GOD is love. The whole scripture is a history of the wonders which his love has done for the children of men. It was love which first gave being to the universe. The same continued love has preserved it. But the description of the works of creation and preservation takes up a small part of the sacred volume. The great subject of it is redeeming love. In this sweet and amiable light God has proposed himself to our consideration. When his justice was offended at the transgression of his holy law, his love contrived how to get glory to every divine attribute, by pardoning and saving the transgressor. He had provided the covenant of grace, in which was the richest display of his infinite love. In this covenant he glories. He sets it forth and recommends it as the greatest work of God, and has revealed the Old Testament and the New to demonstrate to sinners, that our redeeming God is love. When Moses desired to see his glory, he did not refer him to the works of the creation, or to the instances which he had seen of his almighty power; but he sent him to the mercies of redemption, in which he might have the strongest evidences of God's glory. He proclaimed himself as the Old Testament God, under the style and title of—"The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin." Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. This description was fulfilled when the brightness of divine glory was revealed in the person of Jesus Christ. When he came into the world to save men from their sins, then his disciples beheld his glory, and believed that God was love; then they saw the completion of what was written in all the scriptures, more especially in the Song of Songs, concerning the greatness of redeeming love: for though all scripture treats largely of it, yet this is an entire treatise upon the subject. It contains a lively description of the perfect love which our redeeming God has for returning sinners, and of the grateful affection which his love stirs up in them. He relates what graces and blessings he would bestow upon them; and they express their happiness in the enjoyment of his graces and blessings. He finds them black and deformed sinners; and he presents them fair and without spot in the sight of God; and they, knowing him to be their Beloved and their Friend, see him altogether lovely. Upon this subject they discourse, setting forth the happiness of their mutual love.

The Jews call this book "the Holy of Holies;" and so it is to every one who has the love of God shed abroad in his heart. Here he converses with the most holy persons and things, and has a foretaste of those pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore. But here the carnal and unregenerate man reads at the peril of his own soul. He enters as it were into the holy of holies, which was death by the law. He is ignorant of God's being in this place. He puts not off his shoe, although it be holy ground. He puts not off, concerning his former conversation, the old man, who is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, and who neither does understand the things of God treated of in this book, nor can understand them, for want of a spiritual discernment. He cannot know them, says the word of truth, because they are spiritually discerned; and therefore, if he meddle with them, he must profane them. The more sacred they are, the more contrary are they to his nature. The more wholesome they are to the spiritual man, the more poison will the natural man extract from them; and that which is a savour of life proves to him a savour of death.

Away, then, ye profane. Come not near to the holy of holies, nor presume to look into it, lest ye die. You are no more fit to read this book than you are to partake of the sacred elements at the Lord's table. With your carnal unregenerate hearts you will read the one and partake of the other, to your greater condemnation. Oh! keep back then, and presume not to look into, or to judge of the sacred mysteries of this divine Song. But if you will venture to read it, and to ridicule it, remember that it is one of the treasures of divine wisdom; and though you may level your wit against a Song of Solomon's, yet it falls upon the almighty God who inspired it. And are you arrived at such desperate wit, as to break jests upon God, and to make sport with his omnipotence? Oh! fear and tremble for yourselves, lest, while you are shooting up your arrows, even your bitter words against heaven, God should send them back upon your own heads with a swift destruction. May his grace show you your danger, and dispose you to leave your sins! and whenever you are stirred up to seek pardon and peace in Christ Jesus, then you will begin to understand this book; and when you have any experience of God's love to you, then you will find comfort and profit in reading it.

I propose, through God's assistance, to treat of some parts of it in a practical way: and to make our future consideration of these particular passages more plain and easy, I shall at present lay before you a general plan of the book. And this we have in the words now read. They are the title prefixed to it by its divine Author, and serve as a short comment to explain its principal use. I shall therefore endeavour,

First, To settle the true sense and meaning of the words—from whence we may gather,

Secondly, That the scope and design of this sweet portion of scripture is to describe the mutual love of Christ and his church.

Thirdly, I shall bring some arguments to prove that this is the scope and design of it: and,

Lastly, I will reduce these truths to practice, and make some useful inferences from them.

And first, The words now read are the title, which the Holy Spirit prefixed to the book, that they might serve as a key to open its scope and design. The Song of Songs which is concerning Solomon, which treats of Solomon. A song, in the scripture usage of the term, consists in setting forth the praises of God. It is a hymn to his honour and glory. The spiritual songs of scripture have no other object but the God of love, and no other end but to raise and exalt our ideas of him and of his works, especially of his works of grace, whereby he brings lost sinners to a happy sense and sweet experience of his love. St. Paul has given us a short, but it is a very full, comment upon the scripture songs, Col. iii. 16: "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts unto the Lord." Hence we learn the nature of these songs; they are the words of Christ, revealed by him and concerning him; and in them we are to teach and to admonish one another, to the end that the word of Christ may dwell in us richly in all wisdom; for they are spiritual songs; and he that sings them must have grace in his heart: without this qualification he will sing the song of fools; and he must also sing "to the Lord," to the glory and honour of his holy name. After this apostolical rule, we may explain this song. It is the word of Christ, revealed by him, and concerning him, and we are to teach and to admonish one another in the things of Christ out of this song. We have the apostle's command to do it, with this encouragement, that the word of Christ may dwell in us richly in all wisdom: for this song is of a spiritual nature, treating of spiritual persons and things, and cannot be sung aright unless grace be in the heart, nor will profit unless we have an eye to the Lord in every word of it. If we look off from him to any lower object, we not only lose sight of its scope and design, but we also form a judgment of it contrary to the judgment of the Holy Spirit, who has exalted this above the rest of the scripture songs, and has dignified it with the high title of "The Song of Songs." There are many divine songs; but this is, by way of eminence, above, and in copiousness comprehends, them all. It is the sum and substance of them, and the point to which they tend. God is the subject of every spiritual song: and what can we find in God which calls for louder songs of praise than that love which is above all his works? which was before them, for it gave them their being; which is with them to preserve it; and will be with them to the boundless ages of eternity. Surely a hymn upon this exalted subject deserves the title of "The Song of Songs;" especially when the divine person, of whom he treats, is considered in it under his most amiable character, and set forth under the style and title of the Prince of Peace; for this is the meaning of the word Solomon in Hebrew. The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's, our translation reads; but the Hebrew particle, put before Solomon, is the sign, not of the genitive, but of the dative case, and is frequently rendered, concerning or touching such a person or thing. Thus, Isaiah v. 1, "Now will I sing to my well-beloved a song of my beloved, touching his vineyard." And again, Psalm xlv. 1, "I speak of the things which I have made, touching the king." It is also several times rendered concerning, as Gen. xix. 21, "I have accepted thee concerning this thing; and in Jer. xlix. it is frequently translated concerning. In this sense it is here used. The Song of Songs which is concerning Solomon—not King Solomon, but the Prince of Peace, Jesus Christ, of whom Solomon was a type and figure, as it appears from Psalm lxxii., which has the same title as the Song. It is inscribed to Solomon, is concerning him, and treats of him; but several passages of it can be applied to none but Jesus, the Prince of Peace, of whom only it could be truly said, that he had dominion from one end of the earth to the other; that all kings should fall down before him, and all nations should serve him; that he should save the souls of the needy, and should redeem their souls; and that prayer should be made unto him continually, and all nations should call him blessed. These things cannot be spoken of King Solomon; but they are strictly true of the Prince of Peace, Jesus, the Lord of life and Redeemer of sinners. Therefore the title of Psalm lxxii. has the same meaning as the title of the Song; and when the Holy Spirit says, "The Song of Songs, which is concerning the Lord and giver of peace," he would plainly point out to us the principal use of this scripture. It is a treatise concerning the God of love, under the character of the Prince of Peace, describing how happy we are in Christ Jesus, when we, who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ: for he is our peace. And this leads me to consider,

Secondly, The scope and design of this sweet portion of scripture. It is to describe the peace which Christ has given to the faithful soul, and sets forth the happiness of the soul in the enjoyment of it. Christian peace is the fruit of that love which the Holy Spirit has manifested to sinners, and flows from a sense of their reconciliation with God, through Jesus Christ their Lord; of which the apostle thus speaks: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." And when we have thus tasted how gracious the Lord is, then we cannot but love him who first loved us; and the sense of this love fills the mind with joy and peace. In this order St. Paul has placed these graces: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace." Our love is by nature placed upon a wrong object. Sin alienated our hearts from God. Our affections are turned from him, and seek for happiness in creature-comforts. And although daily disappointed, yet they continue to seek it, until the Holy Spirit convince them that they are seeking happiness in a vain shadow, and disquieting themselves in vain. And when he has shown them that nevertheless they may be completely happy in God the Saviour, and has stirred them up earnestly to desire his salvation, then he has prepared them to read this divine treatise with profit; the scope and design of which is to set before us Jesus Christ as the only excellent and lovely object of our affections: and when we, by the eye of faith, behold him, and by the power of faith are united to him, then we know what the apostle meant when he said, "To them that believe, Jesus is precious;" and we can take up the words of the believer in the Song, and declare that he is altogether lovely—the chiefest among ten thousand. And thus every other object will fade away in our esteem, and grow mean and worthless in comparison of God our Saviour; whereby we shall be able to enter into the spirit of the Song. We shall know something of that spiritual fellowship and communion of which it treats: for it dwells largely upon the mutual joys and mutual praises of Christ and the believing soul, describing the complete happiness which they have in each other. This is the general plan of the book, which is very well expressed in the argument put before it, in the Bible that was in use in Queen Elizabeth's time: "In this Song, Solomon, by most sweet and comfortable allegories and parables, describeth the perfect love of Jesus Christ, the true Solomon and King of Peace, and the faithful of his church, which he hath sanctified, and appointed to be his spouse, holy, chaste, and without reprehension: so that here is declared the singular love of the bridegroom toward the bride, and his great and excellent benefits wherewith he doth enrich her, of his pure bounty and grace, without any of her deservings. Also the earnest affection of the church, which is inflamed with the love of Christ, desiring to be more and more joined to him in love, and not to be forsaken for any spot or blemish that is in her."

This was the judgment of our reformers: and they were not singular in it, as I purpose to show under my third head, which was to bring some arguments to prove that this is the scope and design of the book.

The first argument, which would occur to every serious person, is, the universal consent of expositors. All the Jewish writers suppose it to treat of the spiritual union between Christ and the believer. All Christian writers understand it in the same sense. And the unanimous opinion of all learned and good men ought certainly to have great weight with us: for the scope and design of the book must be very plain and clear, since there never was any dispute about it in the church of God. This, then, being the received sense, I may proceed to examine upon what principles it came to be so universally received. I suppose men were led to consider it in this light from the established method of explaining scripture: and this is the second argument I shall use.

The scriptures are suited to man in his present state. While he is here in the body, he cannot converse immediately with spiritual objects: he can only see them comparatively, as compared to and illustrated by material and sensible objects. The scriptures take this method of instruction. They teach us spiritual and heavenly things, under their expressive images of nature. Whoever considered the scriptures in this light, could not rest in the literal sense of the Song. He knew that all scripture had a spiritual sense; and therefore, in reading the Song, he would consider what the spiritual sense could be; and he could not easily mistake it when he recollected what was the one great end and aim of all scripture. Every part of it was to lead men to some knowledge of Christ; which is the third argument tending to open to us the scope and design of this divine book.

Search the scriptures, says he of whom they write; for these are they which testify of me. The Song is part of these scriptures; and therefore it testifies of Christ. And what other testimony does it bear of him than in setting forth the love which he has for his faithful people?

The testimony of Jesus, says St. John, is the spirit of prophecy. If you understand the prophetical spirit of this book, you will read it in the testimony of Jesus: therefore, if you do not see how it bears testimony to him, you have no insight into its prophetical spirit.

Again we read, "That the holy scriptures are able to make a man wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus: for all scripture is given by inspiration of God." 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. From whence I infer that the Song, being part of scripture, is given by inspiration of God, and was therefore given that it might make the man of God wise unto salvation; and this it does by establishing him in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Another proof may be taken from the forty-fifth Psalm, which is a song of loves.

The subject and the manner of the composition are the same with this divine book. They treat of the love of Christ to his church, and after the manner of a dialogue; and the forty-fifth Psalm is applied to Christ by an infallible interpreter. St. Paul, in the 1st of the Hebrews, and the 8th verse, says, that it was written of God the Son: from whence we may conclude that the Song, being upon the same subject, and drawn up in the same manner, treats also of the love of God the Son to his faithful people. And to confirm the interpretation of these more general proofs, I may mention a fourth argument, taken from those places of scripture wherein Christ is spoken of in the very terms used in the Song. The scripture often speaks of him under the character of the bridegroom. In the 25th of St. Matthew we have the parable of the ten virgins who went out to meet the bridegroom, who, in the 13th verse, is called the son of man. In the 5th of the Ephesians, St. Paul is treating of the love and union between husbands and wives; and in the 32nd verse he says, "This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and his church," in the same manner, and with the same expressions, which are used in the Song, and which are carried on through the New Testament: for thus we read, in one of the last scenes of the Revelation of St. John, that the multitude of the heavenly host cried aloud, as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth: Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour unto him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. And in the 21st chapter St. John informs us who the bride, the Lamb's wife, is—the church, the Jerusalem that is above, which is the spiritual mother of us all, even of every one of us who shall be so happy as to be called to the marriage-supper of the Lamb.

From these authorities it appears to me undeniably evident that it is common in scripture to speak of Christ in the very same manner that he is spoken of in the Song: and therefore, summing up all these arguments together, considering that the expositors, Jews and Christians, are agreed about the plan and design of it, and that the received sense is agreeable to the general rule for interpreting scripture, and is founded upon clear reasoning from many particular passages, and more especially from those passages wherein express mention is made of Christ's love to the faithful, under the very images used to represent it in the Song, we may certainly from hence conclude that the scope and design of this sweet portion of scripture is to set forth in the most lively and affecting manner the mutual joys and mutual praises of Christ and the faithful.

Having thus far endeavoured to settle and establish the principal use of this sacred book, I come, in the fourth and last place, to reduce what has been said into practice, and to draw some useful inferences from it.

The Song, as you have heard, is of the nature of a parable, wherein spiritual things are described by material. It is one of the offices of the wisdom that is from above, to understand a parable and the interpretation thereof. I have endeavoured to give you the interpretation of one of the sweetest of all the divine parables. And are there any of you, my brethren, who, after what has been said, are not yet reconciled to this book? Do you think that it had better have been left out of the sacred volume? Consider, that your opinion weighs nothing against the unanimous consent of the church of God, and your opinion is founded upon your ignorance of the things of God. If you understand this book, you could not think meanly of it; but, in order to understand it, you must have some experience of that love of which it treats: having never tasted of it, you cannot enter into the spirit of the descriptions of it here made by Christ and by the faithful. Instead, then, of looking into the book for matter of censure, look into your own hearts, and beg of God to show you how much you stand in need of having the love of Christ shed abroad in them; and whenever he enables you to say with the apostle, Jesus Christ loved me and gave himself for me, then you will taste and see how exceedingly sweet every image and description is in this divine Song.

If you cannot be persuaded to desire the love of God may be shed abroad in your hearts, you will entertain a mean opinion of this treatise upon it. But for the sake of your dear and immortal souls, suffer not yourselves to speak irreverently of it. If God ever revealed himself to man, this is part of his revelation. The holy and eternal Spirit, who inspired all scripture, spake this by his unerring wisdom. He is the author; and the subject is the deep things of God. Let not then a disrespectful word come out of your mouths against it. But if you will suffer your wit to run into licentiousness, remember that you ridicule this book at the peril of your souls. You are guilty of blasphemy against the Most High. And how can you think it safe to jest upon the Almighty, and to make sport with his omnipotence? Why will you set God at defiance, and add fresh fuel to his wrath, as if all your other sins would not sink you deep enough into the pit of destruction? If you have any love left for your eternal interests, forbear this desperate wit; and beg of God to enlighten the darkness of your understandings, that you may see the scope and design of this sacred Song. And to those persons who desire this, I make my second remark.

You do not clearly comprehend the things written in this book, but you desire to comprehend them. If this desire be from God, it will put you upon praying for the experience of that love which is here treated of. You may possibly come at the meaning of some things in it, but you cannot know them practically nor profitably, until you are taught them of God. You cannot tell what the love of God is until it be shed abroad in your heart. No description can make you acquainted with it: and therefore look up to God, who has it to give. Ask him, out of the riches of his grace, to bestow it upon you: and when he gives you the comfortable sense of it, then you will have the best key to open the mysteries of this divine Song. And for your encouragement in seeking, remember that this love is free. Though it be inestimable, yet it is to be had without money and without price. God had no motive to show it to sinners but his own inherent mercy, and he waits for no merit or qualification in them: for it is to supply the want of all merit and qualification: and he has already begun to bestow the riches of this free love upon you by making you sensible of your want of it, and by putting you upon seeking for it. Wait upon him, then, in the ways of his ordinances, and he will finish what he has begun. He will enable you to love him, because he first loved you. Ask this out of a due sense of your unworthiness, and the Father, for the sake of his Son, will shed abroad his love in your hearts by the Holy Ghost. And thus he will bring you into the happy number of those believers, to whom I make my third and last inference.

You, my Christian brethren, can read this sweet portion of scripture with delight and profit. You know it to be true by your own experience. You look upon Jesus Christ in the light here described: for he is your peace, and you find his dealings with your souls are the very same which the Song mentions. For what the Song says of the church in general must be true of every individual who is a member of it: for the church is nothing more than a congregation of believers united by faith, and by the bond of the Spirit to Christ, the head of the spiritual body, and by love to one another. United to him, as the members are to the head, and united to one another, as the members are in the same body. What, therefore, is spoken in the Song of the whole church, as the spouse of Christ, is true of every particular Christian. And what is said of the church is briefly this: in the first chapter, the church expresses a strong desire for nearer communion with Christ; and then there follows some declining of her affection. After this, we have her recovery—a regaining of her first love: and yet she afterwards declines again in her affection, her love grows cold, and she falls into a state of desertion. Christ hides his presence from her more than he did in her former coldness; and this continues until, perceiving Christ's constant affection to her, notwithstanding her unkind treatment of him, she recovers, and follows him more closely, and with a more constant love than before.

These passages agree with the experience of the best Christians in the course of their own lives; and therefore the Song is not a dark unintelligible book to them. They find it to be an experimental treatise upon the love of Jesus Christ to his people. And all of you, my Christian brethren, understand it in this light. You have read it with care, praying the holy inspirer of it to enlighten your understandings, that you may see its true sense and spiritual meaning; and he has opened to you the truth of its descriptions. The Holy Spirit has drawn you to Christ, and has made you happy in the sense of his love, and thus he has given you the best comment upon the Song. The more he enables you to taste of this love, the more clearly will you understand the Song. You will have the greater insight into it, the nearer access you have to the Father, with confidence through the faith that is in Christ: for what is written concerning communion with God must certainly be best understood by those who live in close communion with him. This is your privilege. Remember how great and high it is, and act worthy of it. You have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit is the bond of this communion, and therefore it is called the "communion of the Holy Ghost." Oh beware! then, of every thing that would grieve or offend him. As his is a holy office, entirely relating to holiness, nothing can displease this Holy Spirit so much as sin. He is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity. The least thought of sin offends him: for it is sin that pollutes his sacred residence, and defiles the temple of the heart. Sin makes him withdraw and hide the light of his countenance, and withhold the sweet sense of his comfortable presence. Oh! beware, then, as you love your own peace of mind, as you love your God and his glory, as you love Jesus Christ and his salvation, beware of the least approach to sin. Pray, watch, strive against it. Resist unto blood striving against sin. Wait upon God in all his ordinances to get power over it. And the more you are dead to sin and alive unto God, the nearer fellowship will you have with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ; and as this fellowship is the subject of the Song, you will therefore understand it the better, and experience more of its sweetness.

My Christian brethren, you have tasted of its sweetness. You know the loving-kindness of the Lord; and if you would have the constant abiding sense of it, earnestly beseech the Holy Spirit to keep you from offending him in thought, word, and deed. Entreat him to give you grace never to grieve him. Stand in awe, and sin not. Sin is your great enemy. Nothing makes God hide his face from you, but sin. All the darkness, and blindness, and depravity that are in the soul, concerning the things of God, come from sin: from it came all misery. Oh, watch then, and pray always against it. Pray that you may be kept from the works of darkness, and from every error and vice which would cloud the understanding, and hinder your reading this portion of scripture with profit. Look up to the Spirit of wisdom, and entreat him to open to you the true sense and meaning of the Song, and to give you the happy experience and comforts of its doctrines. And that we may all receive the benefits from it which he intended it should administer to his people, let us humbly ask it of him in the words of our church, which hath taught us to pray, saying,

Blessed Lord, who hast caused all holy scriptures (and this portion of them in particular which we have been considering) to be written for our learning; grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort of thy holy word we may embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us in our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

DISCOURSE II.

CHAP. i. ver. 4.

Draw me: we will run after thee.

THE Saviour of sinners is God and man united in one Christ. As God, he has all the perfection of heaven; and as man he has all the beauties of this earth. He has every grace of time, and every blessing of eternity, which ought to draw and to attract our love. But while men are in their natural unregenerate state, they see none of his perfections and beauties. They behold no form nor comeliness in him that they should desire him. The world and the things of it appear more desirable than he does. The base perishing joys of sense have the entire possession of their affections. Sin is more lovely in their eyes than God the Saviour; and they give up their hearts to its enjoyments, in preference to him and his heaven. While they continue to place their love on such unworthy objects, they are incapable of judging of this divine Song: for they are not only strangers, but also enemies to that love of which it treats; and how, then, can they see the beauties of its composition, or judge of the justness of its sentiments? So long as they love sin, they cannot love Jesus Christ; and therefore they cannot love the sweet descriptions in this poem, which set forth the happiness of loving him above all things. But when their eyes are opened to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and their hearts are once drawn from the love of sin, when they have found that it cannot make them happy, then they are glad to hear of a Saviour; and when they have tasted of his love, then they begin to understand and to admire the beauties of this divine Song; and the more they love him, the greater beauties do they find in it.

The subject of it is the union betwixt Christ and the faithful soul. In this, all the expositors of scripture, ancient and modern, are agreed. It is a spiritual Song, composed in the manner of a dialogue. The speakers are Christ and the believer. The inspirer of it is the holy and eternal Spirit, who delivered it by the mouth of Solomon. He knew it to be true by his own experience, as every believer does to this day. After he had left God, he sought for happiness in the creatures, but was disappointed He turned from one object to another, tried the whole circle of worldly enjoyments, and, as he passed on, he wrote upon each, vanity and vexation of spirit. It pleased God to show him his error, and to make use of him as a proper person to warn others from setting their hearts upon any object but God: for if Solomon could not find happiness in the world, what can the man do that cometh after the king? This is the subject of the book of Ecclesiastes. After Solomon had turned from these worldly vanities, to serve the living God, he wrote this divine Song, to show what true happiness he had found, and every believer will find, in being united to Christ in the bonds of love and affection. The Holy Spirit had drawn his heart from the love of all inferior objects to God the Redeemer, and had given him faith to see his own interest in what the Redeemer was to do and suffer for him. By these bonds the union was formed and perfected. The Holy Spirit, on Christ's part, and faith on the believer's, united them to each other. And the believer here describes what happy effects flowed to him from this union; and Christ describes the delight he had in it. The descriptions of their mutual love and happiness run through this Song of Loves.

The awakened soul begins with expressing its desire to receive some sensible tokens of Christ's love, in the second verse; setting forth the excellency of it in the third; and at the same time its own utter inability and insufficiency to attain it, unless Christ would be pleased to draw the affections from all other objects unto himself: "Draw me," as it follows in the fourth verse, "and we will run after thee." Draw me, Lord Jesus, from the love of the world, and the things of it. Draw me from the love of sin and self. I feel my bondage; I find that I am a slave, and am without strength to deliver myself. Oh draw me, then, by the sweet impulse of thy good Spirit from my bondage and slavery. And when thou art pleased to set my feet at liberty, then we will run after thee —we, in the plural number: for when the heart is once drawn after Christ, it commands all the faculties; and they which could not stir before, now run; they which had no strength now run against all opposition; they which were enemies to Christ now run after him with joy in the ways of his commandments. Draw me by thy grace, and we, every faculty of soul and body, will obey, we will follow the divine attraction, and thou shalt be our God and king ruling over us, and getting thyself glory by setting up thy kingdom within us. May these be the desires of all your hearts, while we are here met together! May the Lord Jesus draw your thoughts from every vain and sinful object, and keep them fixed upon this subject! Oh that he may send his good Spirit to open your understandings clearly to see, and to influence your affections readily to receive,

First, The reasons which induced the awakened sinner to desire Christ would draw him.

Secondly, The scripture method of drawing the soul unto Christ.

Thirdly, The certain effects which follow upon its being drawn. And then,

Fourthly, I will reduce these particulars to practice, and will apply them closely, as God shall enable me, to every one of your consciences.

And First, We need not look farther then the text for the reasons which induced the awakened sinner to desire Christ would draw him. He found he could not run after Christ unless he was drawn: for although God be the fountain of all good to his creatures, and the God-man Christ Jesus be the fountain of all good to his sinful creatures, yet they are not willing to go and receive good at his hands. Sin has corrupted all the faculties of the soul, and has turned and alienated them from God; insomuch that they leave God to seek good in the creature, and idolize it by placing their happiness in it. The God of this world, and his riches and honours, and pleasures, have possession of their hearts; and the God of heaven, who promises them heavenly riches, and honours, and pleasures, has none of their affections; nay they hate him. While they love present and sensual gratifications, they are haters of God. They hate him because their sinful nature is opposite to his perfect holiness, and because he has forbidden them these gratifications, which they are determined to enjoy; and they hate him the more, because he has threatened to punish them, and conscience informs them that they deserve the threatened punishment. This is the state of all men by nature. They are lovers of sin, and haters of God, Rom. i. 30. And until this hatred be conquered, how can they come to God with any kind of love? Their affections will lead them farther from him every step they take: and how can they return unless he draw them to himself? If they can but be convinced of the vanity and emptiness of all these creature-comforts, upon which they have set their hearts, and can see reason to think that God will be reconciled, and love them notwithstanding their former opposition to him, then they will be disposed to seek his love; but until they be convinced of these two truths, they cannot be drawn to seek happiness in God.

This is the plain doctrine of scripture. Our divine Lord and Master thus instructs his disciples, John vi. 44: "No man can come unto me, except the Father, which hath sent me, draw him." No man, be he ever so moral, civil, and learned, let him have ever so many natural gifts and acquired accomplishments, can come, has either will or power to come, unto me for the graces and blessings which I have to give, unless the Father which hath sent me draw him by the sweet attraction of his good Spirit.

Our church teaches the same doctrine, in her tenth article; "The condition of man, after the fall of Adam, is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God: wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will." Here we are taught that man by his fall is turned away from God, and has no strength to return, unless the grace of Christ go before to give him a good will, and then work with him when he has that good will. He has no strength in any of his faculties: they are all turned from God; and the grace of Christ alone is able to draw them back again. The understanding has no light. It is entirely in darkness, as to the things of God, Eph. iv. 18, and the eye of the mind can no more enlighten itself, than the eye of the body can enlighten itself without light. When the first ray of grace breaks in upon us, it finds us, as it did the heathens at the coming of Christ, sitting in darkness and in the shadow of death. And unless the rays of his grace shine into the understanding, it cannot be enlightened. Christ is the only light of the world. He is, in the kingdom of grace, what the sun is in nature. Stop the influence of his bright beams, and the understanding will never see any reason to follow him, nor can the will choose him. The will of the natural man is depraved.

It has a wrong bias, and is directly opposite to the will of God, and never can desire to be reconciled, unless the Holy Spirit draw it.

But does not the Holy Spirit's thus drawing it destroy our free will? By no means: for it cannot destroy what is not. Fallen man has no free will but to sin: if that may be called free, "which is tied and bound with the chains of sin," as our church expresses it. The scripture is absolutely positive upon this point, declaring, Rom. viii. 7, "that the carnal mind," the will of our corrupt nature, "is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be," until it be delivered from the bondage and slavery of sin. It cannot be subject to the will of God unless his grace draw it to himself: for by nature it is drawn to sin. "The flesh always lusteth against the spirit," says the scripture. "Fallen man is of his own nature inclined to evil," as our ninth article teaches. We run fast enough into evil. We want nothing to draw us. Sin strikes upon our nature, and catches like a spark upon gunpowder. Surely we can all remember with what different tempers we used to go to the playhouse and to the church; how much greater delight we took in spending an evening over the devil's books, at an innocent game of cards, as his children call it, than in reading the word of God. And are there none of you who now find more joy in many things than you do in prayer? These are evident proofs that you are still governed by the will of the flesh, which, the scripture says, lusteth always against the spirit: and therefore how can a desire ever arise in it after God, or the things of God, unless Christ draw it to himself? But the worst part of our corruption consists in the depravity of our affections: for they are also governed by the will of the flesh, and are, according to the apostle, to be crucified, Gal. v. 24: "And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." And they that are not Christ's are still under the power of the affections and lusts of the flesh. The heart, which is the commanding faculty, is in them shut against God; but is open to receive sin, loves it, dotes upon it, yea, is so enamoured of it, as to prefer its short and empty joys to the solid felicity of an eternal heaven. And what power is able to break these chains? Who can set our hearts at liberty, and turn them from sin to righteousness? Who but the same God that created our hearts at first? He alone can draw the affections from the love of the world, and from the love of sin and self, up to the things above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.

Upon all these accounts it appears that man is incapable even of going to Christ, and much more of running after him, unless he be drawn. The scripture is express: "No man can come unto Christ, except the Father draw him." Our church is clear in her opinion: "Such is the condition of fallen man, that he cannot turn himself to God unless the grace of Christ go before, to give him a good will, and then work with him when he has that good will." And this is also evident from matter of fact, and from experience. We find that all men, by nature, instead of turning themselves to Christ, who is the fountain of every good, turn to sin, which is the source of every evil. Among learned and polite nations, professing Christianity, there is the same ignorance of the things of God as among the darkest heathens; the same depravity of the will, the same corruption in the heart and the affections; which are clear and full proofs of our inability ever to go to Christ, unless he draw us to himself. The speaker, in the text, saw these proofs in a strong light. He found his want of a Saviour, and he felt how unable he was to do any thing towards attaining or meriting the Saviour's love: he was quite helpless, and without strength; therefore he begs the grace of Christ would draw him. My brethren, are you in this state? Do you see the reasons which I have now laid before you in a clear and convincing light? If not, may the ever-blessed God, of whom we are speaking, draw you by his grace unto himself: but if you are convinced, then you will gladly follow me to the consideration of the scripture method of drawing the soul to Christ: and this is the second point upon which I was to speak.

It is evident, fallen man wants drawing to Christ, because the scripture has taught us the established method by which he draws us. The several steps of it are there particularly marked out for our instruction, that we might be certain how the work of grace advances in our own souls. The word of God is the outward means of drawing us. The Holy Spirit applying the word is the inward means. He begins his application by awakening the careless secure sinner, and by convincing him deeply and thoroughly of his being a sinful helpless creature. He shows him how entirely he is departed from God, and how unable he is to return; and then he makes him deeply sensible of his misery until he does return. By which means the awakened sinner finds his want of a Saviour; and it is the daily prayer of his heart that he may find pardon and peace through the blood of the Lamb of God; but at the same time he feels so much of his corruption, that he knows these prayers could never have arisen in his heart unless the Holy Spirit had begun to draw him unto Christ. He who could before boast of the light of nature, and of the great stretch of his reasoning faculties, now finds nothing but blindness and darkness in his understanding. He who used to think highly of the dignity of human nature, and of man's rectitude, and of the moral sense, &c. now sees that his will is by nature inclined to evil, and that our dignity and rectitude, and moral sense, are the mere chimeras of metaphysical dreamers. Now he feels himself to be a poor lost sinner, whose heart and affections are so far turned from God, that, unless the Holy Spirit create in him a new heart, he can never return. Being thus convinced of his sinfulness and misery, and of his own helplessness to take one step towards his deliverance, he is prepared for the next work of grace, which is to draw him and to unite him to Christ by faith. If the Holy Spirit had never convinced him of sin, he would never have found any want of a Saviour; and if he had never seen his own helplessness, he would not have seen any necessity for being drawn to Christ by his grace: but being now convinced that he is both a sinner and also a helpless sinner, the desires of his soul are drawn out after God, and he is in a right temper to wait upon God until he be gracious unto him. And it is the office of the Holy Spirit to keep him waiting in the ways of the ordinances, until, in God's due time, he is sent to convince him of righteousness, and to bear witness with his spirit that the Father has accepted him and pardoned him through the merits of his beloved Son. Hereby he receives a well-grounded faith in the obedience and sufferings of Jesus Christ. He can safely apply the merits of them to himself, and has great joy and peace in believing that they are imputed unto him for righteousness. He has the sure witness of this in himself, even the witness of the Holy Spirit, bearing testimony that Christ is his Saviour, and that God is his reconciled Father. This spirit of adoption enables him to cry, Abba, Father, and to go to God with filial love and confidence. He now loves God, because he knows that God first loved him; and thus he is drawn to God by the cords of a man, by the bands of love, and is ready, through grace, to give outward evidence of the reality of the inward work, by running after Christ in the way of his commandments.

Thus the Holy Spirit is the convincer of sin and the convincer of righteousness; and by these two convictions he draws the sinner, and unites him unto Christ. He shows him that he wants a Saviour, and then he shows him his interest in the Saviour. He first makes him feel that he is a lost sinner in himself, and then that he is saved by the righteousness of Jesus Christ. This is the established method in which the Holy Spirit draws the sinner unto the Saviour; and this is a further proof of its being necessary he should be drawn; since the scripture has informed us both of the agent by whom, and also of the method by which, he is drawn unto Christ

My brethren, have you experienced this? Has the Holy Spirit drawn you from the love of sin and self? Have you left the world, and all that is called great and happy in it, to follow Christ? Is no object more desirable than he is in your eyes? Can you take up the cross, and run after him with joy, although reproach, ridicule, and opposition, meet you at every step? Examine your own hearts, and try them by the certain effects which follow upon the Holy Spirit's drawing the soul to Christ; and this is the third particular in the text: "Draw me, and we will run after thee."

The natural man cannot follow Christ, because his heart and his affections are in another interest. He loves to follow the world and its pleasures. And if he was convinced it was right to follow Christ, he would meet with many insuperable difficulties before he could set out and run after him. But when the Holy Spirit draws him, he then removes that unwillingness which made the way appear so difficult; and when he renews the faculties, he then gives them strength to overcome every difficulty. By his grace the inbred opposition is subdued: the understanding is enlightened, and sees the way clearly; the will follows it readily; the heart and the affections pursue it cheerfully. They follow their Lord and Saviour whithersoever he goeth. They run after him with ease in the way that was before difficult; with pleasure in the way that was before painful; and with continuance in the way wherein before they could not take a step. When the Holy Spirit has drawn the sinner to Christ, and really united him by faith to the head of the mystical body, he is then a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new, both in his state and actions. The branch of the wild olive-tree is grafted in, and partakes of the root and fatness of the good olive-tree, whereby its nature is changed. There is a real and an entire change made, which appears evidently to the common observer by the outward change in a man's life and conversation. He acts upon different motives from what he did before. He pursues different ends, and by different means. Before, he ran after the world, now he runs after Christ. Christ is now become all his treasure, and the heart will be where its treasure is; and where the heart is, the other faculties will follow. No opposition shall discourage them. Let them be drawn and united to Christ, and none of his commandments will be grievous. Even self-denial, the hardest commandment, will be easy. Place the love of Christ in the heart, and the man who before shrank from and trembled at reproach is nothing moved at it. He that was afraid of having his name cast out with contempt, now can rejoice in being despised for Christ's sake: he can give up his character: he was once reckoned a learned and a good man: but now he can bear to be called a madman and a fool. He takes up his cross daily, and runs on rejoicing. The contempt of the world hastens his steps. It spurs him on. It drives him nearer to his Saviour, and makes him live in closer communion with him. If worldly men knew what infinite service they do us by their opposition, they would alter their behaviour; for they are our real friends, though they do not intend us any kindness. They make us sit looser and freer from the world than we otherwise should do; and when we are willing sometimes to take a little rest, and our love and zeal begin to abate something of their ardour, then they stir us up, and make us mend our pace homewards. Thus the Holy Spirit causes all things to work together for our good: even outward opposition, sanctified by his grace, helps us forward, and enables us to run the faster after Christ. And I hope there are many of us who can say with the apostle, that nothing shall separate us from our blessed Lord and Saviour. "I am persuaded," says he, "that neither tribulation nor distress, persecution, famine, nakedness, peril, or sword, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

My brethren, if you have been drawn to Christ, have these effects followed? Are you running after him in the ways of his commandments, and running with delight, as after the greatest happiness you can enjoy in time and in eternity? If this be your state, then in you is this scripture fulfilled. May he keep you by his almighty grace, and lead you on safely, until he draw you up to himself, and make you blessed with him for ever and ever. But if this be not your state, then it is incumbent upon me to warn you of your guilt and of your danger, and to call upon you, by every thing that is dear and valuable, to reflect seriously upon the situation you are in. And this brings me to the fourth and last particular upon which I was to speak. While I am applying it as closely as God shall enable me, oh, may he second my application by his grace, and carry it with his effectual working to every one of your consciences!

And first, in the spirit of love, I address myself to those persons whose affections are not drawn out after Christ by the sweet influence of his Spirit. Although Christ has every beauty, every perfection, in himself, and is willing to communicate to us of his fulness, grace for grace, yet, alas! few persons desire him, and fewer run after him. You may easily draw them to a play, to a concert, or to a ball; but to the God of all grace and glory, what arguments, what motives, can draw them? Propose to them a fair opportunity of getting a great fortune; show them the way to honour and grandeur; their hearts meet the proposal with raptures: but change the discourse, and offer to them the inestimable riches of Jesus Christ, and the eternal honours and grandeur which he has to give; they feel no emotion. What can be the cause of this strange inconsistency? Whence is it that men who love pleasure should nevertheless be so absurd as to prefer sensual to spiritual, and temporal to eternal, pleasures; nay, so monstrously and wickedly absurd as to let the love of the world shut out the love of that God who made it, and who will soon destroy it? What can be the reason of this? But that man is a corrupt, fallen creature, depraved in every faculty of soul and body; insomuch that, in spiritual matters, he is as incapable of acting aright, as a dead man is of acting at all: for he is dead in trespasses and sins. Before he can move or stir a step, he must be awakened and convinced of his own helplessness. Then he will have reason to wait upon God for his help. But if he never finds himself sick, he will never send for the physician. If he be never convinced that he cannot go to Christ unless he be drawn, he will never desire the Holy Spirit to draw him. And if any of you be in this case, awake, thou that sleepest in death! Oh! awake! awake! open thine eyes, and consider thy guilt. Whither can sin draw thee, but to hell? Consider thy danger—how near thou art to it! Thy heart and affections have never been drawn after Christ; but they are still placed upon those objects which draw the love of all natural men unto themselves. Either money or pleasure or ambition are their favourite pursuits, so far as to exclude Jesus Christ, yea, the very hungering or thirsting after him. You have not even a desire to experience his love: and therefore you may be assured that you have no work of grace in you. You are still in your natural state; at an infinite distance from God. You have the guilt of your nature and the guilt of your lives to answer for at his great tribunal. His holy law has already condemned you, and has passed sentence upon you, threatening to pour out all its curses upon your guilty heads. The righteous Judge is bound to see them executed upon you. And you know not how soon he may call you to judgment. Oh! may God rouse up your fears, my brethren, and alarm you at the sight of your danger! Shall you, who fly with eager haste from temporal danger, be easy and careless while the almighty God is your enemy, and he may this moment come and get glory to all his attributes by your everlasting destruction? Can you think yourselves secure in this case while there is only this little light vapour in your nostrils between you and hell? Lord Jesus, forbid it! If any person hear me this day, who came hither without any intention to be made uneasy about the state of his soul, oh let him now feel the misery of being separated from thee, the fountain of good, and draw him to thyself. Dear Lord, now draw his heart from sin and Satan, from the world and the things of it, that he may follow me with profit, and be edified and comforted from what I have to apply,

Secondly, To those persons whose desires the Holy Spirit has begun to draw unto Christ. I hope many of you are brought thus far, and can truly say, "Draw me; and we will run after thee." If you can desire this sincerely, then the Holy Spirit has already begun to set your hearts at liberty. Wait upon him, and he will enable you to follow Christ with delight, whithersoever he calleth you. He will let you see so much of your want of Christ, and of his all-sufficiency to supply your wants, that you will resolve to give up all for him: you will see nothing more worthy of your pursuit than the knowledge of your interest in Jesus. There is indeed nothing else worth your pursuit. Unless you are found in him, God the Father is your enemy, as you are a sinner in yourself; but when he sees you in the Son of his love, a living member of his body, all his blessings are yours, in time and eternity. Oh, then, be earnest, be unwearied at the throne of grace, until you are drawn effectually to Christ, and by faith united to him. Whatever keeps you from him, pray that it may be removed. And be it ever so dear an object—a right hand, or a right eye—look up to him, and he will give grace sufficient for you. If it be sin; he is almighty to save you from it. If it be great sin; his merits and righteousness are infinite. If they be many sins; what proportion do they bear to infinity? Are you a poor lost sinner? Did not he come to seek and to save that which was lost? Are your sins of a deep dye? The greatest have been pardoned. But none, you think, were ever so great as yours. How can that be? Is it not written, Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I, says Paul, am chief. But still the sense of your great unworthiness fills you with doubts and fears. You forget that Christ is the Saviour of the unworthy; and when he gives you Paul's faith, and you can say with him, Jesus Christ loved me, and gave himself for me, then your doubts and fears will fly before it. Whatever keeps you from closing in with Christ is an enemy to your soul. Pray, therefore, against it. Entreat the Holy Spirit to remove it, that you may be drawn to the loving Saviour of sinners and united to him by living faith. And until he produce this grace in you, seek him diligently in all his ordinances. They are the instituted means by which he draws sinners to himself, and more closely unites believers. The word is the ordinance which he chiefly uses to the awakening of sinners. Glory be to him for that attractive virtue and powerful efficacy which still accompanies the preaching of it. By his blessing it is daily effectual to the convincing and converting of careless sinners, and to the building up and establishing of believers. Wait, then, under it, and look up to God for the quickening Spirit to enable you to mix faith with what you hear. Be much in prayer. Pray to have your affections drawn from the world, and fixed upon God. Seek his presence in every ordinance; and when you find him in it, he will give you that grace which he intended it should convey. And thus persevere in the use of the means until he bring you to the end. You shall find him whom your soul seeketh. He will draw you to himself; and then you will be able to run after him to whatever he calls you to do or to suffer. I hope there are several of you in this happy condition: and to you, my Christian brethren, I address myself in the third and last place.

You know the truth of this scripture by your own experience. Having been convinced that you could not come unto Christ except the Father had drawn you by his good Spirit, you waited upon him, until he gave you faith, and united you to Jesus Christ. Being united to the Lord and Giver of grace and glory, all things are become yours. You are now the sons of God; and your heavenly Father will make all things work together for your good. You are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. Oh, remember then your privileges, and walk as children and sons of the most high God. Keep near to your reconciled Father, and be ever looking to Jesus, your dear Redeemer, and seek to be drawn nearer to him daily by waiting upon him in his ordinances, that you may have more of his life and love. And let the great things he hath done for your souls be manifested by your outward walking. Show that you have nearness to God the Father through the Son of his love, and access with confidence through the faith that is in him. Let this appear by your living upon Christ's fulness, and receiving from thence grace for grace. And the more grace you receive, in the strength of it run the faster after Christ for more grace. Run in the ways of his commandments. Follow his example. Press close after him in his steps. And, be assured, the closer you follow him upon earth, the nearer will you come to him in heaven. The more you are conformed to him in holiness, the more shall you be like him in glory.

Happy are you, my Christian brethren, who have been thus drawn to Christ, and are thus running after him. Hold on your course, determined in God's strength not to stop upon account of what he shall either call you to do or to suffer. Pursue the way of duty, in which Christ walked, whatever difficulties you may meet with; and fear not but he will give you strength to go on conquering and to conquer. Whatever his will is concerning you, rely upon him, and he will make you more than conquerors. You know where your strength is. God is your refuge and strength. Go to him in every hour of temptation, and he will give you grace sufficient for you. Ask, and you shall have. The Father will give whatever you ask in his Son's name. This is your great privilege; and God grant you may ever make use of it in time of need. Let us now use it to crave a blessing upon what we have heard. And the whole of this discourse is excellently summed up in the collect of our church for this day:—

"Grant to us Lord, we beseech thee, the Spirit to think and do always such things as be rightful, that we, who cannot do any thing that is good without thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy will, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Amen.

DISCOURSE III.

CHAP. i. ver. 4.

The upright love thee.

THE first part of this verse has been already considered. The person who speaks it, perceiving the form and comeliness of Christ, and finding a sweeter savour in his name than in the most fragrant ointment poured forth, was desirous of close union and spiritual fellowship with him: but, being sensible of his own helplessness to come to Christ, had therefore prayed he might be drawn: "Draw me; and we will run after thee." The prayer was heard and answered. Christ drew the soul by the cords of love unto himself, and, as the following words show, he brought it nigh, and gave it free access with confidence, through the faith that is in him. He shed his love abroad in the heart which drew it out in love to him. The believer found himself enriched with so many graces, and enjoyed such sweet communion with Christ, that he rejoiced in him always, and declared that nothing but sin and ignorance could hinder men from seeing and admiring the excellencies of Jesus Christ. If they were not in a fallen corrupt state, they would certainly admire and love him: for the upright love him.

If you were to ask the generality of men, who call themselves Christians, whether they loved Christ; they would answer, What! do you think we do not love our Saviour? Most certainly we do: for who can help loving him? We are taught to pray to him, and to love him from our very infancy, and we always have loved him.

But if you inquire upon what account they love Christ; what knowledge they have of him and of his salvation; and what proof they can give of their love to him; they are then at a loss; they can only tell you that their parents had them baptized, and brought them up in the church of England, and that they keep constant to their church, and have done their duty, as well as they could, they never wronged any body; no one is without faults; and they have theirs. This is the religion of the greatest part of our people: but how far short is this of the scripture character of one that loves Christ! A man may do all this, and much more, without one grain of love. He may practise many duties in his natural fallen state from several other motives than a sense of love to Christ, and a single eye to his glory. These are the Christian motives to obedience, by which no natural man can be influenced. The Holy Spirit must have convinced him of his fallen state, must have raised him from it, must have opened his eyes to see what Jesus has done for his salvation, and must have shed abroad in his heart the love of God, before he can come up to the scripture character of them that love Christ: for they are upright who love him.

That we may have a clear and full view of the doctrine in the text, it will be proper to consider,

First, What is the scripture idea of the word Upright.

Secondly, That man is not upright by nature.

Thirdly, That he must be made upright before he can love Christ.

Fourthly, That being made upright, he will show his love to Christ by walking in love; and in the Last place, I will draw some practical inferences from the whole. And may the Spirit of grace accompany and bless our meditations upon these particulars. May he direct our hearts into the love of Christ, and render what shall now be spoken upon it the means of increasing it in all our souls. Under his guidance let us consider,

First, What is the scripture idea of uprightness.

The Hebrew word which is here translated, upright, is in the plural number. As a verb, it is rendered, to make straight, Isaiah xl. 3, 4, "to direct in the way," Isaiah xlv. 13, "and to walk straight in it," as 1 Sam. vi. 12, "And the kine took the straight way to the way of Bethshemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left." This is its received sense in the lexicons; and from this idea the noun substantive is used for a directory, whatever guides in the right way; and the plural masculine denotes those persons who are in the right way, and who walk straight in it, whom we properly term upright men; alluding to their having been once in a fallen state and having lost the right way, but, being now raised up, they are brought into it again, and made upright.

"Made upright!" say our moralists, "How absurd is this expression! What necessity is there for making us upright? Are we not so by nature? Have not we all a moral rectitude? Have we not in ourselves the rule of right, and obligations to follow it? We are moral agents, and upright: why, then, do you talk of making men what they already are?"

This is the language of modern reasoners, who would be wise above what is written: "For the soul that is lifted up," saith God, "is not upright in him" Hab. ii. 4. And yet the pride of their hearts loves flattering compliments, be they ever so false; and they are fond of being told of the dignity and rectitude of their nature, although these are mere metaphysical chimeras. They are contrary to matter of fact, and to every day's experience, and contrary to the express word of God, which proves that man is not upright by nature, as I am to show under my second head.

The whole volume of Revelation gives us this character of mankind: "They have all sinned, and come short of the glory of God." And what can be the dignity of a poor lost sinner who has robbed God of his glory? And where is the rectitude of fallen man, of whom "there is none righteous; no not one?" The scripture strikes at the very root of our fancied dignity and rectitude when it declares, Mic. vii. 2, "there is none upright among men," no, not one is there in the rectitude of nature, in which man was at first created; for "God hath made man upright," saith another scripture; "but they have sought out many inventions," sinful as well as foolish, which prove that they are not upright as they first came out of the hand of God. And indeed the scripture speaks so much of the fall and corruption of nature, as if it left man without any power or strength to recover himself. The prophet Jeremiah, praying to God, says, x. 23, "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." To which agree the words of the apostle, Rom. iii. 9, &c.: "We have before proved, both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin: as it is written, there is none righteous, no not one, there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God, they are all gone out of the way:" so that there is no uprightness in any of them. Fallen man is gone out of the right way, and he does not understand how to return into it, nay, he does not so much as seek after God, that he may be set right. His desires and his affections are turned from God: they are set upon sin, as our church expresses it, in the ninth article: "Original sin is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man—whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit." How can man, under the guilt of original sin, have any moral rectitude? Can he be upright who is very far gone from original righteousness? Can he be in the right way, who is very far gone out of it? And how can he be inclined to love Christ, who, by the fault and corruption of his nature, is always inclined to evil? While there is no fear of God before his eye, how can there possibly be any love of God in his heart? The love of Christ is absolutely inconsistent with the blindness and depravity of fallen man, who is in love with sin. Sin and Christ are as opposite as heaven and hell, to which they lead. And as fallen men are inclined to sin, and love it, the flesh lusting always contrary to the spirit; consequently, while they continue in this state, they cannot love Christ; for none but the upright, who are raised from their fallen state, love him.

Men and brethren, examine these authorities. Do they appear to you clear and decisive? Here are the express words of scripture, and the determination of our church upon this very point; declaring that man, in his natural state, is not upright. I would infer, from your presence here, that you do believe this truth; and if you do, may it be a practical belief. Act under the sense of it. As you are convinced that you are not upright by nature, certainly you will seek to be made upright, and will therefore gladly follow me to the third point I was to consider; viz. that you must be made upright before you can love Christ.

There is no other method but what the gospel proposes. You would not go to the law, and set about keeping it more carefully for the future, in order to recover your rectitude; because the law allows of no failing. Upon the first offence it puts you under the curse, and condemns you. And as all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God, therefore by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight. The law is a ministration of condemnation; it is useful to show sinners that they are not upright; but it can afford them no hope; neither doth it offer them any remedy. It can only scourge and wound the conscience with the sense of transgression, and send the guilty to the gospel for the recovery of their uprightness. And the gospel discovers to them the rich plan of grace—the covenant of the Eternal Three—with the distinct offices of each person in the economy of man's recovery. The Father's justice requires and receives; the Son's love pays, the Holy Spirit's grace applies, the atonement. The application is in the hand of the Spirit Jehovah. It is the work of his grace to apply to fallen man the benefits of the atonement, and to unite him by saving faith to Jesus Christ, whereby he is made upright.

The scripture has laid down, and all the upright have experienced, the method which the Holy Spirit pursues in bringing fallen man into a state of uprightness. First he shows the sinner his guilt and his danger, and lets him see that he is not upright. When the Holy Ghost the Comforter is come, says our Lord, he will convince the world of sin. When he comes to the natural man, he finds him secure and unconcerned about the state of his soul or the pardon of his sins: for the whole world lieth asleep, yea dead, in trespasses and sins, until awakened and quickened by the power of God's Spirit. He that can be heard even by the dead, calls, "Awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life." This awakens and alarms the conscience. The sinner is made sensible of his guilt and condemnation, and, convinced of his helplessness, and thus humbled under the sense of his want of uprightness, he is enabled to follow that divine teaching which is to convince him where his wants may be supplied.

He hears the report of the gospel, that all sinners who are sensible of their wants may have them supplied out of the exceeding riches of Christ's grace, who has every thing to give that they can stand in need of. They may receive, out of his fulness, grace for grace. Are they ignorant of the things of God? He is an all-wise prophet to enlighten their understandings. Are they under the pollution and guilt of sin, and under the condemnation of the law? He is an all-meritorious priest, whose blood can cleanse them from the pollution and guilt of sin, and by whose righteousness sinners are freed from the condemnation of the broken law, and stand accepted in the sight of the holy God. Are they enslaved and in bondage to their spiritual enemies? He is an almighty king, who can subdue in them the dominion of sin. When the awakened sinner hears these things out of the gospel, he assents to them as truths, and the Holy Spirit draws his desires out after the experience of them. As he is made to feel his wants, so doth he wish for a supply from Christ's fulness. He pants with fervent desire, and earnest breathings of soul, to know his union with Jesus by faith, and would gladly receive him in all his offices as a king to subdue sin in him, as well as a prophet and a priest to free him from the guilt and deliver him from the punishment of sin. The Holy Spirit cherishes and strengthens these good desires, and in his own good time he completes them; which is the third step in the work of experience.

He convinces the awakened sinner of righteousness by giving him faith to believe that the righteousness of Christ is imputed unto him for justification to life. The scripture says expressly that it is his office to convince men of righteousness, and thereby to give them peace in believing that God the Father is reconciled unto them through the righteousness of his Son: "for being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Rom. v. 1. And when the mind is at peace with God upon account of its being justified by faith, then it is made upright, and the evidence of justifying faith is an upright walking. He that is in a justified state, is upright; and in consequence thereof he will, in his life and conversation, walk uprightly. As he has received Christ Jesus the Lord, so he walks in him, and desires to live to the glory of his divine Saviour. He would have every thought and word and work a testimony of his gratitude. It is the prayer of his heart that he may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, and may show forth the praises of his God by being fruitful in every good work: for "this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and (to the upright who keep them out of love) his commandments are not grievous."

My beloved brethren, consider these things, and weigh them attentively. Have you been made to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin? that it has robbed you of your innocence and uprightness? that you are thereby exposed to the condemnation of the law, and to the wrath of infinite justice? Have you fled for refuge to Jesus? Do you perceive that he is the end of the law for righteousness unto you? And therefore, knowing yourself upright in him, can you say, Christ is precious; he hath made me upright, therefore I love him; it is the grief of my soul to offend him; it is the greatest joy and delight of my heart to live and walk so as to please him? If you are as yet strangers to this happy knowledge, deceive yourselves no longer: do not think you have a sincere love to Christ: for you know not the power of Christ's love to you. But if you have been thoroughly humbled, and convinced of your lost, helpless state, and have received Christ and his righteousness with love, joy, and peace, then, being made upright, it is incumbent upon you to walk uprightly. It is your bounden duty to have a heart full of gratitude to God; and it is your privilege and happiness to be able to express your gratitude in your life and conversation. In them let it appear that you love Christ. Let the world see it in your Christian walking, and give them continual occasion to glorify God on your account. And this brings me to the fourth particular I was to consider; namely, that, being made upright, you will show your love to Christ by walking in love.

When love is in the heart it will appear outwardly. It will have its proper works. It will manifest itself, like light, and spread abroad its sweet influence. Light cannot propagate darkness, nor can the love of Christ produce hatred to his will: it is the doctrine of one apostle to his Colossians, chap. ii. 6: "As you have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him;" and of another apostle: "If any man saith he abideth in Christ, he ought himself also to walk, even as Christ walked." 1 John ii. 6. He is to prove that he abideth in Christ by following Christ's example, and by walking in his steps: for as Christ has made him upright, he will enable him to walk uprightly, because his outward walking is to bring glory to God and good to mankind. The love of Christ in the heart is that practical love which the apostle says is the fulfilling of the law: for it operates in the love of God and in the love of our neighbour, and on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

The upright man has a lively sense of God the Father's being reconciled to him in Christ. Without this he could not love God: for a sinner, conscious of his having offended God, and broken his holy law, can never be brought to love God until he be convinced that God loves him. He may as soon love pain and torments as love an offended God, whose almighty justice is to get itself glory by his destruction: but when he is persuaded that God is reconciled to him, then he has with joy and delight received the word of reconciliation; for "we love him," not abstractedly, or metaphysically, but experimentally, "because he first loved us." And when the Holy Spirit sheds abroad the love of God in our hearts, and reveals to them God's first loving us, then we see God in a new light. We look upon him as our reconciled Father, and in this character he appears altogether amiable and lovely. Having tasted how good and gracious he is, we desire from our hearts to please him; and this desire will certainly operate in the two great commandments—the love of God, and the love of our neighbour.

The upright man loves God and walks with God. Love attracts and unites, and thereby produces communion. The believer has communion with the Father and the Son by the bond of the Spirit; from whence are derived to him all the graces and blessings of the gospel, which he receives with a thankful heart, and shows his gratitude by loving what God loves. We know what God loves, from his revealed will. This is the copy of his mind. And when the same mind is in us that was in Christ, then each of us shall be able to say, "I delight to do thy will, O my God." The will of the upright man is reconciled to God's will; and therefore the way of the commandments becomes pleasant. There may be difficulties in it; but his love rejoices to overcome them. His spiritual enemies may tempt him out of the way; but love sets him above their temptations. When the world tries to share his heart with God, he rejects its offers with scorn; for he remembers that, if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. Does it offer him pleasure? His love has found other kinds of pleasure than the world has to give, even pleasures laid up at God's right hand for evermore. Does it offer him money? His affections are placed upon the unsearchable riches of Christ. There is his heart, and there is his treasure. Does it tempt him with honour? He desires only the honour that is of God. And thus, love arms him against the temptations which try to make his will act differently from God's will. His love being sincere, he has upright intentions, has a straight view of things, sees them with a single eye, and therefore is not easily drawn aside. God's glory is his one great end and aim. He has respect to it in every thing he does, and is as careful of avoiding whatever tends to injure it as if it were wounding the apple of his own eye. And thus the upright man shows his love to God agreeably to what is written: "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

And his love to God not only enables him to do all things, but also to suffer all things. This is a very hard lesson to flesh and blood; but love makes it easy. Every disciple of Christ is called to follow him in the way of suffering. The cross is our portion. Self, indeed, would be gladly excused in the taking it up; but love to Christ enables us to deny self, and to take up the cross daily: "For love endureth all things." 1 Cor. xiii. 7. Love can endure the sharpest cross; and Christians have rejoiced and been exceeding glad in bearing it. They have had trials of cruel mockings and scourgings; yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonment. They were stoned; they were sawn asunder; were tempted; were slain with the sword. They wandered about in deserts and mountains, in dens and caves of the earth, destitute, afflicted, tormented; and yet they were happy under all their sufferings. Many waters could not quench their love, nor could the floods drown it: for they loved not their lives unto the death. In the very flames they triumphed in their love to Christ; and in whatever shape death came, they rejoiced in it, because it would bring them to their beloved Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And, thank God! we have still some men of the same spirit, who know in whom they have believed. Christ is dearer to them than life; and if he should call them to give proof of it, his strength would be perfected in them, and he would enable them to say with the apostle, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us: for I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

And after the upright man has thus learned to do and to suffer all things out of love to Christ, he will certainly keep the second great commandment, which is like unto the first, and love his neighbour as himself. There is no brotherly love in the natural man. He may talk and write about it, but he cannot practise it sincerely and disinterestedly; because his views are narrow and selfish

St. Paul's character of the Romans, chap. i., is true of all natural men; they had every temper that was hateful, and they were haters of God; and hating one another. But how, then, is brotherly love to be attained? It is from above, from whence cometh every good and perfect gift. The apostle Paul says, We must be taught it of God, 1 Thess. iv. 9: and another apostle says, "Let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." From these scriptures it is evident that God teaches us brotherly love; and when we are born of God, are made his adopted children in Christ, and know him to be our loving Father, then have we that faith which worketh by love to God and to man. This working love prays for, and labours to serve, both their souls and bodies. It goes about doing them good, seeking opportunities and willingly neglecting none. This is the upright man's walking with respect to his neighbour. He is knit to him in love, and shows it by the labour of love, by doing every kind and good office that is in his power. And thus he walks in love; as Christ hath loved him; which is the highest degree of brotherly love: for it is our Lord's new and great commandment, that we should "love one another as he hath loved us."

Judge, now, whether there be not good reason for the assertion in the text—"The upright love thee?" Can sinners be sensible of Jesus's having done such great things for them? Can they experience such a happy work wrought in them by the Divine Spirit and not love God? It is impossible. They have been made thoroughly sensible of their being by nature estranged from God, and wanderers from the right way, and of their having no power in themselves to return into it again. They found that they had no uprightness in them; for they loved what God hated; yea, they hated God himself, because he is the just avenger of sin. But upon hearing the report of the gospel, that Christ will receive all sinners who come unto him, they were stirred up to come. And they waited upon Christ until the Holy Spirit brought them good tidings of great joy. He shed abroad the love of God in their hearts, bearing testimony with their spirits that God was their reconciled Father, and they were his adopted children in Christ. And being thus made upright before God, in the strength of the Lord they walk uprightly. In their lives and conversations they make the two commandments, upon which hang all the law and the prophets, the rule of their actions; loving the Lord their God with all their hearts, and with all their souls, and with all their strength, and their neighbour as themselves. And thus they give evidence of their love to Christ. This is the doctrine from which, in the fifth and last place, I am to draw some practical inferences.

And is what you have now heard agreeable, my brethren, to your experience? If it be, you are safe and happy. If it be not, I beseech you suffer the word of exhortation. It is an awful and a solemn word: and may God accompany it with the effectual working of his power! If you were upright, you would love Christ: but as you do not love him, hear and tremble, if you have any love left for your poor souls: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Consider what it is to be under an anathema! to be cursed of God, cursed by his holy law, and to be finally excommunicated by that sentence which is never to be reversed, "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire!" If you make light of this at present, yet, unless you repent, a time will come when you will wish you had never been born rather than have died under the anathema of God. Oh may he now touch the hearts of those ungrateful men who love not the Lord Jesus Christ! and may he, of his grace and bounty, give them to taste of that love which passeth knowledge. May he that heareth prayer hear and answer, while I am speaking a word to the formalist who has something of the show, but no more of the power of divine love than the careless sinner.

The formalist is rather decent in his outward behaviour: he attends regularly upon the ordinances, goes a great way in outward matters, and has the air and appearance of a Christian. If you ask him whether he loves Christ; he is very confident he does, and is somewhat offended that you should suspect his love. But bring it to the test of scripture, and it will not stand the trial; for the formalist not only has not that true love of God, of which the scripture treats, but he is also an enemy to it. He is the first to cry out enthusiasm, if he hear that the love of God arises from the knowledge of our being reconciled to him in Christ. It is with him the very mark of this new religious madness for any man to say that he loves God from a sense of his having freely forgiven him all trespasses. So that the formalist, with all his outward decency and profession, is rather farther from the true love of God than the careless sinner: for the one has it not; but the other thinks it enthusiasm and madness to pretend to have it. And yet the scripture is full of this enthusiasm. It has thus assigned the grounds and reasons of our love to God: "We love him because he first loved us." Here we are taught that our love to him arises from his first loving us: but how can we know he first loves us unless he manifest it and shed it abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost? And in this way he does manifest it. He sends his good Spirit into our hearts to let us know that he first loves us. Hear, ye formalists, the express testimony of God's word; "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." Rom. v. 5. And until the Holy Ghost give you this love, be ye ever so decent, in your outward walking, you have none of the life and power of religion, but are dead in your sins. This is the opinion of our church concerning you: for thus she teaches you to pray: O Lord, who hast taught us that all our doings without charity (or love) are nothing worth, send thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of charity (or love), the very bond of peace and of all virtues, without which, whosoever liveth is counted dead before thee, &c. (Collect for Quinquagesima.) Charity signifies nothing more than love. And in this collect the sense, as well as the epistle to which it refers, determine it to be the love of God: and if you have not this love poured into your heart by the Holy Ghost, let whatsoever else be in your heart, you are counted dead before God. Oh that he may bring you out of that dead, lifeless state, in which you are at present, and raise you up to newness of life, and place you among the upright who love Christ. And Whatever others may do, the upright will love Christ. Though other men may see no form nor comeliness in him, that they should desire him, yet, in their eyes, he is altogether lovely. They love him for making them upright; and they give evidence of their love by walking uprightly. His will is theirs. They love what he loves. His revealed will is the copy of his mind, and therefore it is the rule of their conversations. Being made upright, and the same mind being in them that was in Christ, there will be the same outward walking. They will follow his example, and tread in his steps: for how can their love to Christ act against its own nature, so as to hate this will? Certainly, therefore, their love to him will show itself in love to his commandments. And if a man say, I love Christ, and hateth his commandments, he is a liar; for he that loveth not the will of God, how can he love God? And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God loveth his commandments also.

Is this your experience, my brethren? inquire strictly, and entreat the Holy Spirit to help you in inquiry, whether Christ has made you upright, and you therefore love him and his commandments. I have put you upon this inquiry, because the scripture puts you upon it, and because there is a general mistake concerning it. The scripture has expressly mentioned the effects which will flow from the love of Christ in the heart: these effects we desire you to manifest in your lives. We do not send convinced sinners to the law, and tell them, If ye would enter into life, keep the commandments. No. We send them to Christ, because they have broken the commandments, and they must be pardoned, and receive justification to life from him, before they can keep any one commandment well-pleasing to God. But when the Holy Spirit gives them the knowledge of their pardon and justification, then they receive a faith that worketh by love—a faith that proves itself to be from God by working in love to what God loves. These workings of faith by love to God and man are the marks and evidences we desire to see in your lives and conversations. We are authorised from God's word to call upon you for them; not as if they were your salvation, but as the certain effects of your being in a state of salvation. The sun cannot be without sending out light: so love cannot be without producing its proper works—works as certainly flowing from it as light does from the sun. If works flow not out, we are certain there is no love in the heart; for there is no cause, if there be no effects. Examine, then, I beseech you, the nature of the love which you think you have to Christ: see if it has the scripture marks of true love. Happy is he who looking into his own breast, is able to say, "Lord, thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth I desire in comparison of thee." My brethren, can you take up these words and repeat them with praise and thankfulness? If you can, may you go on rejoicing, daily receiving larger measures of divine love, and bringing forth richer and riper fruits to the glory of God. But if you cannot, do you see your want of love to Christ? and are you hungering and thirsting after it? If you are, look up, and ask it of the God of love. Pray him to bestow it upon you out of the riches of his free grace. And let us all, with one heart and one voice, entreat him, in the words of our church, to give us the experience of what has been now said, praying as she hath taught us—"O almighty God, who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men, grant unto thy people that they may love the thing which thou commandest, and desire that which thou dost promise; that so, among the sundry and manifold changes of the world, our hearts may surely there be fixed where true joys are to be found; through Jesus Christ our Lord." Amen.

DISCOURSE IV.

CHAP. i. ver. 7.

Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon.

THESE words are part of a prayer which the faithful offer up to the great and good shepherd. He had drawn them to himself, had pardoned all their wanderings, and had shed his love abroad in their hearts; which made them pray for his support and defence. They still found that they had many wants, for which they expected a supply out of his fulness, and many infirmities, from which they desired deliverance in his strength. His grace was needful every moment. That spiritual and divine life which he had begun in their souls could not be carried on without his continual help. They wanted the bread that cometh down from heaven, and which is the life of the spirits of men, as much as they want the bread which is the life of the body. And in time of trouble they wanted divine strength. When assaulted with powerful temptations from within and from without, they durst not think of attacking them, and much less of overcoming them with the arm of flesh; but they sought to be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. This is the subject of the words now read; in which the faithful pray the great and good shepherd to tell them where he feeds his flock, and where he shelters them from the scorching heat of the sun at noon: "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon." Here we have

First, The amiableness of Christ's pastoral office: every faithful soul can say to the good shepherd, "O thou whom my soul loveth."

Secondly, The reason assigned for loving him: he feedeth his flock like a shepherd. And

Thirdly, He gives them comfort and strength in the time of great trials: he makes his flock to rest in the burning heat at noon. And Fourthly, He saves his flock from the great trial of all—from death.

And while I am speaking to these particulars, may the Spirit of the living God apply them to all your hearts. May he convince you practically of the amiable-ness of Christ's pastoral office, that you may be able to say from your own experience, " O thou whom my soul loveth." Christ is the good shepherd; and in this character he is altogether lovely. It is one of the sweetest relations that he stands in to his people; and is to them the fullest of comfort: but then they must derive their comfort from knowing him to be their shepherd, and themselves to be his people and the sheep of his pasture. Without this knowledge, speaking of his loveliness would be like talking in an unknown tongue: for what excellency can sinners see in him, that they should desire him, if they were never convinced that they were lost sheep, who must for ever perish, unless the good shepherd bring them back again into his fold? They see no form or comeliness in him until they begin to find their want of him; and therefore, when grace comes, its first work is to convince them of their wants. The first step it sets them in their way to God is, to make them sensible of their having wandered from him. And all of you, my brethren, whatever your state may be at present, had wandered from God. You had gone every man after the error of his own ways; and in the maze of these errors you had wandered so long, that you were quite lost. You could not discover the way back again to God; or, if any one was to show it you, you had neither will nor power to take one step in it. Sin had impaired, yea had deadened, the faculties of the soul. It left the understanding in darkness, the will corrupt and always inclined to evil, and the heart and affections at enmity with God. In this lost and helpless state (and this is the state of every man by nature) you were like sheep that have wandered from the fold. This is a common image in scripture. Fallen man is there compared to a lost sheep; and this is a just and beautiful picture of him; for sheep, as you all know, are simple weak creatures, who have neither force to resist their enemies, nor wisdom to avoid them: they want sagacity to find out the best pastures, to defend themselves from the inclemency of the weather, and to find the way back again to the fold after they have once strayed from it. There is not a creature in the world more helpless than a lost sheep. It must perish unless the shepherd seek it out and bring it back. Now, all the sons of Adam are in this lost and helpless condition: and the first step towards their deliverance is a conviction of their not being able to do any thing towards delivering themselves. Whether they be learned or unlearned, rich or poor, they are alike wanderers from God, and alike unable in their own strength to return. It is exceeding difficult to convince natural men of this truth; and yet the gospel can do them no good until they be convinced. They must see that they are poor lost sheep before they will seek after the salvation which the great shepherd has purchased for them: and because it was necessary they should see themselves in this state, God has therefore been pleased to give them abundant proof of their being in it. The prophet David says, Psalm cxix. 176, " I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant." But lest this should be thought his own particular case, God, by the mouth of another prophet, declares that it is the case of us all: " All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way." Isaiah liii. 6. Here all men, without exception, are said to have gone astray like sheep, and to have turned from the way of God to their own ways; and naturally they are like lost sheep, helpless and unable to return. The people of the Jews were certainly in this condition: for our Lord says, he was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and not to them only, as if they alone were lost: for " other sheep," says he, " I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring " back again to God from their wanderings: therefore they were lost sheep as well as the Jews. " and there shall be one fold and one shepherd."

If the sense of these scriptures were not clear, and their authority decisive, I might bring more proofs; but I hope these are sufficient. They must be satisfactory to the members of our church, because this is her established doctrine, both in her articles and homilies. The homilies on the misery of man are written entirely upon this subject; and the tenth article says, that such is the condition of man after the fall, that he cannot turn or prepare himself to any good unless the grace of Christ go before, to give him a good will, and then work with him when he has that good will. If you never found yourself unable to do any good unless Christ should give you both the will and the power, you may call yourself a member of our church; but you are indeed a stranger to her constitution. And though you attend upon her ordinances, and take her words in your mouth, yet you deny them in your heart. What a mockery is it of God, for a man to come to church and upon his bended knees, in the presence of an all-seeing God, to declare (which you have all done this day), "Almighty and most merciful Father, we have erred and strayed from thy ways like lost sheep," and afterwards to confess "There is no health in us." Is not this mocking God to his face if a man does not believe or does not experience what he says? Let every person who would be thought a member of our church weigh the force of these words, and, if he cannot subscribe to his being a wanderer from God, and as unable to return as a lost sheep, never more let him join with us in our church's confession until he can say from his heart, that he has erred and strayed from God's ways like a lost sheep, and has no health in himself, or strength to return.

It is, then, a plain matter of fact, that fallen man is in a lost helpless condition. He is in it; but the worst part of his fall consists in his being insensible of his danger. He is lost; but he does not know it. He is helpless; but his pride gives him high ideas of his own strength. While he continues in this sinful security, he sees no want of a shepherd; and though he never sends up one wish or prayer for help, yet the great and good shepherd does not forget his own. He is Jehovah, the true self-existing God, the Creator of all things visible and invisible; and this almighty and eternal Being vouchsafes to reveal himself to his people under the sweet and amiable character of a shepherd. Whatever is lovely in an earthly shepherd is to be found spiritually in our incarnate God. Is it expected of a shepherd, that if he lose any of his flock, he should seek diligently until he find it? Is he to spare no pains, to refuse no difficulty or danger, in search of it? Herein we have a beautiful image of our Lord's pastoral love. He looked down from heaven upon the children of men, and saw them wandering every one after the error of their own ways: he saw that destruction and misery were in their ways: he saw the enemy of their souls, like a roaring lion, going about and seeking whom he might devour. His eye pitied them. At the sight of their lost and helpless condition, the bowels of his tenderest compassion were moved. He could not see them perish: and therefore he came down from his eternal throne, veiled the brightness of divine glory under a tabernacle of flesh, humbled himself to the lowest abasement, to be born a servant under the law, to suffer, to die, yea the accursed death of the cross. To this infinite condescension he stooped in order to save his lost sheep. This he expressly declares was the gracious purpose for which he came into the world: "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Even they whom he has sought and saved were lost as well as others, and as helpless as lost sheep. They had no desire, and much less power, to return to God; but were pleasing themselves with the errors of their own ways when the Lord Jesus stopped them. He called to them, and gave them ears to hear: he spake, and gave them hearts to obey. He drew them to himself, and saved them with a great salvation. And thus he was found of them that sought him not. And whoever thou art, whom he has sought, thou hast been made to see thy wanderings. If thou art indeed brought home to God, thou hast been deeply humbled for thy turning away from him; and thou art convinced that, if Jesus Christ had not come down from heaven to seek thee, thou must have been lost for ever and ever. But now being sought out by his tender care, and found, thou canst tell of the love of this good shepherd, who has not only brought thee home to God, but has also pardoned thee, washed thee clean in his own blood, and justified thee with his infinite righteousness. Thou art now admitted into his fold; and the sense of what he has already done for thee will enable thee to go to him continually with faith, and say, "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest. From what I have already experienced of thy love, I doubt not but thou wilt feed me with the bread that endureth unto everlasting life." And this leads me, secondly, to consider a reason here assigned for loving him, namely, that he feedeth his flock like a shepherd.

The earthly shepherd is not only to bring back the lost sheep; but it is also a part of his pastoral office to provide for its future support. He is to see that it lack nothing, but is to feed it in green pastures, and to lead it beside the still waters. And herein we have a lively picture of our Lord's pastoral love. When mankind left God, and turned into the ways of sin, they lost that divine support which is the happiness of the soul, and they were separated from the fountain of life. The apostle says, They were alienated from the life of God. And they had no means to recover it, nor indeed any sense of their want of it. They were lying dead in trespasses and sins when the Lord Jesus brought it down for us from heaven, and they are still in this dead state when he sends his good Spirit, first to convince them how much they want it, and then freely to bestow it upon them: "For the bread of God (that bread which supports the life of God in the soul) is he, which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." This is our Lord's account of himself. He came down from heaven to give this bread of God unto a world dead in sin; and whenever a sinner receives it of him, then he begins to live unto God. This bread is the support received from Christ's body and blood, from the merits of his obedience and sufferings, which are applied to the sinner by the Holy Spirit, and made effectual by the reviving streams of his grace. And this method of feeding his flock is beautifully painted in the 23rd Psalm; the truth of which every believer experiences as well as David, and can therefore truly say, "The Lord is my shepherd; therefore can I lack nothing. He shall feed me in green pastures, and shall lead me forth beside the waters of comfort. He shall convert my soul, and lead me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake." The sheep of the Lord's pasture lack nothing: for he supports them with all things that pertain to life and godliness; and when they find themselves thus supported, they will be full of love to their good shepherd, and they will love the means which he has appointed to convey nourishment to his flock. In these means they have grown in grace, their love has increased, and their hearts have been more inflamed with pure affection to their divine shepherd; and therefore they can always join with the believers in the text, in desiring to be led by his grace to the places and means in which he feeds his flock: "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest thy people and the sheep of thy pasture."

My brethren, can you join with them? Is the good shepherd altogether lovely in your eyes for giving you the bread of God which cometh down from heaven? Have you received it from him? Do you find it strengthening your hearts, enabling you to die more to sin and to live more to God, to get power over inward corruption and outward opposition. Happy are ye if this be your case; for you need not fear his comfort and strength in time of great trials and troubles, as it follows in the third part of my text, he will make his flock to rest in the burning heat at noon.

The heat of the sun at noon is, in Judea, very violent and scorching. The faithful shepherd will take care to drive his flock during these sultry hours to some cool shade. There he will defend them from their enemies; for they are weak and defenceless themselves. All the beasts of prey can with ease devour them; and in hot countries, where the beasts of prey abound, the shepherd is forced to watch his flock in the cold of the night as well as in the heat of the day: for thus we find Jacob describing his care of Laban's flock: "I was in the day consumed with heat, and with frost in the night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes." And in the New Testament we read that in the depth of winter, when our Lord was born, there were shepherds in the open field watching over their flocks by night. How beautifully is our Lord's pastoral care hereby represented! For the shepherd of Israel never slumbers nor sleeps, watching over his flock continually night and day, and he suffers no enemy to come near to hurt them. He himself is a shadow in the day-time from the heat, and a safe refuge from the power of all their enemies. They have a formidable host to contend with. Sin, and Satan, and the world, and the temptations and troubles in it, have taken captive the lost sheep, and law and justice allowed them to be kept in bondage until death should seize upon them and deliver them over to the place of torments, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. From these enemies the Lord Jesus came to save his flock. He subdued all these enemies in his own person, and does subdue them by the grace of his almighty Spirit in all his people. When he has sought them, and brought them back to God, and fed them with the bread of life, then, in the strength of this bread he enables them to fight against their enemies, who are also his; and it is for his glory that they get the victory over them. The weaker they are, the more does his strength appear, which worketh mightily in them and by them. And to encourage them to fear nothing but sin, he thus exhorts them: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom;" and as it is his good pleasure to give you the kingdom itself, he will certainly support you in the way to it. You may be poor and weak sheep; but your shepherd is the Lord God omnipotent. You may have many infirmities; but he knows them, and is touched with the feeling of them. You may have many temptations; but he will not suffer you to be tempted above what he will enable you to bear. Your troubles may be great; but he says, "Fear not: for I am with thee: I will be with thee in trouble; yea, I will deliver thee, and bring thee to honour." Who can doubt of his pastoral love that reads this sweet description of it in Isaiah? "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young." In what a tender and affecting manner is our Lord's pastoral love here represented! He feeds all his flock, so that they lack nothing. If any of them wander from the fold, he gathers them with his arm. Those that are with young, he leads gently: and those that cannot go at all, he carries in his bosom, and lays near his heart. Oh what a wonderful love is this! Certainly there never was greater love, except what our Lord showed when he laid down his life for the sheep: in which instance of his love he is unrivalled. Other shepherds may have such care for their flock as to seek the lost sheep, to feed them all, to watch over them, and to defend them from their enemies: and nothing farther is expected of them. But our Lord showed his greatest love where theirs end. They feed and fatten the flock, that they may feed and clothe themselves with it. They live upon the flock; but he laid down his life for the helpless lost sheep. He died to give them life; for the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep: which leads me to the fourth particular I was to consider; namely, That Christ saves his flock from the great trial of all—from death.

The faithful in the text certainly included this when they prayed for a resting-place from trials and troubles. The raging heat at noon properly expresses the sharpest trial with the last enemy, when sin and Satan try their utmost efforts, and set the king of terrors to attack and alarm the conscience. And they succeed with all natural men. To unpardoned sinners, how fearful is death! The approach of it is to them the beginning of endless sorrows. But our Lord's pastoral love has engaged to deliver the sheep of his pasture from the power and from the fear of death. And here his divine affection for them shines forth in a wonderful manner, which can no more be described than it can be imitated: for if all the holy angels in heaven, and all the creatures in the universe, were to lay down their lives to save one lost sheep, it would be in vain. The Lord Jesus alone was equal to this great work: for he was God and man united in one Christ, and therefore his death was of inestimable and infinite value. By it he made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for sin. St. Paul tells the Corinthians, "I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures." The scriptures of the Old Testament showed, in the sacrifices of the law, that he was to die and to shed his blood for sin. One prophet says that Christ should swallow up death in victory, Isaiah xxv. 8. And in another, Christ himself says, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues: O grave, I will be thy destruction," Hosea xiii. 14. And the New Testament shows how he fulfilled these scriptures. By the one sacrifice of himself he abolished death; so that it has no longer any power over the children of God.

But do not the children of God die as well as other men? Yes. It is appointed unto all men once to die; but death has no power to hurt God's children; and they know, by faith, that it has not. Here is their comfort. Each of them can say, with Paul, Jesus Christ loved me, and gave himself for me. By his death I live. I know him and the power of his resurrection: for I have experienced this power raising me up from the grave of sin to newness of life, and therefore, when I go through the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou, my almighty shepherd, shalt be there with me; and thy rod and thy staff shall then comfort me.

And thus Christ has delivered the sheep of his pasture from the power of death; and thanks be to God who gives us the victory over the fear of it through Jesus Christ our Lord. He came to deliver those who through fear of death had been all their lifetime subject to bondage. And he does deliver them. We see many happy instances of his power to deliver. And if there be any of you, my brethren, whose hearts tell you that you are not delivered, consider what is the reason. Why do you, who call yourselves Christians, fear to die? What is there terrible in death to a true believer? And yet it is terrible to you. If it should come this day, it would surprise you. Nay the very thought of it is painful. You put it aside, and wish to forget it. All this proves that you have nothing more of Christianity than the name. You have experienced none of the life and power of it: for your sins are not pardoned. You fear death, because the sense of guilt is not taken out of the conscience: "For the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." While sin stings the conscience, and the broken law gives strength to sin, so that it stings the deeper, you must fear death. And this is the reason so many people, called Christians, are afraid to die. They do not know that their sins are pardoned, and that all the demands of the law upon them are satisfied, by their good shepherd's laying down his life for them. Nay, they are so far from knowing this, that they never desired, and perhaps many of them think it presumption and madness to pretend to know it. My brethren, if these be your thoughts, you may be assured you can never meet death with joy until faith give you a clear view of your interest in Christ: but when it enables you to see him, obeying, suffering, and dying for your sins, and as your all-prevailing intercessor pleading your cause before God, then the sting of death will be taken away: you will have nothing to fear: for then you will know that all things are yours, whether life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

If we sum up, and lay together what has been said, it will appear that Christ is altogether lovely in the character of the shepherd and bishop of our souls. What more could be done than he has done for the sheep of his pasture? He has brought them back to God from the error of their ways, has supported them when they were brought back, has defended them in their trials and troubles, and has given to them eternal life as the purchase of his death. These, with all the other benefits of the gospel, were obtained by the good shepherd's laying down his life for the sheep, and are now freely bestowed by his grace, and thankfully received by faith. At present it is the great privilege of all Christ's sheep to know by faith that they belong to his fold, and that they have an interest in the blessings which he has to give. These faith receives and enjoys: for we are in possession of none of them until they be applied; and it is faith that makes the application. When we receive faith from the operation of God, then we know that all the benefits which the good shepherd has to bestow are ours: for the language of faith is this: "The Lord is my shepherd; therefore can I lack nothing. He shall feed me in a green pasture, and shall lead me forth beside the waters of comfort. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." When faith fears no evil, no not even death, then hope can rest itself upon the care of the good shepherd, and the sense of his love will produce love and grateful obedience. Thus the graces of the Spirit, faith, hope, and love, are produced in the hearts of all that belong to Christ's flock, and are the sheep of his pasture. They know their good shepherd, and are known of him. They know his voice, and follow him, yea, they follow him with joy, whether he calls them to do or to suffer for his name's sake.

If any of you think this is not to be clearly known, your denial does not prove that God has not promised to give this faith, nor that he does not give it, but only that he has not given it to you: for the scripture has expressly promised it; and it is a certain matter of fact, that God is daily fulfilling his promises. And when they are fulfilled to any person, he cannot but know it. He had been all his life a lost sheep, wandering from God without any desire to return. Does not he know, when he began to pray earnestly, that God would heal his wanderings, and bring him home again? How can he possibly be ignorant of so great a change in his own mind? When his desires take a new turn, he that sought for happiness in the world, now seeks it in Christ, and has turned his back upon all that worldly men call rich and honourable, desiring only the riches of grace and the honours of eternity. How can the man himself not know this, when every body about him sees it? When God has given him these desires, and he is resolved by the help of divine grace to seek until he find by faith that Christ is his Saviour and his God; when his constant discourse is, "Nothing but Christ, nothing but Christ;" does not the man know all this time what he is speaking and doing? It is certain he does, because his neighbours know it and ridicule him for it; and when they cannot laugh him out of his religious notions, they leave him for an incorrigible enthusiast. But if he does not leave seeking God, God will convince him, by many undoubted proofs, that he is one of the sheep of Christ's pasture. God will enable him to know that he is a partaker of all the exceeding great and precious promises of the gospel by means of his union with Jesus Christ through faith, and he will send the spirit of adoption into his heart, bearing testimony with his spirit that he is a child of God. This testimony cannot possibly be a delusion, because it is followed by a change which the Almighty alone is able to effect: for, being united to Jesus by faith, he is made partaker of a new nature, with a new heart and renewed affections: he is a new creature: the old things of his former state and conversation are done away, and, behold, all things are become new. His soul is filled with love to his God and Saviour for doing these great things for him, and shows its love by love to his commandments. When all this is done, may not the man confidently say with the prophet, "The Lord is my shepherd: I am one of his people, and one of the sheep of his pasture?"

Since, then, believers may be as certain of Christ's being their shepherd as they were in the text, and can truly say with them, "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest thy flock, where thou makest them to rest in the raging heat of noon." I have now brought the discourse to the point I aimed at; which was, to prepare the way for this question: and may God enable you to answer it to yourselves honestly and fairly! "Is Christ your shepherd?" Let every one of you ask his own heart, "Is my soul under the pastoral care of this good shepherd?" If you know, by the marks before laid down, that he is yours, and you are the sheep of his pasture, you will love him and serve him, without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of your life. But if you know it not, or are not seeking it, it is incumbent upon me to warn you of your guilt and of your danger. You know not as yet that you have any right to use the words of the text. You cannot say to the great and good shepherd, from a sense of what he has done for you, "O thou whom my soul loveth." You know not that he feeds you with the bread of God, which endureth unto everlasting life, nor that he is your defender in danger, your refuge in time of trouble, your ready helper in an hour of temptation, and your almighty supporter under persecution. Nay, perhaps you may think these things cannot be known. From hence it is certain that you are not at present a part of Christ's flock, and therefore you have none of the blessings or privileges which belong to it—no pardon of sin, no sense of justification to life: you have none of the life which Christ came to give to sinners—no grace, no holiness, no happiness. God the Father is your enemy; his law has condemned you; his justice is concerned to see the sentence of the law executed upon you; and the judge himself has given you an awful description of its execution in the 25th of St. Matthew. Consider these things, my brethren. Weigh the importance of them; and see whether you have not reason to look up to the great and good shepherd, and to entreat him to bring you back to God from the error of your ways. May the Spirit of the living God show you the danger of your present state, and stir up desires in your hearts for deliverance! May he enable you to seek it as his free gift, and in the ways of his ordinances, until you experience the sweet and comfortable doctrine in the text, and can join in gratitude and praise with the Lord's people, and the sheep of his pasture! to whom I shall, in the last place, make a short application.

My Christian brethren, you have experienced the love of the divine shepherd, and therefore you love him, and can with full trust and confidence address him in the words of the text: "O thou whom my soul loveth." In the sense of this love you are happy. Knowing that the incarnate God stands related to you as your all-loving shepherd, you can cast all your care upon him; for he careth for you. He has engaged, and your faith can rest itself upon his promises, that you shall lack nothing. All things are yours: for they are in the hand of your kind shepherd and loving Saviour, who will make them all work together for your good. He knows what is best for you; and he will give it you. And you know it to be best: be it sickness or health, poverty or riches, they are alike sanctified visitations. You taste of God's love in them, and you love him for them. Nothing can hurt you but sin; and you need fear nothing but it: for all things but sin shall do you good. Outward trials and troubles shall be real blessings. They will drive you nearer to Christ, and keep you in closer communion with him; and thereby you will not only be a conqueror over them, but also make great advances in the divine life. "What shall separate us from the love of Christ?" says the apostle, "shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us."

Now, is not this a state greatly to be desired? If something did not blind men's eyes and pervert their judgment, would not they all, out of self-love, seek the happy knowledge of their being the sheep of the Lord's pasture, who lack nothing, and who have all manner of things that are good? The great shepherd and bishop of souls watches over them by his almighty power, suffering nothing to hurt them in their real interest, but ordering all things for their benefit. His very judgments upon the wicked are mercies to them. And since he can thus make outward calamities work for their good, what must his acts of grace and love be? Who can tell how blessed the man is whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered; who has joy and peace in believing that he is pardoned and justified; who has the spirit of adoption in his heart, enabling him to cry, Abba! Father! and abiding with him to strengthen, to comfort, and to sanctify him, shedding daily more and more of the love of God abroad in his heart, and making him fit and meet for glory? Must not such a man be blessed indeed? Can you conceive a more happy state on this side of heaven? And do you not then desire it? If you do, oh, come, taste, and see what happiness this great and good shepherd does bestow; pray to him for the experience of his love and power, and let us join in calling upon him, and saying,

O Lord Jesus Christ, the great shepherd of the sheep, who hast redeemed them by the blood of the everlasting covenant, look down upon this congregation, and be gracious to those who have no desire to know thee to be the shepherd and bishop of their souls. Show them their guilt, convince them of their danger, and enable them, with those who are now seeking, to wait upon thee until thou bring them into thy fold; and there feed them with the bread of God, and support them in all troubles and trials, until death be swallowed up in victory. O blessed and adorable Jesus, give this whole congregation the sweet experience of the doctrine we have been considering; and although we have all been as sheep going astray, yet grant we may all return to the shepherd and bishop of our souls, and be happy with him in time and in eternity. So be it, to the honour and glory of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah: to whom be equal praise and worship, now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

DISCOURSE V

Chap. i. ver. 8.

If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.

These words are in answer to the prayer which the believers had offered up in the preceding verse. They had tasted of the love of the great and good shepherd, and knew they belonged to his flock, and therefore they entreated him to feed them with the bread of God—Give us this day our daily bread—and to lead them in time of trouble and temptation to a place of refuge and safety. Each of them could thus pray for himself: "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?" Why should I be misled by them? If he followed the flocks of these companions, he would be turned aside, and consequently they were not true sincere companions of Christ, but only in name and pretence.

In the words which I have now read we have the success of this prayer. They contain a gracious answer from our Lord Jesus, the great shepherd and bishop of souls. The prayer consisted of two parts; and he makes a reply to each: "If thou know not," says he, "O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock:" there you will find food, "and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents;" there you will find safety. May his good Spirit enlighten all your understandings clearly to see the sense of these words; and may he enable us to experience the power of them, if it be his good pleasure, by means of what shall be spoken,

First, In a short paraphrase upon them, and Secondly, In the practical use and application I shall make of them.

Our blessed Saviour is the great and good shepherd of souls. His greatness makes his goodness more desirable; for he is almighty to give whatever he sees his people want. Whatever they ask of him, he is able and willing to grant it; for he is a God hearing prayer; his ears are always open to receive; his love is always disposed to answer the prayer of faith. So soon as the faithful, in the text, had sent up their petitions to the great shepherd and bishop of souls, the answer came down. Yea, he himself brought it. He that spake, and all things were made; he that commanded, and they still obey his commandments and hearken unto the voice of his words; he, the God and king of heaven and earth, says, "If thou know not, if thou doest not clearly and fully know, but comest to me for direction and assistance, O thou fairest among women." The soul is here spoken of, as the church often is, under the similitude of a woman, and said to be fair, fair even in the eyes of Christ, the bridegroom of the church. And by what means was she made thus lovely in his sight? In herself she was black and sinful; and there is nothing so filthy and abominable in the sight of the all-pure God as sin. He cannot behold the least iniquity; and mankind is conceived and born in iniquity, and by nature subject to the wrath of God: how, then, can he behold it with approbation? Not until it be cleansed from all sin in the blood of the Lamb. When it is justified by his righteousness, and clothed with his graces, then it will be indeed fair and beautiful, yea, perfect, through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God. When Christ has thus presented the soul to himself, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but holy and without blemish, then he speaks to her as perfect in beauty· "If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock." The great shepherd has but one flock. Although it consists of a great multitude, which no man could number, yet they have but one spirit in them all—but one Lord, one faith, and one baptism. They are of one heart, and of one mind; they walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing. Though part of them be already entered into rest, and others are still in the world, yet they have sweet fellowship and communion with each other in the unity of the Spirit; and ere long they will be all gathered into one place. There will be but one fold and one shepherd: for, in the dispensation of the fulness of time, God will gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him.

And as the flock is one, so is the way. There never was but one way in which the Lord's flock walked. In the same good old way they that are gone before and we that are following after them must walk. Many disputes, indeed, have been raised about it by men who are gone out of the way. The philosophers of Greece and Rome sought by the light of nature, but could not find it; and our modern reasoners are seeking it by the same light, and still miss it: but believers are at no loss, because their Lord ended all disputes about it, when he declared, "I am the way." He is the only way; because no sinner can come to the Father but by him. You must walk with him in his way if ever you be reconciled to the Father and see his face with joy. And what is it that brings us into his way? Faith, the one faith, which unites the believer to Christ, and which is justifying faith, because there is no saving faith but this. You may divide faith into many branches, according to its several offices, and may give it several names; but if it be saving faith, it is that which justifies, which, by uniting us to Christ, sets us in the right way, and keeps us in it. And this faith all believers had, under the Old Testament dispensation, as certainly as we have it under the New. They proved that they had the one faith by the actings of their faith, as St. Paul has taught us at large in the 11th chapter to the Hebrews; wherein he sets before us the most celebrated personages in scripture, and shows what great things their faith enabled them to do and to suffer, in order to encourage us to follow the steps of their faith.

Some perhaps may inquire whether the faith that justified and saved them was the same that we have now: the apostle replies, that there is but one faith: and if theirs was not the one faith, how could he propose their faith to us, and exhort us to follow them, looking, as they did, unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith? Our reformers have considered the 11th chapter to the Hebrews in the second part of their homily upon faith, and they sum it up in these words:— "This is the Christian faith, which these holy men had, and we also ought to have. And although they were not named Christian men, yet was it a Christian faith that they had; for they looked for all benefits of God the Father, through the merits of his Son Jesus Christ, as we now do. This difference is between them and us, that they looked when Christ should come; and we be in the time when he is come: therefore, saith St. Augustine, the time is altered and changed, but not the faith." In effect, they and we be all one; we have the same faith that they had, and they the same that we have, and therefore, in the text, we are directed to follow their faith, and more especially the actings of their faith: "Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock." You may see in what way they walked by the marks and prints of their feet, which they have left behind them. Observe those, and tread in their steps. See what great things, how impossible to flesh and blood, their faith enabled them to perform, and go and do thou likewise. St. Paul has determined that this is the meaning of treading in their steps, in Rom. iv. 12, where he is speaking of Abraham's being the father of all those who tread in the steps of that faith which he had, being yet uncircumcised—He is the father of all those who can tread in the steps of his faith, who follow him in the actings of his faith, and can give such marks of its sincerity as he did.

Try, yourselves then, my brethren, in this point, and examine whether you are following the footsteps of the flock. Can you tread in the steps of Abraham's faith? When God called Abraham to leave his country and his father's house, he obeyed, and he went out, not knowing whither he went. God does call you to leave the world, and the things of it, and to set your affections on things above: and can you, have you, obeyed? Do you live in the world, like Abraham, a stranger, and a pilgrim, knowing that here is not your home, but that you have a better country; namely, a heavenly, provided for you? Can you live upon the promises of God, as Abraham did, when all things make against you, and rely with full trust and confidence upon the divine faithfulness and truth? Can you give up the dearest object of your heart, be it an only child, if the God of all grace and love should think proper to take it from you? Are you thus strong in faith, giving glory to God? Can you copy after these actings of Abraham's faith? If you cannot follow his steps, consider what is the reason. Do you desire it? If you do, have you not the promise of the same grace which Abraham had, to enable you to walk by faith, and not by sight? Are not all things possible to him that believeth? Why, then, are you behind Abraham? Oh hasten your steps, and get to the head of the flock. Let none be before you. You have the very same help that the father of the faithful had; therefore cast aside every weight, and the sin which does so easily beset you (it is sin that stops your course), and press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

But, perhaps, some person may ask, Where shall I meet with the footsteps of the flock of Christ? Where are there any marks of them to be found? That you might not be at a loss, God has been pleased to leave a lively and exact print of them in the scripture. There you have an impression of all the footsteps which you are to follow; for the word is a lantern unto our feet, and a light unto our paths, to guide our feet into the way of peace, and then to order our steps in it. St. Paul, 1 Cor. x., having drawn the great outlines of the Jewish history, says, "That all these things happened unto them for examples, and they are written for our admonition." And having, Heb. xi., described the actings of the faith of the Old Testament saints, he applies them to us for our example, exhorting us to follow their faith; and he also proposes himself for a pattern to the Corinthians: "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ:"—follow my steps so far as I follow Christ's. In this light we are to consider the footsteps of the flock. Christ is at the head, and goes before his flock; they follow him and tread in his steps, and we who come after tread in theirs, following them in the way wherein they followed Christ. And all this is recorded for our use in scripture. We are to take no step unless we see some marks of the flock's having gone before and taken that very step; and when we are united by faith to Christ, and under the guidance of his good Spirit, we shall then see directions left in scripture for every step we are to take. And thus, though it be not in man that walketh to direct his steps, yet the Lord will hold up our goings in his paths, that our footsteps slip not: for the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; and he maketh his way acceptable to himself.

This is, I think, the sense of the first part of my text; namely, of treading in the footsteps of the flock: the next words have very little difficulty—"and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents." These shepherds are the servants of the chief shepherd, whose own the sheep are. The ministers of the Lord who have the care and charge of his flock are, throughout the scriptures, called pastors, or shepherds: and their tents, here mentioned, are not such tents as earthly shepherds pitch when they are watching their flocks, but certain stated fixed dwellings, wherein they officiated as spiritual pastors and shepherds. The original word is not what our translators commonly render tents, but another, which always signifies, to dwell or to inhabit, and which is of the same root with Shechinah, the habitation of the divine glory in the tabernacle and temple. The first time it occurs is in the third of Genesis, where the use and design of the cherubim is mentioned: "And God drove out the man, and he 'placed,' he dwelt in, or inhabited, the cherubim." We read of God's appearing in the most holy place of the tabernacle and temple, over the cherubim; for which reason St. Paul calls them the cherubim of glory. And the whole tabernacle and temple, including the holy as well as the most holy place, with all their sacred vessels and apparatus, are generally called by the same word that is in my text; viz. "the dwelling." Indeed, it is commonly translated tabernacle; but it signifies the dwelling-place of the God of Israel; the place where he had put his name to dwell there. And accordingly, when the tabernacle and temple were reared up, the glory of the Lord, that glorious and divine person who was the reality of all their types and ceremonies, came and filled them. And it was upon account of his presence in them that the faithful could say, "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thine house, and the place where thy glory dwelleth." These circumstances may lead us to consider the dwellings mentioned in my text as places appropriated to a religious use; dwellings sacred rather than civil; such as the shepherds dwelt in when they were acting in their office as pastors over the flock of Christ. In these dwellings they resided in order to dispense the word and the sacraments, and to administer the ordinances to the Lord's people, and to the sheep of his pasture: for here they were to feed the kids. The original word is used for the young of the sheep as well as of the goats, for which the chief shepherd had a particular love and tenderness. He carries them in his bosom. And they lay near the heart of all the Lord's faithful pastors, who watch with the greatest care over the young and weak part of their flock, using every likely means to preserve and strengthen them, and withal striving much for them with God in prayer. No tender parent can be more concerned for the health of a weak and sickly child than they are for the weak in the faith. Knowing to what temptations they are exposed, and what difficulties they have to encounter, they labour earnestly to keep them near the shepherds' dwellings, in close attendance upon the ordinances; for here they will be safe from danger, and will find food to strengthen their hearts and to enable them to grow in grace.

I hope it now appears, from what has been said, that the Lord's answer is direct and full to his people's prayer. They had desired to learn where he had fed his flock, and where he had made them rest in times of great trials and troubles. He replies, with lips full of grace, If thou art at a loss, O my beloved, whom I have purchased with mine own blood, and made fair and lovely with mine own righteousness, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock; see in what way they have always walked; mark the actings of their faith; imitate them; and you will find, the more you act faith, the stronger it will grow. If temptations are powerful, and troubles many and heavy, and the heat of persecution rages, and faith is ready to shrink back, and to give way, then keep near the shepherds' dwellings. There are the ordinances upon which, in time of danger, young and weak believers should attend closely. The more they wait upon the Lord with the pastors of his flock, the more food they will get for their souls, and the greater safety and strength will they find: for where can the believer hope to grow stronger in grace than under the means of grace? These are the instituted means of making believers strong in the Lord, and, in the power of his might, able to withstand in the evil day; and having done all to stand, resisting unto blood, striving against sin.

This is the doctrine of the text in which there are two rules laid down for the conduct of believers. At all times they are to tread in the footsteps of the flock, and to follow the actings of their faith; and in troublesome times they are to keep near the shepherds' dwellings, that they may receive comfort and strength from the use of the ordinances. These are Christ's own directions to them that are in the faith. As to those persons who have never seen their want of faith, and are not seeking it, they are not concerned in what has been said. They have no lot nor share with us in this matter: for how should they follow the footsteps of the flock who are not yet got into the way in which the flock walks? All men, by nature, have turned aside from the right way; they have erred and strayed from the ways of God like lost sheep, and have neither will nor power to turn into it. While they are in this state, they do not belong to Christ's flock; and therefore, how should they follow the actings of their faith who themselves have no faith? My brethren, are any of you in this state? Do you know nothing of your having received faith from God as his gift, and wrought in your heart by the operation of his Spirit? Then you should fear and tremble for your guilt and your danger. Consider your guilt. You have all your sins, original and actual, to answer for, and before a God who is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity. Consider your danger. Have you not read, "He that believeth not, shall be damned?" and are you not afraid of damnation? for while your sins are unpardoned, every step you take tends to hell beneath. And what is there between you and it? Think how near you are to it. There is nothing but this thin partition of flesh, and this little vapour of life, this light air that you breathe; nothing else keeps you out of everlasting burnings. And if God was to take away your breath this moment, oh! where would your poor soul be? Meditate on an eternity of torments, and, while there is a moment left, use it, and flee from the wrath to come. Flee to Jesus, the great and good shepherd, and try whether he will not save thee: for there is salvation in none other. If thou art sensible of thy guilt and of thy danger, fear not. Apply to him, and he will get himself glory in bringing thee home to God, and in making thee one of the sheep of his pasture.

Although the directions in the text relate only to the faithful, yet I could not help speaking a word to those who neither have, nor are seeking the true saving faith. I pray God to make it useful to their souls! And I now come to apply the first rule here laid down. It is an answer to the prayer of the faithful. They had entreated Christ to inform them where he fed his flock. His answer is, Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock; see in what way they were led and supported, and what prints and marks they left behind them: these follow, and you will be carried safe through, as they were. Christ himself is the way: faith sets believers in it by uniting them to Christ: the footsteps are the actings of faith recorded in scripture—the great things which, by faith, the saints of old were enabled to perform—and these things the scripture holds out to us for our example and admonition. Now, my brethren, when you read of the power of faith in former times, do you find it as powerful in you? Faith is the same: for there is but one faith, and one Lord who gives it: he changeth not: he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. His promises are, like himself, truth itself, and unchangeable. Why, then, is not faith as mighty in operation as it ever was? Why does it not perform the same wonders now which it did formerly? In the 11th of the Hebrews, we read of many signal victories, which the old saints obtained by the power of faith; and our church says (second part of the homily upon faith), "St. Paul so much extolleth their faith, because we should not less, but rather more, give ourselves wholly unto Christ, both in profession and living, now when Christ is come, than the old fathers did before his coming. And by all the declarations of St. Paul it is evident that the true, lively, and Christian faith is no dead, vain, or unfruitful thing, but a thing of perfect virtue, of wonderful operation or working and strength, bringing forth all good motions and good works." When you read of the actings of faith in former times, try yourselves, my beloved brethren, and see whether it has the same wonderful operation and working in you. Try whether you can follow the footsteps of the flock. The victories of their faith are marked out for your example. Can you, then, with them, triumph over all the enemies of faith—over sin and Satan, the world and the flesh, death and the grave? These are the enemies with whom you are to fight the good fight of faith; and these the faithful have defeated. Their faith conquered sin by apprehending and applying Christ's righteousness for pardon and justification, and by drawing from his fulness grace for grace, to subdue the dominion of sin. And are you growing in grace, and so strong in faith, that, when sin puts on its most alluring dress, you can, with Joseph and Moses, nobly reject its flattering pleasures? When the devil throws his fiery darts at you, have you the shield of faith ready to hold up in your defence, against which the rage and force of his darts is quenched and spent, so that you can say with Paul, I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course, I have kept the faith? When the world invites you with its riches and honours, can you, with Abraham and his descendants, live a wanderer and a sojourner upon earth, knowing that God is your God, and that he hath provided for you a city not made with hands, eternal in the heavens? This is living by faith, and not by sight; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. Do you know that the will of the flesh is enmity to the will of God, and therefore, can your faith submit to suffer the will of God, and, with Job, bear it patiently? In short, can you, with Paul, rejoice alike in poverty and riches, in pleasure and pain, in honour and disgrace? yea, can you with him do all things through Christ that strengtheneth you? That is a great word—all things!—I can do all things! And yet faith can speak it without presumption: for all things are possible to him that believeth. It is possible, with David, to fear no evil, no, not when you are going through the valley and shadow of death · yea, faith can, with the blessed Paul, give thanks to God for giving it the victory over death through Jesus Christ our Lord.

These are some of the victories of faith, which it has already attained, and which are recorded in scripture for your imitation. And if you find any of them too hard for you, it is not because faith has lost any of its virtue and efficacy, but because you do not put faith upon acting. Faith is still almighty. Set it to work, and try its power, and you will find it can do whatever it has done. And why should you doubt of its doing what God has promised it shall do? Surely the Lord's hand is not shortened. He can still make faith as victorious as it ever was: for he left these great exploits of faith upon record for your use. These footsteps of the flock were left on purpose for your encouragement, that you might see how possible it was to conquer sin and Satan, the world and the flesh, death and the grave. These are your Lord's enemies, as well as yours. It is for his honour that you should conquer them. And he promises you his help, the same help which he gave to these faithful soldiers, who, having fought the good fight of faith, now stand confirmed in bliss, with crowns of eternal glory upon their heads, and palms of victory in their hands. Is it not a privilege to be enabled to tread in their steps? Can there be a greater privilege? Can there be greater happiness than to conquer and to be crowned with them? Oh disparage not, then, your Lord, nor his gifts, by doubting of the power of faith. Fear not: only believe. Bring your belief into act. Oppose it to your enemies, and see whether it will not make you more than conquerors over them. Whatever God has promised faith should do in you, and for you, is he not almighty to perform? Doubt not, then, whenever you are following the footsteps of the flock, but his omnipotence will be present with you to fulfil his promises, and you will find that all things are possible to him that believeth.

These victories indeed may be attained by them that are strong in faith: but perhaps some of you may fancy, I am weak in the faith—I must not aspire to such great things. Why not? Faith is the gift of God: and it is mighty by his operation. Faith does not work in the strength of nature, but in the omnipotence of grace. And grace is free—as free for you who are a weak believer as for the strongest! so that you may aspire to great things. Put your faith upon acting, and see whether it will not make you equal to the greatest things: for, Allowing you are weak at present, yet it is not God's intention that you should continue so. He has appointed the means of grace for your growth in grace. Attend upon the ordinances; keep near the shepherds' dwellings; and there you will find yourselves strengthened and established: for there is food for your soul. God has promised that his quickening Spirit shall be in the ordinances, and that he will render them effectual for the ends for which they were instituted. It is his grace that animates and enlivens them: for without it they are but dead letters, mere carnal ordinances, which profit nothing to the edifying of the soul: but when he quickens them with his divine presence, then they build up and strengthen the believer, and are the means of his growing in grace.

If, then, any of you are sensible of your having but weak faith, wait upon God for the strengthening of it; and wait in the ways of his ordinances. In them he has promised to be found of those that seek him. You will find his Spirit present in the word, in prayer, and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper. Keep near to them, and God will give you food for your souls, enabling you in the strength of it to get more power over sin, and to be more alive unto God.

The word is expressly said to be the means of spiritual life, Psalm cxix. 50: thy word hath quickened me: and it is also the means of the growth of this spiritual life, according to the apostle: "As new-born babes desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby." But then, in order that we may thus grow by the word, faith must be mixed with it. St. Paul tells the Thessalonians, 1 Epistle, ii. 13, "When ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe." Faith makes it work effectually; and unless faith be mixed and incorporated, as it were, with it, it does not profit: for we are assured that the ancient Jews had the same gospel preached unto them that we have; but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it.

If you cannot mix faith with the word preached, so as to find yourself growing in grace and strength, can you pray? Prayer is the appointed means of receiving a supply of all your wants from the fulness of Christ Jesus. Ask, and ye shall have all that he has purchased and all that he has to give: for his promise is very extensive, Matt. xxi. 22: "All things," without any exception, "whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing," if faith has any ground in the word of promise to believe, that it shall receive what it asks, "ye shall receive it." Encouraged by this promise, ask humbly whatever God had promised to give. Do you find yourself unable to follow the footsteps of the flock? Cannot you keep near the shepherds' tents? But are you drawn away from attending upon the ordinances by the manifold temptations of sin and Satan, of the world and the flesh? Pray for power to fight against these enemies, and Christ will make you more than conqueror. The more you pray, the stronger you will grow. Out of weakness you shall be made strong. And by waiting constantly upon the Lord, you shall renew your strength—strength to mortify sin, and strength to be alive unto God; yea, by waiting upon God, you will receive the fulness of joy: for thus has the God that heareth prayer encouraged you to pray always and not to faint: "Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full." And Where should we wait upon God for the renewing of our strength and for the fulness of joy, but at his own table? Has not the Lord appointed that his body should be meat indeed, and that his blood should be drink indeed, being the true spiritual food and strengthening of our souls? Our reformers certainly looked upon the Lord's supper in this light; for to the question in the Catechism, "What are the benefits whereof we are partakers thereby?" they have given this answer: "The strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine." The elements are the instituted signs of that life which Christ purchased by the offering of his body and by the shedding of his blood. They are signs to all who understand their meaning; but seals to those persons only who are united to Christ by faith, and grafted as branches into the true vine. Wait upon him then, my brethren, in the appointed means for the continuance and growth of this divine life. Be found obedient to his command, Eat this bread, and drink of this cup—Do this in remembrance of me—and you will receive something more at the Lord's table than mere signs. In the bread you will, by faith, partake of the body, and in the cup you will partake of the blood of Christ, administering to your soul that divine life which he begins here in grace, and carries on for ever and ever in glory.

These are the instituted means in which the weak in faith ought to wait upon the Lord: and he has encouraged them to wait upon him in these means with a promise that he will therein be found of them that seek him, and will strengthen and establish their hearts in the faith. We are his witnesses, that he is faithful and just to fulfil his promises. We attest this upon our own experience. We found ourselves growing in grace by attendance upon the ordinances. We expected to receive freely what God had freely promised, and we are not disappointed of our hope. And this will be your happy experience, my brethren, who are now endeavouring to follow the footsteps of the flock. Keep near the shepherds' tents. Attend close upon the ordinances, and you will grow strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. And when you are strong, beware of spiritual pride. Beware of being drawn away from the ordinances, as if they were not as necessary for you now as they were formerly. Remember that you stand in the Lord's strength, and he expects you should wait upon him for the continuance of it. And if you leave off attending upon the ordinances, because you think you are strong in faith, it is just as if a strong man should fancy he had no occasion to eat any more, because of his great strength. Our souls want continual supplies of grace, as our bodies stand in need of daily bread. And God has promised to make the ordinances food for his children, and he daily fulfils his promises to them. They find the quickening Spirit in the ordinances, communicating to them life, and comfort, and strength, according to their several wants and necessities.

And, as if these were not sufficient motives to encourage you to wait upon God in the way of his ordinances, he has promised to do more for those who wait therein than they can either ask or think: "For since the beginning of the world, men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him. Thou meetest him that rejoiceth, and worketh righteousness, those that remember thee in thy ways." Isaiah lxiv. 4, 5. Let us then remember God in his ways, and in these ways he will meet us with a blessing. Whatever he has promised, he will certainly fulfil. Wait upon him, and you shall not be ashamed. Follow the flock, and you shall be safe. Follow them, as they followed Christ, and you will be kept as they were. And let us look up to him for his gracious help to enable us to follow the steps of their faith, humbly praying to him in the words of our church, and saying,

"O Almighty God, who hast knit together thine elect in one communion and fellowship in the mystical body of thy Son Christ our Lord, grant us grace so to follow thy blessed saints in all virtuous and godly living, that we may come to those unspeakable joys which thou hast prepared for them that unfeignedly love thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Amen. (Collect for All Saints' Day.)

DISCOURSE VI.

Chap. iv. ver. 16.

Awake, O north wind; and come thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.

In the foregoing chapter, the believing soul had been in a dull heavy frame, but, being concerned and uneasy about it, had desired the quickening influences of Christ's grace. Christ here answers these desires. He calls for the wind to come and blow upon his garden. The wind is the scripture emblem and representative of the Holy Spirit. When he descended upon the disciples, on the day of Pentecost, he came in this his known emblem, in a rushing mighty wind, and it follows, "they were all filled with the Holy Ghost:" filled with his gifts and graces. For the same good purpose his influence is here required. He is to blow upon the garden with his several operations, to quicken those things that were ready to die, and to bring forth the sweet perfumes of the graces of his own planting. "Awake, O north wind; and come thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out." May the enlivening Spirit bring the sweet experience of these words to all your hearts. As he is the omnipresent God, he is here with us: Oh that he may be present in these his gracious offices. Like the sharp penetrating north wind, may he awaken conviction, and then come, like the mild and soft south wind, with his comforts, that he may plant his graces in us, and cause the spices of them to flow out. God grant these may be the happy effects of our considering,

First, The sense and meaning of the words.

Secondly, Of our defending the doctrine contained in them. And Thirdly, Of our applying them to our spiritual use and benefit.

And first, Let us consider the sense of the words. Christ is the speaker. He had been comparing the church to a garden which he had inclosed from the wilderness of the world. He had taken it in for his own use, and had set in it trees of righteousness, which he had moved out of the common waste, where they grew wild by nature, and had transplanted them into his garden. The faithful are the trees, which the heavenly husbandman sets in his own paradise: and by his cultivation, by being watered with his grace, and by clear shining after rain, from being wild and barren by nature, they are changed, and they become trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he may be glorified: "for herein," says the blessed Jesus, "is my Father glorified; that ye bring forth much fruit." The Lord has no barren trees in his paradise. Before he transplanted them, they were a seminary of all evil weeds; they brought forth nothing that was good: but when once set in his garden, they had a new spirit put into them, from whence come the seeds of all graces. For thus Christ, in this chapter, describes his garden. Its plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits, camphire with spikenard; spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices. Upon this garden, thus enriched like the paradise of God, he calls the wind to blow, that it may bring forth the fragrancy of all its chief spices. The wind is the agent that was to make them flow out. And wind is air in motion—air in action. This was the first mover in the formation of the world: and it is still the principal mover in the formation and growth of every tree and plant. Natural historians have lately demonstrated, by undoubted experiments, that none of them can live without air. They want it as much as animals do. By it the odoriferous kind diffuse their fragrancy. The air is the cause that first draws out, and then spreads abroad, their sweet perfumes. And by it the fruit-bearing kind will soon be adorned with beautiful blossoms, and in their season with rich and ripe fruit. Their vegetable life, with all the operations of it, depends upon the air, in like manner as our spiritual life, with all the operations of it, depends upon the Holy Spirit, of whom the air was the instituted type. In our present embodied state we cannot see spiritual but through the glass of material objects. We are confined to sense. And therefore God has been pleased to make use of sensible things in nature to represent the spiritual things in grace. He has drawn a just and perfect parallel. In the works of creation he has given us an expressive image of every spiritual object with which he saw it needful for us to be acquainted. Of himself, of his essence, of his personality, and of the offices of the divine persons in the economy of the covenant, he has set before our eyes, in the agency of nature, a lively picture: for the grand agent in nature is the air, which is one in essence, whether it be rarefied to its smallest parts in the action of fire at the orb of the sun, or sent out in light, or returned in gross air to maintain and carry on this action of fire at the orb of the sun: in which soever of these three distinct operations it be employed, it is still air; and accordingly, this unity of its essence, and distinction of its threefold agency, is declared in scripture to be the instituted type in which we are to read the unity of the divine essence and the offices of the three divine persons. The Psalmist, referring to the created image, says, "The heavens declare the glory of God." The heavens are not empty space, for that could declare nothing, but they are the air in its three distinct offices, each of which is a record of God's glory. For, as the apostle explains the point, "The invisible things of God are clearly seen from the creation of the world:" the invisible things themselves cannot be seen; but they may be seen by the creation, "and understood by the things that are made; even his eternal power and Godhead." So that there is a picture in the things which are made, whereby we may understand the things of God which are not made. And this picture, so far as I am concerned to explain it at present, is the threefold agency of the air, in which are represented the offices of the three divine agents in carrying on the work of salvation. The covenant itself, and the distinct offices of the persons, were for the equal glory of each. It pleased the Father to get glory to the divine justice and holiness by demanding full satisfaction for sin. He was the avenger of sin, and therefore air, in the action of fire, is his emblem: he is called in scripture a consuming, a devouring fire, and a jealous God. It pleased the Son to get glory to the divine love and mercy by paying this satisfaction; and therefore his constant name in scripture is light, which is the life of the material world as he is the life of the spiritual world. And it pleased the eternal Spirit to get glory to all the divine attributes by inspiring dead sinners with a desire to be raised to newness of life, and then by breathing it into their souls, and carrying it on through the life of grace until he bring them to the life of glory; and therefore he knows no other name in scripture than Spirit, or air in motion. The very same word that stands for the breath we breathe, both in the Hebrew and Greek, signifies the Holy Spirit. Why was this usage of scripture? Was it from the poverty of these languages? No. It was to show us the perfect likeness and resemblance there is between what air does to the body and what the Holy Spirit does to the soul. He is the breath of its life. Our souls can no more live to God without his grace than our bodies can without air. And after we have received his grace, are quickened and made alive by it, we want its influence every moment to support and to carry on the life which he has given, in like manner as we want breath every moment to support and to carry on our animal life: without it the body can do no work: without his grace the soul can do none. The necessity of his continually breathing into our souls the breath of life is beautifully represented in the text. He is there described under his known emblem, wind or air in motion; and what air is to the trees of the garden, that is he to the spirits of men. Both are alike necessary. Nothing can grow in the garden without air, neither can any grace grow in our souls unless the Holy Spirit act in these his two offices. "Awake, O north wind; and come thou south wind." The sun is never in the northern point of the heavens; and therefore the north wind is cold, sharp, and piercing: but the sun is always in the south; and therefore the south wind is of a contrary quality, being warm, soft, and comforting. The influences of both are necessary: the north wind was to awake: it was to be the first mover: the Holy Spirit was to begin in this office: for all men lay in the dead sleep of sin, without the least motion of spiritual life, until the Holy Spirit awaken them. And his general method of awakening sinners is to inspire them with conviction of sin. He opens their eyes, shows them their guilt, and lets them see their danger. And this is very painful and distressing; and therefore it is compared to the north wind, which, in the first work of grace, awakens and acts with all the sharpness of conviction upon the sinner's heart. Here Christ calls it to act upon the faithful members of his church; not to bring them into the deep distress which persons under conviction of sin are commonly in, but to preserve in them a lively sense of their own insufficiency, and of their dependence upon him. This is necessary to keep them always humble, and to make them always ready to ascribe the glory of what God has done in them to the riches of his free grace. And therefore we find that the Holy Spirit works this temper in all the faithful. None have such clear humbling views of themselves as they have, which empty them of self, and dispose them to receive more and more of the sweet influences of the Holy Spirit. And these are here described under the character of the south wind—gentle, and mild, and comforting. It is observable, that the south wind was not to awake, but to come—the sinner must be awakened, and convinced of his guilt and danger before he is comforted. This is God's method of acting. His good Spirit first makes men feel how miserable they are without a Saviour, and then he gives them the comfort of knowing their interest in him. He awakes and blows upon them like the sharpest blasts of the pinching north wind, and then he comes with the comfortable breathings of the gentle south. Both these are necessary: for Christ calls for both to blow upon his garden. The original word, here rendered to blow, is translated, in the 2nd chapter of Genesis, to breathe, when spoken of God's infusing an immortal spirit into the body of Adam: "And the Lord God formed the man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils a soul of life." Elihu ascribes this to the Holy Spirit, as an economical act of his office, Job xxxiii. 4. "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life." In the very same manner our Lord represented the operation of the Holy Spirit, John xx. 22. "He breathed on his disciples, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost:" he breathed on them to denote, by this outward and visible sign, the inward and spiritual breathing of the Holy Spirit, which he then gave them. Our souls are not alive to God until he infuse into them this divine breath, as you may read at large in the parable of the dry bones, Ezek. xxxvii. And his continual breathing upon the faithful soul is as necessary as this first act; and therefore it is spoken of in the text by the same word: "Breathe with every gracious influence, O divine Spirit, upon my faithful people, that the spices in them may flow out." The spices are certainly the graces of Christ, which he freely bestows upon us who are united to him the head of life and influence, and which are quickened and exercised by his good Spirit. And when he enables us to bring them into continual use and practice, then they become an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing unto God.

The words thus explained offer these particulars to our serious consideration. First, We are here reminded of the state in which all men are while they continue in the barren desolate wilderness of nature. Secondly, We learn by what means Christ's people are transplanted out of the wilderness into the garden of the church, where they grow and flourish; and, Thirdly, the cause is described, that makes the spices in them to flow out, and enables them to bring forth fruit unto everlasting life. These are the great truths contained in the text, which I am under my second general head to defend, from the authority of God's word.

And First—Our state by nature is not a state of grace. We are not born in the garden of the church, but in the wilderness of the world, in a dry barren land, where no water is—no dew nor rain, no kindly influence of heaven, to make us grow in grace. In this barren soil we are like the wild olive-tree; we bear no fruit until the heavenly husbandman move us and graft us, contrary to nature, in the good olive-tree: for you know it is contrary to nature to graft a wild scion upon a good stock; it is against the common practice in all other trees but the olive. And therefore the apostle, Rom. xi., uses this instance to represent the taking of the Gentiles into the church of God. The wild olive, like man in his natural state, bears no fruit but when he is grafted like the wild scion upon the good olive; then he bears forth fruit abundantly. He can bear no fruit of himself; for our blessed Saviour, speaking of the branches not bearing fruit except they abide in the stock upon which they were grafted, declares, No more can ye, except ye abide in me; for without me ye can do nothing. In yourselves you are like the ground, which was cursed for your sakes, and which naturally brings forth nothing but thorns and thistles.

When the Holy Spirit first begins to move in our hearts, he convinces us of these truths. He lets us see how barren we are by nature, and unfruitful. He shows us, that in us dwelleth no good thing, and that we have nothing but sin in ourselves. He makes us feel the burden of our sins. It presseth us sore, and forceth us to cry earnestly for deliverance. When he has thus, like the north wind, pierced us with the sharpness of conviction, then is he ready to administer comfort by transplanting us out of the wilderness into the garden of his church, where, under his mild influence, we may grow and flourish: and this is the second doctrinal point in the text worthy of our consideration.

We cannot transplant ourselves any more than a tree in a bad soil can transplant itself into a good one. But all the faithful are the trees of the Lord's planting. They are taken out of the wilderness, and removed into the paradise of God, where they are set, that they may be called trees of righteousness—the planting of the Lord—that he may be glorified in their bearing much fruit. The whole work of bringing us from a barren to a fruitful state, from a bad soil to a good one, is the Lord's. It is he who maketh us to be like a tree planted by the water-side, that will bring forth his fruit in due season: his leaf also shall not wither, and, look! whatsoever he doth it shall prosper. As it is the action of the air which first begins and afterwards carries on the vegetable life in every tree and plant, so is it the action of the Spirit which first begins and afterwards carries on spiritual life. We should not even have a desire for it unless he put it into our hearts; and the carrying of it on is the continuance of his work, as much as the life of a tree depends on the continuance of the action of the air upon it: for we are helpless and without strength either to begin or to carry on spiritual life but as we are endued with power from on high. All the work is the Lord's: for it is he who worketh in us both to will and to do.

Now, it is the same hand which first plants us that afterwards waters us with the dew of his heavenly grace, and makes us fruitful. This is the third doctrinal point in the text. All our graces come from the Holy Spirit. He first plants them in us, and then makes the spices of them to flow out. We cannot doubt of these truths, because we have often assented to them when we repeated the Nicene Creed. I wish we had all experienced the truth of the words: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life:" he is the Lord and giver of all spiritual and divine life. The life itself, whereby we live unto God, and all the offices of it, work in us that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing unto every man his own gifts, as he will. His own gifts are all the graces of the Christian life. Faith, hope, love, with every sweet and heavenly temper, are his gifts: for they are called the fruits of the Spirit. Sin is our own. Our soil bears nothing else. It grows weeds, thorns and thistles, without any cultivation. Our earth is a mother to them; but a step-mother to every grace. Whatever there is in us, besides weeds, is the free gift of the Holy Spirit. Every good thought, and word, and work, every step we take in our Christian life, is from him. And when he has inspired any thing good into us, he does not leave us to ourselves to improve it. No. It is God that giveth the increase. He worketh in us both to will and to do, according to the Psalmist's prayer, "Stablish the thing, O God, that thou hast wrought in us." He stirs up his own gifts and graces, keeps them in exercise, and makes the spices of them to flow out. When we work in his strength, we work what is well-pleasing. God the Father sees us in his Son, partakers of righteousness, and led by his Spirit; and then the sweet odour of our services ascends with acceptance to the throne of his grace. St. John has given us a beautiful image of the manner in which our very best services, even the prayers and praises of God's own people, become acceptable. It is not for any merit in them. It is not because they flow from fervent affections, that they are set before God as incense, and that the lifting up of our hands is an evening sacrifice. But it is through Christ that our very prayers are pleasing unto the Father: for thus we read, Rev. viii. 2: "The angel of the covenant, our Lord Jesus Christ, came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up with acceptance before God out of the angel's hand." Here we see that our best prayers are nothing worth unless presented before God by the Redeemer, and perfumed with the sweet incense of his merits. When he presents them before the throne of grace, they then become his prayers, and how can the Father deny the requests of his beloved Son? He will answer them, either by giving us what we ask, or something else, that he sees will be much better for us. If, then, we would profit and be fruitful under the means of grace; if we would have the spices of our prayers and praises, and our other religious services, to ascend with acceptance before God, let us look up to the Holy Spirit, and entreat him to enable us to apply what has been said to our own hearts. And may he blow upon us with his gracious inspiration, while I am, in the Third place, Drawing some practical inferences from what has been said.

The church is here compared to a garden; the faithful to trees of righteousness which the Lord hath planted; the Holy Spirit to wind, which is to blow upon the trees, and which makes the spices thereof to flow out, as the Holy Spirit brings forth into use and exercise the graces of the faithful. This is the doctrine: and, that we may improve by it, let us examine ourselves, whether we are as gardens and trees, whom the Lord hath planted, and in whom he is glorified. Have we been taken out of the wilderness and transplanted into the paradise of God? Has the Holy Spirit awakened the north wind to convince us of sin, and come with the south wind to comfort us? Has he united us to Christ, engrafted us into the true vine, and do our tender grapes give a pleasant smell? Does he call forth the graces which he has given us, and let the spices of them flow out in daily exercise, so that men, seeing our fruitfulness, glorify our Father which is in heaven? Happy are they who thus flourish like a palm-tree, and grow like a cedar in Libanus. If you be thus happy, my brethren, you cannot but know it, and feel it, and be thankful to God for it; and to those amongst you who are not in this happy case, I will make my first application. May the Spirit of the living God open your understandings to profit from what I have to say!

If you be not united to Christ by faith on your part, and by the bond of the Spirit on Christ's part, and thereby enabled to bring forth fruit unto everlasting life, consider how dangerous your situation is. There are two spirits, which divide the world between them: you must be led by one or the other, by the Holy Spirit, or by the evil spirit. And you cannot be at a loss to know under whose influence you are. By their fruits ye may know them. This is an infallible mark, which the apostle has largely insisted upon in the fifth chapter of the Galatians, where he has given us a description at length of the fruits of the Spirit, and of the abominable deeds of the flesh, which are the fruits of the devil. Read the description, and then judge to whom you belong. What flows out of your hearts? What do your tongues delight to be talking of, and your hands to handle, and your feet to run into? What appears in your lives and conversations? Surely you cannot be at a loss to know what sort of fruit you bear. You cannot be ignorant whether you live to the flesh, or to the Spirit. If you abound in the fruits of righteousness, and the spices thereof are continually flowing out, a sweet smelling savour acceptable to God and to all around you; if thus, through the Spirit, you bear your fruit unto holiness; then the end will be everlasting life: but if ye live to the flesh, says God, ye shall die—die from God and glory—ye shall die both the first and the second death.

While you are in this dangerous state, how do you keep your consciences quiet? Have you persuaded yourselves that the doctrine is not true? Do you think there is no necessity for bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit? But remember that you must be bringing forth some fruit: and which would you bring forth? Whether what is pleasing to God, or what is displeasing? Certainly what is pleasing. And by whose power and might can you bring it forth? Not by your own. You are by nature helpless and without strength to bring forth any acceptable fruit: for Christ himself, speaking on this very subject, says, "Without me ye can do nothing." Be persuaded, then, to apply to him for faith, that ye may be ingrafted into him the true vine, and may bear much and ripe fruit to the glory of God.

But still the doctrine does not appear to you in a clear light. What is the reason? It is because you are in the flesh and in your natural state, and the motions of sin which are by the law do work in your members to bring forth fruit unto death. Sin has such power over you that you love its dead works, and you hate holiness. You would thank God for making you holy just when you are dying: at the last hour you would like well enough to bring fruit unto God, and to have your spices flowing out: but you cannot bear the thoughts of living a holy life. Is not this your case? If it be, is not your faith a dead faith? And how, then, can you be a living member of Christ? for you were never ingrafted into him the true vine. And if you should be cut off in this state, read your sentence: the God who is to judge you has already declared, "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." May the Holy Spirit set this scripture home with full conviction upon your consciences, that you may follow me with profit in my

Second application to those who are seeking to be united to Christ, and are desirous of glorifying him by bringing forth much fruit. Examine carefully, my brethren, whether you seek aright. Have you a single eye to God's glory? And do you indeed pray that his will may be done in you? Would you receive Christ in all his offices? Do you desire him as your king? and would you have his kingdom set up within you to destroy in you the reign of sin, as well as your prophet and priest to save you from the guilt and punishment of sin? Are you willing he should make you holy as well as happy? If it be the sincere desire of your heart to have the dominion of sin destroyed in your mortal body, then you may take courage. And if you are also set upon attaining the graces of Christ, and would have them in use and exercise, the sweet spices of them continually flowing out, then seek, and you shall find. You have the promises of God to rely upon; and he cannot deny himself. Seek him with humility in the ways wherein he has promised to be found of them that seek him. Attend upon him in the ways of the ordinances. In them wait, and be assured that when it will be for God's glory and your comfort, the Holy Spirit, who has already awakened the north wind to convince you of sin, will also come with the mild south wind to refresh and comfort your hearts, and to unite you to Jesus Christ, in whom you may bring forth much fruit. And to those who are in this happy state I make my third and last inference.

The faithful, in the text, desired the Holy Spirit would make them more lively and fruitful. And the faithful still have the same desires, which are at this time more fervent and earnest, because they hear it objected to their most holy faith, that it makes no change in men's lives and conversations: for which reason they pray for more grace, and to have it more in use and exercise, that they may adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things. They would have all men who see their lives to behold the great change that the Holy Spirit has wrought in them. While they grew in the wilderness, they were like other wild barren trees; but being removed into the garden of the church of Christ, and become trees of the Lord's planting, they now bear much fruit. And, like as the air draws forth the rich fragrancy of the aromatic flowers, and diffuses their sweet odours all around, so the Holy Spirit keeps in action the graces of the faithful, and makes the spices thereof to flow out to the glory of God, and to the delight and good of mankind.

Pray, then, my Christian friends and brethren, for the continual influences of the Holy Spirit: these are as necessary for the growth of grace in your soul as the blowing of the air is to the growth of the fruits of the garden. Convinced of this great truth (and you are convinced of it by happy experience), apply to the Holy Spirit for what you stand in need of every moment; and pray him to awaken the north wind whenever its sharp influences are necessary, either to awaken secure sinners, or to quicken and stir up the graces of the faithful, and then to come, like the south wind, with his mild and comforting influences, blowing upon the garden, upon the believer, and making the spices thereof, the graces in him, to flow out. And thus may the Holy Spirit enable you and me to experience this scripture in its fullest sense to the glory of God and to the good of others, and to the comfort of our own souls. May the blessed and adorable Jesus send his good Spirit to lead us all to, and to graft us all into him, the true vine, that we may live unto God, and flourish and be fruitful. Grant, O gracious Saviour, that every branch in thee which beareth fruit may be purged, and may bring forth more fruit, even rich and ripe fruit, which endureth unto everlasting life, to the honour of the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, three self-existent persons in one Jehovah; to whom we give equal praise, majesty, and dominion, now and for ever. Amen.

DISCOURSE VII.

Chap. v. ver. 16.

Yea, he is altogether lovely.

The Holy Spirit puts these words into the mouth of the believer. He has been drawing a character of his beloved Jesus, and has compared him to the most useful and noble objects in the creation, in order to set forth his due praise. But upon reviewing the character he finds it fall short of the perfection of his divine Saviour. It did not come up to the idea which he himself had formed of him, and therefore he finishes in one word: "Yea, he is altogether lovely." He is all loveliness. Whatever is lovely and desirable upon earth, whatever is lovely and desirable in heaven—all the graces of time, and all the blessings of eternity—centre in him as their proper source, and flow from him as their proper fountain. Whatever can be proposed to the understanding as excellent; whatever the will, rightly disposed, can desire; whatever the heart and the affections can be set upon and find happiness in; all this is to be met with in the Lord Jesus, and nowhere else: for, "he is altogether lovely," all beauty, all excellency in himself. And this consideration should endear to us his inherent excellencies, that he is willing to communicate them. This should give a new grace to each, and make it more valuable in our eyes. He is not only altogether lovely, but will also make vile and abominable sinners, when they apply to him for his righteousness, altogether lovely in the sight of God. He will wash them clean from all their sins in his most precious blood, and will clothe them with his all-perfect righteousness, in which they shall appear at the bar of justice without spot of sin unto salvation.

Now, since the Lord Jesus is all loveliness, what can be the reason that he does not appear altogether lovely in the eyes of men? The generality of them see nothing lovely in him. What was formerly said upon the occasion is still true: "Lord, who hath believed our report?" The word of God reports him to be altogether lovely; and the ministers of God preach his loveliness as testified by scripture and their own experience; but worldly men see no form nor comeliness in him, that they should desire him. They see more loveliness in sin, in pleasure, in money, in diversions, than they hope to find in our Lord and Saviour. This dangerous mistake arises either from the judgment or the affections. Either they do not see how perfectly lovely Jesus Christ is, or else the affections are prejudiced against him: but, wherever the mistake lies, I will offer some scripture arguments to remove it; and may God accompany them with the effectual working of his power, while I am setting before you,

First, What Jesus Christ is, as man.

Secondly, What he is, as God. And Thirdly, What he is, as the incarnate God—as God and man united in one person. And in each of these respects I hope the Holy Spirit will convince you that Jesus Christ is altogether lovely.

And first, Let us view him as man. I mention not his person, though the Psalmist says he was fairer than the children of men. The excellencies and endowments of his mind were so great and uncommon, that I need not insist on a less important part of the subject. For consider, what is it that you admire and love in any person? Do extraordinary gifts or graces draw your esteem? Great abilities or great virtues? Behold, every thing that can adorn or dignify the human nature meets in the man Christ Jesus. If true wisdom and learning be your admiration, it is written, that "in him were laid up all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Do you think that learning never appears so graceful as when it is set off with the charms of virtue? Then look upon Jesus. In him you see not this or that particular virtue only, but virtue itself in a body of flesh; and therefore made flesh, that he might let his graces shine before men, and communicate their sweet influence. He was goodness itself; and he went about doing good to the souls and to the bodies of men, teaching and enlightening the ignorance of their understanding, and regulating the depravity of the will and affections, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of bodily infirmities. There was not a malady which sin had brought upon soul or body but what he proved himself almighty to heal. Was there ever such a character as this? So universally amiable and lovely? Here is a person of all the sons of men the greatest and happiest in himself, and capable of making us great and happy; yea therefore made man, that he might communicate to us his greatness and happiness. And shall any of us be so far lost to all sense of what is great and happy as not to admire this character? Shall men adore and idolize the true patriot whose breast burns with love for his country, and who freely hazards his all to save it? And shall the very same men be wanting in esteem for the great patriot of the whole world? How absurd, how inconsistent would this be!

What a contradiction is it to throw away all our admiration upon lesser excellencies, and to have none to spare for him who had every excellency that can adorn the human nature, either for beauty or use, and who consequently had every thing that could make him altogether lovely!

If I should stop here, enough has been said to place the man Jesus high above the sons of men: but I have mentioned the least and lowest part of his character. He was not only great and good, but had also one thing peculiar to himself—that no sinful frailty or weakness ever sullied his greatness or his goodness He was a perfect man. You will not find any other character without its spots and blemishes, because there is no man living without sin; our nature itself being sinful, and sin is the cause of all our imperfections. The darkness of the understanding in the things of God comes from sin; and the weakness of the memory, and the continual inclinations of the will to evil, and the strong and unlawful attachment of the heart to the world and to the things of it, spring from the same fountain of sin. But the holy Jesus had no sin, and consequently none of the imperfections which sin has brought upon us. When a truth was proposed to his understanding, there was no obstruction in the faculty; he comprehended it clearly and fully. His will was in harmony with God's will: "I delight," says he, "to do thy will, O my God;" and he did it with all his heart, always and perfectly. And accordingly we read of him in the Psalms, that "he spake the truth in his heart;" his tongue and his heart always went together; "he had clean hands," not once defiled with any sinful pollution, "and a pure heart;" not one evil thought had ever arisen in it; nay, "his mind had never been lift up unto vanity;" not one vain thought had ever passed through his mind. Judge then how perfectly immaculate he must have been! for who is there among us that has not had a thousand, yea ten thousand, vain and wandering thoughts? Who does not find them passing through his mind against his will, and intruding into his hours of devotion, from which he had shut them out, and haunting him even at the Lord's table? But Christ's pure and spotless mind never admitted one vain thought. He was the very image of God, in which the first Adam was made; and he did not deface it, as the first Adam did, but he kept it holy and undefiled. The scripture assures us of it: "He was made sin for us who knew no sin." He asserts it of himself: "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." Happy for us, Satan could find in him no part of our fallen image, and therefore the accuser of the brethren could lay no charge against his person, nor consequently against the merit of those actions and sufferings whereby we, who have by nature borne the image of the earthy, may, through grace, bear the image of the heavenly Adam, who is the Lord from heaven.

My brethren, weigh and consider this part of our Lord's character. Is he not altogether lovely? And have you, then, no praise or admiration to bestow upon him? Whatever you see reason to admire in any man, if it be indeed praiseworthy, it was in its perfect degree in Christ Jesus; and therefore certainly you will not withhold from him his tribute of praise. If your praise follow excellency, behold, here is a man not only the chief among ten thousand, but also the chief of the human race. A man that never had his fellow—a perfect man. He has every good gift, and every grace that can be in man. And will you not admire and esteem such a character? Does he not appear to you altogether amiable? If you see any thing wanting in him, it is an argument of your own imperfection: for he, whose all-searching eye trieth the very hearts and reins, saw no way of wickedness in him. He pronounced him to be his beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased; and he honoured him with a wonderful glory, never communicated to any creature but to the man Jesus: he was united to God the Son in so close and intimate a union, that God and man were one Christ as much as the reasonable soul and flesh are one man. Oh how great is the mystery of godliness!—God manifest in the flesh! How can we sufficiently admire and adore it! And how greatly should it endear to us the humanity of our Lord, that it was the sacred temple of the Godhead, inhabited by God the Son, and honoured with the more immediate presence of the Father and the Holy Spirit! for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell, even the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Surely, then, the man Jesus was altogether lovely, since he was lovely in the eyes of the eternal Trinity, who vouchsafed to dwell and to make their abode in him. Oh, blush then and be ashamed, ye sinful worms, who see nothing lovely in Jesus Christ, since the most blessed God sees him altogether lovely. Can ye find no comeliness in him, of whom the Father hath said, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." And are not ye well pleased with him, ye ungrateful men, for whom he was made man? Pardon,

Lord Jesus, our low opinion of the dignity of thy human nature. Let thy good Spirit teach us to form more exalted ideas of thee, while I am

Secondly, Speaking of the glory of thy divine nature.

All loveliness is certainly in God, inherent in him as the fountain, from whence flows whatever is lovely in the creation. And if Jesus Christ be the true God, then he must have every attribute and perfection that can endear him to his creatures, and make him altogether lovely in their eyes: and that he is the true God is as certain as that there is a God. The scripture has given him the names and the attributes of God, and has ascribed to him the works which none but the almighty Creator and the all-wise Preserver of the world could perform. He is called Jehovah, the incommunicable name of the Divine Essence, and Immanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us. He is said to be omniscient and omnipresent, to have created all things, and to uphold them by the word of his power: he came in the flesh to redeem them; and there is a day at hand when he will come to judge them. And will any man say that these are the attributes and works of a creature? Do they not evidently belong to the blessed and only potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, of whom the Old Testament says that he is God, the Saviour, and that there is none other, as Isaiah xlv. 21, 22: "There is no God else beside me, a just God and a Saviour: there is none beside me—Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." The apostle teaches the same doctrine in the New Testament, where he says, Rom. ix. 5, "That Christ is over all, God blessed for ever." Amen.

In these two passages (not to mention others) the Saviour is expressly said to be God—God over all, and consequently he must be altogether lovely; for every perfection which has any claim to our love is inherent in him; and whatever we see of loveliness in the works of nature owes its being to his divine wisdom, and power, and goodness; so that, whenever you see any thing worthy of your admiration, it should lead your thoughts up to Jesus Christ, the almighty Creator and Preserver of it. If you stop short of him, you rob him of his honour; because its loveliness is his. And what, then, must he be, how perfectly lovely and amiable, who is the great parent and author of all loveliness? Whatever sweetness and excellency you find in the creatures, is but a faint ray of the Creator's perfections, and was reflected from him upon them, to give you an idea of his loveliness. Admire him therefore in it. In all the beauties of nature you may trace the beauties of Jesus Christ the God of nature, who is the first cause from whom they all flow, and who is the last end, into whom they will be all finally resolved.

But I need not enlarge upon this point. God has certainly every perfection in himself. He is altogether lovely. But in what respects does he appear so to sinners? While they are under guilt, and sensible of their danger, they have no reason to love God: for, being transgressors of his holy law, condemned by its just sentence, which conscience owns to be just, subject to present death, and to eternal misery, how can they see any thing lovely in that God who may get glory to all his attributes by their destruction? In this view they must see every thing that can make God terrible, but nothing to render him lovely. Until they know that he will be reconciled unto them, and forgive them all their sins, they can have no reason to love him. The gospel alone can set forth to them the loveliness of God; which it does, by revealing unto us an incarnate God, God and man united in one Christ, who is altogether lovely in the eyes of his redeemed people, as I purposed in the third place to consider.

All our hopes of heaven are founded upon this truth, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself: for if the man Jesus was not united to the most blessed God, our religion is the grossest idolatry, and Christians are, of all men, most miserable. But the scripture has left no room to doubt of the union of the two natures in one Christ. The word was God, and the word was made flesh, says St. John; so that God the word was made flesh and incarnate. God was manifest in the flesh, says the beloved apostle Paul. And the reason was, he was manifested for our salvation. And it was expedient that the Saviour should be both God and man, because he was to obey and to suffer for us as man, and to merit by his obedience and sufferings as God, and thereby to be a complete Saviour. Accordingly, he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God the Father, took upon him the form of a servant, and was made man. He obeyed, he suffered, he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; and when all the ends for which he obeyed, suffered, and died, were answered, then it was not possible that he should be holden any longer of death. Justice released him on the third day from the prison of the grave; and he rose again triumphant from the dead; whereby believers had full evidence given them, that all the demands of the law were satisfied, that Christ's sufferings had made a full atonement for what they should have suffered; that he had taken out the sting of death, and had opened unto them the gate of everlasting life; for, as he stood in their place as their great representative, all his victories are theirs, and by faith they know and are assured of their interest in them. And through him, who loved them and gave himself for them, they shall be saved from sin, and Satan, from suffering and death, from hell and everlasting torments. And they shall not only be saved through him from these their spiritual enemies, but they shall also receive joys unspeakable and full of glory, a happiness greater than tongue can utter, or heart conceive, a crown incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away: for they shall be made kings and priests unto God and the Father, and they shall reign for ever and ever in fulness of joy, both in body and in soul: and all this shall be the free gift of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Thus the Lord Jesus, under the character of the incarnate God, is altogether lovely. He has every grace and perfection that can render him amiable in the eyes of believers; for to them that believe he is precious. And he has every thing that can recommend him to the esteem of awakened and convinced sinners. He is just such a Saviour as they want. He has every thing to give that they stand in need of. The God-man has an inexhaustible fountain of grace, which always stands open for the relief of weary and heavy laden sinners, who come unto him seeking rest unto their souls. He calls unto them with this sweet voice: Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters of comfort and salvation. Lo! here is pardon and peace, righteousness and holiness. All the graces that can make you lovely in the sight of God the Father—all the glories that can make you happy with him in eternity, are in my power to give. I purchased them for such sinners as you are, and I give them freely. Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find. And what should hinder them from answering him? Yea, they will answer. This is the very language of their hearts: Lord Jesus, help our unbelief. We are convinced that all the graces of time and all the glories of eternity are thy free gift; and we bless and praise thy holy name for putting it into our hearts to seek for the enjoyment of those graces and glories. All the loveliness of this lower world, all the loveliness of heaven itself is thine, centres in thy person, as the incarnate God, and flows from thee, as God made man, on purpose to make us, filthy and abominable sinners, lovely in the sight of thy heavenly Father. Oh that we may see clearly our interest in thee, and may know the incarnate God to be our Lord and our Saviour; and then our faith will behold thee altogether lovely, and shall admire no loveliness unless it bear thy fair image, and what leads us, through its beauties, to adore and praise thine.

And if Christ appear in this amiable light to those who are only seeking and desiring to experience his love and mercy, what thoughts must believers entertain of him? How must they value him? Certainly, he is with them altogether lovely. And have they not good reason to think him so? for what loveliness is there in heaven or earth but his? Is there not in his manhood every grace that can adorn the human nature? Is there not in his Godhead every infinite and eternal perfection? And do not these perfections flow through the manhood of the incarnate God, to render vile and polluted sinners altogether amiable and lovely? God and man were united in one Christ in order to save them from their sins; and he puts them into perfect possession of many of the benefits of his salvation, as pledges and earnests of his bestowing more: for he now awakens them and raises them from the death of sin to newness of life; he pardons their past rebellions, sends his good Spirit into their hearts to shed abroad in them the comforts of his pardoning love, to fill them with joy and peace in believing, to enable them to mortify the body of sin, and to put on the new man which, after the image of God, is created in righteousness and true holiness. All this is present salvation; the happiness of which is great beyond description. Oh! come then, my brethren, taste and see what the Lord Jesus has to give. Whatever your state and circumstances are, he can make you completely happy: for he has engaged that all things, adverse as well as prosperous, shall work together for good, for present and eternal good, to them that love him. And when you can love him, because he first loved you, then you will find that he is able to do exceeding abundantly for you, above all that you can either ask or think.

Upon this short view of our Lord's character, it appears that he is altogether lovely. He certainly has, as man, as God, and as the incarnate God, every perfection of heaven and earth. All that is amiable in itself, or ought to appear amiable to us, meets in him; and therefore, if we love what is amiable in itself, or what is good to us, we ought to give the first place in our hearts to the Lord Jesus. And does he, then, reign in them? Is he the sole Lord of your affections? Do you, my brethren, love him in sincerity, with a pure incorrupt love, and with all your hearts, and with all your minds, and with all your strength? Is his kingdom set up within you? and is it your delight to do the will of your Lord and of your God? Grace be with all them who thus love the Lord Jesus. But, alas! their number is but small: for melancholy it is to see how little the generality of men, called Christians, love him who is altogether lovely. The transient perishing objects of sense, the vanities, the follies of life, appear more lovely, and have more of their hearts, than that God whose servants and worshippers they profess themselves to be. Nay, the abominable deformity and horrid ugliness of sin seem to them more lovely. What can be the reason that men professing Christianity should be so inconsistent, and should make such a wrong judgment in so plain a case? Surely they must lay under some great delusion: for not to love him whom they call their God, and who is altogether lovely, is both a disgrace to their boasted reason, and is also acting against their own present and eternal interest. Sin is the cause of this monstrous delusion: it blinds the sinner's understanding, that he does not see his want of a Saviour, and consequently he cannot judge of the Saviour's worth. While he thinks himself whole, he sees no occasion for the physician. But so soon as conscience awakes, and he is made sensible of his guilt, and feels his misery, then he will desire the assistance of the great physician of souls, and will begin to value him. The more deeply he is convinced of sin, the more earnestly will he apply to the Lord Jesus who is able to save him from his sins. And as he partakes of the graces and blessings of salvation, the Saviour will grow more and more lovely in his eyes. And when conscience ceases to accuse, when the law no longer condemns, but he finds joy and peace in believing, then the Saviour will be altogether lovely. The believer will form higher ideas of him than he can find words to express: yea, he knows that his ideas of him cannot rise up to the greatness of his Lord's merits. As man he is far exalted above the children of men; as God, he is over all blessed for ever; and as God incarnate, he is the continual joy of the believer's heart, and the sweet subject of his praise here in time; and the song of the glorified spirits in heaven will be upon the riches of his grace; and they will never be able to exhaust the subject, or to search it to the bottom, because the riches of Christ are unsearchable, and infinite, and eternal.

Here, then, we are come to the root of the matter. Jesus is altogether lovely: but why do not all men who profess to worship him think him so? Because they do not find their want of him. They are under no concern about their sins, and have no desire to know the pardon of them, and therefore they see no reason to esteem the Saviour of sinners. They are ignorant of their own wants, and therefore they know not his worth; but basely, wickedly prefer the worthless things of this life to the Lord and giver of life and glory. Is not this the sad state of the generality of our people? And does not this evidently prove that they are Christians only in name? They have none of the spirit and power of their religion, but in their lives dishonour that holy name by which they are called.

My brethren, are any of you in this state? Look up to God, and beg of him to show you the true state of your souls, that you may see how much you are concerned in what has been said. Are you indeed lovers of the Lord Jesus? Is he in your eyes altogether lovely? When the objects of sense flatter, and present themselves to your choice in the most alluring dress, then do you see your beloved Saviour the chief among ten thousand? Can you give up ten thousand of them for him? For him can you reject with disdain all that the world calls great and honourable, and looking upon Jesus to be all and in all? If you are not in this state, be assured that your hearts are not right with God: and if you neither see the perfect loveliness of Jesus Christ, nor desire to see it, then you are still under the power of sin, deluded and blinded by it; and, if God does not open your eyes to see the delusion, death will soon open them to your everlasting confusion. But if God has convinced you of sin, and you find your want of a Saviour, wait upon him, and he will give you many happy proofs of his perfect loveliness. You will experience his love in pardoning your sins, in justifying you from the guilt of them in making you the children of God, and in fitting you for his heavenly kingdom. Daily, as you find your interest more clearly in his redeeming love, you will partake more and more of his exceeding great and precious promises, whereby your love to him will increase, and you will find him more lovely. Faith will open to you the riches of his love, and show you how precious he is; for, to them that believe, he is precious; he is precious indeed to the believer. And he is not precious to all men, because they do not see their want of him, nor know what his free grace can do for them: for he has invited all weary and heavy-laden sinners to come and experience how happy he can make them. Whatever their wants may be, he is willing and able to supply them. If ye be but sensible of them, ask, my brethren, and he will relieve you. Be ye ever so black in yourselves, he can make you comely. Be your sins ever so many, ever so heinous, in his righteousness you may be presented before God the Father without spot of sin unto salvation. Have you thought ever so meanly of him, his good Spirit can give you reason to entertain more noble sentiments. Your ingratitude, your very blasphemies against him, may be pardoned, and much ingratitude, and many blasphemies are no bar to his free grace. This is the sweetest part of our Lord's character, and ought, above all, to endear him unto those who see their want of his help. Let them come ever so late, ever so guilty, the arms of his mercy are open to receive them. If you see nothing but sin in yourselves, yet go to him. His blood cleanseth from all sin. Implore his mercy, and see whether he will cast you out. Be not discouraged by looking into yourselves; you may be deformed enough; but remember that he is altogether lovely, and by faith you will know his loveliness is yours. He will wash you clean from every stain of sin in his most precious blood, and will present you before his Father in spotless purity. Be ye ever so defiled with uncleanness; have lust, drunkenness, or gluttony polluted the body; and the love of the world and of the things of the world still more polluted the soul; yet the fountain is open. Go, wash, and be clean. Sins deep as scarlet shall be as white as snow; sins like crimson shall be as wool. They that are washed in the Redeemer's blood stand before God's tribunal as white as snow, without spot of sin unto salvation.

My dearly beloved brethren, can ye believe these things? do ye assent to them? and yet, are ye not determined to apply to Jesus Christ for his graces and blessings? He invites you to come to him; and will you not come? Be ye ever so unworthy, he will make you worthy. Be ye ever so abominable in the sight of God, he will make you lovely. All your wants he is able and willing to supply. Why, then, do you choose to live without his graces and blessings? They may be had freely. Ask, and ye shall have. Only express your wants. Beg a supply from his bounty, and he that has done all for you will do all in you. Go, then, with your wants, whatever they be, to the throne of grace, and the incarnate God will supply them. He is more ready to give than you can be to ask. His heart is large and open. It is the same tender heart which once bled to death for sinners: it cannot want love. And he is now on the throne of glory: he cannot want power. Apply to this loving God and Saviour of sinners, and he will convince you of your wants and of his worth. He will bestow upon you, out of his fulness, grace for grace, until you acknowledge with thankful hearts that the Lord Jesus is altogether lovely.

My Christian brethren, you can bear me witness that I have spoken but a small part of the Redeemer's praise: for you believe him to be a true and very man, and true and very God, united in one Christ; and you know, by sure scripture marks and evidences, that the one Christ is your Saviour; whereby you are interested in all that he did and suffered as man, and merited as God, and has now, as king-mediator, to bestow. Being thus enabled to say, "My beloved is mine, and I am his," you are convinced that your beloved is above all blessing and praise. You cannot reach the greatness of his merits. The poverty of language, the weakness of the human understanding, the coldness of your affections, are so many hindrances to your speaking of your God and Saviour as he deserves. And when you try to get over these obstacles, and have some hopes of success, yet then you find the corruptible body so presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle so weigheth down the mind, that praise dies away upon your lips. But you hope there is a time at hand, when your praises will be more perfect. When you shall be freed from all the frailties of this mortal life, you will then be better able to discover, and more constantly disposed to celebrate, the loveliness of your redeeming God. But even you will not be equal to the subject. Your praises will be but finite, and the adorable Redeemer is infinite. There is no proportion between them; no more than between time and eternity: and suppose you continue your praises to eternity, yet your happiness, your crowns of glory and palms of victory, your standing confirmed in bliss, are the free gifts of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. And how, then, can you worthily extol the riches of his free grace? How can you pay the debt that you owe to free grace? When you have praised him for millions of years, Jesus is still as lovely, your praise as much due, your joy in offering it as great, as when you began. There is still the same majesty in the brightness of that glory which shines in the face of Jesus Christ. He is the light of the heavenly Jerusalem; and light, you know, is sweet; yea, a pleasant thing it is to behold the sun. Oh how sweet, how pleasant, then, must it be to see the sun of righteousness shining in his glory! Surely he will then appear altogether lovely. Blessed are the eyes that shall then see the king in his beauty; and happy, for ever happy, are they who shall then praise him; but even then the highest strain of praise of angels and men united will not come up to the greatness of his merit. He will be more lovely than all the tongues of all the heavenly host will be able to express. And if the glorified spirits thus fail,

O thou incarnate God! whose glory the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain, pardon the low opinion we entertain of thine infinite excellencies; pardon the imperfect manner in which we have been speaking and thinking of thee. Thou knowest, Lord, that we desire to know thee more, and to praise thee better. Arise then, O thou bright and morning star, and shine into our hearts, dispelling the darkness of our understandings, and taking away the depravity of our wills and affections, that we may see thy loveliness, and our interest in it; and enable us daily to love thee more and more, until we behold thee face to face, and then we shall know that our Saviour and our God is altogether lovely. O thou adorable Jesus! admit us all to this blessed vision and fruition of thy Godhead. May all this congregation be in the happy number of thy redeemed people, who are to praise and admire thine infinite loveliness for ever and ever. So be it, to the honour and glory of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three persons in one Divine Essence, to whom be equal praise and worship in heaven and earth, in time and in eternity. Amen and Amen.

DISCOURSE VIII.

CHAP. v. ver. 16.

This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend.

IN the last discourse I endeavoured to recommend to you some of the loveliness of Jesus Christ. It was only some part of his loveliness: for we know it at present but in part. It is infinite, and surpasseth all understanding. The most enlightened mind cannot fully comprehend it, no not in heaven. We shall not be able in eternity to discover all the perfections of our incarnate God: and how then can we think or speak worthily of them at present? We must fall below the majesty of the subject; but that is no reason we should not treat of it. It is our duty and interest to think and to speak of our blessed Saviour in the most sublime ideas, and in the highest expressions, because we cannot exceed the greatness of his merits. He is above all blessing and praise: and so you will believe when you know him to be your Saviour. When the Spirit of wisdom and revelation enlightens the eyes of your understanding, then you will behold some of Christ's loveliness; and when you are enabled to say with true faith, "This is my beloved, and this is my friend," then his loveliness will appear to you with a new grace and excellency, because you will then see your interest in it.

This is the particular view in which I shall consider our Lord's loveliness at present. The believer knows him to be his beloved, and the perfections of Christ appear with a peculiar beauty through this endearing relation, because he can truly say, He that has these perfections is my beloved and my friend; he has them for me; I have a sure interest in them, in time and in eternity. My brethren, do the perfections of Christ appear to you in this light? Can you take up the words of the text and repeat them from your own experience? I fear there are not many of us who can: for the generality of men, called Christians, choose other beloveds and other friends than Jesus Christ. Many of them have no love for him; or, if he has any place at all, yet he has not the first place in their hearts and affections, no, not even in theirs, to whom he has been most bountiful. Where his favours have been great, there one might expect great returns of love; but we find no such thing in fact: not many worldly-wise and learned, not many rich and noble, repay his favours with thankfulness. Though Christ be altogether lovely, and ought to appear so to them, yet few of them love him. What can be the reason that men of genius, whom Christ has blessed with great gifts and talents, should make him no suitable returns of gratitude? and that men, who profess themselves to be his worshippers, should have no love for their God? The true cause is, they are in love with sin, and it blinds them. Christ is all beauty, but they have no eyes to see it; no, not even a desire to see it, until they begin to find the exceeding sinfulness of sin. When conscience is uneasy about the pardon of their sins, and they feel their want of a Saviour, then they will begin to desire his salvation, and God will hear their desires, and will open their eyes to see a precious Christ, and will give them faith to believe in him to the saving of the soul. Faith makes Christ appear precious: for it is the proper office of faith to enable us to behold Christ's excellencies; and it is the proper work of that faith which worketh by love to let us know our interest in them, by which every excellency appears to us more lovely. And the text describes this office, and also this work of faith. The believer first declares that Christ is altogether lovely, and then, that he knew Christ's loveliness was his. "This is my beloved, and this is my friend." He is my beloved, on whom my heart and mine affections are entirely placed; because he first loved me, and gave himself for me. He has shed abroad his love in my heart; and I know that my beloved is mine, and I am his. He is mine—my friend—who has my welfare at heart, and who will deny me nothing that can make me happy in time and in eternity. May the Spirit of the Lord Jesus open all your understandings to see, and all your hearts to receive, these comfortable truths, while I am discoursing upon the words, and opening the sweet doctrine contained in them, by showing

First, What Christ has done to make himself the beloved and the friend of every believer.

Secondly, The believer's knowledge of his interest in it before he could say, This is my beloved, and this is my friend.

Thirdly, From whence arose the certainty of his knowledge.

Fourthly, The happiness he had in knowing certainly that Christ was his beloved and his friend. And then I will apply the whole, as God shall enable me, to your consciences.

And First, I am to show what Christ has done to make himself the beloved, and the friend of every believer.

If men followed the common instincts of nature, and had no bias to turn them from their own interest, he would be the beloved friend of the whole world; for is there a more natural or stronger instinct than the love of pleasure and the hatred of pain? We are subject to innumerable pains, both in body and soul, in this world and in the next; and we have very few enjoyments that can be called real pleasures. Sin was the cause of all our misery. It robbed us of our pleasures, and brought upon us our pains. All was good until sin entered into the world; but when it entered, all evil entered with it; the evil of pain to torment our bodies and bring them down to the grave of death; the evil of guilt to torment our consciences; and the evil of punishment beyond the grave, where soul and body were to receive the wages of sin. Fom these evils the Lord Jesus came into the world to save his people. And he took our nature, that in it he might bear our griefs and carry our sorrows. The holy law of God accused us of transgression; and he came to answer the demands of the law; which he did by paying it a full and perfect obedience: and this obedience, being the act of a divine and infinite person, had therefore a divine and infinite merit to atone and satisfy for sin. For transgressing the holy law of God we were liable to suffer the threatened pains and penalties. Christ, in our nature, suffered them for us, taking our sins upon him, and bearing the griefs and sorrows and death due to them: for the scripture declares that he was made sin for us, who knew no sin, and that he bare our sins in his own body upon the tree, and that by his stripes we are healed. And he demonstrated that these sufferings were infinitely meritorious when he rose from the dead for our justification. And thus, by his active and passive obedience, he wrought out an all-perfect righteousness for us: and when the Holy Spirit enables us to lay hold of it by the hand of faith, then, being thus applied and made ours, we are not only freed from condemnation and redeemed from the curse of the broken law, and from all the pains and penalties due to the breach of it, but do also receive a right and title to the present graces and to the eternal blessings purchased for us by the obedience and sufferings of our most blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Now, let us examine how the forementioned instinct operates in the present case. We all love pleasure, and hate pain. This is a universal principle in human nature. And here is a Saviour who promises to deliver us from the present and eternal pains to which sin had subjected us, and to give us of his spiritual and heavenly pleasures here in time and in eternity. He is able to fulfil his promise; for he is the almighty God. He is willing; for, as his power is, so is his love: both are alike infinite. And indeed he is daily fulfilling his promise unto all true believers. But are all men seeking freedom from pain and enjoyment of pleasure at his hands? Do their desires, their affections, move to him with the same natural instinct with which they would fly from sickness and pursue health? Let matter of fact speak. How are men found to act with respect to Jesus Christ, who has present salvation to give them from sin and its effects in his kingdom of grace, and the pleasures of eternal salvation to bestow in his kingdom of glory? Alas! he is despised and rejected of men: although he became a man of sorrows on purpose to carry our sorrows, and acquainted with grief that he might bear our griefs, yet they hide, as it were, their faces from him. The haters of pain choose sin, with all its miseries, rather than accept of the great salvation of our God; and the lovers of pleasure prefer the empty perishing joys of sense to the solid and everlasting joys of his heaven. In what relates to the soul, they act against that very instinct by which they are invariably guided in what relates to the body. What can be the reason that the same men should act so inconsistently in a case exactly parallel? Sin is the true cause. Sin has destroyed the use of the intellectual faculties in all spiritual matters, and, by cutting off all communion with God, who is the fountain of spiritual life, has left the soul in a state of death, even dead in trespasses and sins. The soul of every natural man is represented in scripture to be as dead to all motions of grace, as dead to God and to the things of God, as a lifeless corpse is to the things of this world. Talk to it of its wants; it feels them not. Recommend to it the Redeemer's sweet graces and divine excellencies; it has no desire to find an interest in them; because it feels not its wants of them. To persons in this state Jesus Christ cannot appear lovely. Notwithstanding all that he has done and suffered to endear himself to sinners, yet, while they see an engaging form and comeliness in sin, they can see no form or comeliness in the Saviour, that they should desire him.

But when one of these persons is awakened from the dead sleep of sin; when his eyes are opened to see himself; when he has a clear view given him of his sinful heart and of his wicked life, and the Spirit of God sets home the conviction of sin upon his conscience, and makes him sensible of his guilt and of his danger; then he will find his want of a Saviour, and will see a peculiar suitableness and fitness in Jesus Christ to supply all his wants. He has every office and every qualification that an awakened sinner could wish. He is just such a Saviour as his heart could desire: and when he begins to see Christ in this light, then he will begin to appear lovely in his eyes. And when, out of the riches of his grace, he begins to supply the sinner's wants, then he will become more lovely: for the more any man knows of Christ, the more he will love him. But when the pardoned sinner tastes the sweetness of redeeming love, and finds joy and peace shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Spirit; when he can say Jesus Christ loved me and gave himself for me; then the beloved Saviour appears altogether lovely; because he sees his interest in the obedience and sufferings of the God-man. He can take up the words of the text, and speak them upon his own experience, which leads me, Secondly, to consider the believer's knowledge of his interest in Christ before he could say, "This is my beloved, and this is my friend." Here he applies to himself what Christ had done for sinners, as the ground of his love and friendship to him. He had been made to see his wants. The soul, being awakened, had found the burden of sin intolerable, and had gone weary and heavy laden to Jesus Christ; and he had given it rest. The soul, being convinced of sin, felt the torments of a guilty conscience, which nothing could quiet and comfort but the atoning blood of the Lamb of God: and when this was sprinkled upon the conscience, it felt the sovereign healing virtue: for the blood of Jesus quenched the hell within, and brought down heaven into the soul. The Holy Spirit bore his inward witness that this was the work of God; and he continued the heavenly joy of his first testimony by enabling the believer to show the reality of the inward work by the outward evidence of his life and conversation, by bringing forth the rich and ripe fruits of the Spirit to the glory of God. And thus he had good evidence of his being interested in the obedience and atonement, in the righteousness and sanctifying grace of Jesus Christ, and lived in sure and certain hope of inheriting through him immortality and endless glory.

The sinner must experience these things before he can say of the Redeemer, "This is my beloved and my friend." He must find in himself these proofs of Christ's love and friendship which he was to show to sinners. He had wisdom and pardon, righteousness and holiness, and eternal redemption to give them: but my gratitude and love cannot arise from his having them to give to sinners in general, but to me in particular. I must have reason to call them mine: he must enable me to apply and to appropriate them to myself before I can see his loveliness in giving them; because it is not what he does to others, but what he does to my soul, that makes him my beloved and my friend. And hence came the wise remark, which was so often made by our first reformers, "That an un-applied Christ is no Christ." All that he has done and suffered for sinners must be applied to me before I can call him mine. He is the wisdom and the light of his people: but how can he appear to me altogether lovely in this character if I am still in ignorance and darkness? How can I love him for being made unto me wisdom until he has enlightened me with saving truth? He has pardon to give to the greatest sinners: but if it be never made out to me, I can have none of the comforts of it: and how, then, can I love him for being the pardoner of sin "unless I feel my conscience at peace with God, through the remission of my sin," as our church expresses it, in the third part of the homily for Rogation week? He has the robe of perfect righteousness to bestow: but if I know nothing of my being clothed with it, the law will still condemn, and my conscience will be full of guilt and horror: and how then is it possible for me to love him for being the righteousness of the saints if I never find joy and peace in believing that his righteousness is imputed unto me for my justification? He is the believer's holiness and sanctification; but how is he mine while I find myself enslaved to sin and kept under its dominion? How can I love Christ for being the sanctification of his people while I am under the absolute power of sin? Christ is also made unto the believer redemption: but if I know nothing of my having received redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, how can I lift up my head with joy when the almighty Judge is coming in the clouds, as knowing that my redemption then draweth nigh? In like manner all Christ's gifts and graces are matter of joy to the pardoned sinner, so far as he receives them, and knows by faith his interest in them: without this knowledge, of what benefit can they be, or what comfort can they administer to any person? For if you be sick, and have an excellent remedy that would cure you, yet it can do you no service unless you take it. Suppose you are perishing of hunger and thirst; setting meat and drink before you will not save your life unless you use them. If you are naked and like to be frozen to death, will those clothes warm you, and save your life, which you never put on? So Christ is the medicine of the sin-sick soul: but if Christ's virtue be not applied to heal, if the medicine be not taken, how can it work a cure? So he is the bread of life: but unless he be taken, and verily and indeed received, as spiritual food, how can he support the life of God in the soul of man? So Christ is the clothing of his people: but how can he be their clothing if they never put him on? How can they appear before God in spotless purity if they have never put on Christ Jesus the Lord? Surely, then, there is great judgment in that wise saying, which our reformers had so often in their mouths, "An unapplied Christ is no Christ"—he is no Christ to that sinner to whom he is not applied, and therefore he is not his beloved nor his friend.

From hence appears the manner and kind of knowledge on which the believer grounded the words of the text. He was able to apply to himself all that Christ had done and suffered for sinners. He knew it experimentally. He had the comforts of it in his own heart; and, seeing clearly his interest in Christ, he therefore saw him altogether lovely.

But perhaps some one may ask, Can I apply the merits of Christ's obedience and sufferings so clearly and safely to myself, that I may be sure I am not deluded? This is a very important inquiry, which I shall pursue under my third head, wherein I was to consider what certainty I can have of Christ's being my beloved and my friend. The scripture promises us full and complete evidence; and it is the office of faith to enable us to rest upon it. Our certainty arises from our faith, and from what faith shows us of our own particular interest in God's promises. The word of promise and the Holy Spirit applying the word must go together: for the word is but a dead letter unless the Holy Spirit animate and quicken it, by working faith in the heart, to apply it savingly. Faith is a divine grace, given us by the Spirit of God on purpose to convince us of our interest in Jesus Christ, and to enable us to apply the promises to ourselves: for it is expressly said to be "the gift of God," and to be wrought in us by "the operation of God." By his almighty operation he works in my heart a clear conviction of my being accepted at the bar of justice as just and righteous, through the righteousness of Jesus Christ. When the Holy Spirit has given the believer this clear conviction, then he has divine authority, both from the word of truth and the Spirit of power, to call the Saviour his beloved and his friend. The Holy Spirit must enable him to do this: "for no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost:" and therefore without the Holy Ghost, how can any man say that Jesus is my Lord? Indeed he will be so far from saying it, that he will question whether it can be said with certainty. The natural man, who has not the divine grace of faith, is always reasoning against it, and concludes with himself that it is altogether presumption. He cannot see how it works full assurance in the mind. And how should he? As he is a stranger to the thing, how should he judge of the nature of the evidence which it gives? He is a more improper judge than a blind man is of colours: for until he receive faith from God as his gift, and by the operation of God as the work of his Spirit, he can form no idea of the nature of the certainty which it produces in the mind. The scripture teaches him that faith is the evidence of things not seen, even such evidence as gives them a present substance and reality; so that the whole man and every faculty of soul and body rest upon the certainty of them with full assurance, and direct every word and work towards the attainment of them; but the natural man receiveth not these things. How the eye of faith should be open, to see what is to the natural man invisible, seems to him a great mystery. And so it will be until God open his eyes. He only can do it; yea, he only can convince him that he is now blind. Oh that the enlightening Spirit may open the eyes of every person here present who has no certainty of his interest in Christ, that he may not only be convinced such a thing is to be attained, but may also be led to seek until he find all the comforts of it! Which comforts I proposed, in the fourth place, to consider.

The comforts which I here speak of are realities, promised in God's infallible word, bestowed by his Spirit and received by faith. They no more depend upon fancy and imagination than the objects do which we see with our eyes and handle with our hands. The soul has as true a perception of them as the bodily senses can have of any solid substance And you may as well say we are deluded at our common meals, when we are eating or drinking, or when we are hearing a fine piece of music, as suppose righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost to be a delusion. Thank God the believer knows, and is happy in knowing, the reality of those things. When he can say with the apostle, Jesus Christ loved me, and gave himself for me; and with the faithful in the text, he is my beloved, and he is my friend; then he has the present possession of the graces and blessings purchased by the Redeemer's obedience and sufferings, and the eternal possession is secured to him under the seal of two infallible witnesses; viz. the word and the Spirit of God. The comforts which he enjoys in this state can no more be described than the joys of heaven. He has a love which passeth knowledge, a peace which surpasseth all understanding, a joy which is unspeakable and full of glory. In one word, the Comforter is his. The eternal Spirit, whose name, whose office, whose glory, it is to be the comforter of God's people, is his. He is the applier of all comfort, and he dwells in the heart to apply it. What comfort, then, can be wanting? He is the sinner's comforter: for he comes to give him faith, and to assure him of his pardon and acceptance. He is the believer's comforter in all times and states, strengthening and establishing him, shedding abroad in his heart that love which makes prosperity safe and adversity sweet, and which renders even the way of the commandments delightful. And this divine comforter is the dearest pledge of our Lord's love; "for he shall take of mine," says the blessed Jesus, "and shall show it unto you," even to all his disciples and followers, to the end of the world. He shall take of my graces and blessings, and shall show them unto you, shall manifest them and your interest in them to your hearts. I will send him for this purpose. In this one gift he sent you all; because he sent you that Spirit who lets you know your interest in all. Knowing this, you are happy, yea, happier than tongue of men or angels can describe. Your loftiest descriptions fall short of the happiness which the Lord Jesus gives by his Spirit in the present life: and they who taste of it find that he is altogether lovely, and are assured that he is their beloved and their friend. May the God of all mercy and consolation assure every one of you of your interest in the Redeemer's friendship, that you may receive many happy proofs of it in time and in eternity!

And now let us look into ourselves, and apply what has been said to our own hearts. You have heard what the Lord Jesus did and suffered to make himself the beloved and the friend of all believers, and what knowledge he gives them of their interest in his obedience and sufferings; nay what certainty they have by faith of their interest in him, from whence flows a continual source of pure and spiritual comfort. Since these things are so, the matter is now brought to a point; and that is—Can you, my brethren, take up the words of the text, and upon the clear evidence of your own experience declare, Jesus Christ is my beloved and my friend—He is mine, and I am his—His good Spirit bears testimony of it in my heart—The word of God bears testimony of it in my life: for I am become a new creature, and live a new life in Christ Jesus. If you can say this with truth, then you are happy. But if you cannot, you want the true foundation of gospel comfort, which is laid in Christ Jesus, and in the evidence I have of my interest in him.

But perhaps some of you may think that there is no knowing for certain, and others may think it presumption for a man to declare, that he knows so much of the state of his soul as to be certain that Christ is his beloved and his friend. Hear what the scripture says: "Jesus Christ," says the blessed apostle Paul, "loved me, and gave himself for me." Certainly this was not presumption in Paul, nor yet in the beloved John, when he said, "The Son of God hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true: and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ." He did not think it any presumption to declare that he was in Christ—rooted and built up in him.

But these apostles, some will say, were inspired: they knew this by inspiration: but is it the common privilege of all believers to know it? It is. Every true believer knows that Christ Jesus is his Saviour and his God. Faith manifests it to him; and faith is wrought in him by the operation of the Holy Spirit for this very purpose. So says our church, in the third part of the homily of salvation: "The true faith is a sure trust and confidence in God, that by the merits of Christ my sins be forgiven, and I am reconciled to the favour of God, and am partaker of the kingdom of heaven by Christ." And in the third part of the homily for Rogation week, our church says, "that a man may feel his conscience at peace with God through remission of his sin." So say the living members of our church. They can use her words without presumption, and declare that they have a sure trust and confidence in God, that by the merits of Christ, their sins are forgiven, and they are reconciled to the favour of God, and are partakers of the kingdom of heaven by Christ, and that they feel their conscience at peace with God, through remission of their sin. What can you object to these authorities? The Liturgy will not suffer any member of our church to make the least objection: for, in the prayer after the communion service, we are taught, "That God does assure them, who have duly received these holy mysteries, of his favour and goodness towards them; nay more, assures them that they are very members incorporate into the mystical body of his Son, and also assures them that they are heirs through the hope of his everlasting kingdom." Here our church plainly teaches that a believer may know Christ to be his beloved and his friend: for he may have assurance of God's favour and goodness towards him—the assurance of his being united to Christ, and incorporated into his mystical body—and the assurance of his being an heir of Christ's everlasting kingdom. The warmest contenders for the assurance of faith could not have expressed their opinion in stronger terms than our church uses in this prayer. And now, my brethren of the church of England, what do you think of these authorities? Are they not clear and decisive? And will you not be determined by them? Here you have the word of God, and the Spirit of God, and the people of God, with one voice declaring that a man not only may know, but that it is the very office and work of saving faith to let him know, and to assure him of, the favour and goodness of God towards him, and that he is a member of Christ, and an heir of glory. Do not then, my brethren, deny a fact so well attested. Your denial of it will only prove your want of true saving faith: and it is a very strong proof to others. Would to God you saw your want of it yourselves! At present you dispute against the certainty which faith gives, because you have not received it, nor have any desire for it. Is not this the case? This shows your want of that faith, which is the operation of God. When faith is the work of his grace, it brings absolute certainty. According to the apostle, it gives substance to the things hoped for, and evidence to the things not seen. If you have not this kind of faith, do not dispute against it, lest you should be found disputing against God. Rather beg of God to give it you. Ask him, if it be the privilege of believers to know Jesus Christ to be your beloved and your friend, to give you this knowledge. Ask it for the sake of your present and eternal peace. If you desire a calm, serene conscience, free from the guilt of sin, and saved from the power and dominion of it, beg you may know your interest in the Lord Jesus: for until you know it, you cannot live upon the promises nor enjoy the comforts of the gospel. You cannot live upon the promises but by faith—by that faith which makes the things hoped for substantially present, and realizes the things not seen, and thus enjoys the comforts of the gospel. But as you have not this faith, you live without Christ in the world: and if you should come to die without any hope in him, oh! think what your condition would then be! All your sins would stand unatoned against you. Conscience would accuse. The broken law would condemn you. Justice must give you your due: and what but the wages of sin! even eternal destruction of soul and body! Are not these very interesting and alarming considerations? I pray God to give them their proper weight and influence upon your minds. May he convince you of your want of faith, and stir you up to seek it as the free gift, and as the work and operation of the almighty Spirit. Thus seek, and you shall find. Continue seeking with humility in the ways of the ordinances, and you will be brought to the knowledge of a loving Saviour, who will give you many reasons to call him your beloved and your friend.

If then you are convinced of sin, and see your guilt and your danger, what should hinder you from accepting the blessings of Christ's love? Is it the sense of your unworthiness? He is the Saviour of the unworthy. Are you afraid he will not receive you, because you are great sinners? He came to save the greatest. But you have been high and long in rebellion against him. Then you stand in greater need of pardon. Make more haste to obtain it, and apply more earnestly for it. But you find so much weakness and backwardness in yourself, that you are at a loss how to take one step. This is another motive for applying to him. Read, for your encouragement, that sweet scripture, "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Go, then, to him such as you are: go as poor lost sinners: for such he came to seek and to save. He is the beloved Saviour and friend of sinners. His love to them brought him down from heaven—carried him through a blaspheming persecuting world—nailed him to the cross—and laid him in the grave. Can he want love for sinners, who did so much, who bled to death for them? What can he withhold from them, who is now their advocate, pleading their cause, and interceding for them at the bar of justice? Oh, sinner, consider what a blessing it is to have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is willing and able to supply all thy wants. Make them known to him. Open thy heart before him, and acknowledge thy great and numerous sins. Confess them, and they will be no bar to his love and friendship. He will do honour to his free grace by making thee out a full pardon. The Holy Spirit will be sent to bear his testimony of it in thy heart: he will give thee love and joy in believing: he will clothe thee with the perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ: he will enrich thy justified soul with his sanctifying graces, mortifying sin in thee, and making thee alive to God; and he will make thee happy in having the most high God and Saviour for thy beloved and thy friend here in time and in eternity.

All this, and more than this, the Lord Jesus will do for every unpardoned sinner who will apply to him. No tongue can relate the greatness and number of the graces and blessings which he has to give to sinners. Faith has a present taste of them, and hope now enjoys them; and, though imperfectly, yet no description can come up to what the believer feels. And who, then, is able to describe how great they will be when faith and hope shall cease, and the soul shall be filled with the love of God? Oh what happiness, what a heaven will it be to see our Saviour in the brightness of divine glory! to behold him face to face—and then to be able to say of him whom all the host of heaven worship—of the eternal and almighty God whom all the redeemed adore—This is my beloved, and this is my friend! That will be joy unspeakable. Oh, how lovely, how altogether lovely, will this blessed God then appear in the eyes of sinners, when his love and friendship shall have brought them safe to the enjoyment of his eternal glory! How will they then admire and praise the wonders of his redeeming love! What subject of joy, and gratitude, and thanks will their consideration of his free grace afford them, which raised them from the lowest state of wretchedness to the highest happiness of his heaven! Certainly, this blessedness surpasseth all understanding. No tongue can utter, or heart conceive, how great it is. And yet, sinner, all this may be thine. The Lord Jesus promises it freely. Come, then, and accept of it. Unless thou thinkest thy sins can make thee happier than God can, return to them no more. Now close in with the invitation that is made thee. Take Jesus for thy God. Go this day, this hour, to the throne of his grace. Commit thyself into his hands, sinful as thou art, and he will send his good Spirit into thy heart, to give thee present comforts of salvation, and to prepare thee for the eternal salvation of thy Lord and thy God.

And now, what wait we for, O thou most blessed God and most loving Saviour! but that we may all experience the truth of this scripture. Write it, Lord Jesus, in all our hearts. Send us away with warm impressions of it upon our minds. Oh that every soul here present had reason to say, Yea, he is altogether lovely—Whatever is lovely in heaven and earth meets in the incarnate God; and this incarnate God is my beloved and this is my friend. May the grace of the eternal Three, of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, manifest to your souls the perfect loveliness of Jesus Christ, and keep him your beloved and your friend in time, until you see him face to face in his eternal glory. Amen and Amen

DISCOURSE IX.

CHAP. vi. ver. 1.

Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee.

IN the beginning of the fifth chapter, we find the believer fallen into a spiritual slumber. After much sweet communion with Christ, and long walking in the light of his countenance, he grew negligent. While the bridegroom tarried, he slumbered and slept. He left off stirring up the gift of God that was in him, and ceased to be watchful and to strengthen the things which remain. And thus he forgot the rule laid down for the conduct of believers—"Let us not sleep as others do; but let us watch and be sober."

Christ is represented as coming to the soul sleeping in this security; but it was not a total, universal sleep, like the dead sleep of sin: for he found the heart awake, and capable of distinguishing it to be his voice that knocked at the door of the heart for admittance, and said, "Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; for I have been waiting till my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night." The soul, willing to enjoy its indolent slumber, excuses itself from rising to let him in. Upon which he withdrew himself, and hid his face. He took away the sensible feeling of his comforts, but at the same time left something in the heart which made it sensible of its past unkindness, and put it upon endeavouring earnestly to recover its former communion and sweet fellowship with Christ. The soul is restless until they be recovered—goes out to seek for Christ, but cannot find him—calls, but he gives no answer—meets with reproach and persecution in the search, and yet gives it not over—turns to the daughters of Jerusalem, the outward members of the church, and charges them, if they found her beloved, to tell him that she was sick of love; she had enjoyed the sweetness of his presence, and now so distinctly discerned his absence as to be sick and in pain for the return of his love.

Instead of answering directly, they inquire, "What is thy beloved, more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? What is thy beloved more than another beloved, that thou so chargest us?" This question gave occasion to the believer to describe his beloved. He draws a character of Christ, and paints his excellencies under the most sublime images nature could afford; but finds all too mean to express Christ's worth, and his value for it. He therefore sums it up in these words: "Yea, he is altogether lovely—This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem."—Although he has withdrawn himself, yet still he is altogether lovely in my eyes: for I know that I am interested in him; and this gives a new grace to his every excellency. Still he is my beloved, and I am his; still he is my friend, and I am his. Although he has for a time hid his face from me, yet I believe that, ere long, I shall again walk in the light of his countenance. This enlivened description of Christ fired the daughters of Jerusalem. They now saw there was something more in this beloved than in another beloved; and they had good desires stirred up in their hearts—earnest and fervent desires—to share in his love, and to partake of his graces and blessings: for thus they now reply, in a very different temper from what they showed before: "Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee." May the Holy Spirit, by his gracious influence, dispose every one of us to seek, as they did, until we find an interest in the blessed Jesus. And to this end may he accompany with his grace and blessing what shall now be offered,

First, Concerning the character of the persons who speak the words of the text.

Secondly, Concerning the subject-matter of their speech. And Thirdly, Concerning the use we are to make of it.

And first, The persons who speak in the text are called "The daughters of Jerusalem." Jerusalem is the church. The scripture applies the word both to the congregation of the faithful here below, and also to the heavenly Jerusalem that is above. The daughters of the church are its members, who are bred and educated in it. They lived in her communion, and partook of her ordinances. And yet they seem to have had no experience of that sweet and spiritual union which the believer enjoyed with his beloved Saviour: for they inquire what he saw in Christ more than in any other beloved, and, being made acquainted with his graces and excellencies, then they desire to seek him along with the believer. These circumstances plainly prove that they were not intimately and vitally united to Christ by faith. They were not joined to him as the head of the mystical body, nor, as his living members, were they drawing nourishment and strength from him for the support and carrying on their spiritual life. They were not as living branches grafted into the true vine, and bearing much fruit by their union with him; but they contented themselves with living within the pale of the visible church, and thought themselves safe and happy in church membership. They were the children of Abraham, admitted into the covenant on the eighth day, lived among God's chosen people, who had the law and promises, and they were strict in the observance of the instituted rites and ceremonies. Easy and secure in this state, none of them inquired—All these have I kept: what lack I yet? One thing thou lackest—spiritual communion with Christ—without which church privileges and outward ordinances do not answer the end of their appointment. It is the Spirit that quickeneth: the flesh profiteth nothing. The flesh, the outward service, profiteth nothing unless the quickening Spirit go along with it; and the quickening Spirit has not gone along with it until he has begun to draw the soul to Christ, and to unite it to him by faith.

If we look among the members of our church, we shall find too many followers of these daughters of Jerusalem. We have some who, because they live in the communion of a sound apostolic church, therefore think themselves safe, while their lives give open scandal and offence to all good men. Their opinion about good mother church is very much like the opinion of the Papists, who think the living in the church can save them, although they live in their sins. And we have others who make the greatest boast of their love to our church, and speak of her in the highest terms, who are only outward members of her communion. They will contend with all their might for the purity of her rites and ceremonies, and will draw their swords to defend the divine institution of episcopacy, and to cut off from all communion with Christ those vile schismatics who will not live in the communion of the church of England; while they have not a word to say for the necessity of being united to the head of the catholic church, and of being joined to him by living faith. Nay, perhaps, when they hear that, unless the Holy Spirit be the bond on Christ's part, uniting him to the believer, and faith on his part, uniting him to Christ, it will be of very little consequence in what outward communion a man lives: when they hear this, it is too hard a saying; they cannot bear it. They think that a sound church, with a good liturgy, scripture articles and homilies, and a regular discipline, are the main things. Doubtless they are good things. God forbid our church should be without them; and God forbid any member of our church should rest in them; for in this communion, excellent as it is, a man believing it to be excellent may yet live without the grace of Christ, and perish from glory for ever. The church is not a Saviour. We Protestants have one Saviour, even Christ Jesus our Lord. The Papists indeed make a Saviour of the church, and a far greater Saviour than Christ: for the holy mother church can save a man who dies in his sins unrepented of, which Christ has nowhere in scripture promised to do. And our high churchmen, in the heat of their party zeal, speak and act in the very spirit of Popery. By laying so much stress, nay, laying all the stress, as some of them do, upon outward communion, they omit the weightier matter of inward communion with the head of the church, without which, of whatever reformed church or Protestant congregation a man be a member, he is no member of the true church of Christ. He has not the spirit of Christ uniting him to the head of the mystical body; and without the spirit of Christ he is none of his. Rest not, then, I beseech you, my brethren, in outward membership, to this or that communion. Do not place your religion in externals. You may live in the best communion upon earth, and such indeed I take the church of England to be, and yet you may be out of Christ's kingdom. Outward things, of themselves, will not avail: for the kingdom of God does not consist in meat and drink, nor in any thing external, but in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. His kingdom is a spiritual thing. It is formed within us in the heart. There Christ must rule and govern. Seek then to have his kingdom set up within you by an inward work of his grace. Beg of God to show you your want of it. And when it shall please him to convince you that no outward things can avail, not even his own institutions, unless his quickening Spirit be in them, then he will bring you into a proper frame and temper of mind to join with the daughters of Jerusalem in the text in seeking the knowledge of your interest in Christ; which is the second particular to be considered.

The believer had described the excellencies and perfections of his beloved Jesus, and had spoken feelingly of his own interest in them. The description stirred up the daughters of Jerusalem, who wondered, at first, what he saw in his Jesus to be so enamoured with him, to desire that they might have the same happy experience. And they who could inquire before what there was in him more than in another beloved, now ask, "Whither is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women?" Christ had before called her the fairest among women. She had no beauty in herself. Defiled and deformed with natural and actual guilt, she was cast out to the loathing of her person. He that is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity could not see any thing in her but ugliness and sinful deformity: and yet the love of the Lord Jesus has cleansed her from every spot and stain of sin. In the 16th chapter of Ezekiel we have a sweet description of his free grace and love. "When I passed by thee," says he, "and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee when thou wast in thy blood, Live."—And after describing the several steps which he took to raise her up, to ornament her, and to ennoble her, he adds—"Thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty; for it was perfect through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God." He clothed her with the unspotted robe of his own righteousness, and made her perfect through his comeliness which he put upon her. All our comeliness now consists in what Christ puts upon us, and in what he works in us. While man was innocent, he wanted no clothing; but when he lost the image of God, then shame and sin made clothing necessary. The sinful body is forced to go to the creatures to borrow a covering from them; and the soul has no covering but what comes from the Head of the church. The moon has no light but what she receives from the sun. The spouse of Christ shines in the beams of her husband. Covered and ornamented with his righteousness, and enriched with the graces of his Spirit, she is the fairest among women; fair in the sight of an infinitely holy God, in the eye of the perfect law she appears to be without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, holy and without blemish. In this amiable light she now appears to the daughters of Jerusalem. They see and acknowledge her perfect beauty, and earnestly desire to partake of her Lord's love. Whither, say they, is thy beloved, whose love was able to clothe thee with this immaculate robe of righteousness, and whose spirit has enriched thee with so many divine graces, whither is he gone? They knew he had withdrawn himself from the believer; but it is plain, from this question, that they did not think Christ had quite forsaken him; they supposed he still knew Christ, and was able to inform them whither he was gone. The words immediately following the text show that he was acquainted where Christ then vouchsafed his presence, though he had hid his face from him: "My beloved," says he, "is gone down into his garden." He is still in the garden of his church. There he was to be found. He was still present by his Spirit in the ordinances; and in them he was determined to wait until he found his beloved. Christ had taken away the light of his countenance, not only to chastise his former sleepy security, and to make him more earnest in seeking his Lord, and to make him more thankful when he should find him, but also to render him the means, as it here proved, of stirring up others to seek for a clear knowledge of Christ and the experience of his love. "Whither is thy beloved gone?" say they; "whither is thy beloved turned aside?"—not wholly departed, but only turned aside, "tell us, that we may seek him with thee." How wonderfully does grace appear to work by the growth of these good desires in the daughters of Jerusalem! And how ready should we be to speak a word for Christ, since such may be the happy effects! How industrious ought we to be to seek occasions! how careful to neglect none! As we know not which word is to prosper, either this or that, let us take every opportunity of saying something for Christ. Let us inform men what he is, and what we know of him; and who can tell but a very imperfect, yet well-meant description may receive a blessing. Have we not great encouragement in the morning to sow our seed, and in the evening not to withhold our hand from the success mentioned in the text? When the daughters of Jerusalem heard the believer enlarge upon the excellencies of Christ, and set forth his own share and interest in them, and saw that no discouragements could cool the ardour of his love, they were hereby stirred up; these were the means, under God, of putting them upon desiring a nearer and more close acquaintance with Christ. They knew him before by profession; but now they wanted the possession of him. They wanted to know Christ to be theirs. At first, they saw no form nor comeliness in him, that they should desire him. But now the desires of their hearts are after him. They see their want of him; they are convinced of his all-sufficiency to supply their wants; they believe he is able, and they hope he is willing; they neither doubt of his power or of his love to save, and therefore they resolve to seek him until they have experienced the truth of the character which they had heard of him, and can call him their beloved and their friend.

Considering the words in this light, they hold out to us one plain lesson. When the daughters of Jerusalem heard of the beauties and excellencies of God the Saviour, it wrought upon their hearts, and kindled fervent and earnest desires to know their interest in him. Still God works in the same manner. When Christ is set forth in his divine graces and attributes and offices, the Holy Spirit thereby stirs up desires in the hearts of sinners to seek Christ and his salvation, and he also excites holy affections in believers to follow Christ more closely. Has he, my brethren, wrought thus in any of your hearts? How have you been affected with these discourses upon the loveliness and perfections of Jesus Christ? Have they made any good impression upon you? Have you had stronger desires after Christ? and have you seen him more lovely than you ever did before? These effects ought to have followed: for his "name is as ointment poured forth;" the preaching of his name is like opening a box of the richest perfume: it diffuses its fragrancy all around; so that the house is filled with the grateful odour of the ointment. Did you perceive none of it poured forth? none of this unction from the holy one descending upon you this day? Did you find no sweet savour of grace working in your hearts while I was attempting to draw a short character of the loveliness of Jesus? Did he appear to you altogether lovely, as man, as God, as God-man united in one Saviour? and was it the prayer of your soul that you might find him your beloved and your friend? If the Holy Spirit accompanied the word, these effects have followed: if they have, give the glory to God, and be thankful; and if they have not, oh that he may now enable me to speak a word to your consciences under my third and last head; which was to make a proper use and application of what has been said.

The believer, though under spiritual desertion, could see nothing worth seeking after but his beloved Saviour. He seeks him though he cannot find; calls, though he has no answer; continues seeking and calling, though he meets with disgrace and persecution. The pleasing remembrance of their love would not suffer him to rest until it was renewed. His love grew with seeking. Opposition made it burn the brighter. He went on, nothing discouraged, until he found the daughters of Jerusalem, and made them acquainted with his case. They ask what he found in this Jesus that he was so distressed at his withdrawing himself from him. This gave him occasion to draw the character of his beloved; which he does in a very enlivened description, setting forth, in the most beautiful colours, what he was in himself, and what he was to him, the perfect loveliness of Christ, and his interest in it. Upon this the daughters of Jerusalem take fire. They become also in love with Christ, and desire to share in those perfections, the account of which had touched their hearts and inflamed their affection.

Now, if the Spirit of God be moving in your hearts, this is, my brethren, the case with you. You are convinced of your own spiritual wants, and of Christ's being an all-sufficient and a loving Saviour; and while I have been describing him, you have sent up many a wish to heaven, praying him to reveal himself to you, and to manifest his love to your soul. This is always the consequence of preaching Christ Jesus the Lord, when God effectually works with the word preached. When the Holy Spirit accompanies it with his divine grace, it is then the power of God unto salvation. But,

If this has not been the effect, if you have had no desires awakened in your minds after Christ, consider, I beseech you, what a state of guilt and danger you are in. Jesus Christ has all the excellencies of heaven and earth—every thing that ought to gain your esteem in his human nature—every thing that can demand your love in his divine nature—and, as God-man united in one Saviour, he has every grace and every blessing to give that can make you happy in time and in eternity. And yet, though he has every thing valuable that can win the understanding, though he has every thing desirable that can gain the will, though he has every thing lovely that can influence the heart and the affections, you can hear of him without any emotion. You see no form nor comeliness in him that you should desire him. Without an interest in him you must be miserable for ever. He alone can save you from the just punishment due to your sins; and yet, your hopes and fears, your own interest, your love of pleasure and hatred of pain, cannot prevail with you to love and esteem the God of our salvation. What is the reason of this? Why are all the faculties of the soul thus strongly biassed against their own interest? Propose to them any sensual pleasure, they eagerly desire and ardently pursue it; and with the same propensity they fly from sensual pain. But in matters relating to the soul, they act directly contrary.

Jesus Christ, being the Saviour of the world, has every spiritual pleasure to give, and yet they neither eagerly desire nor ardently pursue it. Without an interest in him, body and soul will be in everlasting pain; and yet they do not fly to him, that they may avoid it. Whence is it that men act thus absurdly, thus unnaturally? The scripture gives this reason. Sin has corrupted all the faculties of soul and body, and has got dominion over them. It has blinded the understanding, which is dark, yea darkness itself, the apostle says, not only without the actual knowledge of God and of the things of God, but also without the potential knowledge of them: "for the natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God." From whence we learn his actual want of knowledge in the things of God. But lest some should ascribe this to his neglect of them, or to his not being acquainted with metaphysics or moral reasoning, the apostle adds, "neither can he know them," let him study them ever so much: from hence we learn his want of power to know them; and this is the reason: "because they are spiritually discerned:"—an evident proof that the faculties of the natural man are as much under the power of sin, as a dead corpse is under the power of death. In all spiritual matters he is like a dead man, without any spiritual discernment. He cannot turn his mind to think, his will to desire, or his affections to love them. Sin has absolute dominion over him, and forces him to serve it with all the powers of soul and body, even to their own destruction. In this state, dreadful as it is, you are at present. If the desires of your heart be not after Christ; if you do not at this time wish from your souls that you may have an interest in the loveliness and excellencies of Christ, and may know him to be your Saviour and your God; then be assured that you are still under the power of sin: it has entirely blinded you: and I should be an enemy to my blessed master, and an enemy to your happiness, if I did not speak to you freely and openly, and warn you of your danger. Out of love to your souls I cannot be silent; and, whether you will hear or whether you will forbear, I must deliver my own soul.

I suppose, my brethren, you profess yourselves Christians, and you believe that Jesus Christ is a perfect and complete Saviour; and you believe, further, that you shall, some time or other, stand in need of his salvation; but you have no desire to experience it at present. You do not want present salvation from sin: you cannot but wish to be freed from the guilt and punishment of it: but then you have no wishes to be freed from its dominion. Is it not evident therefore that it still has dominion over you? and being so, you are children of God's wrath, under the curses of his holy law: sentenced by it, and condemned to everlasting torments, death will soon come, and inflict the curses of the law upon you, even the most terrible and dreadful of them. How awful and striking are these words: who but a man dead in sin could stand out against the force of them! "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." You are here put under the heaviest and bitterest of divine curses, not only if you hate or oppose Jesus Christ, but also if you do not love him. Oh consider, then, and weigh this scripture carefully, if you have not some love for the Lord Jesus, and are not seeking to love him more. I leave it upon your minds (and may God write it upon all your hearts), that you may fly from this Anathema and Maran-atha to the arms of that loving Saviour, who alone can deliver you from it. Flee, then, from sin. Flee, then, from Satan. Flee, from all the enemies of your souls to this loving God, who is almighty to save. And to those who are flying to him for salvation, and whose hearts have been stirred up to seek him along with these daughters of Jerusalem, I make my second practical remark.

My brethren, you have great reason to be thankful for these first motions of grace. God has begun to draw you to himself: follow and run after him. Seek him while he may be found. And, for your encouragement, remember how many sweet promises God has made in scripture to them that seek him: "Those that seek me early, says wisdom, shall find me," Prov. viii. 17. Christ, who is made unto us wisdom, here declares that he will be found of them that seek him. And again he says, "Seek, and ye shall find: for every one that seeketh, findeth." These are the words of the God of truth; and they shall stand fast for ever and ever. His almighty power will, against all opposition, fulfill his promises. And his faithful people find them fulfilled. They have the comfortable experience of them. One of his people, a man after his own heart, has declared, "Thou, Lord, hast never failed them that seek thee." No, never, at no time has he disappointed them. If they sought happiness in him, they infallibly found it. And this is the experience of all God's people. They can take up the prophet's words, and with one voice declare, "Thou, Lord, hast never failed them that seek thee." Here is comfort for them that seek the Lord Jesus.

How happy would worldly men think themselves, if they were upon this footing! if they were sure of finding what they seek! Let them not rise up in judgment against you, my brethren, and condemn you for not seeking what you could not but have found if you had sought aright; Christ is to be found in his own ordinances. He is to be met with, not in the wilderness of the world, but in the inclosed garden of the church. Thither he still comesd own, and manifests himself to them that seek him. In the assemblies of his people he will be made known by animating and quickening the word, and by rendering it effectual to awaken sinners from the dead sleep of sin, to encourage seekers to go on until they find, and to build up and strengthen them that have found. He will prove himself to be the God who heareth prayer, by hearing and answering their petitions for themselves, and their supplications for all men. He will make himself known to them by breaking of bread, and by feeding and strengthening their souls with his body and blood at his own table. He still comes down with his gracious presence into these ordinances, and animates and enlivens them. We are his witnesses: for we find his good Spirit in them. Oh continue, then, seeking, and continue in the ways of his own appointing; and when it will be most for his glory, and for your comfort and salvation, you have his word of promise, "you shall find." And sooner shall heaven and earth pass away than the least tittle of any of his promises shall fail; "Seek, and ye shall find." And to them who have found, I have a word of exhortation, in the third and last place.

My Christian brethren! since you know Christ to be altogether lovely, and to be your beloved and your friend, pray daily for more and more of his love. Beseech the Holy Spirit to shed it abroad abundantly in your hearts, that you may honour him more in your lives, and praise him more with your lips. How meanly soever men may think of him, be not ye ashamed to own what he has done for your souls. Publish his praises. Proclaim to all about you what a loving Saviour you have found. If you, after what you have experienced, were silent, surely the very stones will cry out. Speak out, then, and tell of his matchless excellencies and infinite perfections, and try to stir up others to seek. Press them to leave sin, and to come to him; for nothing but sin can keep them from him. Persuade them to leave the poor unsatisfying joys of sin, and to seek his heavenly pleasures. Among your acquaintance and friends, in your family, in all companies, speak a word for your dear Saviour. He sometimes blesses a well-meant speech, if it be neither learned nor elegant. But if it should not be a blessing to others, yet it will certainly be one to yourself: for he hath promised —them that honour me, I will honour.

The scope and design of what I have said was to persuade you all to seek he knowledge of your interest in Christ's love, as the only means of making you happy. Knowing your interest in him is the ground of your love: for if you had no knowledge or experience of his love, how could you love him because he first loved you? Your love is only the reflex act of his love. And you must know that he loves you before you can be truly happy; and you must be happy in him before you can have any motive to sing his praises from your heart. It is the blessed employment of the faithful upon earth, and of the glorified saints in heaven, to give honour and blessing and praise to the Lamb that was slain. and hath redeemed them unto God by his blood. Can you, my brethren, join your hearts and voices with theirs? Are you able to praise the Lord for his goodness, and to declare the wonders that he hath done for your soul? to be telling of his salvation from day to day, every day, and all the day? If you have not reason enough to be always giving of thanks, you may be assured you are not a real member of the church of Christ. If you were, you would find the truth of this scripture: "Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be always praising thee." This is the sweet employment of those who dwell in the house of God, in the church here below. It is meet, right, and their bounden duty, that they should at all times and in all places give thanks unto thee, O Lord, holy Father, almighty everlasting God. It is their duty, and they reckon it their privilege; and sorry they are when they either find themselves interrupted by the necessary affairs of this life, or, through coldness of their affections, are indisposed for the delightful exercise of thanksgiving. But, thanks be to God, who will soon deliver us from both these hindrances! Ere long, we shall join the glorified spirits who are now standing round the throne, singing the praises of God and the Lamb. This is their constant and happy employment: and his infinite, adorable perfections will find them fresh matter of praise to all eternity. Suppose any of you were to go out of the world in love with sin, and void of the love of Christ, you could not join them, nor would it be any pleasure to you to hear them ascribe blessing and honour and glory and power to him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever. This is the felicity of an innumerable company of angels, and of the spirits of just men made perfect: but it could be none to you; because your heart was not fitted for it. If you believe this, and, if God's word be true, you cannot deny it; then ask yourselves, Would you choose to die unfit for the joys of heaven? Surely you would not. Why, then, do you live unfit for them? If ever you relish them, you must begin to taste their sweetness here. In this life the praises of Christ must be your delight if they ever be in the next. Weigh these motives, and give them the attention which they deserve. Consider them under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Pray for his grace. And may he dispose you to seek the knowledge of your interest in Christ, and enable you to wait until his love be shed abroad in your hearts: and then you will have reason to rejoice in your redeeming God in time and in eternity. And that this may be your happy experience, let us pray for it! May he who sitteth upon the throne hear and answer!

Look down with mercy, O thou almighty and loving Saviour, upon this whole congregation. All hearts are open, all desires known, and no secrets are hid from thee. Oh cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit, and enable every one of us to form a right judgment of what we have heard. Stir up, we pray thee, thy power, and come among us; and with great might convince those persons of their guilt and of their danger, who are seeking happiness in the world, and put it into their hearts to seek it in thee. Teach them, blessed Lord, that there is no true happiness to be found in a world which lieth in sin. Let them experience the delusion of all worldly joys, that they may seek for those joys which thine almighty love has to bestow. And to those whom thou hast given grace to seek, give more grace. Confirm and strengthen the good desires of those who are waiting for thy salvation. Keep them by thy power until thou save them from their sins. And save us all, O thou Lord God omnipotent, save us from the power of sin. Deliver us more and more from its dominion. May all the Lord's people serve him, out of a pure heart, and with love unfeigned: and may they go on rejoicing to do or to suffer his will, until he who got himself glory by them upon earth shall be glorified in them in heaven, by bestowing upon them an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. And when he cometh thus to be glorified in his saints (and we know not how near the day of his coming may be), oh may it be your happiness and mine then to be found at his right hand, to hear the almighty Judge pronounce us blessed, and to enter into the joy of our Lord, there to praise Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three self-existent persons in one Jehovah, to whom be honour and glory, dominion and power, thanksgiving and worship, now, and for ever and ever. Amen

DISCOURSE X.

CHAP. viii. ver. 5.

Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?

WE have in these words a beautiful representation of our Lord's love to his people. In whatever light we consider him, he is amiable and altogether lovely. He is not only great and good, but has also every thing that is great and good united in him, whereby he is able and willing to save poor sinners unto the uttermost. They can want nothing but what he has to give. And, happy for them, his heart is large and open. He is not straitened in his bowels. He gave proof of it in the days of his flesh, when he never refused any person that came to ask his help. And no weary heavy-laden sinner, who comes to him for his promised rest, has ever since been cast out. He is free to pardon and to cleanse them from all their sins, and to bring them into a state of acceptance with God; and then he is able to keep them through faith unto salvation. This is a sweet part of our Lord's character—he is able to keep them from falling. They are weak in themselves; but he is strong; and by faith his strength becomes theirs. They are engaged in a dangerous warfare, and have many powerful enemies; but the captain of their salvation has conquered them, and has promised to make them also more than conquerors. They have many troubles from within and from without; but he knows how to make them all work together for their good. He is able to carry them safely and sweetly through all dangers. In this amiable light he is considered in the text. He is here drawn with every grace which can recommend and endear him to the affections of his people: for he does not leave them to find their way through the wilderness, nor to overcome the difficulties of their passage through it, nor to get subsistence in it; but he conducts and carries them safe through all, while they lean upon him for strength: for he is here supporting the church while she is journeying through the wilderness of this world to the promised land of everlasting rest. And the church is, every believing soul. Thou makest part of it, whoever thou art, who canst place thy trust and confidence upon Jesus Christ. Thou seest the perfect beauty of this image, and knowest what it means, for the church to come from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved. Oh that the eternal Spirit may teach you all what it means! He can open your eyes to see the sense of it, and can open your hearts to feel its sweetness. The experience of it will make it sweet indeed: and God grant you may now experience it, and may be able to lean upon Jesus Christ for his grace and blessing on what you hear, while I shall

First, Take the words in the same order they lie in the text, and endeavour to give the sense of them; and then,

Secondly, While I shall apply the doctrine to your spiritual benefit and improvement.

The person celebrated in this divine song is Jesus Christ; and his graces and infinite perfections are here described under the most sublime and affecting images. His love to the church; that is, to every believing soul, is the grand design of this highly-finished painting. The manner of the composition is in the way of dialogue. The principal speakers are Christ and the church, and twice or thrice the daughters of Jerusalem, or some standers by, are introduced, in order to ask some leading questions which would give occasion to the answerer to open the subject more fully. These persons are, I suppose, the speakers in the text, and make the inquiry, "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning on her beloved?" Who is this? The answer is, it is the church, of whose love to Christ this divine poem treats. And the church is neither the Jewish nor the Gentile, neither the Protestant nor the Papist, neither the Calvinist nor the Lutheran: for the multitude in all outward churches is the same. A man in his natural unregenerate state is just the same, whether he be a Papist or a Protestant; but the few in these outward churches who live and walk in the spirit and power of Christ, they are the church. Every believing soul is a part of it; for of numbers of them the church is composed Whoever is united by faith to Jesus Christ, who is the head of the church, he is a living member of it. All the rest are dead, formal professors, of whom, God knows, we have too many. The generality of our people content themselves with a foolish notion of their belonging to the church of England, and of their being members of the established church, although they seldom see the inside of a church. They live in ignorance of her doctrines and in disobedience to her discipline. But may not the persons who frequent her services, and constantly attend upon the outward ordinances, think themselves mighty good churchmen? They may, if they be united by saving faith to the head of the church; but without this union, a parcel of loose stones thrown together in a heap would make just such a church as they are: whereas the spiritual building, of which Christ is the chief corner-stone, is fitly joined together and compacted in every part; and the cement or bond of union, which keeps all the lively stones of this spiritual household in their proper place and station, is faith, as the apostle has taught us, Heb. iii. 6: "Christ is a son over his own house, whose house we are, if we hold fast the confidence of faith and the rejoicing of hope firm unto the end." If you attend ever so much upon the outward ordinances, yet, if you have not this confidence of faith, and this rejoicing of hope, you make no part of the church of Christ; you want the proper cement of this spiritual building: you are but loose stones, and therefore neither united to it, nor any part of it. You come to prayers; you attend twice a day on Sundays; you go once a month to the sacrament: All this is very well, and you may go thus far, nay much farther, and yet be no member of Christ's mystical body. For these outward services profit nothing unless the heart be rightly disposed: and the heart is then rightly disposed when we go to these services in faith, hoping to meet God in them, and to receive such supplies of grace from him as we stand in need of. But when men use the ordinances in hopes of making themselves good, and of attaining some self-righteousness, then they abuse them, and the strictest attenders upon the ordinances with this view are the worst churchmen; because they most effectually cut themselves off from all union with the head of the church. By going about to establish their own righteousness, they entirely deprive themselves of that righteousness of Jesus Christ, without which no man shall see the Lord. If the self-righteous could be made to consider this, they would not rest in forms and ordinances, which are only the beggarly elements of religion when rested in, but would seek the grace of God, which is the life and spirit of the ordinances; and then, as they are his appointed means, he would certainly be found in them. And whoever finds him in them, and thereby receives continual supplies of grace for the advancement of his spiritual life, he is a member of the true church of Christ.

Our reformers have given us an excellent description of the church in the 19th article: "The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly administered according to Christ's ordinance." Here they allow none to be members, no, not even of the visible church, unless they be faithful men: faith uniting them to Jesus Christ is that which makes them good churchmen, as it will evidently appear from a further consideration of this scripture: for the condition of the church is the next particular: "She is coming up from the wilderness," from the waste howling wilderness of this world, and travelling on towards the promised land of everlasting rest.

When man was first created, he was placed in a paradise of delight, where God had provided every thing necessary for the support both of soul and body. But when he transgressed the just and holy law of God, he was driven out of paradise, and turned into the wide barren world, where his body was forced to labour for the bread that perisheth, and to earn it by the sweat of his brow, and his soul was banished from God and from all sweet communion with him, which had made paradise so much like heaven; and the remembrance of its sweetness would make the pleasantest spot upon the earth appear like a desolate wilderness. As God is the life, and his presence is the happiness, of the soul, what must it be without God? More uncomfortable surely than the body would be in the most dismal howling desert: and we are all by nature in this state. The world is indeed a place of banishment to every son of fallen Adam. What will you call it but a wilderness, where not a morsel of bread grows without human labour and cultivation? And is not this a just picture of the state of the soul, which has no divine or saving knowledge of itself, and can receive none from any of the arts and sciences? This barren earth cannot produce one single ray of heavenly truth. It must all come down from above, as manna did upon the Israelites in the wilderness; otherwise our souls will perish for lack of knowledge, as their bodies would have perished for want of bread. And since this is our condition, how shall we obtain deliverance? We are here in bondage. Sin has chained us down in this wilderness. Satan watches us, and tempts us to love our chains; the vain world smiles upon us, and would make us believe that we are still in paradise: and, God knows, there are too many poor silly creatures who take this world for their only paradise. They are so dotingly fond of it, that nothing can break the enchantment. Though pains and miseries come one upon the back of another, like wave after wave, yet still they cannot entertain one hard thought of this dear world. They love it with all their hearts, and with all their souls, notwithstanding the briers and thorns which tear and scratch their flesh, and the disappointments and vexation they daily meet with. This fatal delusion is the worst part of their case; because, to be in such a wilderness is a great calamity; but, to be in love with it, is a greater. It is a great misfortune to be sick; but to be in love with sickness, is worse than the distemper, and much harder to be cured. And how, then, can the soul recover her liberty? She is enslaved and chained down to this wilderness, and her enemies have her absolutely in their power. She cannot stir one step in her own might. Indeed, she would not desire to stir. She loves her bondage. And since she has neither the will nor the power, how can she escape out of this wilderness? God be praised, there is a way open; and this is, through Jesus, who has declared of himself, "I am the way;" and all that fly to him escape from the miseries of this wilderness, and are coming up from it, though not in their own strength. The first desire to leave it was from Jesus Christ; he enabled the soul to seek deliverance, and then gave her strength to break loose from the chains wherewith she was bound; and in his might she is now travelling on. He has given her a prospect of a better country, and for it she has left off seeking happiness in the wilderness. The honours, riches, and pleasures there to be found, have lost their former value. She has turned her back upon them, and has set out upon her journey heavenwards. And, see! all the way she is coming up from the wilderness she

"Leans upon her beloved." He supports every step. This is the chief part of the beautiful image in the text. We here see the work of faith painted before our eyes in the most beautiful colours. There could not be a finer picture of the believer's reliance upon Christ for grace to support every step, and for strength to carry him on in the Christian life, than to draw the church leaning upon her beloved. To lean and rest the body upon any thing is the perfect representation of faith leaning and resting itself upon Christ. An able expositor upon the passage has these words: "She is leaning on her beloved; that is, as they who are weak make use of a staff in climbing of a strait and steep ground, or ease themselves by leaning upon one that is strong, and especially one whom they love, for helping them in their way; so the believer is said to come up from the wilderness, 'leaning on her beloved;' because she, being weak in herself, and unfit for such a difficult journey, by faith rests on Christ for helping her in the way, whereby she is sustained and carried through in the duties of a holy walk, and the difficulties in her way, till she come through the wilderness into the land of rest."

Every step she takes, spiritually, by faith and love, she cleaves to and relies upon Christ. There is a sufficiency and efficacy in Christ to save to the uttermost, to begin, and to carry on, and to perfect the whole work of salvation: he is the wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption of believers; and therefore they would not only by faith be united to him, and lean upon him for the pardon of their sins by his righteousness, but they would also by faith depend upon him for their sanctification, for their dying to sin, and being alive unto God. And thus, by the exercise of faith, they fulfil the commandment. "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not to thine own understanding." If they overcome the world, the victory is from trusting in the Lord by faith, from the power of Christ apprehended and applied by faith. If sin be dying in them, it is by the efficacy of his death apprehended and applied by faith. If they be alive unto God, "It is not I," says Paul, "but Christ liveth in me." It is by exercising faith on Christ that I receive strength to get forward in the way of duty, and to make a progress in holiness. I derive continual support from him; and the more I can depend and lean upon him by faith, the faster I go, and the farther I advance in the way: for leaning on him, and coming up, are joined together in the text. If you gain any ground, it must be by leaning upon the beloved Jesus for his support and strength: for he is "the beloved" here spoken of—the beloved Son of the Father, in whom he declared he was well pleased; and he is become the beloved of the believing soul, which is now awakened by his Spirit, and stirred up by his power, to leave this barren wilderness, and to seek a better country; that is, a heavenly. His love began the first desire, and still carries it on. His Spirit opened the eyes of faith to see a better country, and supports every step towards it: and the believer, leaning and relying upon his beloved Jesus, goes on sweetly and safely. He beholds infinite excellencies, and daily discovers new worlds of delight in him; and the sense of his own interest in them increases the delight. He can call all these his own: and to have a property in them makes them still more valuable. In this divine Song he frequently lays a great stress upon this particular, especially in the fifth chapter, where he has been drawing a picture of his Lord; and he puts the finishing stroke to it in these words: "This is my beloved; and this is my friend." All his excellencies appear with a double grace to me, because I can call them mine. This is the happy experience of every faithful soul. May the Holy Spirit bestow it upon you, giving you a view of the Redeemer's excellencies, and convincing you of your interest in them, while I am,

Secondly, Applying the doctrine contained in the text to your spiritual benefit and improvement. "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness?" It is the believer, whose affections are now raised above all earthly things; and he is coming up from the world leaning, every step he takes in the way towards heaven, upon his beloved Jesus. The believer's heavenly mindedness is here represented by his coming up or ascending from the wilderness, wherein he sojourned in his way to heaven, as the Israelites did in the wilderness, while they were on their journey to the promised land. The believer looks upon the pleasantest and best cultivated spot of this earth as a mere wilderness, because there is no true comfort or perfect rest for the soul in any of the good things of it. He has left off seeking happiness in the enjoyment of them, being convinced that all worldly joys are empty and unsatisfying, and therefore he has turned his back upon them. He remembers Lot's wife. He would not cast one wishful look after them. He keeps walking on with an unwearied course, because he has an almighty support. He leans upon one who is able to bear up every step, who can strengthen the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Christ is his support in his walk heavenwards. He takes Christ for his sanctification as well as for his justification. Christ must do all in him, as well as for him. Christ must enable him to do the works proper to a state of acceptance, as well as bring him into it: for the believer knows of no power whereby he may be enabled to die unto sin, and to live unto God, but his power only, who is almighty to save his people from their sins. This is the doctrine. From the first moment our backs are turned upon the world, and we begin to leave the wilderness of sin and misery, until we come to the promised land of everlasting rest, we must lean, all the way, upon Christ. He must be our stay and support. Faith must rely upon him for the success of every thing we undertake; and by this reliance it secures success. The greatest part of our misfortunes and disappointments in our temporal as well as religious affairs come from the ignorance of this doctrine. We know not how to trust all in the hands of our loving Saviour. Worldly prudence will be managing its temporal matters without resigning all to him: and men's pride and self-sufficiency cannot bear to be stripped of all merit, and to rely entirely for acceptance upon the merits of another. It is too low and degrading an idea of the dignity of man to suppose him to be in a state of condemnation until Christ justify him, and to be unable to take one step in his Christian course unless the Spirit of Christ assist and support him. These truths are too mortifying to be generally received; but believers know them to be truths by happy experience. They are assured that there is no other way to walk contentedly and cheerfully homeward but to lean and rest all the way upon him who is both their guide and their strength, who has them and all their concerns in his gracious hands. Although this be the only way to true happiness, yet it is extremely difficult to convince sinners of it. Every error leads them away from it; and error is infinite. I will endeavour, through God's help, to correct some of the most common errors. And

First, I shall speak of those which all careless sinners fall into. Sin cuts off all communion with, and reliance upon, God; and whoever lives in his natural unregenerate state cannot rely upon him for any good: the sinner leans upon some worldly enjoyment for happiness; and the careless sinner is secure in this worldly enjoyment. He has no thoughts for seeking happiness in Jesus Christ, and therefore has no desire to lean with faith upon him. The danger of this is evident; because every man in it is under condemnation, and is a child of wrath; and it is wonderful that the devil should be so far able to delude sinners as to make them sit easy under it: for, did they but know and feel their condition, as it really is, sinful and dangerous, they would then acknowledge themselves to be miserable sinners; and were they convinced of their want of salvation, and that there is no Saviour but Jesus Christ, then would they in earnest seek salvation through him, and, not as they do, labour to deprive themselves of it with all their might: for they are daily adding to their sin, and to their guilt, and to their misery. When they read, "There is salvation in none other than Jesus Christ," they are deluded into a false peace, although they are not assured they have salvation in him. When God declares, "that without holiness no man shall see him," they know they are not holy, and yet they never consider what eternal misery it will be not to see God. Thus these careless sinners being out of a state of salvation, are in danger of perishing every moment. Jesus Christ alone can save them, and yet they prefer sin to him and his eternal salvation. The guilt of this is so monstrous, that men could not fall into it unless they were under a strong delusion. And yet the extreme folly of this conduct is equal to the guilt of it. Men who have no rest nor stay upon Christ cannot be happy in the present world. They are not upon the foundation, the rock of ages. Their happiness is built upon sand, against which, when the rains descend, and the floods come, and the winds blow, it will fall. When the evil day comes, these careless sinners have nothing to rest upon. When affliction presses hard upon them, they sink under it. When sickness seizes them, down fall their high spirits, the approach of death is most dreadful, and they sometimes die for fear of dying. Or if they meet with heavy troubles, they are often so miserable, that life is quite a burden; and if natural conscience should at this time begin to torment them with its horrors, these, added to their other distresses, would overset them. Having none of the comforts of the gospel to support them under this complicated misery, they often seek relief in self-murder. This is frequently the cause of that dreadful crime which can never be repented of. And thus these poor miserable cowards murder themselves rather than live in pain, and fly to hell for refuge from the miseries of life. Are not these evident proofs that there is no solid happiness out of Christ, and that whatever men lean upon for happiness but him, are nothing better than so many broken reeds? Do we not see these proofs confirmed by daily experience? When God sends any public calamity, the sword, or the pestilence, or famine, sinners receive them as judgments, and are terrified but not reformed. If he arise, to shake terribly the earth, their hearts tremble more than the ground does under their feet; they fear lest it should open every moment and swallow them up. If it should, their consciences tell them they cannot escape the pit of destruction. This is the miserable condition of careless sinners, who have no trust and confidence in Jesus Christ. They are an easy prey to every enemy, and they are made miserable by the fears and terrors of their own consciences. And is it not the foolishness of folly to be always tossed upon such a tempestuous sea when you may be saved from all the storms of life? Who would choose to have his peace of mind lie at the mercy of every wind and wave? Is this prudent, is this safe, when he that commandeth the winds and the waves has only to say, "Peace, be still," and there will be a great calm? Thy tempestuous soul will be composed. Thou wilt find a peace of mind that passeth all understanding. O unpardoned sinner! hast thou no desire, hast thou no wish now rising in thy mind for the enjoyment of this peace of God? May he, without whom thou canst not so much as think a good thought, put it into thy heart to seek it. And when thou art once made sensible of thy sore disease, here is thy remedy. Christ is the infallible physician of the soul, and he has a sovereign balm to heal every malady of sin. Does thy conscience accuse and torment? The sprinkling of the blood of Jesus can take out the sense of guilt, and give thee joy and peace in believing. Dost thou begin to be weary of thy sins and thy sufferings? Ask Jesus Christ to take off thy burden. Come to him, who bore all thy sins, and he will ease thee of thy load, and thou shalt find peace and rest unto thy soul. He has promised it to every returning sinner; and he is a God of truth. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee." This is his promise, and he daily fulfils it. Look among believers, and thou wilt see it literally fulfilled. Thou canst not deny but that, being justified by faith, they have peace with God, and are happy in the sense of his love to them through Jesus Christ their Lord; whereby they are supported and comforted under all God's dealings with them, knowing that he will make all things work together for their good. And accordingly, we read in scripture of his having never failed them, who leaned upon him for help. When they were visited with sickness, or poverty, or any other affliction, he enabled them to bear his fatherly correction without murmuring or repining. When sin cries aloud for vengeance, and justice draws the sword, and cuts off the inhabitants of the earth with a swift destruction, then believers happily experience that their gracious God, in the midst of wrath, remembers mercy. His judgments upon his enemies are mercies to them. When the earth quakes and trembles under their feet, their soul does not melt away because of the trouble. The rock upon which they stand cannot be moved, and therefore, in the midst of the earthquake, they can triumphantly say, "God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble: therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." Would not you think yourselves happy if this was your case? And yet, believers have still a greater happiness. When death itself approaches, it is welcome; for the sting of death is taken out, and they have no fear left about any thing but sin. They are more afraid of sin than of poison. They would not live in sin to gain the world; and in the strength of their beloved Saviour, on whom they lean and rely, they can, and do, conquer sin! so that it does not reign in their mortal bodies. What do you think of the safety and happiness of those persons who are afraid of nothing but of offending their reconciled Father? Certainly they are the happiest men upon earth; and every sinner would envy them if the devil had not propagated an opinion that they are all under a delusion. If any of you, my brethren, have entertained this opinion, weigh the matter carefully, and you will find this makes nothing for your case. For what you suppose to be a delusion is a sweet and comfortable state of mind, promised in the word of God, and bestowed upon the children of God. And are they deluded, think ye, who say they have received nothing more than what God had promised to give? That faith by which ye suppose us deluded, does certainly free us from the commission of many sins and from many of the miseries of the present life, and it deludes us into a kind of fortitude, that not only enables us to bear reproach, contempt, injuries, and afflictions, but also to rejoice under them, when we meet them for following Christ. Oh, happy delusion! We are deluded into a strong belief that God loves us in Jesus Christ; and therefore we are confident that whatever he appoints for us is the best. Be it poverty, or sickness, or any outward evil, we can resign ourselves contentedly to his holy will, being assured that our loving Father would send us nothing but what will be for our good. Is all this a delusion? Can a man be deluded into such real solid happiness? Glory be to God, I have tasted a little of it; and I would not part with the blessing for a thousand worlds. Upon this earth there is no happiness like it. Heaven only exceeds it. Therefore you gain nothing by giving credit to the devil's lie. He would have you to believe that all God's people are under a delusion, and that they only fancy they are safe and happy by leaning upon Jesus Christ. And can you believe this barefaced lie? Who but the father of lies could raise such an evil report upon the good land? and who but his children would give any credit to it? for the Spirit of truth speaks a different language. Hear what he has promised, and then judge whether we are deluded who say, he has fulfilled his promise to us: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee. Trust ye in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." Here he engages to keep those persons in perfect peace, by his everlasting strength, whose minds are stayed upon him. Fear then, careless sinner, to call this perfect peace a delusion: for thereby thou wouldst ascribe to the devil the glory of God's work; but rather ask God to show thee thy guilt and wretchedness, that thou mayst find thy want of that peace which God has to give. Hast thou no desire to ask? If thou canst not send up one wish for it, may his good Spirit now put it into thy heart. Oh that thou couldst pray to be in the happy state of the faithful soul, "Coming up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved." And to every one who desires to be in this state I make my second remark.

I suppose you begin to find the heavy burden of sin; and it is growing intolerable: then look to Christ, that he may take it upon him, and ease you. He can sustain it; for he hath borne the weight of the sins of the world; and he will ease you of your burden whenever you can cast it upon the Lord. But if you are discouraged from trusting in him, and find your sins to be so many and so great that you fear he will not receive you, fear not. Be your sins ever so heinous, if you are sensible of them, and can ask mercy, he will be merciful He never shut any one out of mercy because he was a great sinner. The greatest have found mercy, and so may you, if you go as one of the greatest to ask it. Ask, and ye shall have. Pray to Jesus for his help, and he will raise you up. Pray for faith, and he will enable you to lean upon him for wisdom, and righteousness, and holiness, and eternal redemption.

But you have, you say, been praying and waiting upon him, and yet you find nothing but coldness and deadness in your heart. You make no progress. Though you desire to lean upon Christ every step, yet you cannot put your whole trust and confidence in him; your mind is full of so many doubts and fears. Several persons, when they first set out in the ways of religion, get into this temper. They are always disputing and doubting whether this step be right, and that service accepted, looking too much into their own hearts, and looking too little at Christ; and so they puzzle and perplex themselves, and can gain no ground. If you would be freed from these difficulties, follow the light which God gives, and make use of the help which he offers. And that is the way to receive more. You, my brethren, are seeking his promised salvation Inquire what you are to trust to and to rest upon at present. If God has made a provision for your case, it ought to be your support. And has he not left you the word of promise to rely upon? He has commanded you; and it is your bounden duty to believe the report which God has given of his Son. You are required to take him at his word, and to believe that Christ is, as the scripture hath set him forth, a Saviour willing and able to save every sinner who comes unto him. This is the scripture character of Christ; and if you do not believe what it says concerning him, you make God a liar. And you will call in question both the faithfulness and the goodness of God if you think that he has promised any thing to them that seek which he will not fulfil to you who are seeking. Heaven and earth shall pass away; but not one tittle of God's promises shall pass away until all be fulfilled.

Is not this, then, my brethren, the point wherein you fail? You are seeking Christ and his salvation; but you want something more than the word of promise before you rest upon it in the manner God requires. You desire a particular application of the promises, and want the experience of them, before you can wholly rely upon the faithfulness and truth of God who made them. Examine whether this be not the case: and if it be, consider how you discredit the word of God. You are commanded to believe it; and, unless you think God is a liar, you may safely rely upon it. It is your duty to receive Christ as he is there set forth, and to wait for the witness of the Spirit in the application of Christ when and in what manner he shall think proper to give it you. And suppose your belief of his word of promise, your faith of reliance may be very weak; yet, however, bring it into act. Let it operate. Lean upon Jesus Christ as well as you are enabled, and you will certainly go on, lamely perhaps at first; but, however, halt on, and believe that he pities you, and lay the care of bringing you safely through upon him. Do not lie complaining and arguing; but believe his word, and act faith upon the word of promise; and the Lord shall be with you. And the weaker you find yourself, you have the more need to rely upon Christ. Look more at him, and less at yourself, and wait humbly upon him, and you will not long want his promised comfort. He will give you joy and peace in believing, and show you that you are in the happy number of the redeemed of the Lord, to whom I make my third and last remark.

My Christian brethren, you have experienced the truth of the doctrine in the text, and you know the happiness of leaning with faith upon Christ. You are enabled to trust the whole of your salvation on him. In all your duties, you lean upon him. You hear and read the word, and pray, and give alms, and attend at the Lord's table, not to make yourselves righteous in the sight of God This is not your motive. You know that he who made your persons righteous, must also make your duties acceptable. He that justified you is the same also that must sanctify you. Nothing can make you holy but his good Spirit. To this you trust. And as he has promised that his grace shall at all times be sufficient for you, you can therefore lean upon Jesus in the worst of times and the sorest trials. The more you are afflicted, the more do you rely upon him, and cleave the closer to him, and therefore the stronger you grow. Sickness cannot weaken your hold; death itself cannot break it off: "for when I walk through the valley of the shadow of death," says the Psalmist, "then thou art my support; then thy rod and thy staff comfort me:" leaning upon thee, I neither fear death nor him that hath the power of death.

The text, thus explained and applied, teaches us one of the most useful lessons for the conduct of life. All men are seeking happiness, but few find it; because they seek it where it is not. It has been a general inquiry among thinking men, how they might be able to bear up under afflictions; how they might keep the mind easy, when the body was in pain and sickness; and how they might be happy in all circumstances: but upon the principles of moral philosophy they could never fortify the mind against the evils of life. Various remedies were proposed; but they all failed when they were brought to the trial. But the great secret is revealed in my text. If you would be always happy, lean upon Christ: take off all trust and confidence from every other object, and place them upon Christ: it is a command: "Cast all your care upon him," he will bear it for you: but, in order to do this, you must know by faith that "he careth for you:" for how can you trust yourself and all your affairs in his hands, unless you have some evidence of his love to you? But when you receive faith from the gift, and from the operation of God, and thereby know your interest in the promises made through Christ, and, as our church expresses it, are assured of the favour and goodness of God towards you, then you can lean upon him for his promised help. And this faith can carry you safely through all troubles and temptations, be they ever so great, because it is almighty. Faith does not attack them in the strength of nature, but in the omnipotence of grace. It relies upon the promise of God, and believes that it shall be done according to his word. When faith can thus plead the promises, and lean upon Christ for the fulfilling them, it will certainly receive whatever is promised—power to subdue sin—power to live unto God—grace sufficient to resist temptations—comfort under afflictions—strength in the inner man when the body is in pain and sickness—and victory over the last enemy, death: "for all things are possible to him that believeth."

Here, then, is the infallible scripture remedy for the evils of life. May the Lord God dispose all your hearts to take it! If you would be safe and happy, lean upon Christ. But if there be any of you, my brethren, who are still determined to lean upon some other thing for happiness, be assured it will deceive you in the end. You may seem to go on smoothly and merrily for a while, but there is a day coming when you will see the falseness of your confidence. In the day of sickness, in the day of death, and much more in the great day of judgment, you will have nothing to support you unless you lean upon Jesus Christ. Be persuaded, then, in time to put your whole trust and confidence in him. If you see your want of a Saviour, go to him, and he will supply all your wants. Ask and seek the precious gift of faith until you are able to turn your backs upon all worldly happiness and to come up from the wilderness leaning upon your beloved Jesus. And whenever the grace of God brings you into this happy state, you will then go in your Christian course sweetly and cheerfully. You will find the presence of your God with you every step, and, being mightily strengthened with his Spirit in the inner man, the work of salvation will prosper in your souls. Oh that we may be all strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, to travel on in his strength. May every one of you who has come up from the wilderness of the world to the house of the Lord this day be enabled to lean and rely upon Christ for his promised help; and may receive out of his fulness grace for grace. If you have never yet been united to him by saving faith, God grant his good Spirit may bless this discourse, and make it the means of uniting you to Jesus Christ. And if you be now united, oh may you find the bond of union growing stronger and stronger every day, until death perfect it and eternity continue it in endless bliss and glory. We look up unto thee, O most gracious God, for these blessings; and we ask them in that excellent form of prayer which our church has taught us to use this day. Enable us to pray in faith, while we say.

"O Lord, we beseech thee to keep thy church and household continually in thy true religion; that they who do lean only upon the hope of thy heavenly grace may evermore be defended by thy mighty power, through Jesus Christ our Lord Amen" (Fifth Sunday after Epiphany.)

DISCOURSE XI.

CHAP. viii. ver. 6, 7.

Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned.

THIS Song of loves, which treats of the pure and spiritual affection between Christ and the believer, is very little understood. Worldly and sensual men read it with worldly and sensual tempers, and therefore find nothing divine in it. It is to such persons of all scripture the most exceptionable; and no wonder. St. Paul gives us the reason: "The natural man," says he, "discerneth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned:" for want of this spiritual discernment, he cannot see the things of the Spirit of God treated of in this divine song. But it is nevertheless a fine painting, although these blind men cannot judge of it. The subject is the union of Christ with the believer. He that is not a believer does not know what it is to be united to Christ; and therefore he is as incapable of judging of this poem as a blind man is of the expression of a beautiful picture. But he that has the love of Christ in his heart, who is one with Christ and Christ with him, he knows what the believer means when, speaking to Christ, in the text, he says, " Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned." This is the believer's prayer. He has tasted of the loving-kindness of his Lord. The Holy Ghost had shed abroad the love of Christ in his heart, and he could truly say, " I love him, because he first loved me." He was happy in the enjoyment of his Lord's love: but he wanted more, as every one does who has tasted of it. He hungered and thirsted for more full experience of it, and earnestly prayed to be rooted and grounded in love, that he might be able to comprehend what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, and to know the love of Christ that passeth knowledge. The believer knew it was his interest to study this love, and to try to take some dimensions of it, although it surpass all human understanding, yea, the understanding of all saints, of angels and glorified spirits, to comprehend it fully; but the more he did comprehend, the happier he found himself When he considered the wonders of Christ's love, in his humiliation, in his life, in his sufferings, in his death, in his resurrection and ascension, and in the glories of his mediatorial kingdom, he found particular sweetness in this consideration—that he had an interest in all the good offices of this love. He knew that whatever it did for sinners was done for him. And would not this greatly recommend the study of Christ's love above all other studies: for how exceedingly delightful must it be to trace out the steps of his love, since every new discovery is a fresh addition to the believer's happiness? Upon this experimental plan the speaker in the text considered the subject. He prays for a more full and perfect enjoyment of Christ's love, and urges his petition by several motives taken from what Christ did and suffered for sinners. He takes a view of the triumphs of his love in the greatness of his actions and sufferings, and then by them pleads with him for a more abundant measure of love. May the divine Spirit enable every one of you to put up the same prayer. May he shed abroad in your hearts that love which will make your consideration of this scripture useful and profitable. Under his guidance, then, let us inquire,

First, Into the sense and meaning of the words; and Secondly, Into the practical use we can make of them.

This divine Song is drawn up in the manner of a dialogue. The speakers are Christ and the church. The church is every faithful soul which is united to Christ as the members are to the body, or the branches to the vine. When some men hear the word church, they are apt to apply it to national or congregational assemblies; but the scripture applies it to believers, and to them only, allowing none to be true members, not even of any Christian communion, unless they be members of Christ's mystical body: and our reformers, in the 19th article, give us this definition of the visible church: " It is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God and the sacraments be duly administered." One of these faithful men (for of numbers of them the church is composed) is here expressing the fervent prayer of his heart, to have more full experience of Christ's love. He had no doubt of the favour and goodness of God towards him in Christ. He had received many clear proofs of it. He had the scripture marks and evidences in his own soul of Christ's being his beloved and his friend; and he was happy in knowing this. The sense of Christ's love to him had enabled him to love Christ in return, and therefore he was led to pray for the continuance and for the increase of Christ's love: " Set me as a seal upon thine heart;" and convey to me, under thy seal, all the graces and blessings which thy love has to give: for the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his: he knoweth them that have his seal upon them. Oh, seal me, then, for thine! When a man sets his hand and seal to a will or to a deed of gift, it is as if he should declare, This is my last will and testament: this is my act and deed. So, when Christ sets the believer as a seal upon his heart, it is as if he should declare, I seal this person for mine, and give unto him freely all the benefits of the New Testament in my blood; and this is properly attested by my word and by my Spirit. The word is the outward witness; the Spirit, applying the word, is the inward witness. The scripture very clearly assigns to him the office of sealing believers, as Eph. i. 13: "After that ye believed in Christ, ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise:" and, chap. iv. 30, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, by whom ye are sealed unto the day of redemption." Christ redeemed both our real and personal estate; but we are not in possession of either until it be conveyed to us under the seal of the Holy Spirit. Christ's redemption without the Holy Spirit's application is like a deed without a seal, which you know can legally convey nothing. It is the signing and sealing that makes it good in law. And when the Holy Spirit seals the believer, then he receives the earnest of his inheritance. The believer in the text had this earnest in himself, and therefore he prayed fervently for a greater measure of Christ's love, and he prayed the more fervently, as well from the lively remembrance he had of his former misery, while he was without Christ in the world, as from the pleasing sense of his present happiness. All the time his heart had been set upon the world, he remembered in what a vain shadow he had been walking, and how he had disquieted himself in vain. From whatever he sought happiness, he was disappointed; and therefore, convinced of the emptiness of every creature-comfort and of the sinfulness of resting in them—having found the best of them unable to fill the desires of his soul—he had turned from the creature to God. God had every thing to give that could make him completely happy; and God the Saviour was willing to give it. As his power is, so is his love; they are alike infinite. The speaker in the text had happy experience of Christ's love, and did not doubt of his power to save. With a grateful sense of what Christ had already done, he prayed that the Holy Spirit would make him increase and abound in love. My brethren, is this your prayer? Do you know so much of his love to you as to pray for more love to him? If you are not seeking happiness in his love, in what have you been seeking it all your life, or in what are you now seeking it? Out of Christ you could seek it in nothing but in the sinful love of the creature. And now ask yourselves what you have found. If you deal honestly with your souls, you must confess that you have met with continual disappointments. And why, then, will you not be wise from experience? Are you tired and weary of the dull round of worldly joys? Then pray the Holy Spirit to turn your affections from these deluding objects to the Lord Jesus; and when your hearts are set upon him, he will then make you perfectly, eternally blessed. Blessedness is his to give. The world has it not. Oh, turn then from it to our loving God, and beg you may know so much of his love as to be able to pray with the believer, in the text, that Christ would "set you as a seal upon his heart," and let you know your interest in his love. When you are sealed for his, and find his affections are placed upon you, then you will have the comfortable enjoyment of his present graces and sure and certain hope of your inheriting the promises of eternal life: for then he will also "set you as a seal upon his arm." His arm is his power. The hand is the active part of the body, by which the strength of it is exerted. We labour and work with our hands; and when the scripture speaks of the arm of the Lord, it means his active power, which the faithful soul here desires may be exercised continually for its salvation. To be as a seal upon his heart would be of no use without the seal upon his arm. His love would not be a blessing unless it was an active, operative love. But it is therefore desirable to partake of Christ's love, because it will always awake the arm of the Lord, and will bring salvation. His love and his power are never separated; his heart and his arm act together; and therefore the believing soul does not put them asunder, but prays, in the text. that the beloved Saviour would give her experience of both:—Oh, set me as a seal upon thy heart, that whatever thy love disposes thee to do for sinners, I may share and partake in it! Oh set me also as a seal upon thine arm! Let me also, blessed Jesus, be engraven on the palms of thy hands, that in all thy works thou mayst remember me with mercy! Let thy love engage thy power to make all things work together for my good.

These are the desires of the faithful in the text; and they are the fervent desires of every true believer. And if there be any of you who are not convinced that these are the breathings of true faith, then you are ignorant of the nature of Christ's love. You know it not, because you have had no experience of it. If you had ever found your want of his love, and had ever tasted of it, you would bear your testimony to the truth of the following description: viz. That his love is strong as death; the ardour of it is harder than the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame, burning with such an inextinguishable affection, that many waters could not quench it, neither could the floods drown it; and of so inestimable a price, that if a man should think of buying it, or of meriting it, and would give all the substance of his house for it, it would utterly be despised. These are the excellencies of Christ's love, for which the faithful soul so earnestly desired further experience of it, and for which you will desire it with the same earnestness, as soon as you are made sensible of your wants. When you find the misery of sin, and the wretched slavery of serving Satan and the world and the flesh, who have no wages to give you but death, then you will wish your souls under the protection of that love which is "strong as death." The love of Christ was stronger than death: for he conquered death, and took out its sting. And the sting of death will be taken out of your conscience when it is sprinkled with his atoning blood. His love brought him down from heaven, and he took a body of flesh, in which he might obey, and suffer, and die. Accordingly, he became obedient, obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. He died the painful, ignominious, and accursed death of the cross. Greater love hath no man than this—that a man lay down his life for his friends: but how far does the love of Jesus exceed this instance? He laid down his life, not for friends, but for sinners, for enemies, the bitterest enemies, who persecuted him even unto death—he died for his persecutors. Greater love than this there cannot be: for as he died to save his enemies from death, so he rose again, that they might rise to a newness of life, whereby he showed "his love to be stronger than the grave." Our translation reads, "jealousy is cruel as the grave." The word rendered jealousy denotes the ardour and intenseness of Christ's love; not what he thought of the love of others to him, but the nature of his love to them—the great degree, the flaming ardour and intenseness of it, which made him submit, not only to death, but also to go down to the grave. In the prison of the grave, the bodies of all the dead were shut up. The prison was secured with bars and gates, and guarded by him that had the power of death; and he had suffered not one prisoner, for four thousand years, to escape. To this prison the Lord Jesus went down; and he was detained in it for three days: but it was not possible that he should be holden any longer. On the third day he broke through the gate of death, and demonstrated that his love was stronger than the grave. And when he is describing his victory to the beloved apostle, he represents it under a very beautiful image: "I am he that liveth," says he, "and was dead, and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen, and have the keys of hell and of death." My brethren, are any of you afraid to die? Has death still a sting, and the grave victory over you? If they have, did you ever consider what was the reason? Is it not because you either do not believe that Christ has the keys of death and the grave in his hands, or else you have no certainty that he will use them for your interest? You have no knowledge of Christ's love to you. The Holy Ghost never shed it abroad in your heart. Perhaps you never desired it: and therefore you are ignorant of his having died and risen from the grave for your salvation. If you knew your interest in his death, and had experienced the power of his resurrection, you would no longer fear death and the grave; for then faith would enable you to triumph over both. You would have nothing to fear, but every thing blessed to hope for from them, after you knew that Christ had set you as a seal upon his heart, and as a seal upon his arm; for then death and the grave, instead of separating you from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, would bring you to the more full and eternal enjoyment of it.

My brethren, if you have not this love, do you desire it? Can you pray for it? If the Holy Spirit has discovered to you your want of it, and has put you upon asking, ask, and he will grant you your heart's desire. You shall know Christ and the power of his resurrection—know him to be your Saviour and your God. And this experience of his love to you will open to your understanding the next words in the description; viz. that the ardour of Christ's love is like coals of fire, burning clear and bright with a most vehement flame, "such as many waters could not quench." These many waters are the many troubles he met with; and they were so many that they would have quenched any love but his. He went through a sea of troubles from the manger to the cross; but his love burned all the time with such a vehement flame that the many waters he waded through could not quench it. Herod persecuted him while a child, and forced him to flee his country, but his love to his enemies brought him back. His very humiliation, until he entered on his public ministry, was a great trial. As God he was the highest in heaven; as man he was one of the lowest on earth; that was consequently the highest love which stooped the lowest to save sinners. You may read in the gospels the history of the many troubles he went through. His public life was one continued scene of opposition. Trouble came, like wave after wave, raging and lifting up their heads on high; but the ardour of his love mounted and flamed above them all. You know that nothing cools love so much as meeting with hatred: he was hated even for doing good, and yet he loved his enemies. They poured cold water upon his love, by railing at his doctrine, blaspheming his person, blaspheming his miracles; but his love, being of an uncommon nature, burned the brighter—he went on doing good to his revilers and his blasphemers. And though the rulers and nation of the Jews, a few poor people excepted, would not receive him for the promised Messiah, yet these many waters could not quench his love: it burned with a pure flame, which neither the ingratitude nor the vile treatment of mankind could in the least damp or abate. And we need not wonder that many waters could not quench, "for the floods could not drown the love of Christ." It still kept its ardour when the overflowing flood broke over his head. When the floods of ungodly men rose up against him, and tried his love with every pain and reproach which is distressing to human nature, they only served to make his love shine out the purer and brighter. In his last sufferings these floods tried to drown his love; but it mounted up triumphant above all. In the garden, on the eve of the passion, he had a prospect of what he was to undergo; and as there was no other way for man to be saved but for him to drink the bitter cup, he therefore resolved to take it and to drink it up to the very dregs. No sooner had he spoken the words, "Father thy will be done," but the cup was instantly put into his hands. He is apprehended, and all his disciples forsake him. Not one, not Peter himself, durst own him. As a malefactor he is brought before the high priest; accused for saying he was the Son of God; shamefully ill-treated and spit upon; blindfolded, by way of insult on his prophetical office, and struck upon the face; led to Pilate; tried and acquitted, and yet whipped and scourged; crowned with thorns, by way of insult on his regal office, and the thorns driven into his head by the barbarous soldiers until the blood ran down his temples; and then, innocent, and pronounced so by his judge, nevertheless given up to the rage of the people—to the floods of ungodly men that went about to devour him. They thirsted for his blood, and shed it as if it had been water. Having gotten him into their power, they led him out, marking the way as he went with his blood; and having reached mount Calvary, there they prepare their instruments of death. They drive the nails through his hands and feet, fastening his body to the cross, and then, lifting up the cross, they stand by to insult and blaspheme him. O love divine! how triumphantly didst thou rise above all these floods of opposition, when that sweet prayer came out of thy dying mouth, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" But he had another flood of opposition to withstand, infinitely more dreadful than the former: he had the wrath and justice of his Father to sustain, who, finding all our sins upon him, took full satisfaction, even to the uttermost farthing. His Father had before declared, by a voice from heaven, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased:" but now his justice draws the sword in wrath upon his beloved Son. Whence was this? What! is there any variableness or shadow of turning in God? No. He was still the beloved Son of the Father; but he was made sin for us, who knew no sin: he was wounded for our transgressions, and was bruised for our iniquities: he bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows, from the time he sweat, as it were, great drops of blood in the garden, until he expired upon the cross. And what he endured while that scripture was fulfilling—"Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord"—and justice was taking full and perfect satisfaction for sin upon him—no tongue can tell; no imagination can conceive. He says himself, "All thy waves and storms are gone over me." They broke upon his head, and with so much fury, that he complains, in the 88th Psalm, ver. 7, "Thine indignation lieth hard upon me, and thou hast vexed me with all thy storms." When all the waves and storms of the Father's wrath, which should have fallen upon us, vexed him, he might well say, "Was there ever sorrow like unto my sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger?" There never was any sorrow like that which occasioned this lamentation: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" All the powers in heaven and earth heard this cry, and were affected with it: the sun hid his face; there was darkness over the whole earth; the rocks were rent; the graves opened; the dead arose; the veil of the temple was rent from the top to the bottom. What the bleeding Lamb of God suffered at this time surpasseth human understanding. But, however, in this day of the Lord's fierce anger, the floods of divine wrath did not drown our Lord's love. He bore up under all, until love heard the happy words, "It is finished," and then he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. But his love did not die. No. It gained the greatest victory in death. We read of Samson, that the dead whom he slew at his death were more than those whom he slew in his life: which was a type and figure of the great victory which Christ obtained by his death; for he then vanquished all the enemies of our peace. His love was stronger than death; because, through death he overcame death and him that had the power of death. It was stronger than the grave; for he redeemed his own body before it had seen corruption. And he arose from the grave as the first fruits of the dead; and, behold, he has in his hands the keys of hell and of death; so that neither death nor hell shall have any power over them that believe in him. And being risen from the dead, and ascended into heaven, he is seated upon the throne of glory; and he neither wants love nor power to bestow upon them that believe in him every grace and every blessing which can make them happy in time and in eternity.

Surely, then, the love of Christ is beyond all value. What price can you set upon it? Might not the faithful, with good reason, say of it in the text, "If a man would give all the substance of his house for this love, it would utterly be despised?" for it is a free love; it cannot be bought. It is inestimable; and the riches of it are unsearchable. With what can you think of purchasing it? With the substance of a man's house? Why it is one of the free gifts of this love: and can you then think of meriting or buying it with its own gifts? This love created all things that are in heaven and that are in earth; so that you have nothing to offer it but what is already its own. And if you are one of the Lord's people, it redeemed you from the bondage of sin and Satan, of death and the grave, and you have only to receive its blessings, and to be thankful: for you yourself, and all that you have, are not your own. You are bought with a price. And what can you offer the Lord but what is already his own? His by right of creation; by right of redemption doubly his. And must he not then utterly despise both you and your gifts if you think that the substance of your house is to be compared with his love? He will despise you, and you will feel his resentment through the ages of eternity, if you disparage his love so much as to think that any thing in the world, yea, the whole world itself, ought to be put in competition with his love. They who have tasted of it know it to be invaluable. The least experience of it is worth thousands of worlds. And oh that He who has it to give may now shed it abroad in all your hearts, that you may feel the happiness of it! May this be the desire of every soul here present—Set me, Lord Jesus, as a seal upon thine heart; set me as a seal upon thine arm: for thy love to sinners is strong as death; the ardour of it is mightier than the grave, it burned like bright coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. Many waters could not quench thy love, nor could the floods drown it. If a man would give all the substance of his house to purchase thy love, he and his gifts would be utterly despised.

My brethren, can you make use of this prayer? Are these the pious breathings of your souls? You have heard, from the sense of the words, that these were the pious breathings of the faithful under the Old Testament; and they must be yours under the New, if you would experience the comforts of the doctrine in the text: and to stir you up to seek them is the subject of my second general head; under which I shall make two or three short practical inferences.

The first relates to the manner in which the words are drawn up. They are in the form of a prayer, founded upon past experience of Christ's love, and earnestly desiring a larger share of it. And is this your heart's desire? Can you willingly and heartily pray to have the love of other objects shut out of your hearts, and to find your happiness in the love of Christ, and in being sealed for his? If you can pray thus, may you daily find more reason to love Jesus Christ. But if you cannot, is it not expedient that you should consider what is the reason? For has not Jesus Christ every perfection in himself, and every grace and blessing to give, which ought to draw the affections of miserable sinners unto himself? And yet you have no love for him. What is the cause which makes you act so directly against your own interest? Is it not an unlawful attachment to the world, or to some object in it, which you set up against Christ? You prefer it to him. You think it can make you happier than he can; and so you give up your hearts to its service. Herein you are guilty of a monstrous absurdity; because you prefer creature comforts to God; and you are guilty of monstrous wickedness; because you leave God to idolize the creature. And though, after daily experience, you find that the creature cannot make you happy, yet still you idolize it. What prodigious power must sin have over a man; how entirely must it have blinded his understanding, when it can make him act against the clearest evidence even of his own senses! for upon whatever object you place your hearts, in preference or in opposition to Christ, it cannot make you happy; for this plain reason—because you sin in giving that love to it which is due to him. "My son," says he, "give ME thy heart." I will make thee happy by taking guilt out of thy conscience, by pardoning thee freely, and shedding the love of God abroad in thy heart. Until this be done, no creature can make you happy. While sin is unpardoned, while guilt is in the conscience, and while the broken law condemns, what can money, what can pleasure, what can honour give of happiness? They may for a time soothe the uneasiness of the mind, but they cannot remove it. Nothing can remove it but Jesus Christ. He has perfect peace to give. And if ever you obtain it, you must receive it from his free love and bounty.

My brethren, do you give your assent to these truths? How do they appear to you? Do they not carry conviction along with them? Certainly they do, unless men be entirely blinded with sin. If they have convinced you, and you begin to desire to know the love of Christ, then turn from seeking happiness in creature comforts, where it cannot be found, and seek it in Jesus Christ, and you will find in him true solid bliss when he sets you as a seal upon his heart and as a seal upon his arm. But if you have not been convinced from what has been said, then turn to the world, and get its seal upon your hearts. If the world can make you happier than God can, idolize it. Serve it, as too many do, with every faculty of soul and body, and pay it that obedience which is due to God only. But did you ever consider who is the god of this world that ruleth in the children of disobedience? Is it not that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world? And what! would you be found, when you come to die, with the devil's seal upon you? Do you now deliberately choose to be marked for his, and to have your portion with him in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone for ever and ever? If there be any of you thus far deluded and infatuated, let me entreat you to read the ninth chapter of Ezekiel. You will there find a lively image of your present state. I pray God to make it the means of showing you your danger. The Lord gives a command to slay young and old, and to destroy the whole city: but first, one clothed in linen goes to set a mark upon the Lord's people; and they only were to be saved. You have not the Lord's mark upon you; therefore, in the day of his fierce anger, his eye will not spare, neither will he have pity. Whenever the destroying angel is sent out, he has no power to hurt the servants of God, who are sealed; as you may read, Rev. vii. Four angels had a commission to hurt the earth and the sea; but they were not to execute it until the Lord's people were sealed: then they were to destroy, and spare not. Are not these awful scriptures? Have not they made you sensible of your present danger? May the Spirit of the living God apply them! Oh, may his grace now begin to work upon your hearts! Now may he put it into your minds, from a due sense of your wants, to seek a supply from the love of Christ, that you may receive profit from what I have to remark upon the second part of the text; viz.—The greatness of Christ's love.

But of this you can form no judgment unless you have seen your guilt and your misery, and found how much you stood in need of his love. It will appear great in proportion as you find your want of it, and greater as you experience it. In itself, it is divine and infinite. It partakes of the nature of its author. It is, like him, above all blessing and praise. If you try to take the dimensions of it, you will conclude with the apostle, that it surpasseth knowledge, yea, the knowledge of angels as well as of men: the height, the depth, the length, the breadth of it cannot be measured by any created being. Oh the height and depth of that love! which brought our divine Lord from the highest heavens to the lowest humiliation! Oh the length of that love! which reaches as far as the east is from the west; for so far hath he set our sins from us. Oh the breadth of it! which includes a great multitude, that no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues. But although Christ's love be thus unspeakably great, and inconceivably divine, yet, until you feel the misery of sin, you will not think of applying to Christ for his love. But when guilt torments, death terrifies, the grave and hell appear to you in all their horrors, then you will think it a blessing indeed, if you could have that love in your hearts, which is able to cast out these fears. And the knowledge of Christ's love to you casteth out all fear: for his love has conquered all your enemies, and is now almighty to conquer them in you. For sin he has made an atonement, death he has subdued, and him that had the power of death: he is risen from the grave as the first fruits of the dead, and has opened the gate of everlasting life. Oh, beseech him, then, to let you share in that love which was stronger than death, mightier than the grave—whereby all his conquests shall be yours! When you are united to him in the bonds of love, he will make you more than conqueror. He will make your love triumphant, like his. He will so strengthen it, that many waters shall not be able to quench it, neither shall the floods be able to drown it. Neither distress nor persecution, neither life nor death, neither the pleasures of the world nor the temptations of the devil, shall be able to separate you from the love of Christ Jesus your Lord.

If you see your want of this love, seek, and you shall find it. The promise is, "They that seek me early shall find me." And if any of you have been seeking, and have not found, you may conclude that you have been seeking wrong; and have not followed the last part of the text; viz. seeking it as a free gift, which, with all your endeavours and pains, you cannot merit: for such is the free and inestimable love of Christ, that if a man would give all the substance of his house for this love, it would utterly be despised. If you had millions of worlds to give, they would be counted as nothing. He would reject you and your worthless bribes, as one said upon a like occasion, "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the free gift of God was to be purchased with money." Not only all that thou hast, but also all that thou canst desire, is not to be compared with the love of Christ. Whatever can make the sinner happy in time, whatever can make him blessed in eternity, Christ's love is able to bestow, and does bestow, upon those who find their want of it, and who come, humbled under a sense of their wants, to ask it as a matter of free grace and bounty. It is to the glory of his love that he bestows it upon the unworthy. And if his good Spirit has enabled you to see your want of it, and you can ask it as an unworthy sinner, you will receive it. This is your only qualification—to acknowledge that you do not deserve it. Go to the throne of his grace with this humble temper, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and the Lord Jesus will send you away filled with good things.

It is evident, then, from what has been said, that there is perfect happiness to be found in the love of our redeeming God. All that call themselves Christians profess their belief of this truth; but the generality of them act in direct opposition to their belief, and are seeking happiness where God has decreed it shall not be found. They try to find it in the world, but are disappointed; and, after many disappointments, they will not give over the search. Their great love for the world will not suffer them to turn their backs upon it, although it has deceived them so often. They are quite enamoured with its fancy goods, and place their whole hearts and affections upon its money, its pleasures, and its honours: these they pursue eagerly, and perhaps attain them: they have their heart's desire, and yet they are unhappy. What is the reason? Because these things cannot satisfy the wants of a sinful soul. Sin separated the soul from God: not only set them at a distance from each other, but also occasioned enmity between them. The law and justice of God are of purer eyes than to behold the least sin, and therefore he revealed his wrath from heaven against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men. And until his law and justice receive full satisfaction, God the Father will not appear reconciled, nor pardon the sinner, who cannot return to God with any love or confidence, and find happiness in him, until he believe that God is reconciled, and has pardoned him. Now, Jesus Christ is the only Saviour who has pardon of sin to give. His good Spirit can give the sinner the knowledge of the pardon of sin, and shed abroad in his heart all the comforts of God's pardoning love. Then he will know the truth of the description in the text. Christ's love will appear to him as it is there described. He will be able to take up the words, and to use them with the same spirit, with which they were spoken in the Song: for he is happy in the love of Christ, and can truly say, "I love him, because he first loved me, and gave himself for me."

Since these things are so, surely, my beloved brethren, you will not go away resolved still to seek happiness in the love of creature comforts. You cannot suppose that the world can make you happier than its almighty Creator and Saviour can. If you had it all in your possession, yet there are times when it could be of no service. What pleasure could it give you in sickness? How could it remove the torments of a guilty conscience? How could it keep off death, or take out its sting? How could it bring you any comfort, if your poor soul should appear with all its sins unpardoned at the judgment-seat of Christ? Alas! in these circumstances the world and the things of it cannot give relief. You know they cannot. And why, then, will you pursue them, since there is no happiness to be found in them, and the more you pursue them, the farther will they lead you from true happiness: Oh, turn from the world, then, leave it; follow its vain shadows no longer; nor disquiet yourselves in vain. No man was ever happy in the love of the world; but every man is happier than the world can make him who has only accepted the invitation, "Oh come, taste, and see how gracious the Lord Jesus is:" but he that has tasted, and seen, and is under the care and protection of Christ's love, he is completely happy, even in times of trial and trouble; because Christ is almighty to deliver; and when he does not deliver from affliction, he is able to sanctify it, and to make it work together for good to them that love him. And is not this a happy state? What sinner would not desire it, and what afflicted person would not pray for it? May He who is able to bring you into it, put it into all your hearts to seek it. Oh that he may send his good Spirit, and give every one of you earnest desires to have this scripture fulfilled in your own souls! May this be the language of every soul here present—Set me, blessed Saviour, as a seal upon thine heart, and as a seal upon thine arm. Let thy love and thy power act together for my salvation: for thy love is mightier than death, and stronger than the grave. Oh that I might share in these victories of thy love, the vehement ardour of which many waters could not quench, neither could the floods drown it. If a man would give all the substance of his house to buy this love, it would utterly be contemned. I have nothing to purchase it with. Give it to me, Lord, as a free gift, and to the glory of the giver.

O dear Redeemer, send us away with these good desires in all our hearts, and cherish them, until we know that love of thine which passeth knowledge, which exceeds all that can be said of it upon earth, and will exceed all that can be said of it in heaven. There will be no end of singing its praises through eternity. Oh may it be your joy and happiness here in time to sing with grateful hearts the praises of redeeming love until Jesus take you to himself and put more love into your hearts, and fill your mouths with louder songs of praise to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, the adorable Trinity in Unity; to whom may we all ascribe equal honour and glory, majesty and dominion, now, henceforth, and for evermore. Amen and Amen.

DISCOURSE XII.

CHAP. viii. ver. 14.

Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices.

THE church makes this her last request. She desires her beloved to hasten his coming, which under the Old Testament dispensation, referred to his coming in the flesh, as under the New it refers to his second coming. But the church of God, both in the Old Testament and the New, expected another coming of Christ; viz. his coming in grace. The believers knew that he was to come, and to abide with them, and not as a sojourner, but as an inhabitant, to dwell in their hearts by faith. This was promised them, and this they have always experienced. The words may with great propriety treat of the three advents of our Lord. And I will endeavour,

First, to explain them in their full sense, and then,

Secondly, To draw some practical observations from them.

The words were spoken before the coming of Christ in the flesh; and supposing they refer to it, they imply great haste and speed. The faithful would have Christ to hasten his coming in the swiftest manner; whereby they express the holy impatience of their affections, which could not endure delay. They longed to see the desire of all nations incarnate. It was their continual wish and prayer that they might see the day of Christ. Therefore upon the conclusion of the Song, they break off as it were abruptly, with this their last request, upon which their hearts were principally set,—"Make haste, my beloved."

This was the continual prayer of believers under the Old Testament, which they made, not from any doubt of God's faithfulness and truth, but from their earnest desire after the Saviour of the world. They were sensibly convinced of their great want of him. They found sin in themselves; they read in the law of the punishment due to sin, which the law had threatened, and justice was bound to inflict; and they knew that they could do nothing to make an atonement to law and justice: therefore they ardently prayed for the coming of the promised Lamb of God who was to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and to answer all the demands of law and justice. The first prophecy was sufficiently clear to be a ground for their prayers. God had declared that the seed of the woman—one born of a woman—should bruise the serpent's head, in which his poison lay, and thereby destroy the power which he had usurped over mankind. The types and services then instituted, which are in sum and substance the same that were afterwards recorded in the written law, tended to explain the first prophecy, and to keep it continually in remembrance. They served as a schoolmaster to lead men to Christ. From them it was certain that the Saviour would come and be made a sacrifice for sin; but the precise time of his coming was not made known in the first ages of the world. This gave men occasion to expect him in every age, until the fixed time of his coming was revealed. And, accordingly, we find the patriarchs before, and the prophets under, the law, waiting with eager desires for his coming: As our Lord assured his apostles, Matt. xiii. 17: "Verily I say unto you, Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see these things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear these things which ye hear, and have not heard them." There were many prophets and righteous men in the church of God, as well before the written law as since, who desired to see God incarnate, and to hear the gracious words that should proceed out of his mouth. Jacob was one of these prophets and righteous men; and he expresses all their desires in his own: "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord." Gen. xlix. 18. And the prophet Isaiah, speaking in his own name, and in the name of the faithful, says,—"In the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee: the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee." And there were always in the church some waiting for the promised consolation of Israel, and especially at the time of his appearing in the flesh; such as the just and devout Simeon, who, when the holy child Jesus was brought into the temple, took him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." And this, my brethren, will be your happy case when your eyes see the salvation of God. When faith gives you a clear view of your interest in the salvation of Jesus Christ, then, whenever you die, you will depart in peace.

Thus the Old Testament saints desired Christ to hasten his coming in the flesh. They wanted to behold his day. They longed to see the great mystery of godliness opened and explained—God manifest in the flesh. In the fulness of time, according to their desires, he came. He visited us in great humility, and in the form of a servant; but he thought it not robbery to be equal with God: for he required the same faith in himself as in the Father: "Ye believe in God; believe also in me." John xiv. 1. He commanded the same divine honour to be paid to him: "All men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father;" John v. 23, for he is Jehovah, the self-existent God; John viii. 24, which whoever does not believe shall die in his sins. He supported these high claims by appealing to his miracles, which were God's testimony to the truth of his words. Hear his own argument upon this very subject. The Jews were going to stone him for saying that he was God. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him." John x. 37, 38. He did all the works which the prophets had foretold the promised Immanuel should perform. And after he had fulfilled the scriptures of the Old Testament, had suffered all that law and justice required, and had completed the great work of salvation, he ascended into heaven, and sat down at the right hand of the majesty on high. And we are now, according to his most true promise, waiting for his second coming. There is a great day, and not far off, when every eye shall see him coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. God had revealed this very early to his servants, the prophets: for Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it; saying, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." In the New Testament we have the manner of our Lord's coming to execute judgment, with the process of the last day very particularly described. And it is the wish and prayer of every faithful soul that he would hasten this his glorious appearing, and accomplish the great things which are to go before it. When the blessed Jesus closes the volume of Revelation with this promise, "Surely I come quickly," the faithful reply, "Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus." And daily is it in their prayers—Thy kingdom come. And they have good reason to desire it; because all that their Lord and Saviour has to do upon the earth will then be completed. The number of the elect will be perfected, and be will be admired in them. His enemies will be finally subdued. An end will be put to the reign of sin and Satan. There will be no more death. Whatever robbed our redeeming God of his glory will be destroyed. Oh how greatly, then, is this second coming of our Lord to be desired by all his faithful followers and servants, who are described in scripture by this character—that they love his appearing. They love it first for his sake, because he will then be glorified in his saints, he will then be glorified for the great glory which he will bestow upon them; and they love it also for their own sakes, because then all their wishes and desires will be fulfilled, when they shall see their beloved Saviour face to face. They will have no more prayers or requests to make. When that great day is come, there will be no more complaints, no more wants or necessities, sorrow and sighing will flee away for ever. Our warfare will be ended, our victory completed. Our crowns shall shine upon our heads with never-fading lustre; our palms of victory shall be ever green. How exceedingly great this happiness will be we cannot fully comprehend at present. However this one circumstance heightens every thing said of it in scripture; namely, that it will be eternal. When we have ascended from judgment with our Lord, he will admit us into his kingdom of glory. After this meeting we shall part no more; but shall ever be with the Lord, praising and adoring his perfections, and being happy in the enjoyment of them to all eternity. And is not all this happiness earnestly to be desired by them who have received through faith the earnest of their inheritance? And will it not be much upon their hearts to pray him to hasten his coming? And will not they who love his appearing pray for it with great fervency? Our church is very earnest in her prayers: for she teaches us, in the Burial Service, to be continually praying to him, "that it would please him, of his gracious goodness, shortly to accomplish the number of his elect, and to hasten his kingdom." And he has promised to hear and to answer these prayers: for when he is describing, in St. Matthew, the tribulation of the last days, which shall be greater than any since the beginning of the world to that time, he says that "for the elects' sake these days shall be shortened." Amen. So be it, Lord Jesus.

My brethren, when you hear of our Lord's second coming, how does it affect you? Do you love to think of the day of his great glory? Do you wish and pray for it? Does the solemnity of it strike no terror into your consciences? Is all peace and joy within when you hear of the suddenness of his coming, and of the general surprise it will be to a careless world? Do you now find no fear if the last trump should this moment sound, and you should lift up your eyes, and see the God of glory coming in the clouds of heaven, attended with all his holy angels? Could you look up with joy, knowing that your redemption draweth nigh? Is your conscience so purged from dead works, that it would not be alarmed if the air that we breathe, being on fire, should be dissolved, and the elements should melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein, should be burnt up? Are you prepared to draw near the judgment seat with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having your hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience? When you meditate upon the solemn process of the last day as described by the Judge himself, can you suppose yourself to be in the midst of this awful scene, and your state ready to be determined to all eternity? and have you no fearful apprehensions about your salvation? If you have none, may he who delivered you from them strengthen and establish your faith, that you may daily love our Lord, and love his appearing more and more. But if guilty fear does arise in your heart when you think of the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour at the last day, this proves that all is not right in your own soul. There is a coming of Christ in grace which you have not yet experienced: for if you had, it would have given you that love which casteth out all tormenting fear. If Christ had come, and manifested himself to you as your Saviour; if he had awakened you, had pardoned you freely, and given you the witness of the Spirit in your heart, enabling you to look upon God as your reconciled Father, Christ as your Saviour, and the Holy Spirit as your guide and comforter, then you could have no reason to fear. And this coming of Christ is the most to be desired, because without this you do not receive the graces and blessings of his first coming in the flesh, and therefore are not prepared for his second coming to judgment. What he did and suffered in the flesh is not imputed unto us for righteousness until it be applied and appropriated. The Holy Spirit must come and show us our interest in it; he must give us present salvation from the pollution, and the guilt, and the dominion of sin; and we must know and experience this by true faith before the fear of Christ's coming to judgment can be taken out of the conscience. But when Christ thus dwells in the heart by faith, then, being interested in all the graces of his first coming, we may wait for the blessings of his second coming with hopes full of immortality. Therefore,

My brethren, above all things seek the experience of Christ's coming to you in grace: for when you once know and love him as your Saviour, you cannot fear him as your judge: but from the sense of his love to you, you will be able, with the faithful in the text, to call him your beloved, and to pray for his speedy coming, that he may put all his enemies under his feet. When they say, "Make haste, my beloved," this implies that there was mutual love between them. The soul was made sensible of Christ's love to it: "For we love him," says the apostle John, "because he first loved us." And when you have scripture evidence of his first loving you, then you can with true faith take up the church's words, and say, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." To know that he is yours, is the same thing as to know whatever he has is yours: for, by being interested in him, you have a property in all his promises, graces, and blessings, in time and in eternity. This is the blessed state of believers. And do you not desire, my brethren, to be in it? Is it not happiness indeed to be freed from the fear of death and judgment—nay more, to be able to pray for the coming of Christ, and to love his appearing? What can be more desirable than to know that the almighty Judge is your loving Saviour, who, when he comes at the last day, will make you completely blessed, both in body and soul? May God put it into all your hearts to desire this; and may he give you faith to pray, in the words of the text, "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or a young hart,"—like them in swiftness and speed, for which they are remarkable. It is said of Asahel the son of Zeruiah, that he was as light of foot as a wild roe; and the Gadites who came to David at Ziklag, are celebrated for being as swift as roes upon the mountains. With all this speed would the faithful have Christ to hasten his coming. They had no stronger idea of the greatest speed than what they took from the swiftness of a wild roe; and therefore by this they express the fervent desires of their souls after his speedy coming. He heard their prayers, and he will answer them. He gave them many promises in the Old Testament of his coming in glory to judge the world, and many more in the New. In his last words, with which he shuts up the volume of Revelation, he leaves us this sweet and comfortable promise—"Surely I come quickly." Here we have his promise: he will come quickly; and confirmed by a solemn asseveration: surely, and surely what his truth hath promised, nothing shall be able to hinder his omnipotence from fulfilling: for, yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. And because he seems to tarry, therefore the unbeliever takes occasion to reflect upon the faithfulness of God, and the careless sinner sinks deeper into carnal security; but both these sorts of persons may read their condemnation in the third chapter of the second epistle of Peter, in which he foretels that there should come, in the last days, scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? We see no signs of it: for since the fathers fell asleep, all things go on as they did from the beginning of the creation. To this the apostle replies, first, by saying, It is wilful ignorance to maintain that the world has suffered no change since the creation: for was it not once destroyed by a deluge of water? And, secondly he answers, that the Lord is not slack concerning his promise as some men count slackness, but is long suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. What these men call slackness, is an act of mercy. The judge only waits till the time fixed in the counsel of God be finished, till the number of the elect be perfected: and then shall the end come. His delay may seem long to us, who measure time by days, and months, and years; but with the Lord, a thousand years are but as one day. There is no time in eternity. What seems long to us, who are but of yesterday, is with the Lord speedy: for he that is truth, and cannot lie, says, Surely I come quickly. The longer he has delayed, the sooner he will come: and therefore, my brethren, you should be the more prepared. If you think his delay long, this should hasten you in your preparation: because every moment brings his coming nearer. No one dare affirm that he shall not live to see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. If this may be, and every one of us may live to see it come to pass, oh what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness! What diligence should we give to make our calling and election sure! Ought we not to have a clear knowledge of our interest in the Judge, and to be assured by faith of his being our Saviour, that we may love his appearing, and pray for it, as the faithful did in the text? They finished their prayer, and closed the book, with entreating him to come speedily, and to give them more experience of his love: they desired to have, daily, more proofs of his being their complete Saviour, by his acting in each of his anointed offices for them, and for their salvation, as their prophet, their priest, and their king. This is, I think, the meaning of the last words—"Upon the mountains of spices." In our language, we apply the word mountain to the highest hills, and we generally fix the idea of barrenness to it: but the scripture applies it to hills of no great height, and to the most fruitful hills, such as Carmel, and Sharon, and Gilead, upon which grew the spices here mentioned. In the 30th of Exodus, we have a particular description of these aromatic spices. Moses was commanded to take myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia, and to mix them up with olive oil, to make a composition that would diffuse its fragrant odours without the help of fire. The use of this holy ointment was to anoint the tabernacle itself and all its vessels, that they might be holy unto the Lord: and it was able to consecrate the high priest, that he might minister in holy things: and it was strictly forbidden in the law to use it to any other purpose, upon the penalty of death. This holy anointing was to represent what was to be in Christ, and what was to flow to us from him. It was the type and figure of the anointing of the Holy Spirit, which was poured upon him without measure, to consecrate him to the high offices of prophet, priest, and king over the people of God. He is their prophet, to enlighten the blindness of their understanding, and to lead them into all saving truth; their priest, to take away the pollution and guilt of sin; and their king to destroy in them the dominion of sin, and to carry on the divine life in their souls, here in grace, and hereafter in glory. The faithful in the Old Testament expected him in these gracious offices, for which he was to be qualified by the unction from the Holy One; and therefore they made it a matter of their prayers that he would hasten his coming in his three office characters, which they express by that holy anointing, whereby he was constituted and ordained to these offices.

The meaning of the words, from what has been said, appears to be this. The faithful finish this sweet portion of scripture with a prayer. They had experienced so much of Christ's love, that their hearts were entirely set upon further communion; and therefore they beg of him to hasten his coming. In the Old Testament they mean his coming in the flesh; in the New we mean his coming to judgment: but, both to them and us, there is another coming. Christ must come and dwell in our hearts by faith, that we may receive the benefits of his first coming in the flesh, and be prepared for his second coming in glory: for until we have by faith a clear view of our interest in him, how can we take up the words of the text and say, Make haste, O thou beloved Jesus, and for the elects' sake shorten these days of sin and blasphemy. Why is thy chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of thy chariot? Oh! come with all the swiftness of the fleetest roe, or wild deer, to fulfil whatever remains of scripture not completed; especially, come to fulfil what is written of the sacred offices to which thou wast anointed, and by which thou art to make us an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing unto God. Thus come, Lord Jesus, as our prophet and priest, and set up thy kingdom of grace in every one of our hearts, that we may love thy appearing, and pray thee to hasten thy kingdom of glory.

Upon this state of the doctrine there are two practical truths offered to our serious consideration.

First, the prayer for Christ's coming. And Secondly, the reason upon which the prayer was grounded.

And First, As to his coming at the last day, it is as certain as that he came in the flesh in the fulness of time. From the certainty of the fact, the faithful were led to pray for it. And can you, my brethren, join in their prayer? Do you desire from your hearts that Christ should soon come in all his glory to judgment? Are you preparing and looking out for it as an event that may not be far off? If you are, then you are safe. But if you are not, examine carefully what is the reason. Why cannot you pray along with the faithful for Christ's speedy coming to judgment? Surely you do not doubt of the fact? That he will come to judge the world, is as certain as that he did come, at the fixed time, to judge the Jewish nation: "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ." The matter of fact, upon scripture principles, is undeniably clear and certain. Why, then, are you not so prepared for it as to make it the subject of your prayers? Is it because you put it at a great distance, and therefore think yourselves safe? Consider attentively what the scripture says upon this point. Our Lord has given us several marks and signs of his coming, by which we might know as certainly when it was at hand as we could know, when the fig-tree puts forth her green figs, that summer is nigh. There were to be wars and rumours of wars, pestilences, earthquakes in divers places, very little true faith left upon the earth, and yet as great security among careless sinners as there was in the days of Noah, when the flood came and swept them all away. Do you think these cannot be the forerunners of our Lord's speedy coming, because there always have been such things in the world? But when all these signs are at once upon the earth, and in a manner they never were before, then they become loud calls to an immediate preparation. Were there ever greater wars, or more rumours of wars? Has not an uncommon pestilence raged among the cattle for several years in this and in other countries? Were there ever such earthquakes, so universal, and of so long continuance, as have been for some years past? And does not the present state of the world, as to religion, greatly resemble our Lord's description of the men upon whom that day shall come unawares as a thief in the night

And when could the account which St. Paul gives us in several of his epistles, of the men of the latter times, be more true than it is at present? Have they not the name and form of Christianity without the power of it? Are they not worldly minded, sunk into carnal security, and so entirely influenced by the love of pleasure, that the love of God, and of the things of God, is not only waxed cold, but quite frozen up? Was there ever any age wherein our Lord's words could be more strictly fulfilled? "When the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith upon the earth?" By these signs our Lord is alarming a sinful world with notices of his speedy coming; and if sinners are not at all alarmed, but continue still secure in their sins, this is a scripture proof that he will soon come as a thief in the night and surprise them: for when they shall say, "Peace and safety, then sudden destruction shall come upon them, and they shall not escape."

But still you do not see the signs of his coming so clearly as to be convinced of the necessity of being immediately prepared. If it be at all necessary to be prepared, it is certainly necessary to be prepared immediately: for you cannot be sure, at any time, that he will not come; and therefore you should be at all times ready for his coming. Suppose he should come in a day that ye look not for him; what would your eternal condition be? What if he should surprise you in your sins; have you no apprehension about your danger? Who amongst you could dwell with the devouring fire? Who amongst you could dwell with the everlasting burnings? And suppose he should not come; yet, if he send death to surprise you, it is the same thing. If you die unpardoned, you are lost for ever: for it is written, "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God." So that, put our Lord's coming as far off as you please, yet you cannot put death off. And there is the same preparation necessary for the one as for the other. You must be turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; you must be justified and sanctified, before you are fit either to meet death or judgment. And if you have no knowledge of Christ's being your Saviour, it is the same thing to you as if there was no Saviour: for if you are not united by faith to Christ, he is no Christ to you, according to the saying of the first reformers, that "An unapplied Christ is no Christ." Therefore, my beloved brethren, if you have any real love for your own souls, if you indeed prefer everlasting joys to endless torments, seek for pardon and peace from the hands of Jesus Christ, who has them to give; that, having received them from him, you may be able with true faith to use the prayer in the text, and for the same reason the faithful here used it; namely, from your experience of your interest in Christ; which is the second practical point in the text I was to apply.

They pray to Christ to hasten his coming; which they earnestly requested, because they had clear evidence of his being their loving Saviour. He first loved them, and made them sensible of his love; therefore they loved him. And having a sure interest in the present graces of his salvation (for they were in possession, and had actual enjoyment of them) they knew that they should at his second coming share in the blessings of his eternal kingdom: for which reason they offered up to him the prayer of faith, requesting him to come quickly—Make haste, my beloved, and may we soon see thee manifest in the flesh, making an atonement for sin and bringing in everlasting righteousness: and when thou hast, by obeying, suffering, dying, and rising again, fulfilled the law and the prophets, oh hasten thy second coming. Let all things be forwarded that are to go before it. Finish the number of thine elect, Jews and Gentiles, and then come in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Now, my brethren, do you pray thus for Christ's second coming? Can you make it, do you make it, the daily subject of your prayers? Being assured that Jesus is your Saviour, have you no fear of him as your Judge? Are you so entirely delivered from fear, that you love his appearing, as the day of the Lord's great glory, when he will be glorified in the destruction of all his enemies, and glorified much more in the eternal salvation of all his saints?

Perhaps some of you may think that it savours of enthusiasm for a man to pretend to be so certain of Christ's love as to pray for his coming to judgment. Let us hear, then, what the scripture says. The faithful in the text desire Christ to make haste; and upon this motive they ground their prayer, that he was their beloved: but they could not have urged him to make haste for this reason, unless they had been certain of their interest in him. If he had not been their beloved, they could not have made their hopes of meeting him soon the subject of their prayers; but every one could say for himself, "My beloved is mine, and I am his:" and knowing that they were his, and belonged to him—knowing this from the work of grace which was in them, from the abiding witness of the Spirit, and from the long and sweet communion which they had enjoyed with their beloved Jesus—they therefore prayed him to make haste—to hasten his first and second coming. And if this be enthusiasm, it is not peculiar to this portion of scripture. It runs through the whole volume as well as through the Song. All the patriarchs, as well as Abraham, desired to see Christ's day. Moses prayed earnestly for it, and was honoured with the sight of it, as Abraham was. God showed it to them in a vision; but he did not vouchsafe the same to many prophets, and kings, and righteous men, although they earnestly desired to see it. The Psalms and the prophetical writings are full of petitions to Christ, praying him to come to the salvation of his people; and the New Testament abounds with the like petitions. It is said of believers, that they love their Lord's appearing: they love it and make it the subject of their prayers, because they know it will be a happy event for them. Daily are they looking up to him, and praying, "thy kingdom come," and beseeching him, in the words of our church, "shortly to accomplish the number of his elect, and to hasten his kingdom."

Thus, it is so far from being enthusiasm to love Christ's appearing, that it is one of the plain truths of scripture, clearly taught and strongly enforced in numerous passages both of the Old Testament and of the New; and it is a doctrine received by our church, and made use of in her liturgy. And certainly, my brethren, you will not oppose a truth confirmed by so many proofs! This would be acting a very irrational part, and would be a clear sign of your being under great guilt: for it would prove you to be without the least sense of that love which you oppose. If you had ever seen your want of that love, had ever been seeking it, or had ever tasted of it, you could not deny there is such a thing as loving Christ, because he first loved you. This is a received truth in scripture. In the Song it is taken for granted throughout; and in the New Testament it is expressly asserted; "We have known, say some, the love that God hath to us." And another declares, "Jesus Christ loved me, and gave himself for me." And we may still know this by the very same means by which they knew it; viz. by the Holy Ghost's shedding abroad the love of God in our hearts. Until he shed it abroad in your hearts you cannot join the faithful in the text, and pray with them for Christ's coming; because, if you love him not, how can you love his appearing? You cannot call him your beloved; and therefore you have no interest in him. Consider and examine whether this be a desirable state to live in, and to die in. What is it to be without Christ? Is it not to be aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, to have no hope, and to be without God in the world? This is the scripture account of your dangerous condition. And does not it alarm you? If it does, fly to Christ, and he will give you to taste of his pardoning love. If it does not, may he send his good Spirit to convince you what it is to be without Christ, that you may feel the misery of it in time, and therefore may seek to be happy with him in eternity.

If, then, the same spirit be in you which was in the faithful in the text, you will be able to take up their words, and to speak them with their faith. You will have such a clear view of your interest in the beloved Jesus, that the thoughts of his coming soon to judgment will be matter of joy and delight; and this will furnish you with the best comment upon the Song. The experience of Christ's love makes it plain and easy: for he that has this love in his heart will not be much at a loss to understand what is here written of it. He is not like a novice, who begins to learn the first principles of some art or science; but he is a great proficient. He has been taught of God, and has received a practical and experimental knowledge of the subject of this book. It treats of the believer's happiness in being united to Christ; and he is united to Christ, and finds himself happy in that union: for he knows the love which Christ has to his soul; and he has received many clear scripture marks and evidences of it. The Holy Spirit has shed abroad the love of Christ in his heart; and he loves Christ, because he knows Christ first loved him. He loves God the Father, who is now his reconciled Father, and he loves and delights to do his will. He loves the Lord's day, his ordinances, his people, and, in short, he loves every thing that God loves. He has indeed in his heart that love of which this book treats; and his own experience daily opens and explains it so clearly, as if it had been written for his particular use, and was a copy of God's dealings with his soul. He finds that nearness to God which is here described. He has much sweet communion with him in prayer. In time of temptation, or affliction, he can go boldly to the throne of grace. Faith gives him boldness and access with confidence: for he is assured that, whatever he asks in his Saviour's name, he shall receive. When he hears or reads the word, he can mix faith with it; and he is enabled to grow thereby. And when he goes to the Lord's supper, he finds that Christ is still present at his own table, and makes himself known in breaking of bread. He finds a nearness to Christ, and enjoys sweet fellowship with him in all the ordinances. He lives in his presence, is led by his Spirit, and partakes of his comforts. In short, he is united to Christ intimately and vitally, as a member of the body is to the head, or as the branches are to the vine, or as the bread is to the eater, or as the building is to the foundation: for under these, and several such like images, the scripture describes the union there is between Christ and the believer. Our church, speaking of it, says, That believers are one with Christ, and he with them; that they dwell in Christ, and Christ in them. Surely, then, they that are thus closely united to Christ will know the most of this book, and will be the best commentators on it: for it is not a sealed book to them. The subject-matter is to them plain and open. Daily experience gives them clearer views of its sweetness and fulness; and every step they advance in the divine life affords them fresh occassion to bless and praise God for this comfortable portion of his holy word.

My brethren, if you are united to Christ in the bonds of love, you know that these things are true: but if you have not his love in your heart, nor desire it, you are not fit to read the Song: for you cannot understand it. A deaf man is as good a judge of a fine piece of music as you are of a treatise upon that love of which you never had a taste. The Song is a book of experience, describing Christ's love to his people, and the happiness they have in the sense of his love: but if you have no sense of it, how can you understand what is here written concerning it? If you should take it up and read it, having never had any fellowship with the Father nor the Son by the bond of the Spirit, it will appear to you an unintelligible piece of jargon. The English translation would be as dark and mysterious as the original Hebrew, which you do not understand: for it is a sealed book until the Holy Spirit open its meaning; but all becomes plain and clear when he sheds abroad in the heart that love of which it treats; and the more he gives you to taste of the love of Christ, the plainer and sweeter will the book grow in your esteem.

My Christian friends and brethren, you know these things to be true from your own experience. You set a great value upon this sweet portion of scripture, and desire to see the depths and heights of it: they will open more fully to your view if you pray for more love and nearer communion with Christ. And if any of you, my brethren, have been prevailed upon to seek for the happy experience of Christ's love, you are ready to join your hearts with mine to pray to him for a blessing on these discourses. And as to you who have not been stirred up to seek, you stand in great need of our prayers; and we will offer them up for you. May he that heareth prayer hear and answer!

We humbly beseech thee, O thou God of love, to bring into the way of truth all those who have erred and are deceived concerning this portion of thy divine word. Remove all their prejudices. Show the natural man, the ridiculer, and the unbeliever, that they want the love of which it treats. Convince them, blessed Jesus, that thy love can make them happy, and nothing else can. Let them feel their guilt and their danger, while the love of earthly and sensual enjoyments hinders their seeking for thy spiritual and heavenly joys. And may thy good Spirit shed abroad the love of God in the hearts of all those who are seeking it, that they may find this portion of scripture verified in their own souls, and daily fulfilled in their own experience. Oh that we may all know more of the love of God, and taste and see how gracious the Lord is. May we enjoy that fellowship and communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ which will explain to our understandings and apply to our hearts all the comforts of this divine treatise. So be it, Lord Jesus, to the praise of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah; to whom the church militant and triumphant gives equal honour, and worship, and glory, now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

WRITTEN BY THE

REV. WILLIAM ROMAINE, A.M.

TO THE HON. AND REV. W. B. C.

LETTER I.

June 15, 1782.

My dear Friend.—Our Lord has been showing you some tokens of his singular regard for you. Whom he loveth, he takes pains with. He has been trying you with his rod: the trial on his part was altogether love, and graciously intended for your improvement: "I will feed them, says the good shepherd, with the rod."—Strange food to reason and sense, but rendered truly nourishing to faith. It learns to feel what sin, exceeding sinful sin, is. The smart says, "Sin deserves ten thousand times more than this;" the smart continues, "Jesus, Lord, thy will be done; only let faith and patience have their perfect work, that I may love thee for mortifying the life of sense:" the disorder abates—"O dear Saviour, keep me humble and thankful, that I may so cleave to thee with full purpose of heart, as to be dying daily to other objects, and be more alive to thee. As the pain drove me to thee, may the removing it keep me nearer to thee, so that I may practically learn to set the Lord always before me." These and many other improvements, I hope, followed your late visitation. It was sent to yield you the peaceable fruits of righteousness; yea, a harvest of blessings. May they be rich and ripe to the glory of the Giver!

These sentiments were upon my mind, and I could not help sending them to you, although my writing was upon another occasion. A friend of mine offered, last year, to bring me to R——; but, as we did not return to London, we refused his favour: this year we accept it. I am thankful for your great assistance to the Bible Society. If it be quite agreeable to you that I should once more recommend that blessed book in your pulpit, I am ready. We wait for your answer, and for your fixing a Sunday: the sooner the better for us, if convenient for you. Mrs. R. desires kind remembrance. I am, with brotherly love in our common Lord, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER II.

Brislington, Sept. 3, 1783.

Dear Friend and Brother.—Mrs. Romaine desired me to convey the enclosed to you, with her respects to Mrs. C.; with which I very gladly complied, that I might have an opportunity of acknowledging your great kindness to me during the long visit which I paid you at R——. You may continue the favour, though we be absent, by daily remembrance of me in your prayers. I have nothing beyond these to ask of any one; and I am particularly happy in believing that I have many (Mr. C. among them) who interest themselves for me in this way. Do your best; be fervent; continue instant; persevere: you will not soon get out of my debt.

I have just finished my reading of the Bible for 1783. It has been a season of great teaching. I never went through it with more delight or with more profit. My soul has found it more precious than gold, and it is really sweeter than honey. But still I see much before me to be learned and to be experienced. I do not doubt of the promise being fulfilled to me, Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; but I am seeking and waiting for its being engraven deeper in my heart, and more fairly copied out in my life. Oh that the Lord, the Spirit, may cast you and me into the mould of the word, that we may take the impression of every truth, and receive it in the love of it. I have put down my observations on this year's reading, and perhaps you may see them the next time we meet.

Mrs. R. with cordial respects to you and Mrs. C. and to our common friend Mrs. T. joins

W. Romaine.

LETTER III.

Nov. 29, 1783.

My dear Friend.—I have been out of town this week, and could not take earlier notice of your letter. If I may advise, I would by no means employ any body out of R. Many, many, reasons offer themselves to me. As it is quite necessary to enlarge the church, begin in faith and in the prayer of faith. As to the money, it is forthcoming. I have not had an opportunity to mention it to any body, but you need not doubt of its being raised. Get your plan and your estimate, and then communicate it to your friends. Do me the honour to put me down for one of your subscribers and collectors; and, when the gallery is finished, send for me, and I will consecrate it for you. At present, I will follow your design with my prayers, that the great head of the church would approve of it and bless it. Every good wish to you and your partner. Remember us to our old friend Mrs. T., whose heart rejoices with mine to see St.—— so highly favoured. I am, with great truth, yours, in the best bonds,

W. Romaine.

LETTER IV.

Dec. 5, 1783.

My dear Friend.—With this comes Mr. L.; such a man as you want—able and faithful: I have proved him. When you prove him, you will say the same. I do not recommend him for an experienced Christian; but he is worth a thousand of the professors of this day. Go on and prosper in this and in all your other works. We did not forget you yesterday morning, noon, or night. There is a union which sanctifies all others. As the head quickens all the members, so our Head puts his life into all our enjoyments, and he makes our sweets sweeter, and our bitter sweet; only we do not love the taste, or else he would make the bitterest sweetest. When we leave him out of any thing, it is well if we feel it empty or displeasing; and so for wife, children, servants, parish, indeed for every thing, we must put him in, if we get any good out of it. My congratulations have been made to him, and my prayers also, that he would bless your connexion, and turn your water into wine. You know what that is: and it is his standing miracle.

Our true love, Mrs. Romaine's and mine, to Mrs. C and yourself. Remember us to Mrs. T. She is a wonderful monument of mercy. To dine at the vicarage! Well—what cannot our God do? Pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER V.

Blackfriars, Dec. 23, 1783

Dear Sir.—By favour of Mr. Neucatre, I send my hearty wishes for your meeting the birth of Christ with the spirit of the angels. It was the triumph of their joy that Christ the Lord was born; and yet he was not so nearly related to them as to you and me. But they thought according to God's thoughts; and, as far as they understood them, they admired and adored his inestimable love in taking our nature into union with himself. What a miracle of philanthropy! "Will God in very deed dwell with men" on the earth? O yes! though it puzzled Solomon: yet God's counsels of old are now faithfulness and truth. The Word is incarnate. Glory be to God in the highest! the Peacemaker is come to the earth, and has demonstrated the delight of his Father towards men. Blessed be his witness—that you believe it: blessed be his grace—that you enjoy it: thanks be to his holy name—that you preach it. May your meditations upon it, and your present preaching of it, warm your heart with more than angel's joy. Try to get a note above them; I am sure you ought, notwithstanding they were ἐν ὕψιστοις. I am aiming at it this Christmas, but have not yet attained. And this makes up some of my best praise—what he is to me—and what I am to him. I see and am under such infinite obligations, that I am willing to be in his debt for ever and ever. Even then I shall pay him nothing; or if it be worth any thing, it will be all his own. All my fresh springs of glory, as well as grace, shall be in him.

I could not stop my pen; for he is precious. I hope and pray for his favour on the design, and his blessing on the use of the intended gallery. You must have a faculty—The order of vestry must be sent to Salisbury—Mind, a unanimous vestry. I shall not move in the subscription till matters are settled. But think it not a doubtful point; the money may be easily raised. God bless Mrs. C. this Christmas with his light and his love. I do not forget your neighbour, Mrs. T. I shall not, while she is in the reach of prayer: and when that is done I shall praise him for ever. I entreat you to remember me in your best moments. When the King smiles on you, ask a favour for

W. Romaine.

LETTER VI.

March 5, 1784.

My very dear Friend.—I have two letters of yours before me; one relating to the gallery, which I have much at heart, and shall not be less earnest in collecting for it, although I have at the onset met with two repulses. However, these things only make me the more earnest to do what I can. On some good day, when the Lord smiles, I will go out in his name, and I hope his work will prosper in my hands.

Mr. H. may wait on me whenever he gets the seals: I shall think it an honour to frank him on your recommendation. L—— is a favoured place, in which the Lord delighteth to dwell. He has made himself known there for more than thirty years, to my knowledge. Mr. C. S. was there, and Mr. W. L. was curate there before he came to me. The good seed was sown, and took root. May Mr. H. be a successful labourer, and the Lord's harvest prosper in his hands!

We have begun our hour of prayer from eight to nine on Sunday evenings. I dread what is coming upon this land: I have long read it in the word, and now I see it about to take effect. If nobody stand in the gap, vengeance will find its way. We have pleaded and prevailed. If we cannot this time, and the measure of our iniquities be full, it will however be well with them who are on the side of the Lord and his Christ. Ezekiel ix. None of them who had the mark perished. May we mourn and pray for our sins and others—sigh for the dishonour offered to our almighty Jesus, and to the Spirit Jehovah, and to the word of his grace. Let us do what we can in the way of prayer: and may He who sitteth upon the throne hear and answer my prayers for you and yours especially. Remember

W. Romaine.

LETTER VII.

July 30, 1784.

My very dear Friend.—I received yours by the hand of Mr. L. My service was ready to assist you at the Lock, Aug. 1: the disappointment was not owing to me. Whenever the gallery opens, I hope our Lord will be there to fill it with his glory.

I wish you joy of a troublesome job, from which the Bishop has delivered you. Should it not put your parish in mind of a new church?

We purpose on Monday to set out for the North; in all probability for the last time. I have three sisters alive, all in years as well as myself; and we are to have a family meeting, to take our leave, final as to this life. It has brought a great solemnity upon my spirit; and it would be too much for my feelings if I had not all the reason in the world to believe that our next meeting will be in glory. Mr. Whitfield used often to put me in mind how singularly favoured I was. He had none of his family converted; and my father, and mother, and three sisters were like those blessed people—"And Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus;" and, as they loved him again, so do we. I hope to return about the middle of September, and to visit you soon after.

I am, with Mrs. Romaine's, and my best wishes to Mrs. C., your friend and brother, in our common Lord,

W. Romaine.

The Prince of Peace was very much honoured in this city yesterday. I scarce ever felt so much of his presence in ordinances any day of my life. There was also great outward reverence paid by all, except Quakers.

LETTER VIII.

Monday Evening, Dec. 13, 1784.

My dear Friend.—I have been waiting a long time for news out of Yorkshire relating to the Sunday-schools. I can give you now a full and satisfactory account of them. They have been chiefly useful in the trading parts, where there are great numbers of the manufacturers' children employed, as soon as they can do anything, all the week, but let loose to mischief and wickedness all the Lord's day. It was with a view to prevent this, and also to instruct them in the way of salvation, for their own sakes, and for their parents, and for the public, that several persons, laity as well as clergy, tried to get them together, and teach them to read, write, and learn the catechism. The Lord God has marvellously favoured the plan. He has inclined vast numbers of children to come; the parents in general are thankful; and the schoolmasters and mistresses have given great satisfaction. I know not of any thing more promising for the rising generation, especially as it is made an indispensable part of their Sunday's employment, that they attend the church regularly with their masters and mistresses. Mr. T. informs me of one good effect; that it has been the happy occasion of many conversions, by bringing poor people to see their children at church, who never before came to any place of worship. Others have also been won over to let their children attend by the little presents made to the neighbours' children, and by seeing their improvement in reading and writing. If you are disposed to do something in this way, you have my prayers for success.

I hear you stay Christmas at R. May it be a season of much thankfulness as they sang "glad tidings of great joy." This Advent has brought forth

(Isaiah xl. 1, 2, 3, &c.) verses, to my unspeakable joy. I have trod upon John the Baptist's heels, and have been favoured with some of his views of the Lamb of God. It is a most delightful portion of God's word. Yesterday we had verses 9, 10: "God incarnate, almighty to save." Our next subject is, verse 11. "God incarnate, the good Shepherd, whose love is almighty to bless them." Our kindest respects to Mrs. C. and to yourself. Remember us to Mrs. T. Do not, I charge you, do not cease to pray for

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER IX.

Nov. 26, 1785.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—Methinks I heard a voice, saying, "Weep not for me; but weep for yourselves." However, I could not help weeping for our loss, although we are certain she is entered into rest. The church and people in R—— have a great loss, and none more than yourself; for she really was a mother to you in love, in every good office, and in continual prayer for your person and for your labours. The poor will feel their loss. Her long experience made her wise in the things of God, by which she could teach the ignorant with a meekness quite her own. Her natural temper, sanctified by grace, enabled her frequently to check the spreading of furious zeal and wild separations; both which have had their day, but, I thank God, seem to be dying away at R——. Though we know not the effect of her prayers, yet her Lord is our Lord: he still reigneth; and to him I will make my supplication. He will hear me often before his throne on the same errand. For many years his interest at St. G——'s has been upon my heart. Still I feel it warm: and I hope it will be warmer. When you speak in public upon the occasion of her death, I will be praying him to make it the means of giving life to many dead sinners. The Lord Jesus bless your preaching that day to all who hear it! My feelings are such, that I am sure I could not be able to speak upon the subject. My eyes are running down with tears while I am writing; I do not resist his will: Oh no; I kiss the rod, but I do feel the smart, and shall for some time. God sanctify it; may the Comforter take of the things of Jesus, and with them help us to improve this visitation. May Mrs. C—— profit much, and all of us learn that there is no blessing upon earth but living in the Lord; and then great will be our blessedness when we come to die in the Lord. Mrs. R—— very heartily joins, and begs to be remembered with Yours,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER X.

Jan. 19, 1795.

MY GOOD FRIEND AND BROTHER.—You will please to accept this little book as a small token of my great love for you. If any thing in it appear wrong, or that might be improved, it would be a favour to me if you would mark it; and, if what is right agrees with your experience, thank our divine teacher the Holy Spirit for leading me into the truth, and for keeping me in it, through such a long life, and for the most blessed prospect opened to me when this life shall be ended. May he be with you, and bless you in all your labours, for his glory, according to the warmest wishes of the heart of

W. ROMAINE.

Our love to Mrs. C.

LETTER XI.

Feb. 14, 1795.

My very dear Friend.—I have sent a parcel of two hundred invitations, one for yourself and the other for the printing-office: and I follow them with my prayers that they may be the means of bringing some to pray who do not use it, and some who do, to pray with more faith. The cloud over us is very dark; but prayer can pierce through it, and enter into the ears of the Lord of Hosts. If any good is done, I must thank you for it; because it was from your mentioning it to my son that I set about it.

I am really obliged to you for the offer of your assistance. If you sleep in London, and would preach at St. Dunstan's, Thursday, the 26th, it would be a great favour. If inconvenient then, might I expect you at my own church, on the 24th. I cannot desire both. Please to let me know.

I thank my God; for of him cometh our harmony of sentiments and experience. May he confirm us and establish us yet more and more, that our preaching and living may spread the fame of our Jesus: and you may be blessed in doing both—after he has discharged me. Our respects to Mrs. C., and with great truth, I am, your friend in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XII.

To Sir R. H., Bart.

Nov. 18, 1791.

Honoured Sir.—I do not know that you are returned to England: but if you are, I am sure you have seen enough abroad to endear your native country to you more than ever. It is at present the favourite of Heaven. Our privileges as free men, and as Christians, set us far above the nations of the earth. It is my office to plead with the Lord and Governor of church and state, that we may not be suffered to sin away our distinguishing blessings. I have some interest with a very great Prince, and I am often mentioning you to him, and recommending your case: for he delighteth in mercy. May you know him more than I do, and love him, and delight in him, and every day find him a more, still more, precious Jesus. Oh how marvellous should he be in your eyes—yours are not common favours—that he should vouchsafe to call one of your fortune and rank, should admit you into his friendship, which, I am sure, is heaven upon earth. Oh bless him for what he has done, and pray for greater things yet. Holding the truth in love, may you grow up into him in all things. May your sister and brother partake of the same blessings, is the daily request of your friend and servant in the Lord Christ,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XIII.

Dec. 3, 1791.

My very dear Friend.—I have a long letter from H. full of complaints. I know one whose very soul is delighted with hearing such complaints: for they are the breathings of his own Spirit in the heart of his redeemed, and therefore sent, that Christ may be more necessary, and more precious: but indeed, my friend, you legalize them, and make those things distressing which were only intended to be humbling. The cause of every possible complaint is in you, whether you feel it or not. You have an abyss of corruption: so have I, and perhaps felt it deeper than ever you have or will feel it. But I have a teacher who makes this whole body of sin profitable, and to the increase of my faith, and to the magnifying the grace of my almighty Saviour. My daily lesson is to carry my burden to him, and he carries both me and it: and while we thus go on lovingly together, he often lets me look into the hell within; but he keeps my conscience sprinkled with his atoning blood; and even then I do feel its sovereign virtue to cleanse me from all my sins, if they were ten million times more and greater than they are. Thus believing, yet groaning, under my dreadful load, I hear the Father's testimony, and I honour it: "Thy sins and iniquities will I remember no more."

You met an old saint at Sandwell; and you wished to be in his case. I do not. I suppose you mean F. C. I know him well. I dare not unchristian him. But I thank my God for his leading, I think in a more gospel way, and, I am sure, a safer. Carrying about me a body of sin and death, I groan under it, being burdened; it is my continual plague night and day; it makes me loathe myself, and repent in dust and ashes. Hereby I am kept sensible of my wants, my unworthiness, my helplessness, my vileness: and through grace these things are made useful to bind me closer to my beloved. They render him absolutely necessary to my desperate case, and preach that self-abhorrence which makes Christ very precious. This should be the happy improvement of all the bitter things you write against yourself: in my judgment and experience they make for you. Under the law, they speak guilt and misery. Under the gospel, they magnify the grace and salvation of our God. I observe also that you attend too much, by far, to what others (perhaps professors) say of you: and it brings distress upon you, and hurts your spirits. But they are not your judges; neither are they competent. Thus I read—Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God. God can be with you. God can help you to glorify him by your abiding in your calling. He has promised it. In a cottage in Wales you would be out of your place and duty. You would carry yourself there. Retirement in will-worship would make you feel more the plague of your own heart; and your cottage would be a very hell upon earth; because you had left the station wherein God, and his help, and his comforts, were to be found. Indeed, Sir R. you have no justifiable ground of distress, either from God or man. You know the truth of what I say; but still the effect remains. Your heart is not perfectly settled in the gospel rest. He that settled me, he alone can settle you. There comes in another part of Christian friendship, which I do exercise and am diligent in. The prayer of faith availeth much—to keep you, as you are, still full of complaints, but improving them in a free spirit to the glory of the Saviour; a child of Adam, deserving hell; a believer in Jesus; an heir of heaven. May he keep you by his almighty power till he bring you safe to his promised heaven. Thanks for your many favours, and the love that sends them. Our real love to your sister, brother B., and to the household of faith. Mrs. R. joins

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XIV.

TIVERTON, Sept. 5, 1794.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—The will of the Lord be done! He does all things for the best; and he is teaching you, not only to say it, but also to feel it. I know it; for his compassions fail not. And he will make you sensible that all his dealings with you are in loving-kindness and great tenderness. Look back; see and admire in what a gracious way he has led hitherto all your steps. Oh what distinguishing favours—to call you by his grace—to make you obedient to his call—to teach you his gospel, in a manner vouchsafed to very few—to keep you by his own power for so many years, that you have not fallen, nor disgraced your profession of our most holy faith, and that to this hour he preserves you, waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus unto eternal life! Indeed, my dear sir, these are sovereign blessings; and I verily believe that you are well taught how to apply them on the present occasion: nay, thanks be to him, I have it under your own hand, that he has enabled you to submit to his will. He has taken away a sister; but she is with him. You have lost a friend; but he has found her. She is dead; but she liveth. Oh most blessed change! She is gone from sin and suffering to live with God for ever. I am ready to say, notwithstanding she will be so much missed in your family, from my very heart I praise and worship him, that he has taken her into his heaven and glory. He did it too in a way which was singularly kind to her surviving relations. I mean those hidings of the Lord's loving countenance, and those desertions and darkness, of which she complained.* You cannot think what a great refreshment this was to my spirits, and what a testimony it was of the soundness of her faith and of her experience. On all these accounts, let your sorrow be turned into joy. Survey your mercies, personal: look at your family: where can you show me so many chosen, and called? Let B. speak. Let Mrs. T. speak. Let all that love H. speak, and say, He is good to them indeed; for his mercy to them endureth for ever. Blessings on him! he is good in what he gives. He is good, yea blest of all, in what he takes away. Strew her hearse with praises; and if a tear be shed, let sorrow be turned into joy; for, what we deposit of her, we commit into his care and keeping, who will make it one day shine like his own most glorious body.

I thank him, therefore, for the good news which you sent me: and with my thanks I join my prayers for your profiting from this providence. It warns you to be ready. You are in the last stage of your journey. He can make it the best. He has promised it; and he cannot break his word. He has a marvellous skill, and an equally marvellous love, in making the infirmities of age so many motives to trust him more. Less of sense, more of faith. Less of self, more of Christ. An infirm body, a sound mind. Nature failing, grace reigning, and that unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. May you find every day, and for every thing, that he is with you, keeping your conscience in his peace, your heart in his love, your life in his hands, and your hope in his glory. Whatever interest I have in him, is yours, and I trust he will make the prayer of faith, which is fervent for you, effectual also. Your letter of August 26th did not come to my hands till September 5th. We are in Devonshire, at my wife's sister's, from whence we remove next week to Mr. Ireland's, Bristol, for the remainder of this month. Mrs. R. is not behind me in best wishes for you and B. and Mr. and Mrs. T., if with you. It is no small part of my happiness, that brotherly love continues. I thank him who gave it, who keeps it, who will keep it unto the end. May he bless you with the choicest of his blessings, and give you to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER XV.

Clapham, Sept. 30.

My good Friend.—I was made to believe that I should have the pleasure of seeing you to-day; but I am sadly disappointed. I wanted to thank you for past favours of this year, as well as many before.

I wanted also to inform you, that no person living ever heard me speak a word against M.'s doctrine. As far as I know, he is sound in the faith; and I esteem him for the truth's sake.

It would have been a real favour done me if I had an opportunity personally of wishing you a good journey. The 121st Psalm be your viaticum, fulfilled in every day's travel, and the last verse made good to you as long as you are upon faith's ground, and then for ever. My love to my dear brother B. I hope he has a Hebrew Bible, and will translate the psalm. I set out after church to Clapham. To-morrow we go to Southampton. God be with you, and guide and keep you So prays

W. Romaine.

* After this season of darkness she was enabled to rejoice in God our Saviour, and departed in full assurance of faith.

LETTER XVI.

Feb. 7, 1795.

Dear Sir.—In some former wars this treatise met with your approbation; and it pleased God to own it, and to bless it. At the desire of my friends, I have reprinted it, in hopes it may, through the divine favour, bring his people again upon their knees. You know well that prayer has dispersed blacker clouds than the present: and if we are humbled under his mighty hand, God is never at a loss for ways and means to grant us our requests. Please to communicate this to my brother B., and tell him that I believe he will meet some of the best company in the kingdom, at eight o'clock, on Sunday evening. I am, with great respect, your friend and servant in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XVII.

*To A. S. Esq.

March 14, 1774.

Dear Sir.—I want no argument to convince you of the friendship of Mr. S. to W. R. or vice versâ. I believe it is of his making who ties eternal bonds. Whenever I think of you, I have only one thing to blame myself for; which I am to try to make amends for, the first opportunity I have, in person.

Your letter has warmed my heart with a fresh proof of your friendship. I do not think it right to take any steps in it myself, but leave it to the great Lord.

Poor R.! It is the worst day that town ever saw. But remember, my good friend, neither you nor I love Christ's flock, nor can love them, as he does. I am afraid, the called are called—and the called shall be well taken care of. They cannot perish. Mrs. T. is amazingly supported. But I am running on I know not whither; and Sunday evening people are coming in: my work begins. Adieu! Yours in our dear, common dear Lord,

W. Romaine.

My blessing on your children.

LETTER XVIII.

Tunbridge Wells, July 1, 1774.

My very dear Friend.—I am forced to make my apology for not coming to appointment. I shall not be in town till the 10th instant. God willing, I shall call at K. on the 11th, and shall be happy to meet with you. Do not forget to pray for

W. Romaine

LETTER XIX.

May 5, 1777.

My very dear Friend.—The great breadth of the Atlantic Ocean, nor long distance, nor my not hearing from you, can keep you and me asunder What

* This Correspondent first heard Mr. Romaine on Luke i. 74, 75, in March 1762; but their personal acquaintance did not commence till late in the year 1764. From this period, to the year 1774, both living in or near London, there was no occasion for epistolary communication. Upon the departure of this Correspondent from the metropolis to America, and then on his return to the country, the letters which follow, among others, were written to him by the author.

a wonderful attraction is there in Christian love! I have fellowship with you in spirit, though far absent in body: and in such a bond as no nearness of flesh can tie. Your concerns are mine. I feel them. I rejoice with you. I mourn with you. I pray with you. I meet you at one throne. Our mutual requests are poured into one bosom. His eyes, his heart, are upon us both. He sends my prayers for you back with increasing love to you, and to him for it. Such a friend is our Jesus! Who is like him? By his magnetical virtue, two persons, distant thousands of miles, can have a fellow-feeling. And by means of their common interest in him, they can do one another the very best services: for his Spirit actuates all his members; who, by their oneness with the head, are sensible of their mutual pains and pleasures, as our members in the body are. The nerves all over in contact: and if one member be affected with pain or pleasure, all the members feel with it. I reckoned this my privilege. Among the number (and I trust it is not small) who are wishing you all blessings, I have the honour to be among the foremost, and will yield only to one. My thoughts often turn upon your present situation: distant from your wife and children, far from your friends, separate from your worldly connexions; these do not excite pleasing sensations. But I am chiefly affected for your distance from the ark and ordinances. Does this grieve you? There was one in the wilderness of Judah in your case. Happy should I be, if his sentiments should be yours. Excuse my jealousy over you: for indeed it is a godly jealousy. Turn to the 63rd Psalm: and may the breathing of your heart be like his!

I meet with many people who say, they never saw such a need of this petition as at present. Grant us peace in our time, O Lord. I keep on praying; but the cloud does not disperse. It is still thick, black, and lowering. The storm gathers, and threatens a wide-spread ruin. This makes me pray more earnestly I would be found among the holy mourners, deeply concerned, not only for mine own sins, but for theirs also which have brought down the just wrath of heaven. Sin is the cause of our present suffering. Judgment is gone forth; and if there be no turning from sin, judgment will continue: yea, if there be hardness in sin under judgment, it is not only the forerunner of greater misery, but is also a part of the sentence executed. Oh what a prospect does this give me of American misery! What can be worse than they be, left as they are to themselves? God seems to let them alone. He has done with them. Hence they are given up to blindness and hardness. They see not, they fear not, their certain ruin. There is not a word in all the book so fearful in my view as what I see now fulfilling—Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone.

Thus dark is the prospect, looking at America: but, thank God! we have a brighter scene. The great King over all the earth is manifesting wondrous care for England, in which we rejoice. His church flourishes—many young ministers come out—more coming—a great awakening still, all over our land—some successful attempts towards a general reformation—much prayer and supplication for our turning, as a people, to the Lord—signs of the good-will of God to his church and people, and earnests, I hope, of better things provided for us.

I could not avoid this opportunity of testifying my regard for you; Mrs. S. having promised to enclose this note in her packet. It comes with all prayer for you, and is loaded with a ship-load of good wishes from me and mine. You will give me credit, and believe me to be, in the best bonds, yours,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XX.

Bradford, Wilts, Oct. 20, 1777.

My good Friend.—I do not forget you, nor yours. I have you on my heart in prayer, and have been recommending Mrs. S. in her time of need. Let me hope she is the living mother of a living child, and one of our kingdom, which is the only thing worth being born for. Our excursions are over for this year; and we purpose to dine with Mrs. Talbot next Tuesday The sight of you would add much to the entertainment, if it could be, and convenient. If we may not expect that favour, I should be glad to hear from you. It is a great prize to meet with a real friend, and a greater still to meet with an approved one. A friend of Christ's making is better still; because he makes everlasting friends.

I am still on my knees before him. He does not cast out my petition: but we are not yet fit for victory and success. His end in chastising is in a great measure answered in his own family. They are humbled. They own the rod is righteous. But he will smite harder, till sinners feel it. The lofty looks of this nature will be humbled. If it be but as Ahab, it will bring Ahab's mercy. However, I pray on, and I do not, I cannot, despair. Common means fail: then is God's time. Till it come, may we wait and trust.

Our love to your dear partner—and my blessing on all your offspring. Do not forget, in your best moments,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XXI.

Dec. 22, 1779.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I need not tell you that I have you always upon my heart. At this time I am praying for you, that you may be kept very hungry and thirsty after Christ—among them whom he pronounces blessed, and whom he will make blessed. It is a sign of health to have a good appetite. There is no better evidence of our having tasted that the Lord is gracious than still to be waiting on him for the bread of life and for the water of life. And he does truly nourish us when we feel the manna sweet, and the Spirit refreshes our hearts with it. Then that meat is not light bread, but a delightful feast; and the cup of salvation is full, yea runneth over with blessings. May these be the choicest of your Christmas fare! and to make you more willing than ever to sit down with the Lord at his royal table, may the ear of faith hear him speak to you all the twelve days of the feast, yea all the twelve months of the year! Eat, my friend; drink, yea, drink abundantly, my beloved. None more welcome than Mr. and Mrs. S. He would have you to be free, and to take your fill. The meat is from heaven, and feeds the heavenly life. The drink sobers. The more you take of it, the more it will deaden your senses to earthly joys; and it will render spiritual joys more spiritual: for it comes from heaven, and tastes of heaven; and it is indeed a fountain of water springing up into everlasting life. In his name I invite you this Christmas; and out of some of his love I wish you to share with us in those blessings. If not present in person, I hope you will be with us in spirit at our banquet: and so to live upon Christ, with his redeemed, as to say with them—He is a feast of fat things—all delights in one. Blessed be our matchless Immanuel, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things: and blessed is his glorious name, not only at Christmas, but for ever: and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. Amen and Amen.

I send you some of my remarks on the year 1779, as they occur in my memorandum book. If you can add to them any fresh matter of praise in your observations, it will be a very acceptable present at Blackfriars.

Answers to prayer in the year 1779.

Encouragements to pray on in the year 1780.

Providences appear in favour of England.

I. A very plentiful harvest, and fine weather to get it in, all over the kingdom.

II. Delightful season in Autumn—fruitful in grass, and favourable for the seed-time.

III. The camps remarkably healthy, even to their time of breaking up, although it was late in the year.

IV. Invasions threatened, and attempted, at Guernsey, at Plymouth, but without success.

V. All our fleets brought safe home.

VI. The enemies either taken by us, dispersed and destroyed by storms, or rendered useless by sickness.

VII. The enemies at home as violent as ever, but restrained by him who set bounds to the raging of the sea.

VIII. The blessing of God on our arms in Asia; so great, that not one enemy left in the East Indies.

IX. Providences against France. 1st. They neglected their trade. 2nd. Imprisoned all their sailors on board their ships of war. 3rd. Crowded them also with soldiers. 4th. Hence our great success in privateering. 5th. The hand of God against the French, in visiting their fleets. And 6th. Armies with sickness, by which more have died than many battles could have destroyed. And 7th. Against them in the hurricane at Martinico.

X. Providences against Spain. 1st. Infatuated by French councils to act against their own interest. 2nd. Against every Christian principle in favouring the American rebellion. 3rd. Suffer for it in their miscarrying in their attempt to take our eight Indiamen. 4th. In their siege of Gibraltar. 5th. And in the loss of many rich ships. And 6th. In the loss of Omoa, as reported in the Saturday's Gazette.

XI. Providences against America. 1st. In their attempt against Penobscot. 2nd. In their public distresses. 3rd. In their dissensions. 4th. In their paper currency. 5th. In their loss of all vital religion. And 6th. In their present despair on the victory over the French arms and fleet.

N. B. I have a brighter view still to give of God's answer to prayer in spirituals; but my paper fails. Surely God is on our side. He has done great things for us, without our fleets and armies. To him be all the glory. Prayer and praise must go together the next year. Much prayer will afford matter for much praise. Remember in both

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXII.

March 18, 1780.

My very dear Friend.—I do not follow impulses, as you very well know; but I cannot resist the present: night and day, it is upon my mind: my heart runs upon it; and when I would have other thoughts, this will intrude and come uppermost. It will be some relief to me to give it vent, and perhaps answer all my wishes in communicating it to you; for I must inform you that you are the person concerned, and it is in your power to grant me my heart's desire. Ought you not to write up over your door, Deus nobis hæc otia fecit? and should it not engage your most serious attention? How shall I employ these horæ solitariæ most and best to the glory of my God, and, as far as he pleases, to enable me to promote the interest of his dear people? I think you was not sent to M— for nothing. Outward causes we look beyond. His hand hath certainly done it. Well, then, come forward. When you know your call, be ready. Here I am: send me: what is the will of my Lord? He has given me leisure: my capacity, be it what it may, is his sovereign gift. "And the right use of it is also of his sovereign grace. What would my Lord have me to do, in order to show forth his praise?"

I can answer for you, that these are your sentiments—I am certain they are. And will you give me leave to point out what appears to me a most profitable and a most seasonable improvement of this gracious opportunity? I suppose you are now and then thanking that great and good Saviour, who had led you to glorify his name and his offices, and had enabled you to bear a noble testimony for his Godhead in this day of blasphemy. In such seasons of gratitude, does it not sometimes occur to you, that you were assisted in this work by him who leadeth into all truth? Indeed, Sir, you are under marvellous obligations—the greatest which can possibly be—to the Lord God, the Holy Ghost. You owe him more than you can ever repay—more than you can ever count up. Your returns, the most grateful, are but acknowledgments; and these are also his gifts. What, if you was to sit down and try to estimate your debt—consider who he is—what he does in the spiritual world—what he has done for you and in you—will do as long as you have your being—resolve all this in your mind—pray him to impress it deep upon your heart: the consequence, I verily believe, will be, that the blessings derived from him are infinite, and your obligations such as demand everlasting praise. With a heart warmed with these views, you could not be able to resist the dictates of gratitude. You would look up and say, May the Spirit of wisdom and revelation assist me to treat of his true and essential divinity—His scripture names, Holy Spirit—Jehovah, Lord, God, Almighty—Attributes—Works—Offices—Spirit of Life—Lord and Giver of life—Continuer of it—Giver of all grace, faith, hope, love, loving obedience, patient suffering—Leader into all truth—A Witness for Jesus—Glorifier of Jesus—Sanctifier of all the elect people of God, who abideth with them for ever—The Comforter—The Advocate—The Strengthener—The taker of the things of Jesus, who ἀνάγγελει, makes them clear and plain.

Here is work for you! May he fit you for it with good will and power! My prayers shall follow my advice. And may he put it into your heart, as I trust he has into mine. The blessing of the Blesser of all nations be with you and with Mrs. S. and all your children. I entreat you never to forget

LETTER XXIII.

June 13, 1780

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—The only design of my writing to you is, to fulfil my promise. The first visit we paid this summer was to be in ——. The time is come, if agreeable to you, next week, on Monday or Tuesday: your answer, early, will be a great favour. Having many, many things to say afresh on the old subject—the evil of sin, and the blessedness of grace, they must be reserved to our walks in your retirement. Pray for us. We want your prayers more than ever. I do not forget Mrs. S. and all yours. Remember me and mine, who are in bonds of real love, your true servants,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XXIV.

June 19, 1780

DEAR SIR.—O how uncertain are human hopes! I was to have been in —— at the time I am writing this; but I could not attain my wish. The effects of the late troubles begin to be felt; Mrs. P. died of the mob last Saturday. I am obliged, at her request, to stay to preach her funeral sermon. Perhaps somebody may soon preach mine; my house and life are both threatened; but my Lord ruleth over all. I desire to live and die by the faith of the Son of God. How he pleases to dismiss me, when, and where; not my will, Lord, but thine be done! If I am permitted to see you in the flesh, I can tell you of persons and things, at which both your ears will tingle. If I cannot get to you soon, I would gladly convey your manuscript, with my imprimatur, if I knew of any conveyance. I am really with you in the Spirit. Every blessing of the covenant be with Mrs. S. Remember me, called at last, to the hardest service. Pray for

BLACKFRIARS, Aug. 30, 1780.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I hope this will reach you to-morrow morning, Aug. 31, to be my harbinger. God willing, I shall follow it to your house on Wednesday, and, if all things favour, be with you before two o'clock. I am still at prayers, waiting for a favourable answer, which I expect soon. My comfort is, amidst all confusions—The Lord reigneth: the government is on his shoulders, and well managed. He has but one simple plan: he intends his own glory, and makes all things work together under him to promote it; with which his people's good is inseparably connected. I have many things to say, but trust to get time to tell you how much I am in the best bonds, yours for Jesus' sake,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XXVI.

Sept. 18, 1780

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I long to see you face to face, and, if you have no other engagements, the time is near: we hope to dine with you at two o'clock this day se'nnight, 25th instant. If all be agreeable, give us a line to put us in spirits: not that I want them about any thing, except our ride. In such storms, we must repose ourselves in our pilot's skill and power: his ark is safe, and all embarked in it will get to their desired port. But I feel for them who are at present tossed with us in the storm, but not in the same keeping of his almighty love. To them I preach. For them I pray. Oh that they may see their danger, and get into the ark, before they perish: but I reserve these things for conversation. Mrs. R. joins in every good prayer to Mrs. S. and yourself, with your very much obliged, and faithful friend,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XXVII.

Nov. 3, 1780.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—We have a sort of correspondence; but it is through others, and a good deal in signs and dumb show: and yet we discover one another's mind, but not clearly and distinctly. When we are at Mr. S.'s, he has a daughter who was once dumb, and is still deaf; but she has learned to speak, and converses with us: sometimes she cannot understand us, and then we are forced to write our mind to her. I am in the same situation at present.

Your present studies are much upon my heart. May that ever blessed person to whom they relate deign to favour and smile upon them. Among his other high styles and titles, there is one divinely glorious, which has greatly employed my thoughts, and affected my heart of late; viz. "the Spirit of adoption:" the received meaning of which is, taking a stranger into the family, and giving him the privilege of a son. This is, among men, a matter of pure favour: and it increases in value according to the greatness of the estate hereby conveyed. When the Adopter has thus raised a poor beggar, he may enrich him with a princely fortune; but he cannot give him the temper and affection of a dutiful child. The adopted may prove ungrateful; he may abuse the favour, mis-spend the fortune, and be worse for the adoption. But it is quite otherwise when God gives his Spirit: he, at the same time, creates spiritual life in the adopted son, unites him by his almighty power to Jesus, and thereby enables him to live by faith, in and on Jesus; through whom he knows and finds the Father's love: thus he forms the son for the family. He lives as Christ does—has the mind of Christ—judges of things as Christ does, Eph. i.—has the same affections, as 1 John v. 1, 2, 3.—has the same relations with Christ, as John xvii.—has the same inheritance, Rom. viii.—and for the same duration, Acts xxvi. 17, 18. Eph. i. 14. In this view, the Spirit of adoption bestows the highest dignity a creature can possibly receive—united by one Spirit to Immanuel, and in him united to the Father, and thereby capable of enjoying the greatest happiness of which any creature can possibly partake, even to be a partaker of the divine nature.

In meditating upon this subject, may our sentiments be the same with the apostle, 1 John iii. 1, 2, 3, and our experience like his.

I desire to be remembered by you on all propitious occasions. When prayer is fervent, and brotherly love active, recommend to the King's especial favour and grace

W. ROMAINE,
And all his.

LETTER XXVIII.

BLACKFRIARS, Jan. 31, 1781.

DEAR SIR.—My silence has been owing to a sore finger, which has for some months hindered me from writing at all; at present it is with pain. I have seen the outside of Mr. H.'s publication; but have no desire to take one view within. I wish to keep to my motto—Homo sum unius libri; of which, the more I read, the more I long to read: it is always new, always instructing, always delightful. In books I converse with men; in the Bible I converse with God. That most blessed Spirit, of whom you are writing, speaks with the word to my heart; and then I look up, and entreat him to get himself glory from you and your labours. In this sweet intercourse I am often present at ——. I pay you frequent visits in your study, and rejoice in beholding the advancement of the work. When I see you hard and industrious in your writing, I cannot help praying the Holy Ghost to inspire your thoughts, and to give you the pen of a ready writer. What, if you are laid aside for a little while, and kept out of your line of life; may it not be of mercy, that you may have leisure to improve in self-knowledge? O blessed retirement, if it prove the means of leading you to devote your time and talents to the service of that God, who has conferred such favours upon you! He has given you life—life from the dead. What is that mercy? Who can tell? It passeth knowledge. He has given you the Spirit of life, who has been teaching you to live upon the fulness of Immanuel. He has been testifying of that fulness to you, and, I hope, enabling you to glorify it in word and in deed. His gracious office herein is one of the most interesting views which we can take of his and of the Saviour's love as represented, John xvi. 14, 15—a favourite text of mine, on which I have preached many times. If you look to the Greek, you will consider the word ἀνάγγελει, translated to show a very gross mistake: it belongs to the ear, and not to the eye—not to seeing, but to speaking—to the word which, preached clearly, begets faith, and which, believed, nourishes faith, and, as faith increases, glorifies still more that fulness of Jesus, out of which comes every grace and blessing. Hence the word is often used in the New Testament for preaching the gospel, by which the testimony of the Spirit is received, and the fulness of Jesus glorified and made use of. I would render the word—He shall clearly declare or preach, and so manifest the things of Christ, that they shall become the object of faith, and hope, and love. I could write a volume on this most gracious office of the Spirit. May you see it in my light, or rather in his own light; and let it shine before men. The winter is retiring. Already the aconite proclaims the genial influence of the returning light. And yet I have not visited, as it was intended, Reading friends, and St. Giles's pulpit: but it has not been in my power, as you shall hear by and by. A new member, I trust, born of your family into ours. God bless him! My love and Mrs. R.'s to the mother. My finger aches; and when you see where the sore has been, and is still, you will wonder how I can write at all. Farewell, and pray for

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XXIX.

June 2, 1781.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I am not master of my time, nor of myself: London is my prison; for I cannot do what I would. When I have set me down to read your papers, presently a knock: "Sir, you are wanted:" and this, again and again. At last, I resolved to get a little way out of town; which I did this week, and, being quite alone, I have had leisure to go through them My remarks upon them are so many, and so material, that what I have put down can be of little use unless I can be with you two or three days. My lectures finish July 1:—my life may before. God sparing it, I would make my first excursion to ——. I send you so long notice, that, when it is fixed, nothing may hinder our meeting. Let us know as soon as you conveniently can, that we may order our matters accordingly. Time is short: working time for God shorter still. May we do his will in our places, glorify him in word and deed; and, when activity ceases, glorify him in simple dependence. It is but right you should leave a testimony under your own hand of his unspeakable love to you, and more so in this blasphemous generation. After I have communicated my thoughts to you, I shall gladly give my imprimatur to the blessed truths which you have written. Mrs. R.'s love to our old friend Mrs. S. My blessing on your children. I am just got home; and have much to do for to-morrow's message. Pray for

W. Romaine.

This day, last year, the riots began. The thermometer is again at riot-heat. Grant us peace in our time, O Lord! He has stopped—He does stop—He will stop the madness of the people.

LETTER XXX.

Reading, March 5, 1782.

Here I am, in my way Sion-ward—Salutes to fellow-travellers at Heckfield—Go forward—Your time shortens fast—The journey will soon be over—Let nothing stop you—He who set you in the way has provided every thing needful to keep you in it safe from the malice and power of all your enemies. Look to Jesus. May you never lose sight of him by faith till you be admitted to the open vision of our God. I have many things to tell you of him—all good—and scarce any thing good of any one else. You will favour me with a visit when convenient, and continue to pray for

W. Romaine,

Who never forgets you, or yours.

LETTER XXXI.

Southampton, Sept. 29, 1782.

My dear Friend —My heart leaped for joy at the reading of your letter: I have much and long wished to visit you at Heckfield, and this would have been the opportunity; but I am here for health, and have only bathed twice: after about five or six times more, I must hurry to London, to a wedding—the parties being waiting impatiently for my arrival; none else must do it; both being my children, whom I cannot refuse. Now I know I may come, it will be no difficulty to find my way another time. Indeed, I should have been glad to have assisted at the dedication of your new house; but you begin, and we finish; so it will be well consecrated in time. Let me entreat you not to lay aside the revisal of your papers: my heart is much set upon their publication. I flatter myself that I shall find your last hand put to them; and my prayers for a blessing on writing will be turned into prayers for a blessing on printing. May the Holy Ghost be sent down from heaven upon it, and may he accompany it with his effectual grace. Mrs. R. joins in every good wish to you and to Mrs. S. My blessing on your children. As I have you by name in my Love's Litany, which I use to-night, do not, I entreat you, forget to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXII.

Tuesday, July 1, 1783.

My very dear Friend.—I am looking forward with pleasure to the day, when I shall see Heckfield friends; my preaching at Reading is fixed for the 20th instant. If it be quite agreeable to you, we will make our journey that way, and be with you the 16th. I understand that you have a revise now with you. If this comes time enough, you will favour me with a line, that we may be certain about our route. You can receive no visiters more truly attached to your best interests. I have you much on my heart, and in my prayers. It is my privilege, and I feel it my happiness, to be in the best bonds, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

Mrs. R. joins in every good wish, as does my son, who is with us, to you and yours.

LETTER XXXIII.

My very dear Friend.—A sure foundation is a great mercy: so I learn daily: my Lord, and He only, is that foundation.—What more fixed than given under my hand?—"On the 16th, I shall be at Heckfield." But Mr. C—— has overturned my plan. He thought it not right to have the society sermon on the day of the confirmation: he wrote to me about it: I acquiesced. It is to be Sunday the 27th; but, intending to finish my summer campaign to-morrow, it seemed a favourable opportunity to go to see my son for some days. We purpose to stay with him till Friday next, and hope to be at Reading, at the Crown, early in the afternoon, so as to eat our bread and cheese at Heckfield. We very thankfully accept the offer of your chaise on Friday next, and shall be glad to see it at the said Crown; excuse this yea and nay work, in which I am quite patient; and believe me to be, on other grounds, yours,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXIV.

Reading, Aug. 2, 1783.

My very dear in the Lord.—We are in continual danger; our friends, our enemies lay snares for us—smiles may hurt, as well as frowns. But where we love God in our friends, he gives us a spiritual use of their love. Our conversation, and every mutual intercourse of kindness, is sanctified. He makes us a blessing to one another, and thereby gets glory to his grace. I am sure he did from me at Heckfield; and I never felt his goodness more in all my life, than in worshipping him at my Oratory: there I set up my Ebenezer afresh. The bench, and the oak, and the heath, and the spring, can all witness for God, that he is good, and that his mercy endureth for ever. Through his kind hand over us, we purpose to be ready Monday morning to make use of your offered favour; Mrs. R. will be prepared about eleven: God give us a profitable meeting! I am adoring his bounty for such a harvest—such weather—and with my praises, joining prayers for a spiritual harvest, that his labourers may get it in fast, and the Lord's garner be soon full. Lord hasten that most glorious day, and keep you and me hastening to it! Our love to Mrs. S.: my blessing on all your children. Do not forget, I beseech you,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXV.

Southampton, Oct. 14, 1783.

My dear Friend.—Having an opportunity of conveying a line to you, by means of Mrs. C———, I gladly embrace it. I write from Southampton, where we are to stay till the 21st or 22nd instant; it is not determined yet what road we take—but it is absolutely fixed that we shall be at home by the 26th. Mr. and Mrs. C——— press hard to make Reading in the way: if they prevail, it will only be for the Thursday evening's lecture: and perhaps our seeing you face to face may incline us to prefer the Basingstoke road.

I have good news to tell you from a far country, as refreshing as cold water to a thirsty soul. God has spared me to read over my Bible once more: O what a treasure—what unsearchable riches are there in this golden mine! I never dug deeper, nor found more precious jewels, than upon this last perusal. You know it is my constant custom, as soon as St. Dunstan's lectures are over, to begin the Bible, and without stopping or interruption, to go on from Genesis to the end of the Revelation; this exercise is always begun with prayer, and carried on with a settled dependence on the Spirit of prayer; and I am always wishing to ascribe all the profit (and it has been very, very great) to the praise of the glory of his grace. At present, I am not reading my Bible in order to find out some new truth, but to be established in what I do know, and to attain more confirmation of it. This I would chiefly seek for, that I may get growing experience of the wisdom of God, and of the power of God in his word, and may thereby enjoy the blessings of his love promised in it. With this view, I send you some of my observations on the reading of the Bible in the year 83. I am happy in believing that your heart harmonizes with me in them. One of the first things to be noticed and expected is, the actual fulfilling of the promises to this day, namely, that the Holy Spirit is still in the word: he works in it, and by it. He makes it at present, as much as he ever did, the great ordinance of God unto salvation, as you may observe in Isaiah lix. 20, 21. Hence it is called the ministration of the Spirit; because in it he holds forth Jesus Christ to be the Almighty Saviour: and whomsoever he calls by it to come to the Saviour, he makes his call to them effectual. They receive the Spirit, by the hearing of the word, as Gal. iii. 2.

This, my good friend, is what you and I should above all things seek. We should be always praying for the Spirit to accompany his own word. It is our duty to hear and read—but we should always do it with the fixed dependence of our hearts upon his divine teaching; without which, the word itself will profit us nothing, as we read Heb. iv. 2: "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them who heard it." May the good Spirit keep us in the use of means, but entirely dependent upon him in the use of them. Thanks be to him, that in this frame of mind I have once more gone through his word—settled and grounded more steadfastly than ever before, that the word of God can be made useful to me, only by the Spirit of God. The next thing that engaged my attention was the divine and infallible truth of the holy Scriptures, of which I have been convinced with all the riches of the full assurance of understanding. Our Lord said in his last prayer—"Father, thy word is truth." And I say the same. I have set my seal to it on this last reading: every line, every word, is according to the mind of the infinitely wise God. It is his revealed will; and it discovers to us objects in God's light, as he sees them—Whereby the Holy Spirit renews us in true knowledge, after the image of him that created us: he brings our understanding to submit to be informed by his unerring word. Whatever it reveals of Jehovah, of the three persons in Jehovah, of the God-man, of his salvation, of the way of receiving the benefit of it in time and in eternity; he has made me willing to live in entire subjection to its teaching. My constant inquiry is—What it reveals; not, Why? I study to know it, not as a metaphysician, but as a Christian. I seek, not so much to comprehend it, as to believe it. Nothing appears to me more reasonable, than that my reason should submit to God's reason: and therefore I am kept praying for divine grace, to make his word, like the light of the sun, clear in my head, and fruitful in my heart.

My dear friend, let me recommend to you this method of reading your Bible. Ever take it up as the oracles of God—the infallible standard of truth. The abiding persuasion of this will save you a great deal of trouble, and will bring you in vast profit. You will not have much occasion to consult authors, or to spend your time in perusing many books. If you take up your Bible with a settled conviction that it is the truth of God, and that it has the stamp of divine authority, this will be the means of your understanding more of the Scriptures, than all the comments in the world could give you: because your mind, having received the impression of divine truth, is now disposed to receive the impression of divine power; which is another matchless excellency of the word of God.

The Spirit of God still works in it, and by it; as in the first creation, so in the new creation—He does all by his Almighty fiat. He speaks, and it is done: he commands, and is obeyed. His is a creating word: he calls, and the dead hear. It is a life-giving word: he follows the call, and the quickened sinner believes—faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God; and this faith is as great a demonstration of divine power, as raising Christ from the dead was; as you may see, Eph. i. 19, 20, &c. Then he puts his word into the inward parts, and the believer is enabled to feed upon it, and to be nourished thereby, even up unto life everlasting: so that he often says to his Lord—"Jesus, to whom should I go? Thou only hast the words of eternal life." This divine efficacy of the Scriptures is the principal thing by which God magnifies his word above all his name. He has made it his ordinance, like the fixed laws of nature—by which he still keeps up intercourse and communion between himself and his people, and gives them to see and to enjoy his perfections. His Spirit makes it effectual to begin and to carry on fellowship with the Father and the Son. And thus he is daily magnifying it, by realizing the promises, and putting believers into possession of the graces and blessings promised in it. So that it is to this hour the mighty power of God, as truly as when he spake the world into being; as effectual as when he said, "Lazarus, come forth." My dear friend, may you and I feel it more, still more: may we live happy partakers of its influence—and whenever we hear it, read it, or meditate upon it, may we get fresh experience of the power of God in his word; which will bring us another blessing peculiar to the Scriptures: by acknowledging them to be the truth of God, and finding them to be the power of God, we shall come to experience their divine sweetness.

It is by continual dependence on the teaching of the Spirit, in and by the word, and by mixing faith with it, that we come to find its value and to taste its pleasures: for it then opens a new world to us, a spiritual and eternal world—it reveals to us the God of that world—our Father, loving us in his Son—it makes known the Son's wonderful person, and his heavenly work in salvation, with all the blessings of it, which faith brings into present enjoyment. The believer is made alive to him, and then has his spiritual senses exercised upon them—and each sense has its proper object and its peculiar delight, as we read—O come taste, and see, how gracious the Lord is—hear his voice for it is sweet—smell the good odour of his perfume, for his name is an ointment poured forth—come and handle the word of God. What a paradise is here! as real, but more blessed, than Adam's. Believe me, sir; I know you do. In my last reading God has thus blessed me; what the word reports, the Spirit has realized. In the way of believing the promises, I have found the fulfilling of them. I speak for God, and his glorious word. Away, self! The Holy Ghost the comforter, does by it at this day make good his name and his office; he shall take of mine, says Jesus, and shall show it, manifest it, unto you, the spiritual world, all the graces, all the glories of it—he will not only manifest them to you clearly; but he will also enable you to believe them with a pleasing earnest, and to enjoy them with many a sweet foretaste of the glory that is to be revealed.

There is a very delightful account of this in the 19th Psalm. What if I should set my seal to it, and say, that I know what is spoken in the first part concerning the light of this world to be matter of fact, as well as what is spoken in the second part concerning the light of the spiritual world? Would not you allow me, sir, to be a competent judge of both? And when the same prophet adds—"O, what love have I unto thy law! I rejoice in it, as one that findeth great spoils! Yea, it is dearer to me than thousands of gold and silver;"—blessed be God, I find it so. Indeed, upon every reading of the Bible, it grows more precious to me, as it did to David; because it is not only the discovery, but it is become also the conveyance of the unsearchable riches of Christ—these are revealed in the word, and applied by the word. Faith is the lawful key, which opens the infinite treasury, and hears the proclamation of grace—" O ye that are seeking durable riches—these, all these are yours—come, take all you want—use all you wish—you cannot do the free giver a greater favour, than to enrich yourselves daily out of his boundless store—Read his promises, how exceeding great, how exceeding precious they are—read his faithfulness to them—Only trust—take—use—all that is in the promises shall be yours in time—yea, yours in eternity." This proclamation of grace I have heard. I believe it Blessed be a promise-keeping God, I enjoy it. And I can assure you, sir, there is more to be had out of Christ's fulness, than any one upon earth has yet enjoyed. For he not only giveth fresh grace, but also more grace. I have never been more thoroughly convinced of this, than upon my last reading. God has humbled me, and has made me feel more of mine own poverty, and has thereby led me to live more upon Christ's everlasting treasury. You do not suspect me of boasting; O no. I would glorify the word and work of the Almighty. A beggar would not be reckoned proud for saying—" When I was just starving, I met with a charitable person, who not only fed me, but also feasted me; and then most generously provided for me all the rest of my days." Should not such an one acknowledge his benefactor, and bless him? So do I. Thanks be to him, who realized to me his word—who opened mine eyes to see wondrous things out of his law—who often made me to look up and say—" O how sweet are thy words unto my taste; yea, sweeter than honey unto my mouth."—Blessed be God for his good word—it is really manna—it is angels' food—it comes from heaven—it tastes of heaven.

When I sat down to write, I little thought my pen would run so fast, or that it would hold out so long. Will you excuse this long scribble? You will. I am writing to a friend, who knows that I have still much more to say of my last reading. I bespeak your candour, while I am mentioning one thing more—and that is, the great end and design of the Scripture, which is, to conform us to it. This is the completing work of God the Spirit by his word; all the rest were led to this. When the word is understood, and believed, and lived upon, then he makes it the means of conforming the whole man to it. The believer is cast into the mould of it, he takes the impression—every feature. It is so assimilating, every tint is to be seen upon him. He lives the word—it is to be read in his looks—visible in his walk—manifest in his tempers. See him—study him—he is the lively picture of a Bible-Christian: let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ. By this rule he orders it; he seeks to be a pattern of the truth as it is in Jesus, and does not seek in vain. The Spirit by faith makes Jesus very precious. The heart loves him, loves to be like him; much fellowship with him endears him more to the heart; and it becomes true liberty—it is real happiness to have constant communion with him, especially to feel the influence of his cross and the power of his resurrection.

My much beloved, may this be your experience. Outstrip me as far as you can: may your sentiments, your affections, your life and conduct, all of them be conformed to the rule of God's word. I shall pray for it, for you and for yours, that you may live by gospel motives, and do all to gospel ends. And may the Bible be made good and fulfilled to you in earth and in heaven.

I stop; but not because my subject is exhausted: I have daily fresh matter of praise. Still I am reading and admiring. New beauties spring up. Yearly, daily, I shall have praises to give for this most blessed book: and if I live to walk with you on Heckfield Heath, I may continue the subject. May your Lord and mine open our understandings, that we may understand the scriptures.

Mrs. R.'s with my real love to Mrs. S. My blessing on all your children. Do not cease to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXVI.

Dec. 7, 1783.

My very dear Sir.—Having an opportunity of sending you a line by a friend coming to Reading, although I am very busy, yet I could not help telling you that I rejoice with them that do rejoice. I congratulate you on the birth of your son; and I thank him who has been so kind as to spare mother and child, both, I hope, for his own kingdom and glory. I have a heart-felt pleasure, which I never heard any body mention of themselves; namely, when I hear of the birth of any person: it rejoices me to think that there is one more born into our family, and one more voice added to the grand concert. Among them let us number our little John—I don't mean that his name should be called John, but that he may be a gracious child, as that word signifies; and a significant name, and a scripture name too, I think is best. I have a custom in Lent to catechise the children; and at every fresh time of standing up, I ask a new person, What is your name? And I tell them what it means, and beg of them to remember it. If they do not live up to it, not only I will witness, but also their very name will rise up against them. John, for instance; your name says that you have grace. Now if you tell lies, and are angry, and fight your brothers and sisters, or disobey your parents, then you are graceless John. This often strikes children, and others also; for I knew a woman who came in on a Friday into our church, and God made this simple way (the speaking to the children) the means of her conversion. On the birth of the infant, be his name what it may, only let it be a scripture name, I will send you a birth-day ode, of a very ancient date, but on the greatest occasion that ever was or will be recorded; on which you and I must place all our hopes. It is called, "A Psalm to be sung by the Sons of fallen Man;" and among them my soul is now singing it, and I am making melody in my heart unto the Lord. They first took it up and sung it:

1. When they laid the foundation (of the temple) on the mountains of the Holy One. 2. (Then it appeared that) Jehovah loved the gates of Sion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. 3. For the most glorious things had been foretold of thee, thou city of the Alehim: Selah (weigh this well). 4. I will cause it to be mentioned to them who shall know me, at Rahab and Babylon; yea, behold to them also of Philistia and of Tyre, This name shall be born (God incarnate). 5. And to Sion it shall be said, A person and a person (God and man) shall be born in her; and he himself (the God-man) shall establish her (the church Sion). 6. Jehovah has recorded it, when he was registering the people (of his church), that this name shall be born. 7. (And then all his people,) the singers, as well as the performers on instruments, shall say, "All my fresh springs are in thee." All, all the springs of grace, all the springs of glory, arise from the incarnate God. I feel, eternal blessings on him, a little stream of this grace; and I do most heartily join the whole choir, who are now giving glory to God and the Lamb. I know you will say, Amen.

Here is an ode for you. Sing it on your son's birth. In the light I view it, it is one of the greatest compositions in the word. Indeed, it is the sum of all. Jehovah incarnate includes the whole of our faith and practice, and the experience of it is our blessedness in earth and in heaven. May it be our crown of rejoicing. How I write on! it was to be a note—and see, how it grows into a long letter! But I must stop—the bearer is come. Adieu. God be with you and yours. Pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXVII.

Dec. 23, 1783.

Dear Sir.—Mr. N. just now tells me he is coming to Reading to-morrow to assist Mr. Cadogan, and will wait while I write my thanks for your last by Mr. M. We can get out of debt with one another by our acknowledgments; but we grow more in debt, the better we acknowledge our great debt. In my present view of things, I would not be an Arminian for the world; because I am not only willing, but happy, in getting more and more into Christ's debt. They are only pensioners in heaven; they take all from him in use, and carry all back to him in praise. God teach us this heavenly lesson. Although I have learned but little, yet I would not be saved in any other way than by sovereign grace; for only by this can I find employment in oneness with God, or happiness in God—All is grace, all is debt. The sense of this keeps one humble, and thereby willing to acknowledge favours received from one another. I feel it towards you. May the same be yours this Christmas—thankfulness on your heart—blessing God, that he would dwell in man, that man might dwell in God. Glory be to him εν ὑψιστοις for this infinite mercy. You say, and I say, Amen

But N. waits, and must go. I stop my pen—My heart is the same. May you never forget, in your best moments,

W. Romaine.

And when you have the King's ear, ask a favour for me. God be with all yours.

LETTER XXXVIII.

March 5, 1784.

My very dear Friend.—Mr. N. just now informed me that he was coming down to Reading, and would wait while I wrote two or three lines. I am first to acknowledge your obliging letter of Feb. 23, and am thankful for that gracious assistance which has been vouchsafed unto you, to begin, to carry on, and now to complete your testimony for the honour of the eternal Spirit. He will make what use of it he pleases: success is his; we cannot command it; but we have been seeking to him for it; my prayers have been as constant as yours. Besides the truth, we want the power; this I have been asking, entreating him to set his seal to the work, and then it will answer your purpose and mine. And for this also I shall continue to make request.

I have much to say, but want time. Our hearty love to your dear partner. My blessing on the children. Remember

W. Romaine.

LETTER XXXIX.

June 14, 1784.

My dear Friend.—I have this moment received your letter. I say nothing of the contents, for He does all things well: so you will find it, the longer you know him and the more you trust him. I am at present his prisoner, as well as you. But sickness with Jesus is paradise; and he will give you at Bath the water of life which proceeds from the throne of God and the Lamb—an antidote against the fear as well as the sting of death. You propose too short a time to give the waters a fair trial; six weeks is the general allowance: but you will judge as you find them agree. You are to lodge and board at Mrs. S.'s, on the Parade. Every body knows her. She will make your stay as agreeable as she can. Make use of my name. You will soon find she is a bigot to ——; but, I trust, a real Christian notwithstanding. I am not afraid of her making you a bigot that way.

As to my visit at Heckfield, it is so far off that I cannot even guess at the time: it cannot be till September, if then; my course lies quite another way.

May God be with you; your guide on the way, give virtue to the waters, and bring you home in health, prospering in body and mind. I can only add our real love to your dear partner. My blessing on all the children. May you never forget, in your best moments, your friend in our common Lord,

W. Romaine.

Oh, that 85th Psalm has made me much sweet melody in the house of my pilgrimage; for I know a little of that holy longing which the blessed man felt in his heart, and which made the presence of God in his house and ordinances so delightful to him.

Mrs. R. joins me in all my good wishes to you and to yours, Mrs. S. and family.

LETTER XL.

January 7, 1785.

My very dear Friend.—I have been living upon promises, but sadly disappointed—promises of men. Mr. M. said you were to be in town in November. Then I heard you were to bring your son to Mr. Clarke's. After, you were to come early in the year. I have waited, and lo! dumb —— came. Nothing to be depended on still. Well, although I have nothing new to send, yet the old repeated wishes of a happy new year. And I will speak of the ——, if nobody else will, and declare it is very good: indeed, according to Mr. Locke, it was eloquent, for it spake in actions from whence it came: it tastes of Heckfield. Our motto this year was, "Go forward." All in a wrong way till set right. He who sets us in the right way has provided every thing needful to keep us going, pressing on, till he bring us to the end of our journey; to which he encourages us by promises, by examples, by setting before us the shortness of the journey, and what awaits us at the end of it. I wish you had been with us in person; as that could not be, I rejoice in your company as a fellow-traveller; and I am happy in believing that I have your prayers, as you have mine, for our persevering—going forward, till we finish our course with joy. I am in the last stage; and for the prospect of safety and happiness through life and death, blessed, most blessed, be the name of my Jesus!

I have many things to say, which I cannot enlarge upon in this note. As, first, you should consider of a new edition of the first volume; there is a great demand for it: while the second is on sale, the first will be always asked for; and as it is not to be had, it stops the sale of the second. The method of publication should be considered. I do not propose any thing, but could wish you to add what would make it about the size of the second; and to be at no expense. I am sure booksellers could be found who would print it. Pray, sir, weigh this matter—ask our Great Counsellor his advice, and favour me with a visit soon. I would come to you, but my Lord's work will not suffer; and I assure you, under my hand, although it has been this Christmas almost too much for me, yet he made it the best Christmas in my life. Oh, he is indeed a very bountiful Master! His work is wages. To be weary in his service is a cordial. Eternal thanks be to him for his most undeserved favours to such a poor creature. I adore him for you—your testimony—Horæ Solitariæ. Tell Mrs. S. I love her, and make interest often for her to my good Lord. May he take care of all the family at home and abroad, and, as they grow up, make them his.

W. Romaine.

LETTER XLI.

April 16, 1785.

Dear S.—I have not many things to wish to live for; but this is one. It is on my heart to see the new edition, with additions, of the first volume of Horæ Solitariæ. I have been much mortified in my application to the booksellers. We must use the world and the people of it for our Lord's honour. If you see nothing foreign to that in the present proposal, you will please to let me know. Rather than it should not be published, I will stand between you and him, and save you some uneasy feelings I was in such a hurry to communicate this intelligence, that I do not delay a moment. I am often at Heckfield, and visit my bench. Come as often to Blackfriars, and pray without ceasing for

W. ROMAINE,

And all his, as he does for you and yours.

LETTER XLII.

Saturday, Two o'Clock.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—We could not call on you yesterday: we met with many disappointments, and got to Reading late. But our great journey is prosperous—mine is nearly at an end. Backward, forward, looking to the present—all is well—the greatest miracle of grace that ever was or will be. To-morrow I hope to see you, and to tell you something of his love and of my love. The little flame of mine kindled by his, and kept alive by it—His kindled ours also. May it evince itself day by day, till it be swallowed up in his love for ever and ever. Our kindest wishes to Mrs. S., and my blessing on all your children. Remember, I believe you do, but continue to remember,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XLIII.

July 22, 1785.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—We must thank you very much for the offer of your chaise; but although I purpose to be with you the 16th, yet I cannot fix any hour or place. God will direct our way to you. I believe our meeting is as much under his eye, and will be as truly with his blessing, as the good old father met his son in Egypt. May he fit us for his favours as well as his trials, and make both work together for good. If, through his providence, I could be certain of time and place, I will let you know; if I cannot, expect us not till you see us. Our love to Mrs. S., and my blessing on all your children. I am, very sincerely, yours in our good Lord, who is the bond of all holy union,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XLIV.

October, 1785.

DEAR SIR.—We are all disappointed at not seeing you, and acquiesce only in His will, who knows how to turn all our disappointments into good. All His will requires faith in exercise—may your trials improve it. You are on my heart always, you and yours. Mrs. Talbot continues in a weak, and, as I think, a dying state; but is safe, and in good hands. I do not forget Mrs. S. Pray still for

W. ROMAINE.

We return home on Friday for our winter campaign.

LETTER XLV.

Nov. 21, 1785.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have taken great pains to get some of your sort of potatoes. Last year I employed Mr. Thatcher, seedsman, in Fleet Street, and this year Mr. Robson, in Holborn, who spoke to Mr. Howard, the person who first brought them into England He is the writer of the history of all the gaols in Europe, which he has visited. He is now gone to see the state of the Calabrias since the earthquakes; from thence to the Barbary coast, to inquire into the present method of treating the plague, and what can be done to stop or to cure the infection. He is a man of great fortune and of great charity; and says that he grows none at present but what he gives away to the poor; therefore I must come at last to you, through necessity. My real friend, Mr. Walter Taylor, of Southampton, is very pressing with me to get him some against the next season. If you would let me have them in my own way, it would be a great favour. I want enow to plant two acres; but if you will not let me pay for them, I would be beholden to you for a small quantity for him to begin with. Mr. Howard says he plants twenty bushels to an acre, which, on his light land, (near Bedford,) in a wet season, produce an amazing increase. Enclosed you will receive a present of my own Hebrew Bible, (not a bribe, but a token of Christian love,) that, remembering me as often as you see it, you may pray for me while I live, and bless God for me when I die. It is truly a precious book. Every day it grows more precious; not only from it fresh light, and life, and comfort, but also more. Many years' studies, with God's blessing upon them, have favoured me with an insight into the meaning of Col. ii. 2. Eternal thanks be to a divine teacher for opening all the riches of the full assurance of understanding! O what, what a happiness is it to be quite satisfied that objects in the spiritual world are exactly as they are described in the Bible! for by being thus taught, one gets ready hold of the spiritual parts of scripture instruction, and fastens at once upon the enjoyment of them by faith. This is truly a present heaven. I wish you more than I have of it; though I have my share in its chartered graces and blessings; which I have now entered upon by holding the truth in love, and am thereby growing up into Him in all things, who is the head, even Christ. In this view the Bible is inestimable. It is not only a perfect map of the spiritual world; but the believer, surveying its riches, and beauties, and pleasures, has a good warrant to say, All these are mine—for God is mine. I cannot tell you how great the happiness is, when the eternal Spirit opens, and applies, and puts the believer into the present enjoyment of the graces here promised, as so many earnests of the glory that is to be revealed. You know enough to make you join me in blessing and adoring our Sovereign Lord and God, who has given us in it, and by it, to taste how gracious he is. I have no words to describe the value of these mercies. My thoughts are quite lost in the survey of them. Why me? What was I? What am I? that this great charter of grace, with all its privileges and honours, should be by infinite mercy granted unto me. I daily sit me down in admiration, content with my Lord's own meditation upon the subject. Matt. xi. 25, 26, 27.

Mrs. R. sends her best wishes to Mrs. S. I remember her present case and wants. My Lord train up your children. May he give you to pray for

LETTER XLVI

March 4, 1786.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I am often with you at Heckfield, in the spirit of that good man who found himself happy in the happiness of others—"Though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ." I salute you, brother, and the church in your house. I have fellowship with you in our common Head. I feel the same spirit breathe through us, even the Spirit of our glorified Jesus, very remarkably giving us the same judgment, forming our hearts to the same affections, and influencing us to walk in the same way. Blessings on him for this great grace! As I see it, great it is indeed; for yet a little, very little while, it will grow to full perfection. And we shall have the same Spirit uniting us sensibly to the same Head, and giving us to receive out of his infinite fulness glory for glory: and this is the charity, love to the Head, and thereby love to the members, which never faileth. It is waxing cold on the earth, as it was foretold; but they who live near to the sun still receive some of those enlivening beams which make the everlasting day. I have felt their influence, as you have done in your solitary hours; and I rejoice in hope that they will abound yet more and more in knowledge and sensible experience αἰσθησει. I sat down to thank you for your love and for its fruits. But I cannot help it—at once I am led by the streams to the Fountain-head. And I look upon it to be no injury to the streams, to say, they flow from such a fountain as covenant love. All the honey in the world could not sweeten my tea this morning, as receiving it from my Lord's grace, and using it to my Lord's glory—and the Morning Psalms wonderfully enriched the feast, 19, 20, 21,—three psalms in praise of his matchless beauty and infinite love. Truly, sir, there is something of heaven in the spiritual enjoyment of our creature comforts. Put Christ into them, and they are marvellously refined and exalted. I look at him in your gifts—the motive and the effect. You generously offer me a waggon load of potatoes. I thank you: but I have got two bushels from Mr. Howard, who first brought them to England, and have sent them to Mr. Taylor. When the season comes, I shall nevertheless accept your six sackfuls, cut and prepared. Before that time I live in hopes of seeing you face to face. Yet I may not forget another kindness; for which Mrs. R. desires we may join in thanking you.

I am become a great admirer of Phil. ii. 1—12. The dark ground sets off this delightful picture. O what times do we live in! Parties, disputes, quarrels, contentions, who shall be the greatest—yea, almost hatred itself in the family of love. We have much hearing, and little doing. The apostle James would be frightened to see the professors of the day, all ears, without hands or feet—nothing about them active, but a gossiping tongue. For these things I mourn, and preach, and pray; not without some profit. I see some love the gospel; and those that profess it make us live more at home—you at Heckfield, and I in London; yet I am as private as you. I very seldom go into any company; and when I do, I return to my study blessing God that I am once more alone: and this makes the haven, of which I have the prospect just before me, a very delightful appearance; because there, and only there, the wicked, ay, and wickedness, cease from troubling.

My dear friend, let me beg of you, so long as I am suffered to be upon this stormy sea, to have a constant interest in your prayers. I do not want to get into the harbour with full sail, but to get in. The how—the when—I leave. He knows best: and I am certain will do the best. Help me all you can, and approve yourself like Him who loveth unto the end. Mrs. R. desires kind remembrances to your partner. My blessing on all your children. The Lord be with you all; the fervent prayer of

W. Romaine.

LETTER XLVII.

May 11, 1787.

My dear Friend.—Miss P. dined with us yesterday, and made me quite ashamed of myself. A book, called "The Christian Remembrancer," was lying on the table. Upon her taking it up, she said she believed it was yours, of which I had no hint before. What! thought I, does Mr. S. write books faster than I can read them. I have not read Horæ Solitariæ yet, and I did not intend to write till I had gone through it, and could thank you for the second edition, as heartily or more than I did for the first. But I can refrain no longer: although I am indeed, sir, almost worn out, and good for nothing. My frame and my present feelings, the infirmities of mind and body, keep me very close to my last lesson. Every thing, within and without me, preaches to my heart the necessity of being saved freely and wholly by grace; and the blessedness of this lesson is by long experience become very precious. What could I do now, if it were otherwise? I cannot look back: no comfort there. Activity, vigour in working, liveliness, are over. It's true, I keep on public exercises; but they grow too much for me. When I am quite jaded after a hard day—"It's time to spare yourself," say my friends. "What! still four times a week, and often five. Oh, it's not required of you!" No, it is not; but His love constrains me: it is as a thousand arguments, inspiring me with courage not to stop in showing forth his praises before men, which I hope soon to take up before saints and angels. Let the flesh complain—I owe it no favours—If it be tired with the praises of my Jesus—shame upon it, that it should ever be weary with the joys and glories of heaven. But weary it is—even now, the writing of this letter is a burden. I have dropped all my correspondents; and keep the little spirits that remain for public preaching. Nobody knows what I feel this morning; what uphill work it is, even to take up my pen, as I am in duty bound, and to acknowledge that I owe you so much, that, like a man over head and ears in debt, I am ashamed to meet my creditor. A letter from Heckfield, if not two. A very acceptable present from the farm. Six volumes of Horæ Solitariæ. Six volumes of The Christian Remembrancer (if it be yours). And what sum shall I put to that brotherly love, which was the fountain from whence these friendly streams flowed? May they flow on, and never, never stop! I believe they will not: they cannot. It is at this moment a blessed prospect, "Unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again." They all come from him; "All my fresh springs are in thee." Our love, with all its comforts, in thankfulness to him and kindness to one another, is from his infinite grace. To Him be all the glory of Heckfield favours. I am sure, the more we thank Him, the better we shall thank one another. Pray for me. Before I write again, I have two books to read, and cannot take them up till June the 25th. Perhaps I may see you before. The Master of the house bless the children; send you servants after his own heart; and fulfil all his purposes of grace to Mrs. S. and yourself. Mrs. R. joins with yours in every holy bond,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XLVIII.

Jan. 26, 1788.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—A. this week called, and dines with us to-day. He brought me nothing under your hand of your good wishes for the new year: but I give you full credit under my hand, that I am remembered by you, as I ought to be, and that my best wishes are not spared in prayer for you and yours. I am still "looking to Jesus;" our word for the year 1788. A present look to him will make this year much better entitled to annus mirabilis, than either the victory over the Spanish Armada, or the Revolution. They are gone and past; but ours is altogether wonderful: in its duration, an endless year; and in its blessings, more and greater than any heart can conceive—and heightened by the motive from which all comes—the eternal grace of the eternal Three. Proud Arminians may laugh at—Why me? But they in whom Jesus will be admired, can now see no reason in themselves: their true Spirit is self-loathing and self-abhorrence. Their one song is—"Worthy is the Lamb, &c." May this be sweeter melody in your heart every day—yea, may every look to Jesus throughout the year be more humbling to you and me, that we may be getting into a higher note of praise. And truly, sir, I can sing a little bit of G. Sol re ut in alt.

We are in great want of "The Christian Remembrancer." My sale of it has been very large—insomuch that Mrs. Trapp wonders what I do with them: it is a nice book to give or sell. It suits modern reading. If I had known the new edition was so forward, I would have proposed a new chapter; but it is too late. In my journeys through England last summer, I disposed of great numbers—and had frequent opportunities of reading it myself. Go on; and the Lord prosper you!

Having an opportunity of sending a parcel to my son this morning, I enclosed this little note, with my respects to Mrs. S. Am thankful our good Lord appeared again for her. Oh He is good, and doeth good. Desire her to look back, and see, observe how he has led her hitherto. May she trust and not be afraid of his future guidance. To him I commend you all, and pray you to remember

W. Romaine.

LETTER XLIX.

March 8, 1788.

My dear Sir.—I know one that said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive;" and I know his reason. He that said it is the giver of all blessings, even of liberality to give, and of thankfulness too for it, both in the giver and in the receiver. In nothing are we more like him than in bestowing, as he does, most freely and bountifully. Much faith in Him always works love to Him and to His. I feel, while I am writing, that I want a more thankful acknowledgment of Heckfield favours. Let me set some of them down, to brush up my memory. Mr. S.'s letters. Mrs. S.'s kind note. Six of the second edition of "The Christian Remembrancer." Mr. Matthews sent me "The Deep Things of God," &c. I cannot tell who I am to thank for it, but ex pede Herculem. All this is friendly enough; but the motive (of which I do not judge doubtfully) enhances every thing. I verily believe our intercourse is carried on by the Lord; and though you have got above me in some things, you have more to give: yet I may not yield to you in others. I have an infinite fulness to go to, to make and to keep me truly thankful. This I get as I want it: the prayer of faith brings in the grace, and is pleading for you and yours—that you may be the blessed of the Lord.

I mentioned a subject which I greatly desire to see treated by your pen. It is "on the profitable hearing of the word;" and should come in after the 36th chapter, p. 188. I need not tell you my reason. A creature, "all ear," has ceased to be a monster. Give them a word in season. Certainly the gospel is heard for better purposes, when it is mixed with faith, than to be only the pleasant voice of a sweet singer, which neither administers food, nor nourishment, nor growth. Do, sir, oblige me with a little chapter there, on the character of a profitable hearer of the gospel. If I do not see you before, I hope to have the pleasure of meeting you in April. In the mean time pray for

W. Romaine.

Mrs. R. says, I have not expressed her thankfulness so strong as I ought. I mention this at her request.

LETTER L.

June 12, 1788.

My dear Friend.—Our time is fixed for coming into your neighbourhood; of which I acquaint you early, in hopes it may suit you to admit us under your roof. But you will be quite free to tell us of your engagements, that we may not break in upon any of them. We expect to be at Reading about the latter end of this month, and will inform you of the day when I hear from you. Our Lord is exceeding gracious to me in all things, in hand and in promise: he makes me admire his infinite bounty, giving me to repeat David's words, with some of David's spirit, Psalm xxxiv. 1, 2, 3.

Pray for me, as I do for you and yours, that we may all hold on our way rejoicing. I am, in our dearest Jesus, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LI.

Dec. 22, 1788

My dear Friend.—I have your Remembrancer by me, and I send you mine for the next year. Accept it, and use it, that it may help the exercise of brotherly love. It has been long my Vade Mecum; for in the blank memorandum part I record the memorables, temporal and spiritual, of the day. I find the review always humbles, always exalts, God's mercies; and as to the present time, it is certainly good to try to fasten something to the flying moments, which may hinder them from running to waste, especially when they have almost done their flight, as they have with me. What should I do now without Christ! Much time to redeem—every earthly help failing—and these few days are in all respects evil—private—public—church—state. Oh what Κακία! as our Lord calls it. Happy for us, he is on the throne, and ruleth right. Our word for 1789 is to be, "The Lord reigneth," Jehovah Jesus, over all worlds and over all creatures; and to him every knee shall, willingly or unwillingly, bow. My dear friend, remember me in an especial manner on New-year's day, that when I speak of the character of our Royal Sovereign, the King of kings, of the nature of his government, and of the peculiar happiness of his subjects, I may be enabled to speak, in some measure, suitable to his fame and high renown. You know one who saw a great deal more of him than any one of us do, and who spoke with admiration—"Who can utter the mighty acts of the Lord? Who can shew forth all his praise?" Because he could not, he did not give over praising. Oh no! he never stopped; he is at it still: through the ages of eternity he will be blessing God and the Lamb. I am living in hopes it will not be long before I shall join him; and his subject of praise, which is mine now, will be mine then. The prospect is big with blessings. I am desired to return thanks to Mrs. S. for her kind present. Christmas mercies be hers, and yours, and all your children's. In the present ferment, I find a sweet retreat in my study, and much refreshment in conversing with my best friend. All my politics are with him. Psalm cix. 4. The words cannot be translated, as you know. The more I get into the spirit and practice of them, the more I shall be your friend and servant, in Jehovah Jesus,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LII.

READING, June, 1789.

DEAR SIR.—All the family present thanks; we took a great deal of pains to bring them ourselves, but could not succeed: my son was all the morning trying to get a chaise, but could not. I am forced to acknowledge your bounty to us to-day, by favour of Lawrence, and by whom I inform you that we are still in hopes to come and take our leave of the favoured Heckfield, where I have spent many days very pleasantly, and with whose inhabitants I hope to spend many more, even more than can be told by multiplication. The good Lord has called you to another place. It is his will: it is his work you are to do. He has given you talents; I am to pray for his blessing upon the use of them; that the public, yourself, your family, your friends, may be profited by your present station; and among the rest,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LIII.

Dec. 18, 1789.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I think it right to acknowledge the receipt of twelve books from Mr. Trapp, by your order; and also to thank you for your good advice to the growing generation, which was never more wanted than at this day. The spirit of the times runs strong against all subordination; even the first commandment with promise, "Honour thy father and thy mother," &c. is losing its authority daily. I have great need to follow your book with my prayers; and I do. May it please our sovereign Lord to accompany the reading of it with his effectual power. May the young learn subjection to all their superiors, in the family, in the state, and in the church; so that the times may be quieter in our land than I fear they will be.

You are waiting: it is not lost time: I have found it very teaching, and very profitable. Put the Lord in, and it will be blessed waiting. "My soul, wait thou only upon the Lord," &c. May this be your present Heckfield lesson; and, as to the event of what you wait for, it is in his hands who can make no mistakes: subjection to his will is heaven.

Mrs. R. remembers you and all yours, especially Mrs. S., with affection; so does

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LIV.

April 12, 1790.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I was thinking this morning what excuse I could make for not acknowledging a very acceptable present, and for not answering a friendly note with it, long ago. Like most of us, very glad to receive favours, but tardy in giving of thanks, I was for laying it upon more business than I was become equal to, having very nearly attained that late period of life, in which Moses says (and I feel it), Psal. xc. 10, our utmost efforts are pain and weariness, both of mind and body. Our strength is really to sit still. And a blessed lesson it is, when, human efforts ceasing, we are led to make the works of Jesus all our salvation, and to find by happy experience that it is become all our desire. Oh what a good time has he lived to, whether he be young or old, who is dying in this faith!

But when I had written this excuse down, and read it, I was quite ashamed of it, because it confuted itself. It savoured a good deal of their practice (Gen. iii.), who sought to lay the blame upon any thing rather than themselves; for, indeed, most excuses are lies. An indolent temper, when what must be done of necessary preparation for public preaching was over, unwilling to set about other things; wanting to relax; and too often easing the mind by that spirit by which many trespass upon God's goodness; delaying from day to day; I will write to-morrow; or, what signifies it when I do write; I shall say nothing that will be worth postage. All my former excuses failed me this morning, April 12th; and I now cry Peccavi. I have got to the true cause: forgive me this wrong. I am to thank you for a Christian Remembrancer of this last edition, finely bound, for Mrs. Romaine. Better late than never to repent and amend. In these troublesome times I find it good to follow Habakkuk's example, which is all the politics I wish to know: he prayed, he got into his watch-tower, and waited for an answer; and he received it, and praised God for it. I am doing the same for the public—at prayers for the church, groaning under an oppression harder than the Chaldean bondage. I pray on; but am still in my watch-tower—I can get no answer—one can see no end of the present troubles—the cause is not removed: therefore they continue; they increase, as if so many fiends of hell were let loose, and suffered to do all the mischief which Satan himself could wish. We know where to lay the blame: unbelief is the provoking sin; it has brought ruin upon many great kingdoms; so that we can trace the vengeance of heaven against it from age to age, down to the present miseries of Europe. Infidelity led the way—"We will not have this man to reign over us:" then he left them to themselves; upon which Antichrist, that is, Apollion, brought out his legions and armies to destroy; and they have destroyed all law, order, property, religion; insomuch, that the earth is made by them like another hell. I tremble; for who takes warning? Oh! my country, my country! I fear for England. We are not much unlike the kingdom of France—very near her in her sin, and may not be far from her in her punishment. Therefore I keep me in my watch-tower, praying and pleading for mercy, begging our Lord to spare us for his own name's sake. This is my only plea. Are we better than they? It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not. May these move him to pour upon us a spirit of prayer and supplication, that, as a nation, we may with national repentance keep the 19th instant, humbled under his mighty hand. This is such a fast as he hath chosen; and for his own glory may he work a general reformation, that iniquity may not be our ruin. I hope you will keep me company in my watch-tower; then especially; but at all times there to plead for you and yours

LETTER LV.

July 8, 1790.

MY DEARLY BELOVED.—Let brotherly love continue and increase. I have to congratulate Mrs. S. and you on the success of the Rev. Mr. ——. He rejoices me in hearing of his present situation, and in hope of his success in it. We hope to set out from London soon after the 18th instant; and, if it be quite agreeable, we purpose to visit friends at Heckfield in the course of that week. If no objection be made, we shall be at Reading, and will make our time and circumstances known unto you. The favour of a line to Blackfriars will be an additional obligation to the multitude already conferred on your true friend, and humble servant in Christ,

LETTER LVI.

Dec. 15, 1790.

DEAR SIR.—My son has been coming down for a long time, but he has been detained. I waited to send my acknowledgments by him, not thinking they were worth postage. You know we then do the best when Jesus gets all the praise. I hope in your leisure hours, in some of these wet days, you have him still in your eye, and are putting down some of your thoughts concerning Him and His.* I have a hand in them, as far as prayer can go; and that with him is a great way. James v. 16. Mrs. R. is not behind in our love to Mrs. S. and in respects to the family. Truly yours in Him,

Saturday, 2 o'clock.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—We are at prayers for the sick of your family. My Doctor is the best, because he cures infallibly and eternally. To his care I am commending Mrs. S. and Miss Ann, and hoping he will prosper R.'s advice and medicine, as he did to Mary, in whose recovery we all rejoice and are thankful. I am the scribe, because I would request, for Christ his sake, a constant remembrance in your prayers for myself, that I may finish my course with joy—and my farther testimony for Jesus, in my Triumph of Faith, may be to his glory; whose I am, and whom I serve. Yours in Him,

LETTER LVIII.

SOUTHAMPTON, Oct. 18, 1791.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I have a great desire to take sweet counsel with you concerning my present studies; and thankfully accept of your kind invitation to spend a day or two with you for that purpose. We hope to be able to get to Heckfield the 25th instant, in the evening, but do not wish to trouble you for your chaise: it will be more convenient, on many accounts, to take a chaise at Basingstoke. The family here desire to be, with due respect, remembered to you: Mrs. R. joins me in my best wishes to you, and to Mrs. S. and to all the family. My Lord has been teaching me some of my last lesson. He is taking down this earthly tabernacle; but he does it like himself—gently—lovingly—with no more pain than as he enables me to say—all is well. May he vouchsafe us a happy meeting by the way—and the best at last: so prays LETTER LIX.

* Alluding to a book, entitled, The Church of God.

Jan. 14, 1792.

My dear Friend.—You will give me credit, farther than you have heard or seen, that I have not forgot your kindness. I also thank One for the full conviction that it was a love of his teaching which inspires your heart and mine, and that it will not end when faith and hope have done their perfect work. Glory be to him in the highest!

I am spending two or three days at Tottenham, and so get time to acknowledge my debts, which I never can get in London. What with much preaching, and many works of charity, I live there for the public; and I do not regret it, because my time is short, and I would labour while it is day. I have reached the 11th chapter of the Revelation, with much comfort to myself: I dare not say, that I have given the whole mind of the Holy Spirit; but, according to my light, I have delivered nothing contrary to it: the most difficult parts of the book are to come; but I am looking up for his teaching who can lead me into all truth: he is my commentator; for all the rest have failed me. Help me in your prayers, as well as with your hints (which I value much), that this my last preaching may be the best.

Our word, for this year, was—Grow in grace—what grace is—favour, free favour—a cool breeze after a sultry day, as refreshing as the dew upon herbs—for to these favour is compared.

What growth is—an increase of the favour of God, by the increasing knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: so I read the words—grow in the grace, and in the knowledge, &c. by the Spirit, through faith in the word; prayer over it; more dependence on the faithfulness and power of God to fulfil it. In this view I wished my people and you a growing year. May much of the rain and shining of heaven upon the good seed make it bring forth a hundredfold, in London and Heckfield, to the praise of the sower, who is the Son of man.

Black clouds and great storms are gathering: but nothing but a full persuasion of this could make us lift up our heads with joy. He has told us that these latter days would be the worst. So it is. infidelity triumphs: the fancied rights of men usurp the rights of God: republicanism throws off subjection to God's ordinance; and every unbeliever is a king, sui juris. Happy for us, the government is upon his shoulders, who can and will get himself glory by fulfilling Psal. lxviii. 1, 2. Read the Hebrew: the verbs are in the future tense: v. 3. is our support and stay in these tempests. You will not fail to pray for me, that I may be kept by his mighty power, through faith, till I come to the blessed end—to see my Jesus face to face. To him I commend you and yours, with Mrs. R.'s Christian love, being in this one respect, without guile, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LX.

READING, Jan. 19, 1792.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I sit down only to tell you that I feel for you. I remember Mrs. H., a friend of ours, had a room full of the pictures of infants Mrs. R. asked her one day, as they had been all her children, and all dead, why she let them hang there. She answered, "It is the same thing between our Saviour and me, whether he has them, or I have them." This is a great saying; yet, it is in fact no more than we are daily praying for—"Thy will be done!" It is soon said: but when the will of the flesh is opposed, it is not so soon practised. Indeed, submission to God's will is an almighty work, which you know as well as I do, and perhaps feel more of it at this time. But through the Spirit of Jesus, when we feel this rebellion, we are commanded to look to "Our Father which art in heaven." In Christ he is ours—his fatherly love is ours—and he can do nothing but what is for our good. And his opportunity of manifesting it, is chiefly when his will goes one way, and our will goes another. Then we are forced to look up for his promised strength, and, we generally find, he appears most for us. He tries faith, purifies it in the furnace, continues it in the fire, that patience may bring fresh experience; and experience improves that hope which never makes the believer ashamed. See these truths most beautifully illustrated in the case of David: I never read it without getting some good from it; for there one sees before one's eyes that faith and patience may have their perfect work. Mrs. R. is concerned with you for the loss of her dear god-daughter Jane; she was God's gift. He allowed you to enjoy it for above twelve years. He hath taken her to himself; and he hath done what is right, what is best, for you and for her: to his name be all the glory. Mrs. R. joins in affectionate remembrance to Mrs. S. with

LETTER LXI.

SOUTHAMPTON, Oct. 6, 1792.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER.—I am desired by several friends who have read the inclosed, to beg the favour of you to let them reprint it. But, as there was something local in the first publication, they thought it best, and so do I, that it should be submitted to you, whether you would give them leave; and if you did, whether some things might not be omitted, to make it so small as to be cheaper, and spread abroad more. It is their purpose to have it printed at Bath by Mr. Hazard, and to be sold, if they can, for two-pence, or, at most, for three-pence. In my judgment only one thing is wanting to make it as full as one would wish on this subject *. I know you can answer this, and to satisfaction. Mr. T., my host, salutes you, and so does Mrs. R., who, thank God, is at present in perfect health.

And let us know particularly how Mrs. S. and all the family are at present. I have enjoyed some of the choicest blessings this summer in my meditations on the Triumph of Faith. Experience prospers, although the written part goes on slowly. Much preaching, wherever I have been, has kept it back. And it is the same thing whether he be exalted in the preached, or in the printed gospel, so his Spirit do but favour the work. Fresh supplies of his grace are as needful as fresh breath. May his blessed inspiration guide you, and bless you in all things. So prays,

Nov. 19, 1792.

My very dear Friend.—I remember you and your family, recommending you all to my Doctor, whose hand is not shortened: he still cures all manner of sickness; and his praise is above heaven and earth for standing miracles of mercy. Can there be greater than you and I? Oh magnify the Lord with me; and let us exalt his name together. The books which come with this, and which I promised you, will, I hope, help to show you fresh wonders of his grace. They are the only copies I have, and shall be glad to have them returned, but not in haste. Since I came home, so many engagements, that I rather live the Triumph of Faith than write it: but still he is kept in his right place, and he makes all within me to speak of his glory. To him I commend you and yours, being by him and in him your friend and servant,

LETTER LXIII.

Reading, Tuesday Morning.

My dear Friend.—We accept of your kind invitation to beloved Heckfield, and wish to see your chaise on Monday next at twelve o'clock: next week being the only time we have to spare this year; and, my great journey being almost over, it may be my last visit.

Oh how faithful is he who keepeth for us the appointed weeks of harvest! Blessings on him, that ordinances are our constant preachers, encouraging us to trust and not be afraid. May his choicest favours be on you and yours, Mrs. S. &c., and on your reverend guest. So prays one and all of this family, as well as

LETTER LXIV.

Jan. 16, 1794.

My dear Friend.—Having an opportunity of sending thanks by a parcel to my son, I embrace it gladly, although I have only time to mention your last book, handsomely bound, to Mrs. R. and myself, accompanied with a letter more worth than all the rest. Thank you for all the rest, and for brotherly love. The report of Mr. I. is very false; he has sent me extracts of sermons lately preached, and I have given it under my hand, that he is not an Arian nor a Socinian. It is much to be lamented that such vile slanders should be raised and spread. Our motto is, "The God of Hope," Rom. xv. 13. I have preserved the substance of the sermon, and will send it you in due time. It was only a comment on the verse. My prayers for all the family. Pray for Letters to J—— I—— Esq. with several to Mrs. I——.

Oct. 19, 1782.

My dear Sir.—Our common friend Mr. A. is coming to meet you. I could not neglect the opportunity by him of acknowledging your last favour, with the inclosed Address to the Freeholders of Somerset. It is seasonable and well-judged; becoming a true lover of his country. I wish success may crown your endeavours; but I have no reason to expect it. There are but two spirits that divide the world. One is predominant in our land and day, insomuch that the love of the public is lost. Self is the great idol, self-interest is the ruling principle, and self-enjoyment the universal end; of which our mock patriots have given us dreadful proof. From them nothing can be hoped for, whether in or out, but mischief: the corruption of their principles in religion can lead them to nothing in practice but what is ruinous in church and state. But bad as the prospect is, we must not be discouraged in doing our duty: you in your station, and I in mine, should take the more pains. Whatever may be the event to others, we shall both be better for our endeavours; and perhaps you may succeed with your fellow-subjects And I have some reason to wait for success from my friend—He is the great Patriot—He teaches—He gives patriotism. The whole world cannot make a public-spirited man without him. In this light I view him as the sun in the firmament—the greatest friend that mankind could possibly have. He is the Saviour—He makes private persons, as well as states, happy—He saves from all kinds of miseries what the sinner may suffer in himself, and what he may make others suffer. To him I am looking in the use of means, as you are for national deliverance from our open enemies, and from our sham patriots. From him also I expect the revival of public spirit: he alone can save from self and selfishness. Oh that he may put forth his power! unless he do, you will not get twelve counties to build twelve ships of war. We are asleep, though in a storm—in danger, but insensible—by quarrels at home, strengthening the hands of our enemies abroad. A wide field of lamentation is before me;—but I stop: he shall hear the remainder who can save a sinking land.

W. ROMAINE.

I have a fresh confirmation of an old promise, "Thou shalt visit thy tabernacle, and shalt find nothing amiss." Oh, he is a good, a precious Jesus.

LETTER LXVI.

Dec. 14, 1782.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I never was more obliged to you than for your Christian sympathy with us in this time of need. It is a great trial: but it is the Lord who has a right to do what he will with his own. It is my Lord, my old Friend, who changeth not in his love: he has acted for his own glory, and has done the best. What would I more? Nothing, but his grace to make me submit to his sovereign will; and that, blessings on him! he does now freely vouchsafe; for I feel a will of my own quite opposite to his. I could wish he would have spared my son: my soul delighted in him: he was a sweet youth. The remembrance of his person and manners and behaviour; his dutifulness (for he never offended me but once in his life); his conduct since he was in the army—these draw tears from mine eyes while I am writing. I do feel as a parent. I am no stoic, but, thanks be to my good God, his grace conquers nature. The struggle is hard; but God is with me; and through him I conquer myself: he forces me to go to him every moment for his support and his comforts. I have no stock of resignation. It is out of myself, laid up in the fulness of Jesus; and while I live upon him for it, he helps me to kiss the rod. He keeps under my rebel will, and teaches me to say from my heart, "Not my will, Lord, but thine, be done." Such is the kindness of my Jesus; for which I adore and worship him.

My poor wife has exquisite feelings on this occasion. It is her constant prayer not to be suffered to displease our Lord by her murmurings. However willing the spirit may be to kiss the rod, yet the flesh is weak. The tender bowels of the mother rise, and struggle; but the power of grace prevails. In the midst of her greatest floods of tears, she would cry out—"Lord, keep me! Lord save me from thinking or speaking any thing contrary to thy holy will." And he was very good to her, her faith was supported.

I have many things to write, but have not leisure; only to add once more, that we are, from our very hearts, sensible of your remembrance of us. May the good Lord sanctify to you all he gives, and all he takes away, and bless you abundantly for your kindness to

LETTER LXVII.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I take the first opportunity of answering your friendly letter. You have full credit for all your professions of mourning with those that mourn: we believe your sympathy, and we bless God for it. The prayers of our friends for us have been heard and answered. Mrs. R., considering her feelings, has been very graciously dealt with; kept at the worst from murmuring, and generally calm and composed. We had friends many, and from them prayers many: but you know that when two strings of an instrument strike a unison, they are in concord. Just so was it with Mrs. I.'s letter: it was then, and is still, in unison with Mrs. R.'s spirit. It sounded a concord; it met the very sentiments of her heart, and became, not a prescription, but an effectual medicine to her wound. It was not a letter about the balm of Gilead; but it brought and administered the healing virtue. It does not at all lessen Mrs. I.'s real friendship, but more endears it, that God gave to her words so great a blessing: they came from love; they have increased love; and to this moment Mrs. R. never speaks of them without great thankfulness I am commissioned from her to bless Mrs. I. for her kindness.

You are very obliging in wishing us at Brislington; but my circumstances are such, and my helps in preaching so very few, that I cannot think of so long a journey. My work is great; and the night will soon come when it will be over: I wish to be faithful and successful these few hours of the evening which are left. If I see you not face to face, I am still, in office, your constant orator: my Lord will hear much of you, and I will please myself with the persuasion that I shall often meet you at his throne. I invite Mr. T. to give me a meeting there; the oftener the better.

Our word for this year was, Judges vi. 24, "Jehovah Shalom," Jehovah is our peace. It was something remarkable that it should so soon have a literal accomplishment. Peace being broken between God and man, the breach was made up by our great Peace-maker. The gospel is the open proclamation of it, inviting sinners to be reconciled to God, and to enjoy the benefits of a free trade between heaven and earth. They who are justified by faith are reconciled, and find this peace with God: and, as far as they believe, they enjoy the benefits of an open intercourse with God in Christ; which benefits are all the graces of time, and all the glories of eternity. I have only to wish that the outward peace may promote the inward, and the Peace-maker himself may get the glory of this and of all his goodness to the children of men.

My blessing on your dear children. May they be kept for you, and you for them! Mrs. I.'s great attention to them is her duty; and being paid in the Lord is her privilege. Prayer for success is the chief thing: he only, yea, he only, can bless instruction. May the parents and their friends plead much and prevail.

LETTER LXVIII.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have yours before me of the 23rd instant. You are still; and your concerns are on my mind, and on my heart. I feel with you, and rejoice with you. When you prosper, it is better with me. I get a fresh subject of praise, and find it a pleasant thing to carry your thanks to my Master. May he be with you all at Lyme, and bless means for the good of the body. When we meet, may he consecrate your house afresh, and make it such a church as Aquila and Priscilla had in their house. It has been, and I hope will be. We have no plan about our summer journey; but think it will not be quite convenient for us to travel westward till the latter end of August. Mrs. R. is at present very much out of order—feverish—a sore throat. Saturday morning: I am writing at six o'clock—and will go no farther till the doctor comes.

He is come, and says he hopes there is no danger; but symptoms are not so good as he could wish. He is the Lord of life and death—in his hands we trust our all. He commands us also to do it at all times. I am learning this lesson, and recommending it much. What I know of it, practically, puts one into a real paradise: because it puts one, and keeps one, in God's will. He graciously appointed it to be a sovereign antidote against all evil, and to be his ordinance for conveying all blessings: for which reason, I write and preach so much about it. The fulness is in Christ; but there is no hand that can receive any thing from him but faith: and faith should go as far as the promise: it should trust for life—the life that now is, and whatever belongs to it, as well as for the next. Oh, my dear friend, let me intreat you to read this attentively and as the subject requires. I wish you always happy, in all things happy: Christ is the only way to this; and you can get nothing from him without faith; and faith is not doing what it should do, if it does not save you from guilty fears, and from natural fears. Mind the promise—"I will save you from all your sins"—no fear from this quarter: so again—"Lest any hurt you (person or thing), I will keep you night and day." No fear from this quarter: almighty love has promised, come what may, it shall not hurt. I harp so much upon this string, because I know you have fears, and they do give you uneasiness; which I earnestly wish to cure. My friendship wants you to be so happy as to be always rejoicing in the Lord. And yet mine is but a ray of his friendship. Surely, then, you may trust him, and not be afraid of any thing. Yea, you may, and you ought, to sing, "God is our hope and strength: we have found him a very present help in trouble." I would go on, but I must take notice of your letter. When I come, I am ready to do any body's duty—to relieve Mr. G. and Mr. T. My love to them both.

Poor Mr. B.! I pity every man who follows his own will; for then the blind lead the blind: now he has got into the ditch, may it be sanctified. He has great reason now to follow my Lord's will; and if he does, he will have ample matter of repentance both before God and man. I pray this may be given him.

Have you taken notice of an uncommon phenomenon? It was never once so in my life. Since last Monday, we have had a continual foggy air—the sun shining, but not able to disperse the vapour, mist, or whatever it was. The sun appears like a red-hot piece of iron. No wind. I thought, at first, it had been our smoke: but a gentleman from Buckingham, informs me it was the same there. On this occasion, there are many fears abroad; but my Lord spake to the point, and I give him perfect credit. Thus saith the Lord, "Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the heathen are dismayed at them; for the customs of the people are vain." I thank him for this cordial: for, I assure you, the appearances of the sky are very alarming: but blessed are they who put their trust in him. May he keep you and Mrs. I. and your beloved children, not only from all evil, but also from the fear of it. This is a part of his salvation. May we receive it by faith, and use it to his glory! To him, &c.

LETTER LXIX.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—We arrived here, through the good hand of my God, in safety: by which means I have learned something more of my first lesson; that is, to trust, and not be afraid. What has he to fear who has cast all his care upon an Almighty friend? And has done it at his bidding, and on the warrant of his promise? Every step of our journey spoke aloud—Now you see he is faithful—He said, I will keep your going out, and your coming in—And blessings on him, he has kept us from all evil. Mr. I., no one has a better title than you have—to trust at all times, to trust for all things. May you live up to your estate, and find your faith working such a love to God on your heart as will cast out all fear that hath torment.

In my journey, I have also met with nothing but what has increased thankfulness. The fine weather, the fruits of the earth, very rich, and ripe, and abundant, and the harvest very near over—these are special mercies, calling aloud for praise. The poor and the rich should alike join; for both are benefited by the present plenty. Wheat, lately nine shillings at this market, was yesterday, the best, sold at five shillings and six-pence. Glory be to God!

I have a magnifying glass, through which I view these mercies, and they appear great indeed. Looking upon them in a spiritual light—oh what an improvement! He that has kept my body in safety has the care of my soul: he has undertaken it: his love, his power, his wisdom, are all engaged. And he says to me what David did to Abiathar, "Abide thou with me: fear not; for he that seeks to destroy thy life must destroy mine first: but with me thou shalt be in safeguard." Corruptions, temptations, dangers, pains, may attack and threaten; but faith says, Fear not; his word is passed—it cannot be broken—I will preserve thee from all evil—yea, I will preserve thy soul; I will perfect that which concerneth thee.

When this is believed as it ought to be, what a subject of praise! Many, many blessings I have in hand; but they increase by use, and they are but earnests: God gives them as his pledges. Take this, and expect greater—the greatest—all my love in Christ—all my heaven. This is but the first fruits: the harvest shall follow. When present mercies are viewed in this light, oh how they increase—how they magnify! May every day, as it adds to their number, add also to their value; that, in all things, you and I may be giving of thanks; of which heavenly employment nothing can hinder us but unbelief. Take heed of that bitter root, and set Christ upon it. Mind; he must pardon it, and subdue it, or else it will shoot up and flourish.

Mr. G. informs me that he would wish to be released before the 31st instant; to which I heartily consent, only reminding you of my parting request, that he would occupy my pulpit as long as he stays in town. My brotherly love to him; and my prayers follow him for success in all that he takes in hand. I hope to revisit you in the Lord on the 29th or 30th instant: we have had some cold mornings, which made me think in earnest of the sea-side. Our joint love, with every good wish of it, to your dear children. Although I am out of office, yet it is still my privilege to keep on praying for you and Mrs. I. I desire to do it more, and better. And I am thankful to my best friend, who hitherto has heard and answered. I am in the Lord, your real friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXX.

Blackfriars, March 26, 1784.

My dear Friend.—I am thankful for the good news which you sent me from a far country. Next to the gospel, it was welcome. Mrs. I. and the children and yourself preserved in health, is a great mercy. Adored be his goodness. I gave you an account of the weather with us, till a little before the solstice: then the frost set in severe, and, excepting a day or two, we have had snow and cold, till the equinox; and even now the wind is in the north-east, and as cold a March as ever I remember. Scarce any appearance of spring yet: my crocuses are but just blowing. Your letter of the 11th of February is before me. I am obliged to you for your intelligence concerning the old preacher. It is good to do all that we can for Christ: but nothing is good which is not done in faith, in his strength, and to his glory.

I hope this will find you before you leave Montpellier, and ease your mind about your hot-house. Mrs. R. joins me in wishing you all a prosperous journey, under the guidance of my Lord, and a happy meeting in London. Trust him. He says, "Lest any hurt you, I will keep you night and day." To his keeping I commend you and yours, and am in him truly yours,

W. ROMAINE.

I have no news to send you: our politics are like the wind: we are ever changing. The effects of materialism begin to be felt. They are the same in states as in private persons. Self reigneth; and then God and his Christ are dethroned. My system begins with "the Lord reigneth." It goes on, every step, with "the Lord reigneth." And whatever opposes it, must come down; for he has all power in heaven and in earth: "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth for ever and ever." In such times as the present, nothing can quiet the spirit, or settle the mind in perfect peace, but that this Lord is my Lord: under his care he has me and mine. Come what may, all is safe in his hands. A poor helpless sinner, who has committed himself to the Saviour's keeping, may, and ought, to sing that reviving hymn, Isaiah xxvi. 1, 2, 3, 4, in all troubles, and in the hour of death. To him again I commend you and yours.

LETTER LXXI.

BLACKFRIARS, Sept. 14, 1784.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I received your kind remembrance of us just before we set out for the North; and attended to your request of hearing from me on the journey; but my yearly engagement would not allow me leisure till this day. I have made it a long time my practice, as soon as St. Dunstan's lecture is over, to begin reading my Bible; and I let nothing take me off till I have read it through. Yesterday, I finished my delightful task; and having blessed my God for his precious word, I take up my pen to write first to you. The impressions left upon my heart in this last perusal are so warm and lively, that I cannot help communicating them to you, and wishing that you and Mrs. I. may feel the same. My admiration has been increasing of the uniformity of the scripture plan. It is the great charter of grace; and all the parts perfectly harmonize: and when one compares them together, each illustrates and beautifies the whole.

The reading of 1784 has also given me a fresh confirmation of the truth of scripture. I am not more certain of any thing than that it is the word of God, and the revelation of the Most High: and of this I am convinced, by finding the power of God accompany it. As in the first, so in the new creation—He speaks, and it is done: his word is almighty. I know of no power beyond that which he has put forth in your heart and mine. Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth. Our new birth is a new creation; and, blessings on him! I feel the effects of this every time I take up my Bible: I find it to be more than the word of man. It is in truth the word of God; because it effectually worketh to this day in them that believe. Its influence in the heart and life is beyond all created power: and the experience of God's real presence in and by his word has made it to me very precious. On this last reading, my love for it has grown much in taste and value—in taste, sweeter than honey—in value, more than gold, yea, than much fine gold. As I dig deeper, the mine becomes rich, and the treasures of grace are greatly enhanced by their being the earnests of glory. Oh what a book is this! What! is any way like it? I cannot get enough of it. You know, it is a good sign of health when people long for their meals; so it is in the mind. I have but just done reading, and yet I want to begin again: my appetite is keener. Feeding upon the word is not like the gross meat and drink of this world—nothing cloying in it: but when mixed with faith it refines the faculties, and exhilarates the spirits. The man says, "O what love have I unto thy law! All the day long is my study and my delight in it."

All these considerations have received great confirmation in my last searching of the scriptures; because I have got one year nearer to the full accomplishment of all God's promises. This vastly enhances their value. Yet a very, very little while—and perfection and eternity will be put to their fulfilment. The word will be completed—perfectly in all its promises—eternally in all its glories. Oh what a day will that be! What Joshua said, will be matter of fact: Josh. xxi. 25; xxiii. 14, 15. All things in this world, when near, look great. As you go from them, they appear less. It is the property of true faith to bring the promises near: as faith grows by hearing and reading, the promises appear nearer and greater. The home prospect familiarizes them, and presents them to our view with fresh beauties. Believe me, Sir, this is matter of fact. The eye affects the heart, and all its affections taste and enjoy the good things of Immanuel's land: which, though they be at present in promise and hope, yet the promises of them, exceeding great and exceeding precious, mixed with suitable faith, excite a hope full of glory and immortality.

This view of the Bible is inexpressibly glorious. It reveals; it realizes; it brings into present enjoyment eternal things. It is my constant prayer for B. friends, that they may be bible Christians. All besides is vanity.

I told you the design of my journey. It was answered. God is unspeakably good to me and to mine. Our meeting was in his name and fear: we profited. And we parted in love, just as they did (Acts xx. 36, 37, 38), to meet again in a better country.

The harvest is fine. He reserveth for us the appointed weeks, &c. He is good. I am going to keep my harvest-home, and for one to bless his bounty. Our feast is Sept. 25. Remember us on that day. Mrs. I., Miss Louisa—none of our Bristol friends shall be left out. Mr. T. not passed by. My dear partner will join. I have many letters to write; but yours, being first, is not the least, neither in love nor size. Every bible blessing be yours,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXII.

Nov. 30, 1784.

My dear Friend.—I am to thank you for your constant kind remembrance of us; for which giving you perfect credit, you will not be offended that I look higher in my thanks. We ought not to live upon the streams; but they should lead us up to the fountain-head from whence they flow. The bountiful giver should be acknowledged in all his gifts, whether they come immediately from himself or from his creatures. And this is his way, both to sanctify friendship and to secure it. Most friendships are ropes of sand: they love to-day, and hate to-morrow; because they leave God out. But bringing him into all our connexions with one another, he renders them holy, and thereby lasting. Indeed, this is the life I am wishing and trying to make some daily progress in: and truly nothing else is worth living for. You may safely write vanity on all worldly comforts, if they be not spiritualized. But God in them exalts, ennobles them, and turns their cold water into rich wine. To his praise be it spoken. I have supped in Mrs. N.'s room on bread and cheese and cider; and it was fulfilled, "So man did eat angels' food." Your grounds are pleasant. Walking alone, to converse with God, they have been turned into a paradise. How many, many times has it been with me as with Isaac. He went out to pray in the field at the even-tide; and while he prayed, he lift up his eyes and saw Rebecca: he asked, and had. How infinitely gracious his promise! How infallibly faithful his performance! Before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear. My dear friend Mr. I., this is really something of heaven: a blessedness that I wish God may add to all your other enjoyments. It will multiply them: you will have two in one—and what no estate, no relations, no comforts can give. This will do you good at your latter end, when they must all fail. One, from whom I wish to learn this lesson, reduces it to this point—I have set the Lord always before me: always at home, or abroad—in company, or alone—writing letters, or reading them—eating or drinking, sleeping or walking, sick or well—sick unto death, yea, dying—I would still be looking to Jesus. It is my safety, my privilege, my happiness, to do all in his presence. So his example teaches. So his Spirit will enable you and me to follow his steps. As believers, we shall be aiming at it, and trying daily to do it better: for when we are reconciled to the Father, and at friendship with him in his Son, we ought then to exercise our faith and hope in him on all occasions. What do we trust our souls for in his hands if we do not trust our bodies? How do we cast all our care upon him if we do not live in perfect dependence on him for our children and families? He has the government of church and state upon his heart and upon his shoulders. Oh why, then, do we doubt of his managing both for the best? He has undertaken the care of seed-time and harvest. How injurious is it to him to burthen ourselves with his own proper business; especially when he says, Cast thy burden on the Lord! But it is bad weather. He appoints cloudy days, as well as sunshine: I quiet myself in his will, be it wet or fair; and thereby enjoy a sweet calm, when the face of the sky is tempestuous, and the wind stormy; although, of late, he has been so gracious in his providence as to give us such fine weather as no man living remembers in October and November; saying, as it were, Trust, and be not afraid: if you have a wet cold summer, I will give you summer weather in winter. I reckon twenty-four fine days in October, and twenty-two in November. What a God! I admire his goodness to a set of people who are at every turn murmuring at and affronting him for his management of the weather. This present autumn should silence all such complaints. And when the winter comes in earnest—cold, and frost, and snow, and north-east winds—they all fulfil his word. Thereby they exercise faith, and improve thankfulness. Lord, lift thou but up the light of thy countenance, and it is Midsummer. I can assure you, Sir, that these are not only realities, but also blessings to be enjoyed: and I wish you to partake richly of them. The Lord's presence will brighten your fair days, and will enlighten your darkness. Troubles come—he will make them big with mercies; death comes—he will be with you; and dying, by his grace, shall only be the entrance, safe, pleasant entrance, into life everlasting. O my Jesus! teach Mr. I., teach Mrs. I., this blessed lesson. Lead them from faith to faith, that, every day, and in every thing, they may have a growing dependence on their God and their Saviour. There is something so blessed in this view, that I know not where to stop, or how to end; and should not, but I am called upon to remind Mrs. I. that Mrs. R. sent the things some time ago, and hopes what was for Louisa, and the chain, answered. She paid for them, all but the carriage. Take notice of this in your next, for her satisfaction. They talk of peace; but we are not ripe for it. Great trade would overset us, and prove a natural intoxication. I heard the bishop of Worcester, a Christian bishop, preach at Bow church, and he called it "the insatiable spirit of trade." So I think. A Christian with food and raiment is a happy man. Having many things to say, I must leave some to the next opportunity. I shall forget my right hand when I forget you and yours. Bad news from India. Pray for us, especially for

LETTER LXXIII.

Aug. 30, 1785.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—Through a kind Providence, we arrived yesterday at our journey's end, safe at Birmingham. All the way, nothing but death sounded in my ears, calling my faith to remember, "How blessed are the dead who die in the Lord!" A friend separated from us by death is like a limb cut off; one cannot help feeling it; and I have lost so many of late, that I seem to have nothing left but a stump. One of the most successful preachers of this day, my intimate for thirty-five years, curate of Greaton, Northamptonshire, is just gone to rest—the Rev. Abraham Maddocks: so is my very, very old acquaintance in the Lord, Richard Wilson, of Frome. I have long known Sampson, the dissenting minister at Truro, who is just gone to rest, while his wife was in labour of a sixteenth child; eleven of whom are alive, and left in great distress:—and I must soon follow. Oh it is a wonderful blessing to be ready! It spreads a calm and peace through life, and all its enjoyments, and is a never-failing cordial to cheer our hearts under all their distresses. Strong faith administers strong cordials: this makes me cultivate so much in myself, and recommend so warmly to others, the life of faith. Blessed are they now who live in the Lord: they shall be also blessed when they die in the Lord. Oh that the precious Lord Jesus may give you to know and feel that you have a life in him out of the reach of death! For this I pray absent, but not forgetful of you nor of yours: your best interest lies ever near to my heart; and I verily believe Christ put it there, and keeps it there. May brotherly love continue; and, as the time of exercising it shortens every moment, may its blessed effects increase and abound! We have found the country along the Severn in general sickly—many dead at Upton, particularly Shipman, a good man, and died in the Lord. At Worcester the same. Also at Knightwick, where we staid some days with our tried friends Mr. and Mrs. S. We had the same account at Broomsgrove yesterday. The first symptom is a cold, which brings on a fever, and commonly putrid. Our whole journey has preached death to me; and, thank God, it has made me more lively and more thankful.

I am, and have also great reason to be, in the best bonds, your obliged friend, and faithful servant in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXIV.

Jan. 1786.

My dear Friend.—I am often with you at Montpellier. I behold your clear sky and bright sun; and I can feel some of your bracing air and your constant fine weather. I do rejoice in them, because you do; but truly, Sir, I do not wish myself in your place. Although I am happy in your happiness, yet there is something even here at Blackfriars far beyond the south of France; for we are not without our enjoyments. I live in an element; and when my sky is clear, and my sun shines bright, and I feel some of its warm beams, and I breathe its pure æther—these are real blessings; they come down from the Father of lights—gifts like himself. He gives his Spirit to enlighten and to enliven our spirits, that, being one with his Son, we may live upon his fulness in earth and heaven. And when this spiritual life is enjoyed, there is a failing somewhere if its influence does not extend to the body and make the whole man better. My physician prescribes for both: he speaks a peace and a calm to the inward man, which reaches the springs of animal life, and makes them move with delight: the nerves feel it; they are brisk and active: he puts joy into the heart, which does good, like a medicine. No doctor like mine, Mr. I.: you have made use of him for your soul; but I would recommend him to you for the life that perisheth. What if you should leave off physic, and forget your skill in it, and live more by faith for the present life: I could infallibly insure the success. There is a something, not to be described, that he gives, which operates according to promise, and by a divine power; witness Rom. xv. 13, &c. &c. Take a little specimen of our testimony for him in the year 1786. Our motto has been generally Hebrew: the present was, "I am Alpha and Omega:" Alpha is the first, Omega is the last, letter of the Greek alphabet. So Christ is the beginning and ending, and all between from first to last. He is all in all, Rev. i. 8, saith the Lord himself, the God of truth, who is, and who was, and who is to come, the great I AM, from everlasting to everlasting, the Almighty, Jesus the God of nature, the God of grace, the God of providence, the God of glory. He is the first author of all the divine works in creation and in providence; the first cause of all the divine works in grace and in glory: he is the beginning and the ending. all things are made by him and for him.

Blessed are they who have begun the new year looking to Jesus: they will find in him every thing they can wish to save them from sin and misery, and to make them truly holy and eternally happy; for blessed are all they that put their trust in him. We are come together this morning to devote ourselves afresh to his service, and to begin the year as we hope to end it, in the faith of the Son of God. He is our Alpha and Omega; and yours, I hope, and Mrs. P's. I will give the heads of our subject: the rest your own meditation will supply.

1. He is Alpha, the God of nature, who created all things in heaven and in earth: see Col. i 16, 17, 18, 19; Psalm cii. 25, &c. Every thing that exists (excepting sin) owes its being to Jehovah Jesus; for he is of the same essence, has the same attributes and perfections with the Father. This truth stands upon a rock, and is the foundation of our faith; namely, that Immanuel, the God-man Christ Jesus, is the Alpha and the Omega of our salvation.

2. The God of grace. For as he is the Lord God Almighty, what could be wanting in his life to make his obedience for us an infinite righteousness; or in his death, to render it a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice for sin? And the benefit of his life and death can come to you and me in no other way than as an act of the freest grace: and we cannot receive it by any other means than by believing the Father's testimony concerning his Son. Are we wise unto salvation? It is the teaching of our great prophet Jesus; he is the Author and the Finisher too of that faith by which we reap the fruit of his atonement and of his righteousness, and by which also we enjoy all the graces of the Spirit in earth and in heaven; as John i. 16; and, amongst the rest, a life of sweet dependence on him for all temporal things: for he is

3. The God of providence. When he has taught us the safety and happiness of trusting our souls in his hands, he calls for the exercise of this, by leaving our bodies, and all their concerns, with him. He calls for it: "Cast all your care upon me for meat, and drink, and clothing: I will provide. Trust; and be not afraid: I will manage your health and comforts; yea, I will make sickness and troubles real blessings." Oh, Sir, this is paradise; it is the believer's present heaven. He lives by faith at all times, and for all things, bad and good, sick and well, poor as well as rich; in all, he has fellowship with Jesus, who satisfies his heart that he loves him too well to try him with any thing but what is for his good. This is a sovereign antidote against all temporal distresses, and really turns them into spiritual blessings. It is our philosopher's stone. I pray God you may find it, and thereby enrich yourself with all you want, as well as all you have; yea, with the unsearchable riches of Christ: for he is

4. The God of glory; lengthening his grace into eternity. For this he gave himself unto death: it was to purchase for us eternal life, as you may see, John xvii. 20, to the 25th verse. In this prayer I wish you and the family an interest. Pray for yours, in our dear Lord,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LXXV.

July 5, 1787.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I could not answer your letter till the lectures were over at St. Dunstan's: then we settled our plan. My sisters have pressed me sore to pay them another visit; to which we have complied; and we purpose, God willing, to set out next Tuesday, July 10; of which I give you as early notice as I could, lest your summer plan should be deranged by not hearing from me. When we shall return, I cannot determine—perhaps time enough to meet you hurrying away out of our blessed country. However, be assured of this, that I shall be much with you, very much, under my favourite elm, sitting and surveying the house and premises, and praying for the blessing of the God of heaven upon the master, and all his. Indeed, Sir, you have a most bountiful benefactor, who has loaded you with benefits; and he is never weary of giving: the greatest of his gifts he bestoweth liberally; even faith, rich faith, that you may take his Christ, live closer, nearer still unto him, and may be safer by him, and happier in him. This prosperity is much upon my heart: I wish it truly; I ask it fervently. All other things prosper about you: may your soul prosper! As your real friend, studious of your best interest, let me just put down what would have been said—If the hall lectures had been delivered at Brislington, 1787, by W. Romaine, Chaplain in ordinary, morning and evening—How often have you heard me say, "Make sure of Christ:" he is the one thing needful, all besides is nothing worth. Pursue what you will of this world, attain too, ever so much, you only get a great estate; vanity at its best—in the enjoyment, vexation of spirit—and in its duration passing so fast away as not to be worth one farthing when compared with Christ and the eternity of his heaven.

You should be often reading your warrant in scripture, and your encouragements from thence to take him, and make sure of him for your own. The Father's revealed will and command, 1 John iii. 23; the Son's express declaration of his willingness and power to save all that come unto him, John x. 27, 28, 29, 30; and the testimony of the Spirit runs thus: Heb. x. 15—24; a wonderful passage; full of strong arguments to silence all your guilty fears, and to encourage you to live and die in peace with God, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Then comes the security of this evidence—Christ is mine. I have taken him at God's bidding—I depend on God's warrant—I make use of him, as I am commanded. The Father hath given him to be a teacher. When I read the word, I look up for his Spirit, that he may make me wise unto salvation. When I feel guilt, I quiet my conscience with the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. When temptations meet with corruptions, he gives me courage to oppose, and strength to overcome them. When the miseries of sin are present, the love of God in Christ turns them into blessings. In my walk, in my warfare, in my duties, in my friendships, in every thing, I live by the faith of the Son of God; whereby a man may be as certain that he is alive to God in Christ as that he is alive to this world. Mr. I., there is no freehold like this, both for the certainty of its evidence and also for the blessedness which it brings with it. Make sure of Christ, and all is yours. Faith in him pleads a lawful discharge, under the broad seal of heaven, from all sins and from all miseries. Here is the warrant: see the judge's own hand:—I will remember them no more. And with this there also comes a full conveyance, by deed of gift, of all possible good in time and in eternity. The title is infallible: the earnest is present possession—even the Spirit; and faith, which is the fruit of the Spirit; and the fruits of the Spirit, which are abundant through faith in Christ Jesus. Grace is yours—glory is yours; for the God of grace and glory, God in Trinity, is yours, and will be yours, with all his fulness, for ever. May these be your summer enjoyments; even fellowship with the Father and the Son by the Spirit. Mrs. I. and her beloved children, Mrs. G. and family, Mrs. B. and family; and honest T. Maryport is not forgot. May Christ himself preach, whoever stands up. These are my present sentiments. And I have not said, I shall not proclaim them in my place, in your hall, before the year 88. When we return, we shall hear of your state and circumstances—where you are—how you are—when poor Old England must take its farewell of you. Till then, without fee or reward, I am the foremost of all your friends be they who they may. Pray for

W. Romaine.

Mrs. R. joins in best wishes—Buy "The Christian Remembrancer" at my recommendation; you will thank me when we meet.

LETTER LXXVI.

BLACKFRIARS, June 9, 1788.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—You and your family are welcome to England. I rejoice in your safe return, and my joy was increased by your being so sensible of the gracious Providence which kept your going out and your coming in. May you learn more of his tender love to you during this visit to your native country, than you have ever found before. Your letter warmed my heart with the sense which you expressed in it, of this greatest of all blessings, and put me into my proper element of prayer and praise—Prayer that you might now experience a paradise at B. The place, the country, no creature, has this to give: you know that well: but our Jesus has: he can make you quite happy in the love of his Father; and this is paradise restored: he can also make you a blessing to all about you; for his influence is like the sun's Mrs. I. shall be happier in your happiness. She will have a blessed summer if she feel all I wish her. The young ladies will enjoy the cheerful rays of that sweet sunshine which warms and influences their parents' hearts and lives. May my God thus bless you · and, dear T., join and say, "Oh! we are happy here—truly happy here at B. Jesus shines with the light of his loving countenance, and we have the joy of his salvation:" and I, W. R., add—may he shine on clearer and clearer to the perfect day. I acknowledge your very obliging invitation to spend part of the summer with you. I have delayed writing, in hopes I should be able to give you a direct answer; but I cannot. I have two engagements, one of two years standing, and I cannot fulfil them till about the middle of September: about which time, you will begin to think of taking your flight with the birds of passage. Go where you will, or do what you will, you will be borne on my heart. Let brotherly love continue; yea, increase. Your mother is where she should be. blessed be the name of the Lord! he gave; he took away. Mr. G. and his are not forgotten. I felt much for him at the time. Oh! it is a sore trial. Mrs. R., with most hearty affection, joins me in every good wish to Mrs. I. and yourself, and in my hearty prayers for our young friends. Remember us to Mr. G. and family, and to Mrs. G. Tell T. to try to get out of my debt: he is in my Litany by name, and ought never to pray without mentioning me: nor should you; for it is my privilege to be your constant friend at the throne of grace. May it be yours to plead as constantly for

LETTER LXXVII.

Jan. 31, 1789.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—The pleasure which I received from your letter, calls upon me to acknowledge it; which I sit down to do with much thankfulness. I get good from your good; and I am wishing you may return to us as much better as possible. We have had cold weather; but it was very healthful, and to me very pleasant. Our air was very putrid in autumn; but the frost has taken away every thing infectious: our skies are now as salutary as yours in France; and we want nothing in England but to be more sensible of our privileges, and more thankful for them.

You know me well. I am a man of one book, and of one sentiment. The word of God, and faith in his word, make up all my learning, and enter into all my life, private and public. The practice of these principles for the year 89 was taken from Psalm xcvii. 1, "The Lord reigneth"—my Lord Jesus, whose kingdom is of such a nature, that England, and the multitude of its isles, may be glad thereof: because he is almighty—the Creator of all worlds. He did but speak, and his word brought them into being; he did but command, and they are upheld by the word of his power; for all things serve him to this day; and he is the almighty Jesus, the Lord of the spiritual and new creation, in which his word is always doing wonders. Behold, says he, I create all things new: I give the Spirit of life to the dead sinner, to enable him to believe in me, that he may never perish for his sins, but may have, by my free gift, eternal life; and I will keep him by my mighty power, through faith, till I bring him safe to the fulness of my joys. This is the great king, who has all power in heaven and earth—the God-man Jesus: and the exercise of this power is peculiar to himself. He makes and keeps the new world as he did the old. He governs by his word. The gospel is the sceptre of his sovereign authority. He sent it out from Sion, as Psalm cx. 2; and the rebel nations were made willing to submit to him: and to this day he gathers in his subjects by the same means. When his Spirit puts life and power into the gospel, the sinner hears his call, and comes, and bows the knee before Jesus: he believes, and is pardoned and saved; henceforth he lives by and upon the fulness of the Saviour. This is the way in which he peoples his kingdom; and whenever he brings any one to be his willing subject, he promises them such blessings, under his government, as the world has not to give, and the world, I can witness for him, is not able to take away. Faith gives him credit. And, according to our faith, he fulfils his promises, and makes us really blessed. Here you see, Sir, I get upon my own ground—living by faith—the only happy life—an emperor has nothing to be compared with it—whether you look at the blessedness of our king's subjects, as they relate to spiritual, to temporal, or to eternal things.

His name, his office, his character, of old, was, the Blesser of all nations: so that his subjects are as blessed in him as Abraham was to whom the promise was made. The blesser himself is theirs; his life is their righteousness; his death is their atonement; his resurrection is their justification to life; his ascension is their hope of being with him, and sitting with him on his throne. Oh what do they feel when, from their hearts, they can say, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings! May this be sweet music at Montpellier.

And then, as to temporals, though he be so great a king, yet he is not above looking to the least concerns of his subjects. The very hairs of their head he numbers:

> "If in the least he be so true,
> What won't he in the greatest do?"

He has redeemed the body, as well as the soul; and he says, Cast all the care of that upon me. But I am sick. "Fear not, I am your physician—I can bring health out of sickness. As to food and raiment, family, children, substance—Trust them all in my hands—If you leave them to my management—come what may—I will make it work under me for your good: and if one thing be better than another in this life, you shall have it: for I have said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee."

He who says these things is King of kings, and Lord of lords: I believe his royal words—and I am as happy about all temporals, as I can be out of heaven. May he make my dear friend as happy; that, looking forward, when we shall see the king in his beauty, we may one day meet, and cast our crowns together down at his feet. So be it. May he reign sole monarch of our hearts till that blessed day.

I hear nothing of Adey nor Jones. I am a stranger in Athens. I only know my king governs all kings, and all kingdoms, and he does all things well. He has the care of your family: they are well, I hear. If you come through London, look upon us, and make us more thankful. All good wishes to my friend Walter; may he come home without hurt to his principles, and better in his health: death has got into their family; and he is seldom content with one. Happy they who are blessed with a life out of his reach—So are believers. Mrs. R. joins in all.

PLYMOUTH, Aug. 20, 1789.

DEAR FRIEND.—I promised to acquaint you with our motions. We inquired after you at Bridport, but could get no intelligence; if we had, we should probably have refreshed ourselves with a short visit. But we must wait a little longer for that pleasure. September will soon approach. Our visit here is over next Monday. On Tuesday we purpose to set out for Tiverton if the king (God bless him!) does not lay an embargo upon us. The whole neighbourhood of Cornwall and Devon crowd in to see the royal family; and I am forced to send to Tiverton for a chaise to take us from this place. We hope to get there on Wednesday next, and to hear from you concerning the state of your famiiy—how you all do—whether settled yet at B. Our kindest respects to your dear partner. Being in the midst of such a hurry—cannonading—crowding—processioning—bell-ringing—ship-fights, &c. &c., I feel my privilege:—"His rest shall be glorious." Quiet at home—the bustle around me makes my rest more sensible and more happy. From my heart I wish you more and more of that calm of soul which is truly paradise restored. Our love to Miss I., and kind remembrance to all our friends, especially brother T—. Lady Hill and Mr. Barham lying dead at the same time. Oh what a lesson of mortality to the survivors! preaching "Be ye also ready—Live by faith, that ye may die in faith." May this be yours. So prays LETTER LXXIX.

TIVERTON, Sept. 1, 1789.

MY DEAR MADAM.—I should have mourned and wept at the contents of your letter, were it not for the consolations of God, which are never small, nor few, to them who trust in him. This sickness is not unto death; but for the glory of God to purify—not to destroy. It comes with a plain lesson, and ought to be a good teacher. Its text is taken out of Prov. iii. 11, 12. And the sermon preached from it, by a most able divine, is recorded Heb. xii. 1 to 14. Our Lord is too good to afflict His willingly. He has gracious purposes in every chastisement. He would have Mr. I. to read what he says, and to trust his faithfulness. Faith, exercised, gets health and establishment. So it works love, and by love. The heart grows satisfied of his love, and loves him more—cleaves to him the faster, and finds that it is good to be with Jesus anywhere, even in a fiery furnace. May my dear friend find it so! I pray it may be a fruitful season; and I thank God that I hope it will. We purpose, through our Almighty guide, to set out on Monday next, and, as we travel with the same horses, to lie at Bridgewater, and to be with you on Tuesday evening. May our meeting be for good, to his praise, and to our profit—that he may cement our hearts more closely to himself—and may give us fresh reasons to love one another as his disciples. Mrs. R. is perfectly well, and desires to be most kindly remembered to you. I shall not cease to pray for you and yours till we meet, being in every holy bond, your friend and servant,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LXXX.

PORTSWOOD GREEN, Oct. 19, 1789.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I cannot forget you while I remember any thing. I can give you full credit for your professions of friendship: I wish I could rely with as much confidence on Him, who speaks, and it is done. His word and deed go together—and true faith unites them, and finds them one. The promise, and the blessing in the promise, are the same with Him; only our foolish hearts separate them: and so, what God hath joined together, we make two; by which means we rob Him of his glory, and ourselves of the blessing. Oh for more faith—settled and established while you are an English believer, and your constant viaticum, go where you may! I have your family at heart, as well as yourself. Mrs. I. wants nothing—God has been very bountiful to her—only more establishment in the faith. There is her safety—there is her happiness. And my Friend cannot only give it, but wishes her to take it—commands her, and would account it the greatest honour she can do him, to cast all her cares and burdens upon his shoulders. Do it in the prayer of faith, and, come what may, the issue will be to you prosperous.

You say nothing of France: perhaps we may see or hear of you the next week, when we hope to get home. Your remembrances of this family were very acceptable to Mr. T., Walter and Samuel, for which they all desire I would thank you. See the fruit of Voltaire's principles—now they are operating. Show me an egg, and I will tell you what it will hatch. May God keep old England from their baleful influence! He only can do it. Even among us they prevail too much. May he stop the spreading of the cause, and the effect also.

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXXI.

May 12, 1790.

Dear Friend.—Your letter from Montpellier, April 7th, did not come to my hands till May 7th. It found me at Reading, very glad and very thankful for the abundance of good news which you sent me. My time is up to-morrow; being obliged to attend my church on Ascension-day, one of my great festivals, when we have preaching and the sacrament, according to the rubric of the church of England. We cannot return again so soon as the 18th instant, and therefore shall not be able to meet you at Reading. But, if we miss the sight of you in London, we will follow you with our prayers; especially that excellent petition of Job, "Thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt find nothing amiss." May England appear to you, as it does to me, the peculiar favourite of heaven: and may you come home to enjoy afresh our special privileges. Mrs. R. and my hearty affection to Mrs. I. Whatever can do good to our young friends, may they share abundantly with your friend and servant in the Lord Christ,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXXII.

Oct. 10, 1791.

My dear Friend.—Mr. T. told me he should send a frank to-morrow, and this paper was to be filled with matter: but this moment coming from the mill, he says, he must send it to-night. I have, therefore, only time (now it is past six) to thank you for many long-continued favours—the cause of them I hope to retain as long as I have my being. As I am convinced of the necessity of your journey, I can the more earnestly pray that God would make it answer your most sanguine wishes; and if we are to meet together in this world, it may be with renewed health, and renewed hearts: I am myself, at present, very poorly, with my usual autumn complaint, but by no means left to myself to murmur or complain. It is good. It is for the best. I acknowledge it. I feel it. I thank my God for his supports and comforts. It is not improbable but we may meet, about the latter end of the month, at Reading; and it will be a cordial to see you set out tolerably well. Our real love to Mrs. I.—I hope it will be made a pleasing service to her to attend you in these long journeys. We are very much obliged to Miss I. for her late obliging attentions to us. You will please to remember us to all our friends, as the Shrapnells also do from Bradford, and wish some providence might throw you in their way. Oh that blessed old disciple, Richard Pearce! he thanks you for your thinking of him: he is just ripe for glory. I saw Mr. Spencer, that good man, who also wishes to be remembered to you. The young man you sent to him is likely to do well.

Mr. Serle's "Christian Remembrancer" is a most proper book for a journey—it is so well divided: chapters so short, and yet very experimental, that I could wish it to be your companion. I do not find that I can read it often enough. May you have the same key to open it, and the same spirit to apply it.

I need say nothing about this family, as Mr. T. writes himself. Mr. T. has two daughters now at the Hot Wells—to-day a poor account of them both. May you keep yours to your joy. Our love to Miss Louisa, and what love dictates—real wishes, further improvement in useful knowledge, and saving grace. So prays yours in our common Lord,

LETTER LXXXIII.

Feb. 8, 1792.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—We have consecrated a day of thanksgiving to the keeper of Israel, who kept your going out safe; and thank you for informing us of it. We hope, before the sun gets out of Aries, he will favour us with another holy day, for bringing you back in peace. Till that happy time arrive, I reckon it my privilege to be daily with you in spirit, and to be keeping up the communion of saints, which is as real a blessing upon earth as it will be in heaven; for believers are all united to one head, have one spirit breathing through them, and enabling them by one faith to cleave close to their head, and, as far as they do, he disposes, and enables them to cleave close in brotherly love to one another. I have you as much upon my heart, while you are at Montpellier, as when I sleep under your roof at Brislington. Prayer for every possible good to you and yours, and praise for the blessings you have received, are truly my present employment; I find it also delightful to remember you before my Lord. May he make it as pleasant to you to read, as it is to me to inform you, of our religious engagements here in the present year. Our word was—Grow in grace. Growth is the end and design of receiving it; and the only purpose of living another year is, that we may get grace in it, and use it. If we have it not, that we may seek until we find it: and, if we have it, that we may improve it; for it is as necessary as breath to the body. The scripture compares it to a cool breeze after a hot sultry day, and also to the dew upon herbs—grace is as refreshing as dew, and as strengthening and bracing as the cool air is in hot weather. When it is saving, it is the favour of the blessed Trinity to sinners who are quickened by the Spirit of grace, and brought by him to believe in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and thereby to the enjoyment of the Father's grace and love. In the Trinity it is always the same, and also in the scriptures; but as to our sense and experience, there is a growth, by more dependence on God's faithfulness to his promises, and more dependence on the supplies of the Spirit, in applying and making the promises good. Thus he who grows in grace this year (as it follows in the text) will grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: the more he knows of him, the more he will trust him; and he who trusts him most will certainly love him best; and he who loves him best will be using all the means of grace, that he may grow in the sense of his favour; the love of Christ will constrain him powerfully to do what Christ loves, to bear patiently Christ's cross, and to persevere in fighting Christ's battles; always remembering that if we have ever so much, Christ giveth more grace.

This was the sum. Reflecting on the past year, the believer should be greatly humbled at his little growth. On the present, setting out in Christ's strength to get forward—more dead to nature, and more alive to grace. Our activity, usefulness, holiness, happiness, depend on our growing into Christ, and daily making such a progress that we may get more grace to return him more glory. This is my daily prayer for all the family, Mrs. I. and Miss, and your English friends, in which my dear partner most heartily joins. I heard of you at Paris —a friend saw you at Mr. Maronne's church, and was pleased to see you so much affected by his discourse: truly, so was I: my heart rejoices that the gospel is known, felt, and in its real blessings enjoyed in your heart. I had an offer to go and preach at Mr. Maronne's, and my expenses paid; but it is too late in life: yet I am trying to get some lively gospel minister to go to Paris. The winter has been at times severe, but never long. My crocuses were in blossom, and fine, last Friday, Feb. 3, and at present our spring delightful; I wish you were with us, that you might experience some of our good days. I have no correspondence in Bristol to inform me of any thing going on there. As you return, let us look at you, and be thankful that once more you vouchsafe to visit your own country and friends. Pray for

SOUTHAMPTON, Oct. 25, 1792.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—We have waited with patience for your visit from day to day, but no Mr. I.: Mr. Samuel T. expected you, and was very much disappointed; as he told me, last night, that he wanted to consult you. We set out for Reading to-morrow, in our way home; and shall be glad to hear how Providence may direct you to dispose of yourself this winter Go, or stay, I shall be with you; but I should like to know your determinations, that I may ask of my bountiful Lord what will be suitable to your case. He is always at hand, and never at a loss for grace sufficient; and he displays his marvellous skill the most when all the foundations of the earth are out of course. It is at this time a strangely disordered world; but his plan is carrying on, and his kingdom shall stand for ever and ever. May he keep you his subject where (come what may) all is safe, and all is happy.

We have had prayer-meetings for fair weather, which the Lord has heard. May he direct you aright every step you take, to the city of habitation. Ever yours in him,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LXXXV.

Dec. 12, 1792.

MY DEAR MADAM.—I feel for your present situation, and I know how much you want the consolations of God. May these abound when others fail. This is the superior excellency of our most holy faith, that it affords not only supports, but also comforts in the worst of times. I am a living witness of this, and I hope and pray you may join me in attesting that God is very good in all his dealings with his children. When Mr. I. was in town, he was kind to give us a great deal of his company; and he promised to write us word of his safe arrival in France, and how his ward fared. Our anxiety is great in not hearing from him. It will be a great favour to me and Mrs. Romaine, if you will oblige us with an account of his safety. With much thankfulness do I bless my God for his mercy to Miss I., who will be a real comfort to you during this lonesome winter. I am not without hopes of Miss L.: she is in my book. From my country all is good news: this world—poor France has none—without Christ—My heart bleeds for the dismal tragedies of the day. Accept our best wishes, and believe me to be, in bonds never to be broken, your real friend—in our common Lord.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER LXXXVI.

Jan. 23, 1793.

My dear Madam.—I am much beholden to you for your speedy answer to my inquiries, and for good news, and for much concerning our friend abroad, and friends at home, very dear to you by natural bonds, but much more by that nearest of all relations, the bond of the Spirit. I acknowledge with thankfulness the many favours of God to you, and am at prayers for the continuance of them —that he who has begun a good work may carry it on to perfection in your sister, brother, and all your children. Where there are fair buds and blossoms, may they not be blighted, but bear rich and ripe fruit, that will endure unto everlasting life.

In return for your good news, I am happy that I can send you some of mine—indeed some of the best which ever came from heaven. It relates to a person called Melchisedek, which was our word for this year, of whom great things are spoken, Gen. xiv. and Psal. cx.; such as can belong to none but the Lord God; and, now they are talking of putting down all kings, I thought it high time to look after a kingdom that cannot be moved: and such I have found in this name, as the apostle has explained it at large, and given us a whole chapter upon it, Hebrews vii. He says it means the king of righteousness—king Jesus, who is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and has all power in heaven and earth, to make his subjects righteous. He is the Lord their righteousness—Almighty to pardon their sins, almighty to subdue their sins, and all their enemies, and almighty to give them faith to trust him for salvation, and for all the things which accompany salvation. Happy subjects, who, being justified by faith, have peace with God, and who live under his government safe and happy. They do not live up to their privileges if either guilty fears or natural fears distress them. When kingdoms are convulsed, states are overthrown, and the civil world turned upside down, the feet having got into the place of the head—then he says to the weakest of his subjects, "Fear not, lest any hurt you: I will keep you night and day: under my protection you are as safe as if you were in heaven."

There was a great deal said of this most blessed Melchisedek, which I need not repeat; you have heard his praises celebrated so often by me, and long before in the word of God, Psalm xlvi., and in that famous hymn, Isaiah xii. We only want more faith to make him more precious, and ourselves more happy. Let this be our study; and on him may our hearts be fixed through the present year. The government is upon his shoulders—the greatest concerns, and the least. May our King (for his eyes and care are every where) look on our travelling friend, and keep him till we meet in peace. May you and yours find it a faithful saying, recorded of his subjects, Psalm cxii. 7, 8, and then you will prize and love Melchisedek.

Mrs. R. has a very bad cold, but it is mending; so is mine. I find inward health a great promoter of bodily health; and I would recommend my Doctor as the only giver of eternal health. Our real love in him to Miss I. and our best wishes to Louisa. When you see our friends at Stoney Hill, or at Clifton, be so good as to recommend us to them in christian affection; and to Mr. T. and Mr. B. Again I thank you for your very obliging letter, and am in our dearest Lord, and in his bonds, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXXVII

April 24, 1793.

My dear Madam.—I have to thank you for your kind remembrance of us, and for acquainting us with your present uneasiness: it is ours, as well as yours.

We often converse about it, and do truly feel for you. My only reason for not writing before was from a fear that our sentiments would not give you the relief we wished. I thought it would only increase your suspicions of Mr. I.'s safety. He has been very much lately upon my heart, and I have been led, without knowing his situation till you informed me, to pray for him. My Lord, I trust, has him in his keeping, and his tender mercies are over him for good: he can preserve him safe in the den of lions, and give you to see his face with joy. If he hear my prayers, and I once more behold him on English ground, it will make my heart truly thankful and happy. God hasten the time!

You see, my good friend, the truth of my doctrine, which I am always inculcating, because I experience the blessedness of it; that is, I am trying to persuade every body to live by faith, trusting their dearest comforts in the hand, and leaving them to the management of the Lord Christ, even life itself. A true Christian holds all by grace, which is the best and the safest tenure in the world. What we have from the sovereign bounty of the giver, we honour him by suffering him to keep it for us, and us for it; and then all will be well, come what may. You have heard of a man who lost nine children at a stroke, and yet he was enabled to kiss this sharp rod, and to say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord." In this patience may he enable you also to possess your soul till he be pleased to turn our present prayers into thanksgiving. And when that happy day arrives (Oh may it be soon, very soon!) you will make Mrs. R. and me very happy in giving us occasion to join our praises with yours. 'Till that time I shall be in my watch-tower, waiting on my Lord, and expecting his gracious answer; of which I am very seldom disappointed. Yours,

W. Romaine.

LETTER LXXXVIII.

June 7, 1793.

My dear Madam.—We had begun our thanksgiving on Tuesday morning. Mr. I. called at my son's, at Reading, and though only the servant was up, yet, from all circumstances, they concluded it was our friend. My son knew how anxious we were about his safety and his arrival, and therefore sent us word directly by the coach. Oh it was a joyful message indeed: it brought forth warm praises to Him who is good, and doeth good to the children of men—who kept our friend's going out and coming in. Perhaps nobody felt more gratitude than myself, excepting Mrs. I. and her daughters: with you I may not compare. But, after many prayers and much waiting, such a gracious answer made us keep a day of thanksgiving with uncommon joy. May my Lord consecrate your heart to give him all the glory; and may his return prove a real blessing to his children and friends. I am interested in his recovery; and he who can restore him and soon shall hear often from me, until prayer for health be turned into the voice of rejoicing, and he himself shall say, "I am now well, both in body and soul, thanks be to Him whose mercy endureth for ever."

While we, his friends, are thus striving who of us shall be most thankful for this special providence, I would hope and pray that Mr. I. himself, for whom we are praising, may feel more than any of us. It is God's goodness to him for which we are so much affected. Oh what mercies have followed him all the days of his life! and none greater than those of the present year and journey. May a record of them be written deep upon his heart; and when these are added to the vast sum of mercies already received, and to the greatest of all still in hope, may he be enabled in all things to be giving of thanks. While he is kept in this happy frame, he will feel as if he was got into paradise, and had really entered into the joy of his Lord.

Be assured, my partner, standing by me, is impressed with the same sentiments as myself. We have often joined in prayer for what now occasions our mutual thanksgivings. May this be the happiest meeting in your lives. Oh that the voice of joy and health may sound loudly in the dwellings of the righteous, and every breath be praise. So prays an old friend, and a true friend,

W. ROMAINE,
For all his friends at Brislington.

LETTER LXXXIX.

June 11, 1793.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—You refreshed my spirit, and I am thankful. What has been done to you has been God's way of old—"many are the troubles of the righteous; but out of them all the Lord delivereth him:" so he will go on with you. And yet a little while he will come and give you an everlasting deliverance. I am better pleased that you did not stop in London: the magnet ought to point to your own family. There was the chief attraction. Their pleasure at the sight of you was ours also: and I hope and pray that our mutual pleasure may continue and increase by your gaining strength and spirits every day.

This is a preaching day; but I would not neglect giving you an account of our engagements. I never can get out of town till about the end of July, and stopping, as I must, at Reading, and at Mr. S.'s, I could not by any means reach B. till about the end of August: you will settle whether that can be made convenient for your return from Beminster: it is the earliest we can think of quite leaving London. You will please, to Mrs. I., to present my grateful acknowledgments for her last letter. Oh how good is our God to your children! May his abundant grace and blessing rest upon them. I see no end of these wars and distresses of nations. The cause remains—rather increases: so must the effects. "If you walk contrary to me, I will walk contrary to you:" this he has proved to be his way in all ages; and I pray, but with trembling, for our own land, lest national iniquity should be nationally punished. Pray for

LETTER XC.

READING, Aug. 3, 1793.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I was just going to write, when your letter came this morning, Aug. 3d. We had agreed to set out for B. Tuesday the 27th, and hope to be with you the next day. I wish to live under an abiding sense of the certainty of death, and of preparation for it. Thank God, I feel the truth of your reflections, and I know in whom I have believed. Just on the verge of eternity, oh it is a blessed prospect to be able to look forward with a hope full of glory and immortality! It makes age, with its numerous infirmities, not only tolerable, but truly blessed. To live in the Lord is heaven upon earth—to die in the Lord is the heaven of heavens. I am a witness for Jesus. How happy it is to live by faith in him! And Jesus himself is a witness how happy it is to die in faith: so he assures us—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." He who spake it with a voice from heaven has never broken his word to one dying believer; and he will not to you: trust, and be not afraid. Cordially yours,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XCI.

BRADFORD, Oct. 8, 1793.

MY VERY DEAR MR. I.—I saw Mr. E. M. on Sunday, who told me you was still at B. Peace be with you there, and every where, you and yours; he can make your home a paradise, and Beminster the door of heaven If it be his holy will, for which I pray, he can make a winter in England as healthful as the south of France, or the best of Spain. we are fully persuaded of it, who live by faith; for he says to us, "Cast all your care upon me: for I care for you—Come what may, I will make it work for the best." Do, Sir, try him. Take him at his word, and let him manage for you this winter: depend upon it, he will look to all your matters, and will take it kindly of you that you trust them in his hands: he is faithful—I am a witness for him—He has done for me better than I could either ask or think; and he vouchsafed to give me the honour of pleading with him, that he would do as much for you. Oh that he may make an English winter as profitable as a French; and may give you as much, yea, more occasion to thank him for home mercies than for foreign. And may God's favourite land be your favourite. We have Mrs. I. and all your concerns upon our hearts, being, with true Christian love, in our dearest Lord, your friends and servants,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XCII

Jan. 4, 1794.

My dear Friend.—When I saw your red wafer, before I opened your letter, my heart leaped for joy; but, when I read the contents, I blessed his holy name, and gave him all the glory. It is his own doing; and, indeed, it ought to be marvellous in our eyes. The more he makes it so, we will join prayer to praise, and beg of him, that whatever was his gracious purpose, in his late visitation, it may be completely answered, and Mrs. I.'s body and soul may be better for it. Oh what a Jesus do we serve! with what confidence may we trust him, who bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up! And he gives us full warrant. Trust in him at all times, ye people: pour out your hearts before him in the prayer of faith. God will be a sure refuge for you in the distresses of life, and in the hour of death. In this delightful exercise, methinks, I hear our friend: What return shall I make unto the Lord for all the benefits that he hath done unto me?—I will offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord. Oh that I may answer his gracious purpose in raising me up again, that I may grow in grace, and in the knowledge and love of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: to him be glory, both now and for ever. Mr. I. stands by, and says, Amen; for I know his feelings: he is blessing his God, who has favoured him with such a gift, and has now, as it were, redoubled it, by continuing it: he is praying to be made, and to be kept thankful, that every sight of Mrs. I. may stir up gratitude and praise in his heart to a bountiful Jesus. Oh! if ever I take my seat in the hall, to worship again, may our meeting be something of heaven, and our praises like theirs above. What mercies! how great—how many! I believe Miss I. knows how to value, perhaps much better than I can, such a parent restored to her: she is sensible of the signal favour; and I pray with the same warm heart Miss L. may thank her God—I would hear her do it. Oh what a blessing to me that my dear mother, who loves me as her own soul, and is the safe guide of my youth, should be raised from such a bed of sickness, and spared to me, and to my sister? I wish to praise the Lord for this his goodness, and to show him my thankfulness in word and in deed. So be it.

You have friends to join you: I know some who are giving glory where it is due, and begging of God that the family and relations, and all your connexions, may be profited by this visitation. May increasing health inspire increasing gratitude. I hope my Lord will take especial care of your own health, and be the guardian and defender of our country. I am at prayers—My chief concern in the times is with God: let him do what he will, believers will be safe, as in the ark, as in going through the Red Sea, Yea, they may sing the 46th Psalm, as I do this day. Your friend in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER XCIII.

Feb. 1, 1794.

My dear Madam.—I have many reasons to rejoice with you, and join my praises to him who hath done such great things for you, and will do greater still. He has restored your life from destruction—health is returning—and spiritual health is returned. Oh how did my heart rejoice! Far more than for any thing outward, when I read of God's abundant grace to you in giving you a thankful spirit! For this is spiritual liveliness, and spiritual growth. I could not help taking up these holy words—"I will bless the Lord at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth. My soul shall make her boast in the Lord: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad. Oh magnify the Lord with me; and let us exalt his name together. We sought the Lord, and he heard us, and delivered us from all our fears. Blessed, blessed, most blessed, be his holy name." Do I not hear you say, Amen?

I have observed the public mind too much agitated about the signs of the times: and my own friends rather uneasy about what was coming upon the earth. Come what may, I have always an infallible antidote: and I gave for the word of this year, "The God of hope," Rom. xv. 13. This is one of his high styles and titles. The God from whom believers in Christ may hope for all possible good, and to be saved from all possible evil. Such are his promises—and faith looks at the truth of them, and hope waits for the fulfilling them, not doubting but that God is faithful. This is his character—"a promise-keeping God." And may he render this year famous for the exercise of Christian hope—well grounded—sure and certain—built upon immutable things—and bringing the words before us into happy experience; even that the God of hope may fill us with all joy and peace in believing, that we may abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost.

This hope is his gift—a grace of his power—the fruit of believing. Whatever God has promised, be it ever so great, ever so much, he enables the believer to hope for its accomplishment, and to wait God's time. If it be for sin—being justified by faith, he gives peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord—peace in the sense of pardon, and peace in the sense of favour, that he has brought us into a state of favour, and that we stand in it with the fullest security of the word, promise, covenant, and oath of the Holy Trinity, that we shall be kept unto the end. This is the hope which never maketh ashamed. All worldly hopes may disappoint, but this cannot. Rom. v. 5. The believer looks at sin, and triumphs, Rom. viii. 31, 32, 33, 34, looks at the troubles arising from sin; for they all come from it, and he carries on his triumph, Rom. viii. 35, to the end. He looks at death, and still is happy; for he has hope in his death. Prov. xiv. 32. He looks, beyond death, to a God of hope. He looks for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, with a hope full of glory and immortality. Psalm xlviii. 14; Titus i. 1, 2, 3; Jude 20, 21, 24, 25. This is the sum and substance, of which you can make the application. The word and Spirit of God encourage us to trust and not be afraid: for he is faithful who promised. Is this my hope? Have I begun the year with waiting thus upon God? It is very high worship, and the most honourable that can be to God's promises. Oh for many, many such worshippers! they need not fear the raging storm, threatening destruction to the earth. They have embarked all their hopes with their Almighty Jesus; and he has engaged to bring them safe to the haven where they would be, as you read, Heb. vi. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20. The prayer that ended the sermon comes down to Brislington; and Mrs R.'s love, with mine, to you all.

W. Romaine.

LETTER XCIV.

April 19, 1794.

My dear Friend.—I was made to believe that I should have seen you, face to face, long before this, and your last letter gave me some hopes of it; but I wait no longer. You cannot think how much I was flattered by your account of yourself; because it was a demonstration of the truth of my principles, which you have so often heard from my mouth, and have so often under my hand. You see, he can keep you any where, every where, when duty calls you. He can make England a very paradise: so it is to me—all but heaven. How well has our God carried you through the winter—found you work—fitted you for it—given you health and strength; and, what is better still, spiritual health and strength, to thank him, and bless his dear name. Oh may every heart in your family, and every tongue in it, ascribe to him with gratitude Mrs. I.'s recovery, and your own particular mercies, and the dutifulness of your children! May HE have all the glory! It is from him that the voice of joy and health is in the dwellings of the righteous; and to him I look with thanksgiving for making you a witness for my old doctrine. Oh! it is a blessed thing to trust him. He promises, and he will make his word good. Trust in him at all times, ye people, and in all places. They shall want no manner of thing that is good. But, now I have got upon this subject, I must stop; for there is no end of it · the triumph of faith is the everlasting joy of heaven. I hear Mr. T. has undertaken great things this Easter. I wish his strength may be equal to his courage. Both mine continue, very marvellously in mine own eyes. I labour more than ever; sometimes to the weariness of the flesh; but my friend gives me rich cordials, and I go on, aiming, as he helps me, to magnify and exalt God-Jesus. He has poured out a very remarkable spirit of prayer; and multitudes, multitudes, through the land, are on their bended knees, lifting up holy hands, crying for mercy. I hope he will hear, and answer by granting us a national reformation, that iniquity and infidelity may not be our ruin. Mr. William Jones has just printed a sermon on the Man of Sin. It is very interesting. I wish you to read it.

The times are still tempestuous, and the poor church tossed on the waves, like Noah's ark: but not one embarked with Christ shall ever perish. They may suffer shipwreck; but, as it was, Acts xxvii., they all got safe to land. I am in the ark, and hope it will soon be so with me. To this most blessed Pilot I commit you and yours. Do not forget in your best moments your friend and servant in the Lord,

W. Romaine

LETTER XCV.

Reading, June 20, 1794.

My good Friend.—If I did not hear oftener of you than from you, I should be not a little grieved. As it is, I have been much led out in my meditations on the present state of your family, and the trials of your faith. If they should be greater than they are, there is a rich supply provided, ready for use, for your suitable improvement. He who sitteth upon the throne has grace sufficient to help in every time of need; and he courts you to take it. You do him a favour by coming to his fulness for a quiet and patient spirit. He loves to be liberal, and would have you to trust him, as far as his promises go. Your daughter is in his hands, and he will be kind and tender over her. Your prayers for her will soon be turned into praises: mine are begun; so are my dear partner's, who feels much for Mrs. I. on this occasion. Many blessings will be given to you if any of your family will give us one line, directed to me at Dr. R.'s, Reading. Your kind invitation has been respected; and we hope, in the course of the summer, to visit our Brislington friends. Your convenience will be studied, that our coming may neither interfere with business nor pleasure. It cannot be, on our part, till some time in August; but of that more hereafter. You say nothing of

Mr. Jones's Sermon on the Man of Sin, which I recommended. It is all I have to say on the present distress of nations. My sanctuary grows every day more safe and precious, because I find all that is said of it to be true in Isaiah xxvi. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, &c. Pray for

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XCVI.

Aug. 9, 1794.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—We were in Buckinghamshire for a fortnight, and did not receive your letter of the 25th July till August 6th: nothing else could have hindered me from not answering it sooner, especially as your motions depend so much upon it. We set out for the West (Tiverton) on Wednesday next, 13th instant, and hope to get there by Saturday. Staying and resting a little, we intend to visit the sea-coast, perhaps at Teignmouth. And after our return to Tiverton, which cannot be till about the first week in September, we will give you as early notice as we can of our meeting, on a day fixed, at Brislington. I look forward with prayer, that it may be made a happy meeting to us all. "As iron sharpeneth iron, so," &c. We want much encouragement from the warnings given us of our uncertain stay here: age preaches, "Be ready:" infirmities second the lesson: the state of the world cries aloud—wars, tumults, cruelties never heard of before. The state of the church also is alarming, more than any thing else—Philosophy with its vain deceits—Infidelity, with its natural children—a swarm of most profane practices, destroying all subordination to God's ministers and to God's magistrates, whom he has set over us, that we might lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. These evils are growing worse and worse, especially as none can tell when they will stop, or how. How earnestly should we endeavour to strengthen one another's hearts and hands in the good ways of God when we see all these things come upon the earth! I keep in my watch-tower, looking to him for his gift of repentance and reformation to a guilty land, that iniquity may not be our ruin; and thanking him for his special favour, that there is a sanctuary out of the reach of all dangers, and that we, of his mere grace, are in it; described Isaiah xxvi. 1, 2, 3, 4. Do not cease to pray for your old friend, and the Lord's old disciple,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER XCVII.

TIVERTON, Aug. 27, 1794.

MY GOOD FRIEND, OLD FRIEND.—The time is approaching when I hope to meet you at B.; and I wish it for the strengthening of one another's hearts in the ways of God: and I wish it the more, because my time is short. I published a book upon Ecclesiastes 12th, some years ago, written by a Dr. Smith, physician to King Charles II. I then thought I understood every symptom of old age: but now I find a better comment, since I feel them in my own person. And though my tabernacle be taken down, yet it is done with so much tender compassion, and so gently, that I am enabled to put old age among my blessings, and thank my God that I have so few infirmities. We purpose, God willing, to leave this place Sept. 9th, Tuesday, and to be with you Wednesday or Thursday in that week: may Mrs. I. and your daughters receive from our meeting all the good we wish: and Mrs. Romaine says, she hopes it will not be little. I am, in my dearest Lord, your faithful servant,

LETTER XCVIII.

Oct. 9, 1794.

My dear Friend.—Yesterday we got safe to Portswood, through the kind hand of our God. Mrs. R. in good health, and desiring with me to be remembered in love to Mrs. I. and to your daughters. In the midst of this great storm, which rages through Europe with unabating fury, what a blessing to enjoy a calm within! a quiet conscience—a happy heart—a true paradise! Let the hurricane spread, and threaten to carry all before it; yet you can recollect what is said of a righteous man: "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord: his heart is established: he shall not be afraid." This is the haven of peace, into which he has entered, and is safe, whose anchor is Christ: all with him is sure and steadfast. Come what may upon the earth, even the great day of the Lord, instead of fearing any thing that can hurt him, he may, he will, lift up his head with joy, and triumph in the God of his salvation. May this be your portion when most wanted.

Our stay here will be short. We paid you the longest visit we have made this summer. It is continually sounding in mine ears: "They sorrowed most of all because they should see his face no more," &c.* It is certain, at my time of life, we cannot promise ourselves on any good ground a yearly visit to our friends. Our meetings must be before God—in the prayer of faith for them—which is the communion of saints—and praise to him for brotherly love with its heavenly fruits. I hope to visit you with my last and dying testimony of faith. I go to town sooner than usual, that I may put my "Triumph of Faith" to the press: and then, my good God favouring me, you will read, and I trust will be a witness, that "Blessed are they who live—and most blessed are they who die in Jesus." To him I commend you and Mrs. I., Miss I. and dear Louisa, with the blessings of Jesus on you all. I am, with hearty love, your friend and servant in our dearest Jesus,

LETTER XCIX.

Nov. 14, 1794.

Yes; poor L. is dead; and he gives us warning. One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh. The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to the place where he arose. His sun is gone down. Yours and mine are setting. What a comfort! our day's work is done; we are walking as children in the light, and waiting to be sent for, whenever our Lord pleases. It need not be a violent death. It must be soon—in the course of nature. It may be in a moment. Come ever so soon, it will be a blessed time. When—and where—and how—all is settled by him who says to you and to me, "Fear not; I will be with you," &c. As to what you mention of his funeral, I have taken care of that: but I understand from Mr. N., the curate, that there are some little expenses attending his illness, apothecary's bill, &c. which Mr. C. has agreed to help me to discharge: and if any thing should remain after his debts at W. are discharged, out of respect to Mr. L. we would make Mrs. L. a present of it, although I have informed her already that our subscription is now closed, and that she cannot any longer look to us for her support.

I have nothing to do with the times but in the way of prayer. Grant us peace in our time, O Lord. So I ask, and keep on asking, although it seems to be farther and farther out of sight. Thus the prophet prayed: "O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? Put up thyself into thy scabbard; rest, and be still." To whom it was answered, "How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge to take vengeance, and there is no repentance nor turning from their crying sins." The Lord grant iniquity may not be our ruin! I have time to pray for Louisa. I hope he will hear and answer, who is my friend and yours. Mrs. I. and Miss have much occasion for faith and patience: I pray for them, that they may find grace to help them in every time of need. Very soon, yet a very little while, and faith and patience will be no more wanted: till that time, may they do their perfect work. I am very busy printing my dying testimony for the truth of the gospel of Jesus, and for the power of it. If you live to see it, you will know somewhat more of his unspeakable grace and favour to

LETTER C.

Dec. 19, 1794.

MY DEAR MADAM.—None of your friends can sympathise with you more on this melancholy occasion than we do. I have written to your brother by this day's post, directing him where to look for supports and comforts. When I was in the same situation, by the loss of a son in the East Indies, I found the consolations of God not a few, nor small. I hope and pray that he may find the same, and in patience possess his soul. A parent (and Mr. G. had much of a parent's feeling) cannot but grieve at the loss of an only son: yet there is grace promised sufficient to help to bear quietly, yea, to profit from this affliction, as you read in Job's case, and in Hebrews xii. The same God, and who keepeth promise for ever, can do, and does as great things, for them who trust in him, as he ever did. And the prayer of faith availeth much to sanctify all our afflictions. Mine are very great at present: Mrs. Romaine has been very ill for three weeks, and is still confined: we hope she is mending; but it is very slow. I must therefore beg your prayers for me and her. Mine for yourself and family do not fail: and for a profit by this loss, I am pleading with the God of all consolation. May he sanctify it to all his relations: and make up an abundant blessing for your spiritual improvement by this his afflicting providence. I am, with great truth, your obliged friend and servant in the Lord,

LETTER CI.

Jan. 29, 1795.

HON. MADAM.—I received your letter yesterday, and though I am very busy, yet I answer it immediately, thanking God that we have learned to rejoice with them that do rejoice. Mrs. R. is singularly obliged to you, because she was very much interested about these young men, and blessed God, who gave them such a great deliverance. I heartily wish they themselves may be made very sensible of it. Mrs. R. is very well in health, and has no complaint but a weakness in her ankles, which makes it painful to walk: and as to myself, I have suffered greatly from a cough, and do suffer still; but, altogether, I am a miracle of God's goodness. As to what he is doing in the earth, I take no part, but in prayer. Matters are never so bad but he can set them right; and I know that the fervent effectual prayer of a righteous man availeth much. From this knowledge I have been encouraged to reprint a little tract; many thousands of which were printed in the two last wars, and owned of God, and blessed. As soon as printed, I will send some of them to Mr. Hazard's, where they may be had for one penny a piece.

Your not hearing from us so long, was owing to Mr. I., who is in my debt in the way of correspondence.

You will receive soon my "Triumph of Faith." I have an opportunity of sending it by a friend, who will deliver it to you: in which you will see my present views. I hope they will answer your experience, and establish your heart in believing, come what may upon this wicked world.

I thank you for your account of your family. I rejoice in your joy; and I pray for Miss Louisa, that her health may be perfectly restored, and she and her dear sister may be great domestic blessings to their parents.

I desire to be remembered to Mrs. B. and to my good brother T., when you see or hear of them: and I would thank Mr. G. for his kind letter, which I cannot get leisure to answer,

You will favour me with your interest at my master's throne, who can make these, my last days, my best days. May he do the same for you and for Mr. I With great truth, I am, your faithful friend, and humble servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CII.

To Mrs. B.

Brighthelmstone, Oct. 14, 1764.

Grace be with you, my dear friend, and with yours.—Upon hearing of the late mercy which you have received, I found my heart rejoice in the Lord, and my faith in him strengthened. Surely his compassions fail not. He is all faithfulness and truth. The mercy which he has promised, he will fulfil to a thousand generations, and none who trusted in his promised mercy ever were or ever will be confounded. I had no doubt of this in myself, through his good hand upon me; but by his dealings with you and yours I am more confirmed. and learn to trust him more. May his great kindness to you have the same effect. May it bring you to see more clearly that you are in Christ, and, as you learn to trust and to depend more upon him, you will thereby get more out of his fulness. And this seems to me to be the end and purpose for which a believer lives. He is in Christ, and he is suffered to live a longer time, that every new day may bring him to a more settled dependence upon Christ. His faith is to be always growing and getting some fresh establishment in Christ. So we read of the Thessalonians, in the first epistle. Their faith was so famous, that it was spoken of throughout the world; and yet, afterwards, in the second epistle, it is said, Their faith had grown exceedingly. It was not only kept alive, or at a stand, but also increased, being renewed day by day by the word and Spirit of God; under whose teaching the believer attains more large views of the covenant of grace, of the unchangeable faithfulness of the Eternal Three in their covenant offices, and of his safety in relying upon their making good to him every covenant mercy. Thus, seeing all things well ordered and sure in the covenant for his ac eptance, through the finished work of Jesus, and for his holy and happy walk through the almighty grace of Jesus—whatever could bring him to God, and keep him near to God, all provided, and all made over to him by two unchangeable things, in which it is impossible that God should lie. On this foundation resting his soul, his conscience is at peace, and he grows daily more sensible of his being in the favour and love of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in their covenant offices, and gets more comfortable evidence of their acting in each for his good. And as his faith thus grows, whatever opposes him in his walk becomes more easy to overcome; because he sees all fulness of grace and power treasured up in his dearest Saviour, and he knows it is there for his use, and he there goes for every thing he wants; and, by daily sweet experience, finding the faithfulness of Jesus, he grows bolder, and has more freedom to go to him. He learns not to be discouraged by what he feels in himself, be it what it will; but he carries it to the Lord. And when he makes use of Christ's promised strength, and relies wholly on it, to subdue corruptions, to conquer enemies, to overcome difficulties, to deny self, and to bear the cross, then all things go well. So long as he trusts in the Lord, the Lord makes him to prosper. The devil cannot come at such a person, but by attacking his faith, and he cannot conquer him till faith give way; and his faith will not shrink, because God keeps it, and with him he trusts faith and all, looking up to the Lord to keep him by the power of his might.

Oh! happy man this; to whom the Lord saith, "I will preserve thee from all evil;" and he saith, "Lord, I believe thy word; and on thy power alone do I depend to preserve me:" to whom the Lord saith again, "I will bless thee, and thou shalt lack no manner of thing that is good."

True, Lord; so I find it. What good thing lack I yet, now thou art mine and I am thine? Thou hast taken all my evil upon thyself, and thou hast given me all thy good. In having thee, I have all things: only I want more faith. Oh that I may glorify thee more! by putting more trust and confidence in thee! Still, Lord, increase; still, day by day, let it be growing—a growing faith increasing exceedingly, until I receive the end of my faith, even the salvation of my soul.

I kept writing on, thinking these things, which are the joy of my heart, may, in these retired hours, rejoice yours also. May the Lord convey them to you with that life and power which I feel now I am writing. I am a poor creature—the poorest of all. Yet Jesus is mine. In his love, and by his sweet constraining grace, I am yours,

LETTER CIII.

BRIGHTON, Sept. 30, 1795.

DEAR Mrs. B.'s servant salutes her in his wife's name, being appointed to answer her letter.—You want to receive something from us, which breathes the air of Canaan. Is not Jesus Canaan itself? Is he not the breath, the light of life; the bread, the water of life; the garments of salvation; the everlasting feast of joy and gladness of that blessed country? While we talk of him by the way, as we are travelling to it, we not only breathe the air, but also enjoy the good things of Canaan itself: for when Jesus dwells in our hearts by faith, we then have possession of the promised inheritance. Our Jesus is all of it to us. Having him, we have it all. Canaan is a wilderness without him. The finest place you can conceive would be no heaven if Jesus was not there. And wherever he is, there heaven is; as the court is, where the king is. "Whom have I even in heaven, but thee?" said blessed David: and one, full of the same Spirit, placed his utmost wishes in being present with the Lord, which he knew was best of all. Our heaven, you know, my friend, is not the place, nor the fine things in it, gold and silver, and precious stones; but it is Jesus, our matchless, loving, lovely Saviour. His presence is to us the fulness of joy.

The common notion of heaven is very much like the Turks' paradise. Writers and preachers generally make it a most glorious place, full of the richest things; and they take care to tell us, there is no pain there, but all pleasure. So it is. But what sort of pleasure? Why, to be with the Lord Christ; to see him face to face; to see him as he is; to behold the glory of God in the person of Christ Jesus, according to our Lord's prayer, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me, where I am; that they may behold my glory." This is the highest enjoyment—to behold his glory. They have nothing above this in heaven; and of this faith has some very sweet foretastes below. When the Spirit has drawn our hearts to Jesus, then he gives us daily, by our fellowship with him, happy earnests of the glory which shall be revealed; and we cannot rest till with open face we behold it. All he gives us here only whets the appetite, and makes us wish more for full and perfect enjoyment; as one sweetly sings of the beatific vision, which is the sight of Jesus,

> What we here taste of thy rich grace
> Makes us long more to see thy face;
> We hunger more, and thirst to see
> The heav'n of heavens, Lord, in thee.

If this be the language of your heart, you are indeed breathing the air of Canaan, and partaking, according to your present capacity, of the good things of it. The heir of that promised land is your Saviour, and with him you are an heir of God, and a co-heir with Christ. Your Hebrew verse proves evidently that you are one of these happy co-heirs; because you are longing for more sweet breathings and heavenly gales of grace, coming from, and drawing you to, Jesus, and thereby assuring you more of the promised inheritance. There are certain means appointed for these purposes, of which, while we make use, may their end be answered in your soul and mine. And

The first is, the word, which is the ministration of righteousness, that exceedeth in glory, being the righteousness not of a creature only, but also of God: for therein is this righteousness revealed from faith to faith. The word is a revelation of the glory of this righteousness of God, in the person of Jesus Christ, discovering to us the Father's grace and love, in placing the fulness of this righteousness, with all its fruits, in his co-equal Son; and the Spirit's grace and love in testifying and glorifying of this fulness, and in bringing the believer to rest safe, and live happy upon it. This is the subject of both testaments, which we shall be studying night and day, and meditating on it with love in our hearts, until we get within the veil, and want no more love-tokens and kind promises from our heavenly lover—he being then ours, with all his glory, in full and never-ending fruition. Here I take shame to myself for reading so little of this precious treasure which breathes throughout the perfumed air of Canaan. Learn, my friend, from my sad experience: and when you read more than I have done, mind,

Secondly, that you read in a constant dependence upon the inward teaching of the Spirit of Jesus. The word is the ministration of the Spirit, by which he is administered, and with which he acts; for he is to the word what light is to the eyes. Let a man have ever such good eyes, he cannot see any thing with them, unless he have light: so the word must have light shining upon it, to make us see it in its clearness and feel it in its power. When he opens the eyes of our understanding, and enlightens them to understand the scripture, one cannot help admiring and adoring what light he throws upon them and what life he puts into them; for he renders them the power of God unto salvation. Then one gets up to Pisgah's top; and not only fine prospects of Canaan's fruitful hills appear, but also her spicy odours perfume the air, and bring us rich foretastes of that good and gracious land. Oh! for more of this Spirit in you and me! He is the very breath of life, to quicken the word. With it in your hand, and him in your heart, you will have the inspiration of the Almighty, and your present knowledge will be but like infancy compared to that maturity to which he will bring you: for,

Thirdly, the word of God, thus explained by the Spirit, will make this material world breathe the air of the spiritual world. The things that are made were therefore made what they are, on purpose to represent and to convey ideas of the invisible things of God. Every outward object is a picture of some inward object: for none of them were made for themselves, but were to reflect and give ideas of something else; namely, of Jesus, and of his spiritual world. Here the scripture philosophy becomes a vast help to a spiritual mind: it represents the world, and all things in it, as mere shadows, and informs us what the true object is which each of them stands for; so that the philosophic mind looks through the sign to the thing signified. Thus all nature preaches grace. Every object speaks something of Jesus; and you cannot open your eyes without being told something of him.

Many are the advantages of viewing things in this light. Such as a continual increase of knowledge. The understanding improves by every object, as it learns to spiritualise every one of them; and it is kept close to the truth: for whatever presents itself to the eye carries its right instruction to the eye of the soul, and thereby becomes profitable to our spiritual and eternal interest.

Temptations are kept out: for they all come from not seeing objects in a true light. The enemy misrepresents, and thereby deceives. Whether he tempts the eye or the heart, he cannot cheat them but by false colours and lies.

The world is kept out; for the spiritual man cannot fall in love with shadows, which all things here are. The whole creation is but a picture: the body and substance is Jesus and his kingdom.

The principal advantage is, conversing and having fellowship with Jesus in every object of which we know the time, nature, and use. When we sit down or walk by the way, eat or drink, or rest, see heaven above with its furniture of sun, moon, &c., or the earth beneath, with its creatures, its products, &c., every thing has a tongue, and reads a lecture concerning Jesus. This the spiritual Psalmist heard when he calls upon all things, animate and inanimate, to join him in praising his Jesus—and a blessed concert they make. My heart has been ravished with hearing the heavens declare the glory of God, and the earth, and all that therein is, echoing back again loud praises to his glory. I cannot walk into the garden but flowers and fruits tell me to praise my Jesus. In the fields I am told of him, and that not fancifully, as a sportive imagination may make something out of nothing; but the scripture informs me what such an object represents, and the sight of it raises, the spiritual idea. So that, whatever I rightly understand, it speaks to me of Jesus, and reminds me of something relating to Jesus and to his kingdom. Then, my dear friend, Canaan is kept in view, and we always breathe its pure air. And that incomparably glorious Jesus, who makes Canaan what it is, grows better known, and more beloved. He is become my one study; but I am a very dull scholar. What I have learned is but just enough to make me count all but dross for him; so much remains still to be learnt; he being an infinite and an everlasting good that I am pressing on. Oh how my heart longs for more of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord! And as I get some little advance, fresh views of his glory sink me to the dust. My vileness is most felt in his clear light. The more precious he grows, the more humbling views I get of myself. As Christ rises, self falls. May you find it so: and the more you do find it, so much the more will you breathe the air of Canaan. I know not how to stop, but my paper, against my will, will not let me go any farther. I am yours, very sincerely,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CIV.

LAMBETH, Jan. 26, 1768.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I received your letter of the 8th instant; in which there was the state of your case. I see nothing singular in it. Scarce a day happens, but I meet some or other in your condition, with exactly the same complaints arising from the very same cause. And I have convinced many a one, through the divine blessing, of their interest in Jesus, from the very arguments they made use of to doubt and question it. Were I to draw the true character of a believer, I would put into it every single circumstance that you mention in your letter; and I would undertake to prove that it made strongly for you, and nothing of it against you. It is the very frame and temper of a real Christian. Just as you describe yourself, is every one that is born of God—feels the very things you do, and is never right when he does not feel them; it being the proper work of the Spirit of Jesus to bring all that are under his teaching to be content, to be exactly what you find yourself, that you may be led to live out of yourself upon the fulness of God-Jesus. He is teaching you this lesson, that he may glorify the Saviour in you. But you are a bad scholar, like me, slow to learn, ready to forget, and, what is worse, apt to pervert the divine instruction. You misapply, and put vile constructions upon, the teaching of the Spirit of God, and give a legal turn and cast to his lesson. I can see, as if written with a sunbeam, the disposition of your mind herein, and can trace from my own experience all the turnings and close windings of your present temptations.

I observe what you say of your judgment. You are enlightened to see that Jesus is all in salvation work. The covenant ordered in all things and sure—this is all my salvation, and as far as I know my own heart, this is all my desire. You unsay these words in the same breath you say them: for, because you are not always satisfied with this salvation, or always alike comforted with it, or with equal happiness enjoying the glorious fruits of it, you therefore doubt and reason about its being yours. Thus you argue: "My judgment is clearly convinced, and my heart desires to be cast wholly upon the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation; but in the act of doing this, I always fail." What reasoning is here! How directly contrary to the spirit of the gospel! For you are looking not at the object of faith, at Jesus, but at your faith. You would draw your comfort, not from him, but from your faith; and, because your faith is not quite perfect, you are as much discouraged as if Jesus was not a quite perfect Saviour. My dear friend, how sadly does the sly spirit of bondage deceive you! For what is your act of believing? Is it to save you? Are you to be saved for believing? If so, then you put acts and works in the place of the Saviour. And faith, as an act, is in your view part of your salvation. The free grace of the covenant you turn into a work; and how well that work is done becomes the ground of your hope. What a dreadful mistake is this, since salvation is not to him that worketh, but to him that believeth.

But besides this mistake, I can see one of the greatest sins in your way of reasoning, and yet finely cloaked under a very specious covering. I pulled it off, and, behold, there was rank treason under it against the crown and majesty of my Lord and God; for you are kept looking at your act of believing. What is this for? Why, certainly, that you may be satisfied with your faith; and, being satisfied with it, what then? No doubt, you will then rest in it, and upon it, satisfied now that Christ is yours, because you are satisfied with your faith. This is making a Jesus of it, and is in effect taking the crown of crowns from his head, and placing it upon the head of your faith. Lord grant you may never do this any more.

I observe, thirdly, how, by this mistake, and by this great sin, the sin of sins, you are robbed of the sweet enjoyment of the God of all comfort. You lose what you seek, and lose it in your way of seeking. You want comfort; and you look to your faith for it. If faith could speak, it would say, I have none to give you: look unto Jesus; it is all in him. Indeed, my friend, it is. The Holy Ghost the Comforter will not glorify your faith. He will not give it the honour of comforting you. He takes nothing to comfort with but the things of Christ—and his things, not as used by you, but as given from him, who is all yours. This lesson, I think, he is teaching you, although you pervert it. He is bringing you off from looking legally at your faith. He intends you should not regard, as you have done, how you believe, but to settle you in believing. I have been long at this, and have learned but very little. I can say my lesson; but when I come to practise, I find I am a dull scholar. The Spirit of Jesus has been teaching me to draw my comforts, not from how well I believe, but from Jesus, in whom I believe; not from there being no failing in my act of faith, but that I do act faith on Jesus, though failingly. My salvation is quite a distinct thing from any act of mine: it depends on the divine purpose and covenant; is absolutely and eternally fixed in the divine will: and this is made known to me by faith. I receive the evidence of it by believing; and so take possession. Faith is not the cause, but the effect. The cause is the act and grace of the Trinity, what the Father, out of sovereign love, gave; what the Son bought with an inestimable price; and what the Holy Spirit proves to a sinner to be a price every way fully sufficient; and so brings him to depend upon it for his redemption. You see, then, that in consequence of the Father's giving Christ for me, the Holy Spirit brings me to Christ, and enables me to trust and rely upon him. This is all that faith has to do in the matter. It is the fruit and evidence of the covenant grace of the Trinity. At best, it is but an open empty hand, stretched forth at God's bidding, and at God's enabling, to lay hold of Christ: but Christ, so laid hold of, is my salvation. It is not faith, but Christ. It is not my hand, but the thing received into my hand, that saves me. I grant you, and I know it well, that much faith brings much comfort from Christ, and carries much glory to him: but the way to get much faith, is not to look at it as you do, but at the Saviour; not to look at your hand, but at Jesus; not how you hold him, but that he is yours, and holds you, and your faith too; and therefore you shall never perish, but shall have everlasting life.

After I had observed these errors in your looking at the act of faith, I did not wonder at the following parts of your letter; such as, your not being pleased with your faith, and therefore not pleased with your state, nor your graces, nor your attainments, nor your own righteousness; but you thought every thing made against you. This is still the same teaching of the Spirit; but you pervert it. Have you nothing to look at but Jesus? That 's right. Then look unto him, and be saved. What! can you see nothing to rest on of your own? Are you forced to renounce the goodness of your faith, as an act? and do you experience that you cannot be saved for it? Very well: hold fast there. Stick to this: no grace, as acted by you, can save: follow this blessed teaching, and cleave with full purpose of heart unto the Lord Jesus. You must learn to make him all in your salvation. He must save you from your faith, as well as from your unbelief; faith, as you act it, being full of sin. If the highest and best act of your faith were to be weighed in the balance of the sanctuary, you would deserve a thousand deaths for it. So much corruption would be found in it, that you could not escape the damnation of hell. Turn about, then; take your eyes off from your acts of faith: look at Jesus. Expect to be received as a poor helpless sinner, not for great and high believing. Come to be saved from your faith, as an act. Follow, as all your salvation is laid up in him, follow him; take comfort from him; see yourself in him, not for any thing in you; trust him, not yourself, not your acts, and learn to discern spirits, to know divine teaching, by this mark—that what tends to humble you, is from the glorifier of the Saviour.

Since I sat down to write, I have been many times interrupted; but I was resolved not to be stopped in writing to-day, that you might at least know what could be said of your case. It is a very common one—common to all who are taught of God: so peculiar to them, that, as I said before, if I were to draw the character of a true child of God, I could not leave out one, not a single one, of the circumstances which you bring against yourself. Indeed, Mrs. B., they are all on your side, and witnesses for Christ. Oh do not then stifle, pervert, nor dispute their evidence. Allow what they say—Your faith is not perfect—Your acts fail—All things fail you. Good, very good. Then away with them. Cast off all looking at, all dependence on them. Betake yourself to Jesus; trust him; use him; grow into him; and let nothing separate you from him. So be it, Lord Jesus.

LETTER CV.

DEAR MADAM.—Yours came safe to hand. It is Mr. Foster's day to preach his lecture at Duke's Place, and will not suit us, nor him, to be absent that day, Sunday 27th. We have no objection against coming to spend a day or two with you, Monday 28th: and, if we hear nothing to the contrary, shall expect your coach any hour agreeable to you on Monday.

Your account of yourself I was suffered to read; and greatly pleased was I with it. You are just brought to the very spot upon which all are saved to whom Jesus is become dear. It is said of him, "He heareth the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him (her too) that hath NO HELPER." Have you no helper—nothing in yourself—nothing within your reach—to help you? Then, behold, there is a Helper—an Almighty Friend—your Friend because you have no other. My dear Mrs. B., your outward state is the very teacher one would wish—weak, burdened, incapable of attention to spiritual or even to temporal matters. How strongly does all this say, and, while you feel it, continue saying—You are now fit to magnify Jesus; he is the Saviour of the poor destitute—the helpless: he pities you; feels tenderly for you; he knows what you want: he has undertaken to supply your needs. While it is best to be helpless, you shall have his help, which is infinitely better than to feel well. Are you burdened? Cannot you carry it? What does that signify? "I will carry it for you, says Jesus: cast it on me, I will carry it, and you too." Welcome, then, say I, welcome helplessness, since it is the means of more acquaintance with the help which Jesus gives to his dear afflicted ones. I am certain all is well; I know all will be well with you. Your help is in Jesus: he cannot fail you. Our respects to Mr. B. and all friends. We are, in great love in Jesus, yours,

LETTER CVI

BLACKFRIARS, Aug. 12, 1769.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—We had a letter from your sister, giving an account of your journey (thanks be to him who kept your going out and your coming in!) and of your present situation and trials, in which I can see nothing singular. The lesson which the Lord is now teaching you, is plain. His way of teaching it has nothing new: it is the established method in his school; and your averseness to learn it occasions all your uneasiness. When he has made you a good scholar, you will then find relief in your soul, whatever befal your poor crazy body.

I take it for granted that you are acquainted with the doctrines of free grace and finished salvation: you are not suffered to doubt of their truth; but you cannot receive comfort from them at this time. Your conscience draws fresh bills of indictment against you. You do not see your interest in your divine Advocate; and therefore you cannot answer them, as you used to do. Hence you are puzzled and mourn; are become impatient and fretful; fear this and the other; and are left to yourself, to your sinkings and dejections, and groundless apprehensions; fancied miseries are felt as real, and fancied fears of dying are as bad as death, yea, worse than death will ever be to you. This is something like your case. Is it not? And what is to be done? Where is the remedy? Certainly our All-wise physician has left some prescription for it; and he can make it, bad as it is, work under him for good. But how? Why, he would teach you now one of his highest lessons, and you are brought into circumstances most exactly suited for your being a proficient in it. He intends in this (as in all things) to promote his own glory as the Alpha and Omega of your salvation; not only in working of it out, for he has satisfied you of this, but also in the security of it; he must have all the honour of the safe-keeping of it—it for you, and you for it. He is the Keeper of Israel, who keeps all the Israel of God by the power of God; and you cannot glorify him, in this his great covenant office, but by giving up your body and soul, you and yours, absolutely to his keeping. And how could you be taught this in a shorter or better way than by being brought into your present distress? For you now find that you can no more secure and keep than you could work out your salvation: he must do it all—begin, carry on, and finish. This is your lesson. Finding yourself, then, in this situation, utterly helpless, without any thing good in you—a poor, dejected, fearful, destitute creature—commit the keeping of your soul to Jesus: you will thereby bring him a richer revenue of honour than all the rejoicing Christians in the world. You will glorify his faithfulness to his word and work by venturing upon that arm of the Lord which is engaged to do all for you, and all in you. Mind one of his sublime styles and titles:—He is the Saviour of him that hath no helper. What! have you no help? Do you feel it? Then the Spirit says, he is your Saviour. Mrs. B., he is yours, as surely as he ever saved any one who had no helper.

But, alas! how weak is my faith! My dear friend, do not look at the how: that will only puzzle you; it will make believing to be a work, and will tempt you to be comforted when you believe well, and to be dejected when you are displeased with your believing. You know it is not the degree or the joy of faith that saves; but it is Jesus who saves; and your safety arises from trusting to the work of God-Jesus, and your comfort should spring from taking it to yourself upon the warrant of God's free offer to sinners like you; not to qualified sinners, but to coming sinners—"Whosoever cometh unto Jesus:" it matters not how he comes, nor who he be, nor what he has been; to him coming, God gives his word, and pledges his honour "Thou shalt never, never perish; but shalt have everlasting life." Whether he come fainting, live fainting, or die fainting, it is the same; the word cannot be broken, but standeth fast for ever and ever. Mrs. B. fainting, dejected, without spirits or liveliness, comes; she shall never, never perish, says God; she shall have everlasting life.

But what signifies the truth of this to me, while I find no comfort in believing? Your case does not admit of comfort; the Master is carrying you up into a more exalted state of believing, wherein we are to get above baby comforts. You could not learn the present lessons of his love in a comfortable frame: he therefore brings you into the valley of Baca, to teach you what Jesus is in himself, and that all your salvation is in him undertaken, fulfilled, applied; and that, after all your knowledge, and all your experience, you have nothing, to this moment, to depend on but his faithful arm and watchful care. This is his last lesson: nothing is beyond it but heaven. You are left to your present distresses on purpose to learn this. Your dear Jesus lets you feel how utterly helpless you are, that you may find how faithful he is to his promised help. He is as exactly suited to your case as light is to your eyes; and your relief does not consist in getting comfort again, but in getting nearer to Jesus, and in seeing what he is to such as you, and thereby growing up more into him. Your present frame is to bring you to commit the keeping of yourself and of all your concerns to him. You find you can do nothing—quite lifeless, heartless, comfortless. Very well: but Jesus has undertaken to keep such; and he is now making you willing that he should be your keeper. Oh that you would not reason and puzzle your poor heart, but follow his teaching: and now, simply leave it to him, to do what he will: your salvation will then be as safe in his hands as if you were in heaven.

And why should not you simply trust him? Consider, you cannot honour his office as your keeper; you cannot bring him more glory than others do but by coming as the weakest of all creatures. You find you are so. Why, then, let his strength be perfected in your weakness. You see you can do nothing; let him, then, have the crown of doing all. What sad work would you make, if your graces or comforts were left to your own keeping! You are learning now to put no confidence in the flesh. Oh that you may yield to the Spirit's leading, and may be willing to be just what your God would have you to be!

But how can you do this under these faintings, sinkings, &c.? These are your schoolmasters. You could not learn without them your absolute dependence upon God-Jesus: and you experience these on purpose that you may find how careful Jesus is over you. He has the same love to your soul, the same faithfulness to his own work, when you have no strength, as at other times. He says so—"I change not"—I am the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever—the same to the fainting as to the rejoicing believer. Oh fall then fainting into his arms: venture—cast yourself upon him; for he is a very present help in every time of trouble.

You see I have no more room. I follow my advice with my prayers. I pity you much for what you suffer: but I wish God may let you see it as I do. Still all is well. May you say so! Our love to the whole family. We set out on Tuesday: in about three weeks hope to be at Mr. Owen's, jun. at Tiverton, Devon, where a line will find us, and a good account make us thankful. Mrs. B., I am as certain as I live of the Lord's design, as mentioned above. Read as you can bear it, and pray for light to know, and faith to follow the Lord's leading. It is a dark night, and a long night; but the morning cometh, and you shall rejoice with the gladness of his people. Farewell.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CVII.

BERWICK, near SHREWSBURY, Sept. 9, 1769.

DEAR MADAM.—We were setting out upon our journey when we received Miss M.'s letter, and have scarce had any resting time since. No opportunity offered, till the present, of sitting down to inform you of my constant remembrance of you in my prayers. My daily petition is, that God may bring you to submit to his will, and to make you lie in his hands just what you are—a lump of sinful clay—that in his own way he may mould you, and form you, a vessel of honour. Oh, this is hard!—to flesh and blood it is impossible. To have been, like you, in light, but now in darkness; to have walked in comfort, but now every ray of it gone; to suffer the disease, but no feeling of the remedy. Who can bear up under such trials? None can of themselves: but I can do all things, through Christ strengthening me. So he said, who rejoiced to be what you are: he was not only content to be a pensioner, living on the mere grace of Jesus, but he also gloried in his infirmities, that the power of Christ might rest upon him. Every infirmity brought him to feel more what you now feel yourself to be: but this did not keep him from Christ, as it does you; nay, rather, it brought him to greater experience of the power of Christ, in so managing his infirmities, as to make them the means of nearer communion and more intimate fellowship.

My dear friend, I must repeat it—although you tell me my last was a probe, rather than an healing medicine—your present frame is necessary; you really want to learn the lesson which it is sent to teach you. Without it, how could our great prophet bring you to live entirely out of self upon his fulness, which, when he is teaching, how do you murmur and repine? Whatever you knew of this before, it is plain you had it but in theory; for the practice has quite overset you. You cannot believe, although the ground of believing stand good, unless you have the comfort of believing: for, now you are left to yourself, you think you are lost, because you are suffered to feel what a poor miserable creature you are: not considering that, bad as your condition is, yet there is a remedy for it, hope under it, and a good end to be answered by it. There is a remedy infallible, which you overlook at this time, although it be as exactly suited to your case, as meat is to the hungry. What! have you forgotten the covenant of the eternal Three—the Father's everlasting appointment concerning those whom he gave to his Son? None of them can be lost. The Son's accepting them as the Father's gift, undertaking for them, writing their names in his book, becoming man, living and dying for them: and, by these his relations to them, he is their head, and they are his members, one with him, and he one with them, in a bond which nothing can break; and the Holy Spirit given to them and dwelling in them, to work all their works for them and in them, and to keep them safe by his mighty power, till they be received into glory. This is the covenant of the blessed Trinity; in which it is enacted and provided, that nothing should befal you but what is for your good; yea, that the very state you are in, which is one of the sad fruits of the corruption of your nature, shall be so overruled as, in the end, to promote the gracious plan of your salvation. Do you not know, Mrs. B.; do you not believe all this? You do—I am certain you do—in theory. I pray you, then, what is it that obstructs your practice? How is it that your present trials, which are working for your good, which must do you good, being appointed and sent for this very purpose, are so mistaken and misapplied? You are left to reason against God's covenant purposes, and to pervert (as far as you can) God's gracious design. You may go on indulging this strange temper; but know, assuredly, my good friend, that God will not only save you, notwithstanding your vile reasonings against him, but will also make you one day acknowledge that it was good for you you had been in this trouble; for still there is hope. Hope is grounded upon some promise; and God has not left you without a word of promise to trust in. His covenant, made for you, is ordered in all things, and sure. This dark, dead frame is ordered; all your nervous feelings, faintings, &c. are ordered; all things—how much you should suffer—how long—till you should be forced to acknowledge God just in his dealings with you. And though you may try to break his covenant, reason against it, indulge your own absurd reasonings, give place to unbelief; yet, his covenant he will not break for the sake of your peevishness. No, he will not. It is sure in all things—as sure to one walking in darkness as to one walking in light—always alike sure on God's part, though to your feeling it may look as if he was going to alter it. Could this blessed truth break in upon your soul, and shine in its divine glory, then you would be made to see that your present frame is most mercifully intended to teach you in experience the faithfulness of God's covenant: for now you find you can do nothing. What more seasonable, what more comfortable, than to be satisfied that your salvation is in safe hands, and that God is managing it so well, that it cannot possibly miscarry? Thus would hope revive, and soon be able to bring in strong consolation; for you would discover many gracious ends answered by your having gone through this dark, and dull, and helpless state. Depend upon it, good will come out of your distrustful murmurings and unbelieving repinings. God will get a rich revenue of glory, when he has brought you to experience that all your salvation was out of yourself, and to be willing to take it, and to enjoy it, as the free gift of free grace, in every comfort, in every blessing, both in earth and in heaven. You are put to school to learn this, and to trust God simply; and sad work you make of your lesson—you read it backward. He would teach you that salvation itself, and every thing belonging to it, is at his absolute disposal; and therefore he keeps you at school, and under sharp discipline too, because you are so dull at your book. Oh that you may be made to feel all is well! David was once in your case; and he had a blessed issue. So will you have. Read the 130th Psalm, and mark where he began. He was in the depths, and he ended in the heights. After the dark and black night, the morning will arise—a morning without clouds—and your soul shall be glad and rejoice in the salvation of our God Much, much glory will then accrue to him from your present visitation.

Perhaps, you say, these things may be true, but how can I take any comfort from them while I am in my present distress? Why not? They are the remedies prescribed of God for your very case, to give you a good ground of hope at present, and to produce the most blessed effects in future. The Lord the Spirit seal these things upon your heart; and may it please him to do it soon. His time is best; but, for your sake, I would plead with him, lest you should quite faint. But that will not be. You know I do not follow impressions unwarranted by the word. I give little credit to any thing of that kind. But here I have the word on my side—that God will not leave you nor forsake you; and I am persuaded, you will soon know you are not left. To my apprehension, the clouds are breaking; the storm is dispersing fast; the day-star is dawning; and your own Jesus is rising with the light of life upon your soul—never, never to set again. It is but a very, very little while, and you shall see the King in his beauty, as you never saw him before. So be it. Amen.

LETTER CVIII.

BLACKFRIARS, Feb. 22, 1770.

GRACE and peace be multiplied to our dear friends at S.—Mrs. B., take the light of the word, and behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon you! what were his purposes of grace in giving you to his Son (admire and adore them!) in revealing them to you by his Spirit, and in bringing you to know your Father, which is in heaven—what! but that you might come to enjoy him who is your supreme happiness. You do enjoy him—glory be to his sovereign grace! but pray mind, you enjoy him now as a fallen creature. You are brought back to the Father, through the Son, by the Spirit. The Son was your surety; the Father accepted him in your stead; the Spirit has enabled you to believe that the Father loves you perfectly in his Son: thus you come to the enjoyment of the Eternal Three; but not such as you will have in heaven. The manner of enjoying God is different. Here it is by faith; there by sense: here by hard fighting; there by constant peace: here sensual are always opposing and lessening spiritual enjoyments; there all are spiritual: here the enjoyment of God is at best imperfect; there it is absolutely perfect. Here, as you are made up of flesh and spirit, sensible enjoyments must be withdrawn, in order to make room for spiritual; the absence of sensible is necessary for the growth of spiritual. On which account I cannot but bless God for you, who takes so much pains with you. He has chosen you to better things than the world has to give. Your portion is not here below. God himself is your portion; and all his dealings with you are to bring you to enjoy him as such. He ploughs and harrows, and takes every method to get a good crop. He rains and shines, sends winds and storms, frost and snow; but all fulfilling his word. His frowns and his smiles have one lesson. Sickness in yourself, in your family, in your other self, are covenant visitations, and speak aloud, "Mrs. B., you are the Lord's, and he will not let you alone, he will not suffer you to settle upon your lees; you must be kept stirring —all peace and quiet would be your ruin: therefore God, even your God, has, in his richest love, weighed out every grain of suffering, needful to keep you near to God."

But why have I got preaching? You do find it true—I know you do—that the time of living by the faith of the Son of God has always most sweetness when the life of sense is lowest in its enjoyments. Lord grant you may daily make up your happiness in God, your covenant God and Father, and in those things which improve in the using when all other happiness fails. Amen.

I am with great respect, in the only bond of true love, yours in Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CIX

Blackfriars, Aug. 3, 1772.

My dear Friend.—I have been taught to feel your case, and to have compassion. We have a sympathising God, who also is touched with the feeling of your infirmities; and he wants you to know the tenderness of his heart. He would give you proof of it, and fresh experience. This is his gracious lesson. If he take away more creature comforts than he ever did before, it is, that he may make room for more of his heavenly comforts. He thwarts your will, that he may make you resigned to his. He is aiming at your good, and taking the shortest and the best way to promote it. He afflicts your children, removes your friends, gives you real trouble, and threatens to give greater; but all is love. He knows it expedient for you to deny yourself, to take up your cross daily, and to follow him in the way he went to glory. I have seen a wonderful beauty in 1 Cor. vii. 29, 30, 31, as applicable to your present circumstances. Read and study the passage. Pray you may be enabled to practise what is there recommended; viz. "That having husband, children, &c. you may live as though you had none," &c.

It may give you some pleasure to hear that we do not go from home till next week. In the mean time, should be glad of one line to know your state and condition, and how all the family do. Considering our dear Lord's past kindness to you, I have no doubt of his continuing it. I heartily pray him, in which my wife joins, to convince you of his unchangeable love, and to manifest it to your heart in time of need. I am (with respect to Mr. B.) yours, in our precious and covenant head,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CX.

Jan. 26, 1775.

My good Friend.—Indeed, it is a great while since we met; and I often think of it. At no time or place do I forget you. But am more mindful when I hear of you, especially of your wants: I believe you cannot do without them; and I feel my heart, as Christ is, most affected to you when you are poor and needy, and have no helper. As such, in your present case, I spread your needs before my Lord and your Lord. He knows what is best for you, and will do it, although you may be apt to quarrel with him for it. But he will not mind that; he will pardon it, and will go on doing you good—in his own way.

Next Monday is the 30th of January: I always preach in the afternoon, before the Leather Sellers' company: the Monday after, we are at your service: we hope to be ready to come down and dine with you in very good time.

What changes in six months time—born, married, dead! what patience exercised to us! we are spared. What grace! spared to live, in, upon, and to Jesus. Oh most blessed long suffering! And what now wait we for? Why truly, being as ready to die as ever we shall be, that, come what will this new year, we may be found in Jesus. In this hope I go on my way rejoicing. So may you.

My partner is pretty well: desires every kind remembrance to you. Our christian love to Mr. B. I carry all your family to court with me, and recommend them to my King. I hope he has a regard for them. I am sure of it. If you forget to pray for me, you will not be a friend to yourself. I am, very sincerely, your friend and servant, in our common Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXI.

London, March 7, 1778.

Mrs. C. presented me, in your name, with the brethren's daily words for 1778: for which I thank you, and through it, may be often put in good remembrance of you and yours this year. In return, I send you my word.

Messiah is one of the high titles of the Redeemer, which being interpreted in the Greek, is, The Christ, and in the English, is, The Anointed. Oil was the instituted emblem of the grace of the Holy Spirit, and anointing with oil was the outward and visible sign of his inward and spiritual grace. We meet with the institution, Exodus xxx. 22, to the end. This holy ointment was to be used in consecrating the tabernacle and all its vessels, and in setting apart certain persons for some great offices. It was unlawful to use it upon any other occasion: whosoever did, was to be cut off from the people. This consecrating unction was used to the tabernacle, which was a type of the body of Christ, and to every vessel of the tabernacle, to show that Christ, and every thing of Christ, was under the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit; and it was used to set apart the Prophet, Priest, and King, because he was to sustain those offices. He was the anointed Saviour. His human nature was conceived and formed by the Holy Ghost. Every thought of his mind, every motion of his body, was under influence, and that every moment: for he had the Spirit without measure. He had infinite grace to obey, to suffer, to conquer. Nothing could possibly be wanting to render his obedience, sufferings, and victories absolutely complete and everlastingly perfect. We have a demonstration of their full value and acceptance. He died; but rose from the dead. He sitteth at the right hand of the majesty on high, infinitely replenished with the graces and gifts of the eternal Spirit: yea, in him dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead bodily.

Here is the fountain of all blessings. His name shows not only that he is thus anointed, but means one who has the power to give the unction of the Holy One. He, as head, has it for his members, which is beautifully described, Psalm cxxxiii.

The precious ointment, poured upon the head of the high priest, flowed down to the skirts of his garments: so does the spiritual anointing. On Christ it was poured without measure. From him it descends to the lowest member. Every believer has his share of its divine influence. The Spirit of Christ is given to quicken the dead. He unites the soul to Christ: he enables it to live by faith upon Christ, and to live to the glory of Christ: and therefore this anointing is absolutely necessary: without it, no man can be a member of Christ: for if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. A Christian means, one who has received the unction from Christ. The same spirit which is in the head is also in the member: for he that is joined to the Lord is one Spirit, and is as intimately united, yea, I think more, than the body and soul in one person. This constitutes the Christian. He has actually the Spirit of Christ; whereby he is one with Christ, and Christ with him. Christ dwelleth in him, and he in Christ: or, as the apostle expresses it, I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless, I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me. Christ was his life, as truly as any member lives by its union with the head, as evidently as a branch is nourished by the sap received from the stock upon which it grows. The anointing which he receives from Christ makes and constitutes him a real Christian, as certainly as the member lives by its oneness with the head, or the branch with the vine. Our Lord's name, the Messiah, leads us to consider him in this view, not only anointed himself, but also the giver of the same grace; he having received it on purpose that he might give it to his people. By his own command it was first used at Antioch; and it has been ever since the peculiar title of those who profess faith in him and influence from him.

Many, indeed, have the name without the thing; as a man may be called rich who is very poor. But such are not Christians. They have a name to live, while they are dead. But he who is truly so called has actual fellowship with Christ by his Spirit. What was on Christ, without measure, is on him according to the measure of the gift of Christ. He partakes of the divine anointing. He is called, after Christ, a Christian: for he is made alive, and lives, and acts, by the same spirit that is in Christ, who is head over all things to his church, which is his body—the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

But if it be thus certain that the head and the members have the same unction, how can any one know it? Should it not be very clear, as it is the thing which makes the Christian? Certainly it should. And the scripture leaves no doubt concerning the way and means in which it is to be known.

Known by believing; ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things. The word is the ministration of the Spirit. We are begotten by it, nourished by it: holding the truth in love, we grow up into Christ in all things.

How is this unction enjoyed? In the same way as known. The influence of the Spirit of Christ keeps up, through faith, communion with the head and members, testifying of Christ, glorifying of Christ.

How is it improved? By daily use we get more faith, more hope, more love to Christ, more happiness in the Father's love in Christ, whereby we learn more subjection to his will and ways.

In this new year, I wish you new grace, fresh unction; yea, may you be every day anointed with fresh oil—much fellowship with him—your guide—your keeper, your Saviour. I have only time to pray for you and yours. Mrs. R., with real love, wishes you the same unction. Farewell. Pray for

LETTER CXII.

My good Friend.—I was at the dedication of your new house, and consecrated it. May my prayers be answered—your house a Bethel—your heart also a temple—and all your family temples of the Holy Ghost! I send you, inclosed, a little book upon prayer, in order to stir you up to it; for yourself as your privilege, and for the public as your duty. I wish you much sweet communion in conversing with your God, and much freedom in pleading with him for this guilty land. When you have read the tract, and Mr. B., please to lend it to Mr. H. with my love.

The weather is very hot. I am tired of London. Next week I hope to leave it for some time. Our course is to Birmingham and the neighbourhood. We fully purpose, God willing, to see you, eye to eye, before the winter.

I esteem it my blessing to be interested in all your concerns. Our right spirit is to rejoice with our rejoicing members. And to be any way well, in so great a family as yours, is matter of daily thankfulness and joy. Learn, at the white side of God's dealings, to admire them. See how many mercies, how great, as well as how many trials: though trials rightly improved are mercies. I will not cease to ask for what your Lord knows to be sufficient grace. Mrs. R. is well, and sends every kind remembrance to you and to yours. I am, with true christian love, your obliged friend and servant, in our common Lord,

W. ROMAINE.

N. B. We have several praying societies already set up; and, next Sunday, if you have my letter in time, and can meet us, you will have the best company in England with you at the throne of grace. My heart rejoices in the prospect: so be it.

LETTER CXIII.

WEYMOUTH, Oct. 11

DEAR MADAM.—I have an opportunity of sending you some good news, which I wish may affect your heart, as it has mine. I left you ill, and grew worse, till we got to Weymouth. The air, bathing, rest, have been greatly useful in restoring health, spirits, and thankfulness.

Out of the twenty good days in October, we have ten altogether. Ever since we left Bristol, fine weather and serene skies, and most refreshing sea breezes. How faithful is our God! He is crowning the year 1777 with his goodness. Indeed, he is always the same—love itself—but we change: and for want of continual trusting, we lose many tokens of his favour. Could you, for instance, always build upon this rock, thus saith the Lord, how fixed would your state be, hanging on his unchangeable will! how numerous your comforts, depending on his infallible word! His will is only known from his word; and his word abideth for ever. As he has said, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away." Your dejections, sinkings, alter nothing in God—nor in his will, or word. And they come to teach you this. May you learn to renounce leaning to self, good or bad; and may you ever build on the rock that is higher than you. For it is Christ, the rock of ages; the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. We say, when the sun revisits Virgo, then we shall revisit you: but a thousand unforeseen things, besides death, may hinder us from meeting any more upon earth. Our visits are short. They disappoint us. We are apt to expect from them what is only to be found in Him. We bear the pain of parting, in hopes of meeting again. When he visits once, it is for ever: not with continual comforts, or abiding presence, but with a promise—"I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." The faith of this will make your mountain sure when every thing else says, it will be cast into the midst of the sea. Only believe. Having a little of that faith which worketh by love, I can feel how the members, under the same head, sympathise. Distance makes no difference. The head is in heaven; the members on earth: yet, one Spirit breathing through both, they rejoice and mourn together; which is heavenly friendship. Oh for more of it in human hearts! I am not without it to Mr. B. and every one of your family. If it be right, I could wish you a sky like ours, without a cloud—a voyage through life like ours, a sea like glass, without a ruffle: but, be it as it may to-day, to-morrow—a sky without a vapour, a sea like glass, smooth for ever and ever, will be your happy lot. There we shall meet, and bless the kind hand of our Jesus for mutual as well as for personal salvation. You know there is nothing good you wish yourself, or yours, which Mrs. R. does not wish you as well as

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXIV.

Blackfriars, March 30, 1778.

My dear Friend.—I am glad the Lord will not let you alone. He is very kind to you, and takes a deal of pains to make you a great proficient in his school. He has put you into the upper form, and you have but one lesson to get; and that he will teach you himself. You must have no under-master. He will not suffer it. Not only because they are incapable of teaching this hard lesson, but also because he will have all the glory of it. "If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross daily, and follow me." The cross is the badge and honour of discipleship. He puts it on. He instructs in the true way to take it up—in the right method of bearing it—and he gives all the profit which comes from it. I have prayed him to teach you how to follow him: and, as he has you now in his hands, prayer for his blessing is worth all the fine lessons in the world. Indeed, they are apt to do hurt; because they take the eye off from his hand and his rod, and incline us to hearken to reason more than to faith. It is one great design of the cross, to bring us to have nothing to do with any person or thing, but with Christ alone: he sends it to wean us from the world, reason, sense, and self. O blessed cross! which deadens us to them, and makes us more alive to Jesus. May every cross have this effect upon you! Remember, just so many comforts as you have, so many crosses may you have. The cross grows out of the comfort. The dearer the comfort, the bitterer the cross. What a large provision have you for suffering!—husband—children—substance—friends—farms—servants, &c. &c. The good Master sees how desirous you are to go to heaven with this and the other comfort. You think, he might very well spare it to you, being such an infinitely loving Jesus: you might keep it, and yet keep his love. But he knows better than you do what is good for you; he loves you, far better than you do yourself; and he will manifest it to you: yea, you shall feel in your heart that his almighty love can bring you good out of evil, and pleasure out of pain. Now he wants to communicate this. At this very time he is training you up for it. He is going to bestow upon you some of his choicest favours: and he has such a certain fixed way of giving them, that I know his mind and will as plainly here at London as if I was at S., and you were to tell me all your thoughts: for indeed I find him very communicative to his friends. He keeps nothing from them. And the Lord said, "Shall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do, &c. No; Abraham is of my court; and I will make him of my cabinet. The same Lord has said to you and me, henceforth I call you not servants, but friends," &c. John xv. Our divine teacher still makes known to us what he doeth. It is your business and your happiness to wait on him for the discovery of his will in his present dealings with you, that you may be able to do it, or patient to suffer it. This he expects of you. And may all within you say, from a feeling submission, "Lord Christ! not my will, but thine, be done."

I am thankful for the grace given to Mr. B. May it increase and abound yet more and more. I am yours, in our ever dear and lovely Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXV.

To the Rev. Mr. K.

April 11, 1789.

My dear Brother.—The famous Dr. Johnson declares, "that a man of genius may force himself to write whenever he pleases." If he found it so, I do not. I cannot even write a letter when I will: if I could, Mr. K. would have received an answer before this time. Indeed, I do not wish to be of the doctor's mind; for I find the activity of our nature is a perpetual temptation to look upon ourselves as something. It seems to me safer and better to feel that every exertion of mind and body depends upon the grace of another—life, and breath, and all things. Say, Here is a fine garden; but who planted it? Say, There are fragrant flowers; but unless the north wind awake, and the south come, what is there to make the sweet spices thereof to flow out? The soul is as much dependent on the fresh supplies of the Spirit as the body is upon breath: so that the feeling of my poverty is my only riches, and the sense of my weakness is my only strength. If I write a letter, if any good accompany it, I wish ever to ascribe the praise to Him, without whom, "we," says a blessed man, "even we, are not sufficient of ourselves so much as to think one good thought." What possibly can be more humbling? And what can be more opposite to the doctor's spirit? Let him, and such, plume themselves upon their self-exertions; but we have learned Christ better. In his school we know that the humblest is the highest; and he does most for Christ, or rather Christ does most in him, who is sensible that, without Christ, he can do nothing. This is the Christian principle of all our activity; because, through Christ strengthening us, we can do all things.

Upon this ground I thank you for your letter, as I have already thanked him who enabled you to write such a letter. And upon the same ground I compliment you on your Sermon,* which is the first in time; and, without being a prophet, I foretel that it will be the first in many other senses. Blessed be his holy name! who sent us such a cordial from S. Indeed, it greatly refreshed my spirits; and my partner desires me to tell you, that she partook of my joy. We also rejoiced together in the account you gave of yourself and family. How great, how many mercies—mercies upon mercies—in what you have, and what you have not! God himself being your portion. His will becomes yours: not yours; as it is the will of the flesh. This is still the same, and will be as long as you breathe: but he makes the flesh bow to the spirit, and enables the renewed heart to say, and truly, "Father, this is a sharp stroke; but I know it was sent in love: as such I kiss the rod—Thy will be done." Glory be to him who gives grace sufficient to bear with patience, yea, to improve with profit, our greatest trials, even to sacrifice our Isaacs. Oh! he is faithful, as you can witness, to that sweet abridgment of his gospel, when rejecting the outward ceremonies as nothing availing, unless mixed with faith, Psalm l. 14, 15; and a little lower, "Whoso offereth me praise, glorifieth me."

Your letter just came up to my wishes for its being so very particular with respect to your own family and to the T.'s. It is a great favour to me, who am now only a chamber counsellor, to know the circumstances of my friends, their children, and families, that I may advise, and pray for suitable grace. You give me fresh matter to ask for yourself—Success to the preached gospel at Southampton. May he help you always to give your people good food, and to bless them with an appetite, that they may be nourished, and grow thereby up into Christ Jesus, and that in all things. Our kindest love to the T.'s. Mr. and Mrs. will hear from me as soon as I can. This is with us a season of much preaching: and, although it be the very joy of my heart to be telling of his salvation, yet the flesh fails, and lags sadly behind. Pray for me and mine,

W. Romaine.

* A most excellent sermon on the king's recovery.

LETTER CXVI.

April 20, 1791.

Dear Sir.—I think myself very much beholden to you for two very obliging letters. The first was alarming; it stirred up many fears, and made me give myself unto prayer. Your second relieved us from our apprehensions, but not from our prayers. We are still before him who hears and answers. When we have done this in faith, we must leave it with him; and then, whatever he does, I am sure it cannot be done better. May Sally be a tender object of his care and love, as well as her poor afflicted mother! She is scarce ever out of my mind, knowing what she feels on this occasion. But what are our real and best feelings for one another compared to the compassions of our Jesus? May he refresh her heart with some of his choicest consolations! Mrs. R. says, Amen.

Tell Mr. T. he should keep a feast of thanksgiving, not one day, but as many days as he has to live. Oh what a monument is he of the distinguishing favours of our God! Every breath should be praise. I hope he is trying, and I pray for him, that more grace may be given, and, under such a load of benefits, he may walk more humbly with his God.

I know S. and you are on my heart. May the work of the Lord prosper in your hands!

If Mr. T. does not write, one line to satisfy us how you go on, and what is Sally's state, will be a very great treat to me and my partner, who most cordially joins in the prayer of faith for the T.'s, K.'s, with your friend and labourer in the Lord's vineyard,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXVII.

Jan. 15, 1795.

My dear Sir.—This is one of your children,* whom you was instrumental in bringing to light. I put it into your hands, hoping you will continue to nurse it with your prayers for its success, and with thanks to the author of every good and perfect gift, who has enabled me to leave behind me this testimony of his saving grace and power. Oh bless him and praise him for his great goodness to your friend and servant in him,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXVIII.

To A D*, Esq.*

My dear Friends,—for so you are in the Lord; in that bond which he ties and none can untie. Thanks to Mr. T. for his letter, and for his kind remembrance of us. We are, as to outward things, just as you left us—but, I hope not at a stand in spirituals—moving still, and getting on, halting, and creeping, slowly, but surely. How this is to be done, in what way, means, and method, would save you a deal of time and trouble, if you were quite satisfied. I will give you a little plan of what I call

A*'s daily walk.

I had observed, a great deal of my time was spent—and most of it quite lost. A very, very little was left. I saw the necessity of husbanding it well, and of making the most of it. This led me to settle and determine a fixed rule of living. "Here is a new day. What lies before me to be done? What do I live for to-day? What am I now to propose to myself, as the end and aim of all my actions?" This matter was brought to a point: and I was made to see that these, and these only, were the things I was to do.

* This letter was accompanied with a copy of the Triumph of Faith.

First, I was to look to my conscience; that the peace of God might rule in it always, and by all means.

Secondly, I was to look to my heart; that it might be happy in the love of God; and, Thirdly, I was to watch over my tempers, my walk, and my conversation; that I might enjoy the peace and the love of God.

I saw my main business concerned my conscience; how guilt, fear, and unbelief might be kept out of it, and the peace of God might be maintained in it. If conscience be good, all is good: and that is a good conscience which witnesses to the truth, as it is in Jesus. Conscience is that faculty of the soul which compares my heart and life with the holy law of God, brings me in guilty for transgressing its precepts, and leaves me to suffer its just penalties, under guilt and condemnation. The gospel offers a perfect righteousness to satisfy the precepts, and an infinitely valuable atonement—the sacrifice of God—to satisfy the penalties of the law. By believing in this righteousness, and in this atonement, the conscience is saved from guilt and condemnation, yea, acquits and justifies the sinner, and brings in a true verdict for him. It says what God does, pleads its discharge under the broad seal of heaven, and stops the mouth of guilt and unbelief, with these words written in golden letters in the royal charter of grace: "Thou art forgiven all trespasses—Thou art justified from all things—Thou art a son of my love and an heir of my glory, through faith in Jesus, my beloved." Here, Mr. D., I triumph. I believe these words on the divine testimony. My conscience bears witness to their truth. It is a good conscience: it agrees with God, and looks upon him as reconciled perfectly. It fears to dishonour him by calling in question the infinite value of Christ's righteousness and atonement, or doubting of their being mine, while they are freely offered to me, and while I find my want of them, and have any dependence upon them. Thus the peace of God rules, takes the lead in the conscience, rules always, the offer being always the same, the righteousness and atonement of Jesus always the same, my want of them always the same, and mine interest in them always the same: which I daily learn to maintain by all means, against all corruptions, enemies, and temptations, from every quarter. Tell Mrs. D. from me, that this is her first lesson in the school of Christ. When she feels any thing wrong, she is low, her sins displease, her duties cannot please her; tell her that these very things, if rightly managed, will establish her conscience in the peace of God. Every new day she lives to learn that she has nothing to trust to but the atonement and righteousness of Jesus, and therefore to depend on God's being in friendship with her—an unchangeable friendship through Jesus Christ her Lord. Oh that her heart may be sprinkled from an evil conscience and mind! That is evil, which refuses to build its peace on the life and death of our Immanuel; and that is a good conscience which has peace with God through faith in Jesus, and expects all the love of God freely in him. This is my second work, to keep my heart happy. And this I constantly experience when the conscience is on Christ's side, and testifies aright for him. God is reconciled. He is my God. We are agreed, and now we walk together. He bids me call him Father. He has bowels of love and fatherly affection for me. He sees me in Jesus—loves me—yea, blesses me in him. My title is clear to all spiritual blessings, because God, being my God in Jesus, all things are mine. My happy walk is in the belief of this, and in the enjoyment of it. I do not aim at getting any new title to my heavenly Father's love, but new enjoyment. All is mine in title; but I want more and more possession. Every day I am seeking to know more, to enjoy more of the riches of the Father's love in Jesus; and I find no way to come at them but faith, and no way to increase faith so effectually as to keep the peace of God ruling in the conscience always, and by all means.

Observe, sir—When you want to enjoy the love of God, and in the enjoyment of it to find your heart happy, look at nothing to bring it you but Jesus; read your share in it; take possession of it; for nothing done in you, or by you, now, or at any time, but only for and in Jesus; his atonement, his righteousness, being your constant title to the love of his Father and of your Father. Thus walk with a reconciled God. Christ is your way. Christ your end. Go on; leaning on Christ every step for strength; relying on Christ for victory over corruptions and enemies, whatever within or without would try to stop you in your way; trusting Christ for blessings, whatever can keep you safe and make you happy all your way; making his company and presence your heaven here, as well as in glory. Thus the true believer walks with God; and the sense of his being a child of God, and the experience of his Father's precious love, makes him happy. And this mortifies the carnal heart, crucifies worldly tempers, subdues creature love: God in Christ enjoyed being the death of every selfish affection.

Pray tell Mrs. D. of this. If she would daily walk with a happy heart, she must learn to make up all her happiness in the love which God has for her in his dear Son. She must look quite away from her graces, her gifts, her righteousness, her duties. God does not love her for these: he loves her in his Son; and she, in believing this, is to find all her salvation, and to enjoy all her happiness. I know her temptations, and therefore go on to the Third and last thing which enters deep into my daily walk: and that is—How my tempers are to be regulated, and my conversation ordered, that I may night and day enjoy the peace and the love of my reconciled God and Father. I find this very hard work, because it is so hard to keep peace in the conscience and the love of God in the heart ruling always. But God's Spirit is almighty to teach this lesson, and to give power to practise it. And I cannot deny him his honour. What I have learned of him has been chiefly from this scripture: Walk humbly with thy God. He is my God: I walk humbly with him in Christ, as mine; so his sweet peace is enjoyed, his happy love possessed: while these rule in the conscience, and in tne heart, the power of the Spirit maintains his influence over the tempers and over the life and conversation, and he keeps all in subjection to God-Jesus. The conscience says, I will have nothing to do with any thing for salvation but the righteousness of Jehovah Jesus and his atonement on the tree. The heart says, This is all my desire. Hope says, I have cast my anchor on Jesus, I cannot be disappointed. Fear says, I would not for the world offend my God and Father. Then the whole man bows in subjection to Father, Son, and Spirit, and says, Lord God, rule in me, rule over me; guide, keep, bless me and mine all the way to heaven. You see, my good friend, from whence I draw my safety and my happiness. Not from self—oh, no!—but from God in Christ: I look not at, depend not on, not in the least, myself; but wholly on my God. Whatever is of mine own, and comes from myself, shows me the necessity of walking humbly with my God. Self consists, as I feel to this hour, of wants, miseries, temptations. These do not stop me, but help me to walk more humbly with my God. They show me my constant want of salvation, and keep me constantly dependent on it. No failings in duty, no sense of indwelling sin, keep me from my reconciled God and Father, but bring we to walk in nearer fellowship with him. And seeing that all is of his grace, and mere sovereign love, pride is hid, every high thought is brought down, and the Lord Jesus alone gets all—it is his due—all the glory. This is my daily walk—a little sketch of it—but enough to let you see, that I have to do with nothing for the peace of my conscience, the happiness of my heart, the conformity of my tempers and walk to the will of God, but Jesus, his Father's love, and my Father's, witnessed by the word, and made mine by believing: the end of my walk is not to get, not to procure a title to, but to make good and to enjoy my title to, his love in Jesus. I learn and am learning to look at him—look unto Jesus. May you do it more than me, and then you will get on faster than me to heaven.

Dear friends, I have written till I am tired: but, upon reading it over, I like it, and set my seal to the truth of it. God the Spirit seal it upon your hearts!

I was to have written to Mr. T. I am vastly in his debt; but have no time. I do not, cannot forget his and Mrs. T.'s love to our Master and his cause. The Lord bless them both—and you both. So prays, &c.

LETTER CXIX.

To Mrs. P.

BLACKFRIARS, Feb. 10, 1773.

MY VERY HON. FRIEND.—I thought myself greatly favoured by your long and kind letter. Many circunstances concurred to make me thank God and you for it. Your acknowledgments to me are over payment; especially as they prove that the great pains which the Lord had taken with you were not in vain. Indeed, I believe they were not. Your trial was sharp and long; very, very grievous to the flesh: and only he who bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up—only he could have carried you through it. His almighty grace supplied you with patience; suffering and bearing was then your exercise. Now this is over, profiting is your lesson: and it must be the same grace that produces the blessed fruits that grow upon the cross. Oh for a rich and plentiful harvest of them in your soul! I would set my wishes before you for the improvement of a recovery from sickness; not from dry precept, but from a winning example. It is not the worse for being ancient, but mellower and riper. I had it from the east, and set a great value upon the manuscript. The author is yet unknown. I have the original, both in Hebrew and Greek. If critics were to form learned conjectures, and to raise arguments from the style, they would very likely give it to John Chrysostom; because he was a sickly man, and it is so very much in his manner of writing. But, however, the sentiments are so agreeable to the canonical scriptures, that it has been put, although apocryphal, at the end of the Hebrews, and entitled the 14th chapter; because, I suppose, the noble army of sufferers, mentioned in the former chapters, were of this spirit, and made just such an improvement of sickness as is here described. For my own part, I can only say that it is perfectly agreeable to the views which I have of a believer rising from a sick bed; and such as I wish to find in experience, if ever I should be so tried. Upon reading it over just now, it warmed my heart, and drew tears of joy from mine eyes; for I am well persuaded, the dear Physician, life-giving Jesus, is exactly such as he is here described. Oh, Mrs. P., I can wish you nothing better than more acquaintance with your best friend. Do not, madam, pray do not, be shy of his company. He loves familiarity. Be free, be intimate with him: nothing can please him so much. Converse with him as you would with your own husband, and be assured he will tell you no lies. You may safely believe every word he says. You may venture your soul upon it; for it is all gospel. It is the truth of God, infallible, unchangeable. It is for want of knowing him that you now and then are tempted to think that he says more than he will make good. Oh, no. He is truth itself, and also the Lord God Almighty. Believe, only believe, and you will certainly find a performance of those things which have been spoken by the Lord, and by us his servants to you. You are within the reach of my prayers; and I would not wish to forget you in them: as long as you and I are upon praying ground, I would be ever making request for you. The inclosed was copied out for your perusal, with many supplications. God hear them for you, and make you what he would have you—that is, an humble, happy believer! My wife joins heartily in wishing you this and every other blessing together with your faithful servant in Jesus,

W. ROMAINE.

The 43d Chapter of Job, in the Apocrypha.

1. Thus you heard of the patience of Job, and you have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very full of pity, and of tender mercy.

2. He never afflicteth willingly: he has infallible wisdom to contrive, and the heart of a parent to send every chastisement to his children.

3. He well knows what sin wants purging; and there is a needs-must for strong physic.

4. He has seen where the fear of man got the better of the fear of God; and he takes his sharp rod, not in anger, but in love; not to punish, but to correct.

5. If the world creep into the heart of any of his children, he is very jealous, and will not be rivalled: he is guided by the tenderest affection when he embitters worldly joy, and by sickness makes that a pain in which his child foolishly sought happiness.

6. If he send great and heavy affliction, and it come in a way which makes it to the flesh the greatest and heaviest, yet he has his everlasting arms underneath, to support, even when little faith can scarce perceive them.

7. And he not only supports, but also often vouchsafes a gracious visit, breaks in with his sweet presence and sensible comfort to the heart, and the poor, sick, fainting child is made to say, "Oh let me suffer any thing, so I may but have such visits from my God! A sick bed with these cordials is heaven upon earth."

8. But the Lord's end is answered; he abates the sickness, and health returns: the Father throws away the rod as soon as the child has learned to kiss it, and to be thankful for it:

9. Then he makes it appear that he kept the rod so long for the child's good, in order to teach lessons which could not be learned in any other way.

10. He intended to make the child's will bow to his; and it does: Holy Father, thy will be done; thy will be suffered: I desire "to lie as clay in the hand of the potter."

11. He designed to produce many peaceful fruits of righteousness, which grow upon no tree but the cross; and therefore he continued the cross a long time, only to make the fruits richer and riper.

12. Hear the great crowd of witnesses. Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us. In love he chose us in his Son, and called us by his Spirit; in love he corrected us; in love he supported us under the correction; in love he removed it, the moment his gracious purpose was answered.

13. Oh may a sense of his goodness grow with health, and the soul prosper as the body does.

14. May every peaceful fruit flourish to the praise of the glory of our Father's exceeding rich grace.

15. May there be more faith in the great peace-maker, and more resignation to the Father's will in him; a mind more reconciled to the cross, and profiting more under it; a heart daily more dead to the world, and more engaged about and pleased with heavenly things; a conversation so well ordered as to maintain peace with God through life, and at last to die in the peace of Jesus that passeth all understanding.

Hebrews xiv. Apocrypha.

1. Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless his holy name.

2. Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not all his benefits.

3. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases.

4. Who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies.

5. I had reason to think, in my sickness, "I shall go to the gates of the grave. I am deprived of the residue of my years.

6. "I shall not see the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living. I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world.

7. "Mine age is departed, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent. My beauty is turned in me into corruption, and I shall be cut off with pining sickness."

8. But when I cried unto the Lord, he heard my voice out of his holy temple: he delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling

9. My recovery was the Lord's doing—his, and his only—and it is indeed marvellous in mine eyes.

10. Oh how good is my God! What return shall I make unto him for this never to be forgotten mercy as well as for his other benefits, with which he loadeth me daily.

11. I have nothing to return him but what is his own, and nothing but what I wish may be his own: myself I give up and devote to the Lord of my life and health, wishing all I have and am may be his for ever.

12. O my God, and my Jesus, make me better for this affliction. Now thou hast raised me from a sick bed, let me recover in my soul as fast as I do in my body, and both prosper alike.

13. Let thy end, Lord, in this chastening, be answered; and let it yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness now I have been exercised thereby.

14. Since thou hast favoured me with sickness, how can I enough adore thy matchless love, which supported me under it, and brought me through it? Now, Lord, give me thy blessing on it.

15. How mightily should a review of thy gracious dealings with me encourage me to trust thee for the future! Oh grant me more steadily to believe the promises, and to rely on thy fulfilling them to me: Lord, increase my faith.

16. As thou hast shown me how uncertain every creature-comfort is—all are perishing—health, on which their enjoyment depends—life, on which they have their very being—Oh my God, raise my hopes above them, to the better comforts of a better world:

17. And there fix my poor wavering heart: set it free from its old sins, and from its favourite pursuits, that every affection may be henceforward where my treasure is, even where thou, my Jesus, art sitting at the right hand of God.

18. Oh for more of these graces, that my best friend, who has dealt so bountifully with me, may be every day of my life more beloved, and better served.

19. My dear Jesus, I want to be more dead to worldly hopes and fears, which have too much governed my heart, and influenced my conduct. Subdue in me these base-born passions; so that, for the future, my hopes may all centre in thy love, and I may fear nothing but the displeasing thee.

20. While thy mercies are fresh upon my mind, let me find growing zeal to thy lovely name and precious cause, that I may never be ashamed of thee before men.

21. Mine own will has been my plague. Oh, my Lord, subdue it, and make it bow to thine: let thy revealed will be my study, thy ways my delight; and let my whole life, so kindly lent me, be one continued sacrifice of praise.

23. If thou art pleased to lend me more time, help me, Jesus, to redeem it: if I have health, add to it a thankful heart. Whatever blessings thou givest, give me grace to receive them from thy bounty, and to use them to thy glory.

23. Whenever thou shalt be pleased to put me into the furnace (it may be soon), Lord, enable me to go into it with strong faith, and to stay in it thy time, with humble patience. Oh never let me want thy good Spirit! that through him, not in word only, but in deed and in truth, I may say, Thy will be done

24. Yet a very little, little time, and the days of my pilgrimage will be ended; and then I shall see thee face to face. Oh! what a sight will that be! My God and Saviour, let the faith of it warm my heart, and the hope of it influence my life, that, whenever thou callest, I may be ready, and may have nothing to do but to go up into the mount, and to die in the arms of Jesus. Amen.

LETTER CXX

LONDON, Feb. 4, 1786.

MR. S.—I was very thankful for your letter: it was a volunteer, and worth a hundred pressed men. It revived the pleasing remembrance of our K. visit, for which I have often thanked our common friend; especially because he made it an earnest of a much better meeting. The year 1786 has some pleasing presages of that event. You know, new-year's-day is a great festival at our church. I used to have a Hebrew motto; but this was Greek: I am Alpha and Omega. As this is a standing dish for all our entertainments through the year, I will send you some of it, that you may feast with us, and give your dear wife some of the banquet; and perhaps the crums from the master's table may prove also very palatable to brother N. We are come together this morning to devote ourselves afresh to the service, and to begin the year, as we hope to end it, in the faith and fear of the Son of God; for he is our Alpha and Omega. And he is all between the beginning and the ending. He is the self-existent Jehovah, who was, and is, and will be, the first cause, and the last end, of all beings and things: for he is the Lord God Almighty; and as such we take him this new year to be our Immanuel, that we may live by him, and on him, every moment, and for every thing: for he is the God of nature—the God of grace—the God of providence—the God of glory. First, He is the Creator of all worlds, Psalm cii. 25, 26, 27, explained; Heb. i. 10; as also Cor. i. 16, 17. He has the same essence, the same attributes with the Father, Isaiah xliv. 6, 7, 8; and, by taking our nature, God and man in one Christ. He has every perfection to fit him to be, secondly, the God of grace; a proper surety to act for us, by completing all his covenant engagements with the Father; and having, by his most holy life, wrought out our righteousness, and, by his infinitely precious death, made a full and perfect satisfaction for sin, he is the Almighty giver of all his grace. He has it all in his fulness: a prophet to teach the ignorant; a priest to pardon the guilty: a king to govern the helpless: and, sitting on a throne of grace, he is able to bless the miserable even with all spiritual, yea, and with all eternal blessings. May he be more glorified this year than ever! He is the God of all grace, and we ought to grow in grace, by our settled dependence upon him for the concerns of this life, as well as for a better. It is our privilege, and we should find it our happiness, after we have trusted our souls in his hands, to trust our bodies, and all that belongs to them, in his hands also: for he is, thirdly, the God of providence. He has the ordering and directing of every person and every event. Not a sparrow falls without his notice. Not a hair of our heads, but he numbers them. He interests himself in the very least as well as the greatest concerns of his people. And on this account, believers should exercise their faith in every action of life, and they would find that, by trusting in him for all things, they would have a spiritual use of, and profit from, temporal things. I have left my all to the care and providence of my Almighty friend: he will manage for me better than I could for myself. My health, my circumstances, my family, children, and servants are all under his government. I may therefore trust, and not be afraid. He is Almighty to fulfil his offices, and all his promises. Almighty to protect his from all enemies, miseries, sin, Satan, death, and hell. And, come what will, he is Almighty to make all things produce good, as he said, Gen. xv. 1. My dear brother, you know something of this blessed life; but there is more than you have yet learned. Let Mrs. S. bring her case, and leave it with the Lord: all will be well—only, trust. Pray for more trust: for, as faith increases, it will open to you most blessed views of an Omega, who is, fourthly, the God of glory. He gives it: for he is the author of eternal salvation. Read John xvii.; mind what he there prays for; and he has all power in heaven and earth to bestow it. The whole company around the throne are ascribing to him all their glory, as you see, Rev. v. 9, to the end. I join them. So do you. Thanks be to him for his unspeakable grace. Through the year, trust our Alpha and Omega. Begin and end with him. Preach him. Live him. Let him be your companion at K.; your friend at W.; your God through life and death. Mrs. S. has my prayers: I know her wants; and I will recommend her to the King: he will be her help in every time of need. I often mention your children; and he has been their keeper hitherto. Now remember me: I am in want of a curate. The great head of the church will send me one of his ordaining. I wait for such a one. Mrs. Romaine joins me in the best wishes to Mrs. S. I charge you never to forget, in your best moments, your real friend and brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXXI.

MANY, many thanks to Mr. and to Mrs. T. for their remembrance of us this year. I am ashamed I have not acknowledged your favour sooner; but truly, sir, I grow very lazy and good for nothing. It is high time I was turned out of the vineyard, and any other master but mine would have had nothing to do with me long ago. I loathe myself, and stand wondering daily at his kindness. Never was self lower, and his loveliness higher, than in this new year. Though we are but just entered on it, yet he has already vouchsafed us some delightful Pisgah views. It has been for many years a custom with me to have a text, a sort of a watch-word, something very short, easy to be remembered, and which may serve the believer to feast upon for a twelvemonth. I have found this very useful to myself; and so have others. Our text for this year, 1772, was "Christ is all:" he has all the fulness of salvation in him, as God-man; and he has it to the glory of the Father, and of the Holy Spirit. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell, as the head for the use of his members; and it pleased the Holy Spirit to testify of his fulness in the scripture; and it pleases him, by his grace, to bring believers to use it, and to live upon it. This is the true saving work of grace. All other experience is not worth a farthing The Holy Ghost comes to pull down self and to exalt Christ; and this he does effectually. He enlightens the understanding, and convinces it that Christ is the one Sun of the spiritual world. He sends his scholars to Christ, and to none but Christ, to be taught the things of God. He brings them humbled to the Saviour's feet, where they sit to hear his words. Thus he glorifies their divine prophet: and in the matter of teaching he makes Christ all. The Bible, and ministers, and means, are only to lead to Christ, that out of his fulness they may receive lesson upon lesson, line upon line.

Methinks I hear Mrs. T. ask, But how shall I know that I am one of Christ's scholars, and that he is my teacher? My dear friend, you are to know it from what you have learned. You cannot be certain of it any other way: and he would have you to look at his truth, and to try yourself by it. When you think of your fallen state, in which you inherit a corrupt nature, and can in it do nothing but sin; when guilt is in your conscience. and fear in your heart; what is it that brings you any relief? to what do you look for pardon? and from whence do you expect peace with God? Your answer will show that the Lord God our prophet has been teaching you.

Methinks I hear you reply (for I have heard you say it), Why, to be sure, I have no hope but in that sacrifice of the Lamb of God which perfecteth for ever, and in that righteousness of his which justifieth from all things. This is the true object of salvation. This, and nothing else. Christ is all. There is no pardon but in his blood; no justification but in his obedience; no heaven but what is the free gift of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ is all.

Thus far all is well. But the comfort of this, the comfort to know it, is mine. There Mrs. T. has her objection ready. My dear madam, show me the text which says, "He that is comforted shall be saved"—or, that faith consists in knowing that salvation is mine. You are called upon to trust the work of Christ, and to trust for yourself upon the free warrant of God's faithful word. Rest here, giving credit to God's promise of salvation to all that will receive it, and, I will lay my life of it, you will never want comforting, and soon be satisfied you are a saved sinner. If you rest not here, get comfort, it will not be true nor lasting; and your application to yourself will be only the act of your own mind, and will prove as changeable as the wind.

But you would not have me to go on in a dark uncomfortable way, not knowing whither I am going. No, Mrs. T.: I want to lead you to light and comfort in the direct road. Christ is the way: look more at him, and less at yourself: trust more to him, and less to your faith. Be always thinking of your emptiness, and of his fulness. Meditate on him; pray to him. You cannot be thus employed about the Sun without being enlightened by his rays and cherished with his warm beams. When people are very cold within doors, and see the sun shining sweetly, they do not ask, Is it my sun? May I go out and walk in this noon-day brightness, and get myself warm with this delightful sunshine? Is it for me? Yes: for you. Whoever will, may take Christ for their pardon, Christ for their righteousness, Christ for heaven, and for all they want till they come there. You are willing; therefore Christ, and all he has, is yours. Now, Mrs. T., what do you say to this? Why, say you, To be sure, I do build upon this foundation; but I still lack many things. Very well; I am glad you do; the more the better. Whatever you lack, it is in Christ's fulness, and he has it for you: so that here will be a blessed intercourse between you and Christ, and a holy friendship, in giving and receiving. Every moment you want something: Christ says, here it is; come to me for it; I can deny you nothing; be it for temporals, Psalm xxxiv. 10, or for spirituals, Eph. i. 3, or for eternals, Rom. vi. 23: all is yours. This is living by the faith of the Son of God; and it is the best way to live: for you cannot be thus receiving every moment out of Christ's fulness but you must experience that he is yours; which will make your faith practical and certain. You will then have done disputing about your interest in Christ. While you are making use of him, you can no more question his being yours than you can whether the meat is yours which you have been eating to-day.

Thus, you see, Christ is All in time, and All in eternity. May he have his honour in little H. Do but trust him, and you will see what miracles he will do for you. My wife joins me in this advice.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXXII.

April 17, 1764.

Dear Madam.—I have you in remembrance before the throne of grace, thanking God for his unspeakable gift to you, praying you may increase still and abound in the knowledge of those things which are freely given to you of God; among which, Christ is the chiefest: for with him the Father gives his children all things, and they know it to their comfort, when by faith they are enabled to believe him for their perfect Saviour, and to live upon his fulness for every grace and blessing. Taught by his word, and guided by his Spirit, they have but one object to look unto, even Jesus, and but one way to get any thing from him, and that is by faith, which, having first evidenced to the soul its union with Christ, afterwards improves it by constant communion with him. What little, by the good hand of God upon me, I have learned of this blessed subject, I have laid before the public. My single design in living, in preaching, in writing, is to exalt and glorify our divine Saviour; and in this I would have none above me. I desire to give him the pre-eminence in all things; for not one upon earth is more indebted to him than I am. When I think of what I owe him, the immense debt makes him exceedingly dear and precious. I would not have it a farthing less; because then I should want a motive to exalt his blood and righteousness. I would not be without one want which I now have; because it is his very crown and glory to supply, and will be, all the needs of his people. Just as I am, ignorant, sinful, and helpless, he is most exactly suited to my case; and therefore my heart most sweetly enjoys and rejoices in his finished salvation. I have much forgiven, and therefore love him much. Dear friend, I have often found you happy in your own soul by building all upon Jesus, that sure foundation. Hold fast there, and leave all nice distinctions and curious points to others: the true solid matter is plain enough. In Jesus there is free, and full, and eternal salvation; and it is all yours by believing.

Look unto him, and you shall be saved. This is the truth, which, if the Lord please, he can make my little * book, the means of establishing you in. I most heartily wish it, and beg of Jesus to bless you as much in reading as he did me in writing it. May the wisdom of Jesus guide, and the arm of Jesus strengthen, you in every good work, and be with you in every one of his gracious offices, and make you quite happy in himself. I am, truly for his sake, your friend,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXXIII.

Extract of a Letter from the Rev. Mr. Romaine.

"YOU may depend upon this as one of the sweetest axioms in divinity:—Whatever it is which makes you pleased with yourself, is not true grace; and whatever makes you displeased with yourself, is not true grace, unless it brings you humbly to Christ, and makes you put more trust and confidence in him. The good Lord teach you these things practically. I have learned them by long experience, though I know but little of them; yet, I am getting on in the school of Christ, and hope soon to be on the lowest form, for there we learn most, and fastest. We there depend entirely on the teachings of our divine Master, who reveals the secrets of his kingdom to none but babes. As a new-born babe depends entirely on the care of its parents, so must we on God our prophet and teacher: and when we are brought thus humble, he will make known to us what he hideth from the wise and prudent. I would therefore wish you to be the humblest man upon earth, not only that you might know most, but also that you might love most. He that feels his sins and miseries, his vileness and unprofitableness, with the deepest loathings of them, is in the fittest way to love Christ. If he be an experienced believer, the feelings of those sins, miseries, &c. will make Christ more precious: the more he finds of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, he will trust the more in Christ. The more misery he knows he deserves, salvation from it will make Jesus more dear and lovely. His vileness sets forth Christ's grace: his unworthiness, the worthiness of the Lamb: his unprofitableness, the sufficiency of Jesus, who is all in all.

When you are going to measure Christ's high grace, do not get upon a mountain, but go down into a valley; lower still, to the depth from which David cried; lower still, to the belly of hell, from which Jonah cried; and from thence take the heights of Jesus' grace; and from thence see how lovely he is. When the Spirit of Jesus is humbling you, showing you your deceitful wicked heart, laying open your ruined nature in all its abominable workings, has not this often discouraged you, my friend? Instead of trusting Christ, and loving Christ more, did it not weaken your faith, and so lessen your love, and thereby counteract the gracious purposes of Jesus' Spirit? May he teach you better; that every future sense of sin may greatly endear to you the Lamb of God, whose blood cleanseth from all sin. Depend upon it, that only is the true humbling for sin that makes his blood more precious."

LETTER CXXIV.

LAMBETH, Dec. 3, 1767.

DEAR SIR.—Mr. F. informed me of your commission to buy the Law and Gospel. I make you a present of the Life of Faith. I have also sent you a book of inestimable value, which I was inclined to do, because it affords me an opportunity to introduce myself to you, and give you a word of advice on your going into orders. It is a great undertaking, and I will speak freely to you upon it, as, were I in your circumstances, I should have wished some one would have dealt with me. The Lord God make it a blessing to you.

First, I would have you, sir, to consider one qualification for the ministry indispensably necessary, and that is, the knowledge of yourself; you cannot teach this till you have been taught, nor farther than you have been taught it. Consider what is your state. Is not sin, misery, helplessness, your condition in Adam? Are not you by nature a child of wrath? Mr. M., do you know this? Have you ever felt the plague of your heart? Have you ever seen the legion of lusts within you—every one of them ready to take up arms and rebel against God? Are you sensible how often they have drawn you into actual rebellion? And do you know what will be the end of this state without a Saviour? Think, sir: how can you preach these things if you have never felt them? Oh beg of God, then, to make you sensible how much you want a Saviour, that you may know how to address yourself to others upon the same subject.

Secondly, Another indispensable qualification is the knowledge of Christ—to know his person—God-man—his work, in his life and death, as our whole salvation, made ours whenever his Spirit enables us to receive it, and enjoyed as ours so far as by faith we dare believe in him. This is the doctrine to be preached. How can a man preach it who does not know it, or who does not believe it? Try yourself here, Mr. M. Is he, in whose name, and to preach whom, you are ordained—is he true and very God—the self-existent Jehovah? Is there salvation in none other person or thing? God help you not to be deceived in that most essential doctrine!

A third thing is absolutely necessary; namely, the knowledge of God's word. I send you this little blessed book, in reading which you will learn yourself. Here is your true picture; and here is the revelation of Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal. In reading and hearing the scriptures, the Spirit sets in with the word, and shows the sinner himself, and then shows him the Saviour, and enables him to believe unto salvation. All the teaching of God's Spirit is in and by the word: he accompanies nothing but his own truth with his own blessing; and that he does so bless, that faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. Are these things so? Is the Bible the word of God? Does it make the believer wise unto salvation? Is it profitable for doctrine, for reproof, &c. Oh! Sir, what are you doing, that other books are so much read, and the Bible so neglected? Will you learn from a poor penitent? Indeed I repent, and God forgive my mis-spent time in sciences and classics. I saw my folly two and twenty years ago, and have since studied nothing but the Bible; and I assure you, sir, I am got but a little way. I see such things before me, which I know but in part, that I am pressing on; and I wish for some of my lost time to spend in this blessed study. Take warning. Prize my little present: read it over and over: it is valuable as coming from my heart's love; but infinitely more so as the copy of Christ's love. You cannot read it too much: wear it out in reading; and I promise you a much neater and finer edition: but the finest is that which the Spirit writes upon the heart. Oh that he may write a very fair copy upon yours!

Fourthly, Your next thing is to know your office. To what are you ordained? If you know not yourself, and know not Jesus, nor his word, how can you possibly discharge your office? In these things the chief part of it consists. A minister, unacquainted with himself, can never show his people what they are in themselves. What can he say of Christ, who is not acquainted with him? Or how can he preach the word, who never studied it, or who never had his understanding opened to understand the scriptures? Think of these things, sir, and meditate much upon them. Weigh well your office; examine well your call to it. Are you enabled faithfully to declare the whole counsel of God: with boldness to tell sinners their guilt and danger, which will make all the unconverted your bitter enemies—with clearness to set forth the way of salvation, through our surety, God-Jesus—with evidence to show the work of the Spirit in convincing of sin; in working faith in Jesus' word; to rely upon his blood and righteousness; and enabling the believer to live upon the fulness of Jesus' grace, receiving out of it grace for grace every moment, for all the purposes of spiritual life? And that you may do this successfully, in spite of all opposition, are you made willing to practise what you are to preach? That is the best sermon which the minister preaches all the week. Nothing is so powerful as example. Blessed is he who lives, out of the pulpit, what he says in it, and knows his doctrine to be truly experience: so may it be with you. I had a great deal more to say to you upon your success in your office, or on your discouragements, &c.; but Mr. B., who sits by me, is in a hurry, and I can add no more, being forced to scribble what I have written. What I leave out in my letter, I will put into my prayers for you —for your going into orders—and for your being fitted for the work of the ministry—and for your saving your own soul, as well as theirs who hear you. Remember me in your prayers. I very heartily wish you well in the Lord; being in him, and for his sake, yours, very sincerely,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXXV.

To Mrs. C.

Dec. 17, 1778.

MADAM.—I herewith send you the Bible of which I was speaking to you—a book of inestimable value, containing the great charter of grace, by which the Lord God has granted you, under his hand and seal, a full discharge from sin and misery, and a full title to life eternal. These blessings he has given to you in his Son; and therefore the record of God, concerning his Son, is the chief subject of the book. What he is in his person as God-man—what he has done —what he has suffered—his complete Redemption—his prevailing intercession— are largely treated of. And, because we cannot understand these things, nor believe them, nor make use of them of ourselves; therefore the Spirit who inspired the book still accompanies the hearing of it, and renders it the means of knowing Jesus, of believing in Him, and of enjoying the Father's love in Him. Would you grow in this knowledge, in this faith, in this love, here is the ordinance of God. His Almighty power is still in the word. Here read, meditate, pray over it, and you will find it able to make you wise unto salvation; and that is as wise as you need be. 2 Tim. iii. 14, 15

It is my privilege to be any ways useful to you in this most noble design: and whatever prayer can do (and what cannot the prayer of faith do?) I shall not cease to use for you, imploring the teaching of the Spirit upon all your hearing and reading the word of God. May you find it profitable, every day more profitable, for those gracious purposes for which it was revealed. Yet a very little while, and it shall be perfectly fulfilled, and more than you conceive fulfilled in your everlasting glory. In the bonds of Christian love, I am yours heartily,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXXVI.

To Mrs. D.

Aug. 17, 1777.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I write unto you because I hear you are still very poorly in your health, and I am desirous you should improve this providence. You are kept low for very good reasons. He who gave his Son for you, and his Spirit to enable you to receive him by faith, has your best interest in view, and never loses sight of it. Could you look into his loving heart, as it is opened in the scriptures, you would see the tenderest mercy in all your sufferings: yea, you would believe and rejoice under them. I know you often want this blessed view of your heavenly Father, and therefore, I will send you a looking-glass, which will always set him before you in the same most amiable light. In his Son, he is altogether lovely—love itself—an infinite ocean of everlasting love—a heavenly Father to all who come to him through Jesus and are led to acknowledge his perfections as they shine forth in their fullest glory in Immanuel. The word reports this. Faith receives it. Faith looks to the person of Christ, the incarnate Jehovah—looks and loves. Faith builds all its hopes upon his wonderful work, trusting to that offering which alone perfects for ever, and to that obedience which alone brings in everlasting righteousness, and to that intercession from which alone we obtain all needful grace and all possible glory: and thus, whosoever believeth is saved freely by grace, through faith.

I know your mind well. You are thinking, This is true: but is Jesus mine? Yes, Mrs. D.; certainly he is yours; not only by free gift, but also by evident application. Has not the Spirit of Jesus quickened you? Have not you received the truth through his teaching, and believed it? I appeal to yourself for what God has done in you, many years ago. You have been brought to know yourself. You do feel what a poor creature you are. You have been enabled to see what a complete Saviour Jesus is; and you are wishing daily to believe more in him: you are grieved to the heart that you love him so little. These are, with me, certain marks of the work of God. Oh do not dishonour his word and work. Set to your seal, without wavering, that God is true; and wait the event: be assured not a tittle of what he hath spoken shall fail. Read Luke i. 45.

In your weak state of body, and frequent complaints, here is your only medicine. If rightly used, it will keep up your spirits, and will prove a continual cordial. God is yours: he has given you an undoubted warrant to call him your Father in Jesus. His love to you is like himself—unchangeable. He loved you in his Son before time, yea from everlasting. Of this he would convince you, by his dealings with you, as well as by his promises to you. There is the same ground for both, and may you believe both alike! He has given you faith: and he would have you to be satisfied it is sterling, true faith, of his own operation. How is he to do this? Why, in infinite love he puts faith to the trial. He keeps you low in body: this is the furnace in which your gold is to be found genuine. He tries your faith, not for his own sake, but for yours. He tells you his design, Zech. xiii., last verse. He sits as a refiner over the process. The furnace shall not be a bit too hot. The gold shall not lose an atom: but the believer shall call upon the Lord in the fire, and he shall say,—"Thou art one of my people," and each shall say, "The Lord is our God."

Happy trial! You shall not only know your faith real, but it shall be refined. The furnace shall evidence the power, as well as the truth of it. The trial is to prove this. It is to bring you experience of God's arm being your support. For in the trial, faith renounces its own strength, that the Lord's strength may be perfected in its weakness. Genuine faith is altogether self-denial. And how can you learn this but when your own strength is totally given up, and you are then made to feel that the Lord's own arms are underneath you. And is not this a mercy? What greater, than to give you faith, and then to bring you to find that it stands in the power of God. I pray much for this improvement of your present poor state of health. If the Lord please to settle your heart in believing, so that you clearly see the truth of your faith, and come to feel the power of faith; then you will find a harvest of blessings from your faith. You may gather them up one by one, in the various promises made to the afflicted believer. Chiefly let me recommend two:—Rom. v. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5; 1 Pet. i. 5, 6, 7, 8. These are what your heavenly Father intends to bestow. The cross is big with them. He wants to do his child good, and therefore makes way for his favours in the soul by removing outward favours. May the master teach you himself, and make up in your heart my pious wishes for you.

If you are tolerably well, and at leisure, we would come down and see you next week. If you are at leisure, I must tell you, we come three. William is now my pupil; and I cannot spare him from me.

Mr. D. must apply what I say of your weakness to his rheumatism, and it will do him as much good. Pray for us, as we do for you. I am, with Mrs. R. and son, yours, in bonds not to be broken,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXXVII.

Letters to W. T. Esq.

Oct. 10, 1781.

My dear Mr.——. Through the good hand of my God, being returned safe to my house and charge, I cannot sit down without thanking him and you. My Southampton mercies were great and many. The very hospitable reception which I found at Mr. ——'s deserves to be acknowledged; and I take up my pen to own it with gratitude. I have been flattering myself, there was something more in your kindness to us than mere friendship. It is said, "that we are taught of God to love one another." Hospitality becomes a divine grace when we love men for God's sake: for it is then the fruit of our union with Christ, and, being united by one Spirit under one head, we live as members, and love as brethren, wishing and promoting each other's happiness. This is a very pleasing thought, as every thing is, that endears Christ; and it has added much to the favours received at Southampton. They are magnified greatly by being viewed, as the effect of Christ's love to you, and as manifesting to me your love to him: because this is a stream from the ocean of his grace, and will not stop till it run into it again. And I thank God on my part, although I was a receiver, yet I found, all the time I was under your roof, what the Communion of Saints means. For I practised it, paying you in my way. You got spirituals for temporals. You have, and justly, gained an interest in my prayers, more than you had. And, I hope, whenever I am in his company who does not forget a cup of cold water given in his name, I shall not forget to recommend to him Mr. ——, his wife, and family. Do the same by me and mine: and get out of my debt as fast as you can. Mrs. Romaine is not behindhand in thanks to Mrs. T. She spent no such time this summer as those six days at Southampton. You may give her credit that her professions are sincere, and that she is truly sensible of your kindness. If we live till the primroses adorn the earth in the next spring, you may expect to hear more from me, and perhaps I may come and tell you some more good news. But this is in God's hand. And it is too far off to promise any thing, especially for me, who have not an hour I can call my own.

My blessing on your children; and the favour of heaven on all your connexions My brotherly love to Mr. ——: much success to him in public and private, in preaching and teaching. If he would take my advice, it would be better to lay aside those meetings which provoke disputations. The self-righteous spirit of Arminianism is fond of wrangling and altercation. Prayer will do more good in opposing it than a thousand arguments. And when the cause is removed in God's way and time, things may return to their old establishment. In the mean season a prayer meeting seems to be the best and most seasonable meeting. I am, very sincerely, in our common Lord, your obliged friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXXVIII.

Feb. 20, 1784.

My very dear Friend.—You made up by its rich contents, when it came, for the long time your letter was in coming. I am much beholden to you for its companions,—both tasting of brotherly love, which completes the banquet; thanks be to God and to you. Be not offended that I put him first; because I owe to him the knowledge of you, the love of you, and from him proceeds all intercourse of love between us. While we keep him in sight in our friendship, it will be a mutual blessing. For this I am praying; and, you know, our God is famous for hearing and for answering prayer. Indeed, what he hears and answers is first his own; for he gives us the spirit of prayer; we know not of ourselves what to ask; and when we do know, we cannot ask aright; but he enables us to feel our wants, to ask a supply of them in faith, and he helps our infirmities in asking: when we have done our best, he teaches us to present our petitions for acceptance into the hands of our great Mediator. As they come from us, they are nothing worth; but when Christ makes them his prayers, then they go up with much incense, and come down with abundant blessings. Was it not so, the morning you were at prayer? You wanted a family Bible. It was only ask and have. Here it is—God's gift. And mind, you may have any thing of him as cheap as this: for he giveth liberally to all askers. I wish you may be as humble an asker as he is a liberal giver. I have complied with your request in writing your name and mine in the Bible—in which, also, you desired me "to write some directions how to read it." This I have not done; because the subject of prayer is the whole Bible. All the volume is to be prayed over as you read it; and then I must have transcribed it. But though I cannot, need not, do this, yet I will lay open my heart unto you, and will let you into my own practice. Something like this is my constant prayer; and, as far as you believe, it will be yours. May you use it with more faith than I ever did.

Oh thou spirit of wisdom and revelation, be with me, whenever I read thy holy word: testify to me in it, and by it, of Christ Jesus, who he is, and what he is to me; and glorify the Father's love in him. Open thou mine eyes to see the wondrous things revealed in it upon these subjects, that I may understand them in thy light, and that my judgment of them may be the same with thine: I beseech thee also to enable me to mix faith with what I do understand; and what, through thy teaching, I am enabled to believe aright, that help me to receive in the love of the truth. Oh God, fulfil thy promise: put thy blessed word into my inward parts: write it upon my heart. And what I am taught to love, grant me power to practise; that thy new covenant promise may in me have its full effect, and I may be in heart and life cast into the mould and form of thy word—thus becoming a real living edition of the Bible. Make it my daily study. Render it my constant delight. Let my meditation of it be always sweet. Oh thou holy and eternal Spirit, witness thus to thine own record; and let me experience it to be the power of God, as well as the truth of God. In this dependence upon thee in the use of it, let me be daily growing until, by the will of God, I shall have served mine own generation; and then let it be the last act of my life, to seal the truth of thy testimony concerning Jesus. Let me find thy witness true in the hour of death, and beyond death all the promises made good to me, through Jesus Christ, in life everlasting. Amen and Amen.

This is the substance of my prayers. I never confine myself to these very words. They are not a form, but a directory: and I think they contain every thing which you and I are warranted to ask of God, concerning the profit which he has promised to them who mix faith with his word.

For this profit on the family Bible I have prayed. It is a consecrated book. May you ever find it all I wish to you. And may the Almighty Spirit speak by it as often as it is read to children, and servants, and strangers. Whenever it is put into my hands, may I always use it with the prayer of faith. It is now my stay: "I know in whom I have believed." My heart is at rest about the event. All besides is disquieting. Look at the state of the church. Survey the kingdom. Examine parties. What profitable good can come from any of them. See the evil within you. Feel it. And then tell me whether there be any certain prospect of solid happiness but what is promised and found in our Shiloh, the giver of quietness. May he continue to bless you.

W. Romaine

LETTER CXXIX.

March 19, 1784.

My dear Friend.—I have read of a certain love-charm, which has pleased me ever since I heard of it—"If you would be beloved—love."

It was the saying of an old philosopher: I admire it, and I set my seal to it. Probatum est: for it is true gospel. It is the very way in which God commendeth his love to us, and which is the means of teaching us to love one another. I have in my heart brotherly love: and what is it worth if it does not prevent the very wishes of my friends, and by trying to do them good, even when they are asleep, or when they know nothing of it? Mr. ——, I tell you nothing but the truth, that I am often thinking of you and yours, and am contriving every possible way of showing my affection, wherever I have interest, especially with my King, and with such of his royal gifts as you may never hear of in this world. Present things are only the evidence; and I cannot help giving you some proof of my good wishes.

Your consecrated Bible is in your hand every day. May he of whom it treats be ever with you in reading it. May he open it to you, as he did to his apostles, and give you to mix faith with it. We have got a great way into the study of it when we feel our need of David's prayer, and are constantly using it—"Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may see wondrous things in thy word:"—especially see, admire, and adore the wondrous love of God our Saviour. May he grow every day more dear and precious unto your heart.

You seem at a loss about the present system of politics. I am not so at all. Leaders of parties differ not an atom. Two men of the world think, speak, act on motives of self-interest. Potsherds of the earth, in their contest, may knock one against each other, and break both to pieces. Truly, sir, they will not, they cannot do you, or me, or our cause, any good, nor indeed hurt, unless we trouble ourselves about them. Our Lord reigneth. This is my first principle in politics: the next is, the same Lord reigneth: and so on, even to the end. The last is, the Lord reigneth. Blessings on him, King of kings, and Lord of lords! My King and my Lord. Here my heart rests, and is happy, come what may. He ruleth the raging of the sea. He ruleth the madness of the people. All things, creatures, devils, are in his power; and he makes them work under him for my good, and for his own glory. To his charge and care I commit you and yours; Mrs. —— especially. I pray that my dearest Jesus may be very near her heart, and comfort her spirit with his divine cordials.

Mr. W. T. shall not escape out of my hands, as he intends. Give my love to him, and tell him we will make one more effort at the Hebrew. Who knows what study and prayer may do?

I wish to eye and follow the blessed pattern of all perfection. To him I am infinitely indebted. "He has made me rich by making me a beggar. So wonderful is his love, that the poorer I am, the more he gives." And you, and I, and all my friends, are better for his gifts: he makes me loving, communicative, benevolent, beneficent, yea, whatever is counted moral. Oh, Mr. ——, I wish you perfectly acquainted with my Jesus. I know a little of him, and it is a blessed knowledge. Believe me, it is something of paradise. Read the word; there is his character: pray over it; there you will meet his Spirit: live on it by faith; there you will have graces and comforts: and go on; your time is short: improve it all you can. Grow ever so fast, and much, in the knowledge of Jesus, yet still there are worlds of science and experience before you. May you grow in grace, and in the knowledge and love of God-Jesus. As you do, I am sure he will put it into your heart to pray for

LETTER CXXX.

July 30, 1784.

MY REAL FRIEND.—I have many subjects of thanks this morning. When I look at you, your wife, your children—your temporal blessings, how many, how great; your spiritual blessings, how exceeding great, passing all understanding, in their sovereign rise and fountain, in their reaching to your conscience and heart and life, in their streams of grace; and how soon they will run, and you with them, into the ocean of eternity—I cannot help adoring and praising your most generous benefactor. Blessed be the Lord God for his unspeakable mercies to you. Indeed, my friend, he has loaded you with benefits, which are constantly calling on you to give him the glory due unto his name. Your skill in your business, your success in it, are the gifts of God. Prosper ever so much in it; build as fine a house as in H—e; live to see all your children grown up, settled, and prospering in the world; none of these things will be any hurt to you while you live in an abiding sense that God is a freegiver; nay, they will do you good while you see his hand and taste his love in them. I admire that sentence, "I have set the Lord always before me." Oh how much is it my daily prayer for you. In the morning, I scarce ever drink a dish of tea, but the cracknel, standing on the table, reminds me of my S. friends, and gets a petition put up to my royal Master. May he who gives me, through them, the bread that perisheth, give unto them daily the bread that endureth unto everlasting life. He himself is that bread. And I want you, in your heart, to feed upon him, feast upon him, I should say; and you are doing it, if he give you for the moment to feel your dependence, and bestow an atom more of thankfulness upon you. Oh that I could bring Jesus Christ and you as near together as he wishes you. He is not shy nor reserved. He knows not what it is to keep state and distance.

Your sins and your complaints, rightly managed, would endear you to him and your miseries, felt or feared, would make him more precious. He has warranted you to live with him in such intimacy, that every thing should set him before your eyes, and keep your heart warm with his heavenly love. He would have nothing to hinder. If good come, he is the giver: if bad come, he can, and he only can, make it work for good. This is the happy life, which you do know something of, as well as I; but truly, sir, I am but a learner, and a dull one: yet I have learned so much as to be convinced there is nothing upon earth to be compared with it. May your experience get far beyond mine. I will help you as I can, and follow you with my constant prayers. See how one wanders from the point, and gets upon what is uppermost. I took my pen to thank you for cracknels, and, lo, I have digressed to my old subject. Excuse me, sir; for in truth, I would give the whole world, if it were mine, to obtain for you a little more faith in the word, and a little more attachment to the person of my beloved Jesus. I thank him for the account of your family. I rejoice in your welfare. It is really mine own. Brotherly love makes it so. Blessed be God for his mercies to Mrs. ——. I thought my request was so reasonable, she would have gratified me. I did not wish a letter from her, but only an acknowledgment of my kindness in one line. I think, in my last, I dictated the words; but I lay no stress upon that. Leave me out; and thank God. I am praying for little John—God bless him. It will do me good, as I truly am his friend, to hear particularly of his welfare. I hope to take him up in my arms and bless him. You wish to know my route: we go north, God willing, next Monday, as far as Newcastle-upon-Tyne. I have three sisters living, and am going to take my final leave of them. They are old; so am I: and we shall not, in all probability, meet any more on this side of the grave.

The occasion of this journey has brought a great solemnity upon my spirits. There is something in this last meeting which would be too much for my feelings if I had not all the reasons in the world to believe that our next meeting will be in glory. Mr. Whitfield used often to say to me, "how highly favoured I was, that whereas, none of his family were believers, all mine were like those blessed people Jesus loved—Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." My father and mother, and my three sisters, share in his love. Glory be to him in the highest. My intention is to return about the middle of September. After some little stay at home, to go to my son's, at Reading, from thence to Heckfield, and so on to you at S.

I hope to find a letter on my table at my coming home, saying, Our house, our hearts are open: come and visit us in the name of the Lord. I have a proposal to brother K. Lately, I preached about a dozen sermons on Phil. iii. I treated it as a body of divinity, doctrinal and practical. Let him try to see my plan:—if not, I will open it to him, as God shall help me. It is a wonderful portion of God's word: I admire it; I bless God for it. I could not do without it. Till Sept. 15, I take my leave. Let there be a letter then on my table, and you shall hear from me. Mrs. R. is not behind in best wishes to you and Mrs. ——. My blessing on all the children. Love to brother K., wife and family, and connexions. Pray for

LETTER CXXXI.

MR. W. T. is come at last. By him I send my love, real, hearty, and what I have just now been expressing to God for you and yours, especially for Mrs. ——, whose chaplain I am till she is abroad again.

It is now my preaching morning; and I am preparing for the delightful work: yet, I cannot help writing a line or two. My thoughts are turned to-day upon recommending Christ to my people. I have a sweet subject from John iv. 10; in which our Lord lays open the love of his heart in a most attracting manner. He must needs go through Samaria, because there was a very wicked creature, whom he would save. His manner of teaching her is peculiar to himself. He does it in the kindest way that almighty love could inspire—and I can witness for him that he is not changed—in convincing her, opening her eyes, making himself known, and giving her to believe in him: he is repeating these wonders every day, if thou knewest the gift of God. It is ignorance that keeps sinners from Christ. When he is teaching and drawing them, it is ignorant pride that hinders them from receiving salvation as the gift of God: it is for want of knowing who Christ is, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink. If his true character were understood—who he is, and what he came into the world for—convinced sinners would not lie under guilt and unbelief as they do. They would come and ask of him (for he gives to all askers) his spirit; which is the water of life. So the promise runs, Luke xi. 13: "Ask, and ye shall have," is the one grand truth that runs through the gospel. And, especially, the receiving, not for, but upon asking, the Holy Spirit, as John vii. 37, &c. He is the water mentioned John iv. 10; not living, as our translation hath it, but the water of life, as the old translations, or quickening water, as the French hath it, in verse 14. It shall be in him a fountain, not a well, springing up into everlasting life. Lord, give us this water of life! I sat down to write as soon as prayers were over, and Mr. W. and Mrs. R. went to breakfast. The bell rings to take away. W. is going. The Lord Jesus Christ bless you and yours, brother K. and family, and school. Excuse the little sermon. My mind was so taken up with it, that I could think of nothing else. Oh how often, how much, do I wish and pray that Christ and you were better acquainted. My dear friend, give him more employment; make more use of him; trust him better: he wants your confidence, and would have you live in perfect friendship with him. He deserves it at your hands. Indeed, sir, he would have you trust, and not be afraid. You cannot think what a heaven it is to be intimate with him. W. does not take his hat: so I write on, and so I will.

> Jesu, on thine each syllable
> A thousand sweet Arabias dwell;
> Mountains of myrrh, and beds of spices;
> And ten, ten thousand Paradises.

Ay, more than all this—millions more.

LETTER CXXXII.

Sept. 15, 1784.

My very dear Friend.—Your letter met us returned in safety. We went out in his name, and came back to give him praise: for we set our seal to the promise, "I will keep thy going out and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore." And it was done unto us according to that word, wherein he had caused us to put our trust. In this same faith we hope to set out next week for Reading, not doubting but that in believing the truth of the promise, and relying on the promiser's faithfulness, we shall have the promised blessing, accompanying us as far as ——. The day we cannot fix; but we will take care to let you know it as soon as we know it ourselves. I have just finished my delightful task, and read through my Bible once more: the impressions which it has left on my heart, in this last perusal, are so warm and lively, that I cannot help communicating them to you, and wishing that you and Mrs. —— may feel the same.

The scripture plan has in it all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, in theory and experience. It will be the study and the admiration of eternity. Oh what a mercy to have a renewed mind—to be of the same judgment with God—and to be made to see things in the light of his revelation. I bless him for the great charter of grace, and that, in my last reading of it, he has much revived my heart with observing how all the parts perfectly harmonise, and, when compared together, each illustrates and beautifies the whole.

I wish you to feel, for I cannot express, how great confirmation I have received of the truth of God's word, and of his power still accompanying it. I am not more certain of any thing than of the divine authority of the scriptures. Every verse has spirit, and has life in it. When one finds it come to the heart, and written upon the inward parts, it nourishes, it feasts: no cordial beyond it. This influence is promised; and it is indeed almighty.

Can you think, sir, of any power beyond that which God has put forth in your heart and mine? "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth." Our new birth is a new creation—and he did it by his word; which he made the ministration of his Spirit. Blessings on him! I feel the effects of this every time I take up my Bible: I set my seal to it, that it is more, much more, than the word of man. It is in truth the word of God; because it effectually worketh to this very day in them that believe. Its influence on the heart and life, to form them to the pattern of the word, is certainly far beyond all created power. Indeed it is a standing miracle. Now, finding this experience of God's power in and with his word, it has been made to me in this reading very precious. My love for it grew as I went on, both for its taste and its value. It was in taste sweeter than honey to the mouth—in value, above gold, "yea, than much fine gold." And all this was greatly enhanced by believing that the feast, sweet as it was, was only a foretaste, and the golden mine, though very rich, was only an earnest of unsearchable riches. Oh, what a book is this! Judge whether there be any thing like it. Truly, my friend, I cannot get enough of it. You know it is a good sign of health when people long for their meals. So it is in the mind. I have just done reading; and I want to begin again. My appetite is become keener. This feeding upon the word is not like the gross meat and drink of the body. No. There is nothing cloying in it. But when mixed with faith, it sobers the senses, it refines the faculties, and exhilarates the spirits. The believer says, "Oh what love have I unto thy word! All day long is my study and delight in it." Lord make it, every reading, more precious. All these considerations have received great confirmation in this last reading; because I have got one year nearer to the full accomplishment of all the Bible promises. This has vastly increased their value. I see them near. Yet a little, a very little while, and perfection and eternity will be put to their fulfilment. The word will be completed perfectly in all its promises—eternally in all their glories. Oh, what a day will that be! What Joshua said of Canaan, xxi. 25; xxiii. 14, 15; will be true of heaven. Faith realises it. Faith brings into some present enjoyment. All things in the world look great when they are near. As you go from them, they appear less.

Now it is the property of faith, in the exercise, to bring the promises near. As faith grows by hearing and reading, it brings the promises nearer, and thereby makes them look greater. The home-prospect familiarises them, and presents them to our view with growing charms. Believe me, sir, this is a matter of fact.

The eye affects the heart, and puts new beauty on the good things of Immanuel's land, which, though they be at present in promise and hope, yet faith has a magnifying glass, which can open such a prospect as is full of glory and immortality. This view of the Bible is inexpressibly glorious. It reveals, it realises; it brings into present enjoyment eternal things. It is my constant prayer for S. friends, that they may be these sort of Bible-Christians. May you live more up to it than I do. I was going on; and my paper said, stop. Take a line to thank Mrs. —— for her letter. It was a cordial. God bless her for it. Thank Mr. —— for love expressed—and proofs of it many; for which Mr. R. will come with returns of love for love. Mrs. R. joins in every good wish to you and to the family. My best wishes to brother K. What if he were to give the Lord of the harvest the honour of 1784? He giveth us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. He giveth us the Spirit to sow the seed. He rains upon it. He shines upon it. It ripens. It is gathered in. It is used. And whenever the believer fills his belly, his heart is full of gladness. He gets the food: God gets the praise. May my brother magnify the Lord of the harvest, and pray for W. R. and all his.

LETTER CXXXIII.

READING, Oct. 27, 1784.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have scarce ever lost sight of you since I left S. And I hope to have you in remembrance, and on my heart, until I take my leave of this dying world. Your kindness to me and to mine is such, that I esteem it my privilege to make mention of you always in my prayers: and it is my happiness to believe that death itself will not part our friendship. It is from the Lord, and in the Lord: thanks be to him, I do feel myself interested in your interest—your children—connexions—minister—and in whatever is for your good. And I trust it is the same with you.

I only take up my pen to inform you of what you expressed a great desire to be acquainted with. Our common friend took care of us. We got safe and soon to Winchester. I acknowledge Mr. T.'s favour, and add one more to the long list. We arrived in good time, about sun-set, at Reading—found our children and their children well—the little babe rather better, but still in a weak condition. Since I got here, I have been arrested, and cannot be suffered to go home till next Tuesday.

Mrs. R. sends every good wish to you that our God has to give: Mr. and Mrs. C. join. Nothing short of all this is expressed by my son and daughter. This comes to you by the waggon, which sets out from hence this day.

Mr. T.—He who is your God and guide has led you hitherto, and done wonders for you. Go on trusting, and fear not. He has prospered you. He has blessed you. Commit your way unto him, and he will give you your heart's desire, and wife, children, &c. &c. all shall be blessings.

Mrs. T.—May the giver of faith increase yours, that as a wife, mother, and mistress, you may adorn your profession.

Miss T.—I have been courting for you a husband, and got his consent. Give him your heart and your hand. Take him, and try him. No evil can befal you while his; all possible good will become yours. Herein I tread in his steps, 2 Cor. xi. 1, 2. May he be yours for ever, even my Jesus.

Miss Esther.—The world's a cheat. It flatters you. Your senses join, and without Christ they will make a fool of you. Your sister has made a good choice. Follow her example, and God will give you infinitely better things than you part with for him.

Mr. W. T.—Take my advice. I wish you well. It rejoices my heart to see you dutiful and diligent: this is from God: but do not stop here. There is an infinitely greater estate to be got than all S. Ask, and it is yours: believe, and you get possession. Seek it by believing, and you shall have it. My wish for you is unbounded—even the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Mr. S. T.—Mind your business. Pray over it. Prayer is as needful as all outward means. I will do my part. May God command his blessing on your person, and on your trade, that both may prosper.

I have much to say to my namesake, and to Tommy and Sally, and to my own John: but I must wait a little. It is so cold, that I can scarce hold my pen: and all so badly written, that I can but just read it myself. We go to town on Tuesday next, God willing. I shall have occasion to write to Mr. T. soon; so that I can only say to him and to you at present, that I do love you, and hope to show it in word and deed, as long as I can write.

LETTER CXXXIV.

Blackfriars, April 21, 1786.

My dear Mr. ——.—Last night we heard from —— by the penny post. All well. Oh, how good is our God! I delayed not. According to request, a short answer. First, that Mr. —— did not use you well. He might have taken down the books, and my account of them; which is, that the "Life of Faith," as I have revised and corrected it, comes out as my dying testimony for Christ. He has an infinite fulness, not only to be looked at, not only to be believed in, but also to be made use of. Herein most professors of the present day fail sadly. May P. be out of the number! He has, under the care and management of his providence and grace, all things that belong to body and soul: and he allows us, commands us, to trust all in his hands—to undertake nothing without his direction—to carry it on without looking up for his blessing; and, when ended well, without giving him thanks. Here only the soul gets rest, and, by living thus, maintains it, notwithstanding the life we live in the flesh is in constant opposition: but he who is on the side of faith is Almighty. And he says to Mr. —— "Trust, and be not afraid what flesh can do unto you." May he speak that to your heart a thousand times while you are reading the "Life of Faith!" Though the spring be backward, yet our spiritual spring has been very fruitful, full of life and power. It has been a fruitful Easter. The resurrection of plants and trees, at this season of the year, puts us in mind of our spiritual resurrection, and daily says, Are you alive? Are you growing? If alive, you must grow. Give my love to Mr. ——, and tell him that I wonder how he manages so much business, and so well. I have but one; and it is too much for me. Suppose he gets upon my shoulders, he will see as far, if not farther, than I do. Well; for once I will let him get up. Our Easter text was Rev. xx. 6, "Blessed and holy," &c.

1. What is the first resurrection? The soul raised from the grave of sin.

2. The necessity of it. By nature dead to God, and the spiritual world. Eph. ii. 1, 2; Col. ii. 13; John iii. 7. A man must be born into this world before he can live in it. So into that.

3. The means by which the soul is raised from the grave of sin. 1. The Spirit, John iii. 5. 2. The word, James i. 17, 18. 3. Faith, John i. 12. 4. Evidences. Spiritual senses—exercised. Spiritual things—enjoyed.

The senses exercised on Christ, all spiritual things in him: in him dead to sin, the world, the flesh; in him blessed and holy; blessed by making us holy. The senses see, and hear, and feel, &c. what they live on. Alive as branches in the vine, as members in the body, one with the head—the same Spirit in them as in him, same life, holiness, blessedness.

Tell Mr. —— that I have given him a subject so copious, that he may mind his boys more, and study less. My love to him, and perhaps he may not have done till I hear him. Our love to our old friend Mrs. ——. My blessing on her dear children, not forgetting any of yours. Pray for

LETTER CXXXV.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—As I was going to church last night, Mr. —— told me, that he had a parcel to send to-day for Mrs. ——. I took the hint, and this morning embraced the opportunity of writing a note to inform you of the publication of Mr. Adam's volumes, which I mentioned to you, and for which you said you would subscribe. The price is half a guinea. I owe more to this man (saving the honour of grace) than to all the world. May you read, as I did, to my first comfort, his lectures on the church catechism. These books I have not yet perused; but I know the man well; and I expect for myself, and I pray for you, Mrs. ——, and brother ——, that every page may warm your hearts, and keep us thankful to the God of our salvation. I subscribed for twenty-five sets; so that if you know of any persons who would prize such a treasure, I should be glad to dispose of some of mine to them. You seem to be anxious after my observations on the perusal of the Bible in 86. I had made several remarks in reading, and had put down more after I had finished. I believe I had the paper somewhere in safe custody; but I cannot lay my hand on it now. When I meet with it, and have a leisure morning, perhaps it may travel down to ———; but it will not be of present use to you, if you had it. I read for myself, chiefly for mine own state and age: I wanted to gather together in one view the promises made to old people: for the Bible is of universal use, suited to all persons in all circumstances; insomuch that you cannot place a believer in any possible situation but the scripture has amply provided for his case, matter of instruction, support, and comfort. When I came to put the passages together, I could not help blessing my God for his great grace in taking such particular notice of the aged and the infirm of his family, and in promising them his help according to their needs. This has been to me, and is still, a standing cordial: so that I am a witness for God. I set to my seal that God is true; and I subscribe with my heart and hand, that he is faithful to every promise made to old age.

Signed and sealed this 17th day of November, 1786.

W. ROMAINE.

You do not want at present, and you may never live to want, this collection, which I made for the aged and infirm. But I have a paper by me, which may be of daily use to you, on which I set a great value, because it was written about twenty years ago, and sent in a letter to my dear friend Mr. Powys of Salop, now with God. He esteemed it so greatly, that he had it printed, and used to have one of them pasted on the inside of every Bible which he either used himself, or gave away. It is so short, that I can transcribe it: and I send it with my prayers, that it may be verified in your heart and life.

"Sir, I herewith send you the Bible, which I had been recommending to you—a book of inestimable value—containing the great charter of grace, by which the Lord God, Jehovah Alehim, has granted under his hand and seal, by his covenant and oath, a full discharge from sin and misery, and a perfect title to life and glory everlasting. These blessings he has given in his Son; and he applies them by his Spirit: therefore the record of God concerning his Son is the subject of the whole book.—What he was to be in his person, Immanuel, and what he actually was, God manifest in the flesh.—What he was to do and has done.—What he was to suffer and has suffered.—His resurrection.—His complete redemption.—His prevailing intercession.—And what he will do for his people in glory. These points are treated of at large. And because we are dead to these truths, we cannot understand nor believe them, nor make the proper use of them by any power of our own: therefore God the Spirit, who inspired the book, still accompanies the hearing of it, and renders it the effectual means of quickening the dead, of working the saving knowledge of Jesus, and, through faith in him, of manifesting the love of the Father. Would you grow in this knowledge, in this faith, in this love? Here is the ordinance of God. His almighty power still accompanies his own word; still he works in it and by it as truly as when he spake, and the world was made—when he commanded, and all things subsist. Hear, read, study, meditate, mix faith with it, pray over it; and you will find it able to make you wise unto salvation—and that is as wise as you need to be. 2 Tim. iii. 14, 15, 16, 17. What think you of this, Mr. ——? Is not the Bible truly inestimable? May you find it more precious every day! I wish the inspirer may write out a fair edition in the heart of Mrs. ——; that she may know and feel for herself what is the meaning of Jer. xxxi. 33, 34."

My good wishes follow Mrs. ——, &c. The blessing of the Lord my God be with them all! I inclose a little tract, which you have seen and read. I beg of you to read it again for my sake. There were so many shabby editions, and one by ——, not to the author's honour, that I thought it right to let it come out in its primitive dress. Here it is. Read—admire—and bless God for it, with

LETTER CXXXVI.

May 23, 1787.

What through infirmity, business, and the King's too, preaching four times every week, and often five, visiting the sick from Hyde-park corner to Mile-end, and a fixed dislike to writing letters—indeed, to almost every thing but preaching—once more I take up my pen, this 12th day of May, 1787, to acknowledge myself so much in your debt, that I am like a man, who owes such a sum, that he is afraid to meet his creditor. This arises from being ashamed of myself, and not from a fear of being arrested. An honest man's word is his bond.

I believe you have it under my hand, that I would send you some hints of our new year's sermon. Such as I can remember, you shall have. They were taken from the life of an extraordinary person, Enoch, the wonder of his time. "Enoch walked with God." It is a custom with you this day, to wish one another a happy new year. There is but one true happiness; without which the wish is but an empty compliment. To be in Christ, as Enoch was, is the only thing which can make a sinner happy: and to live and walk by faith in Christ, is the only way to enjoy that happiness. This from my heart I wish you all. May you know it now in the beginning of the year, and find it increasing unto the end of it. With this view, let us consider the history of Enoch, and the use we ought to make of it. Let us look for God's blessing! (a short prayer). Ever since the fall, there has been one way in which the natural man has walked, being "earthly, sensual, and having not the Spirit;" he follows his own carnal will. He is quite dead to God; but very much alive to sense. Dead in trespasses and sins, therefore he walks according to the course of this world—following the lust of the flesh—the lust of the eye—and the pride of life—a course directly contrary to the law of God, and to that perfect love of God which his law requires. What strong proof of this does matter of fact give us? The searcher of hearts declares, Gen. vi. 5, 11, 12, 13, that all flesh had corrupted itself, and that therefore he destroyed the earth, that then was, with a deluge of water. And, from that time to this, the history of the world, and especially the infallible history of scripture, assures that men have turned every one to his own way, erring and straying from the way of God. Thus speaks the Oracle: "And you hath Christ quickened," &c. Eph. ii. 1, 2, 3.

Men are still by nature the same—ignorant, foolish, disobedient, &c. Titus ii. 3, 4, &c. And they will grow worse and worse till the world, which once perished for its sin by water, will be utterly destroyed by fire: so that, from the beginning to the end of time, there has been one way in which mankind have walked; and that was directly contrary to the way of God. How came Enoch to be singular? He took a different course from his companions. While they all went down the stream, he swam against it. Upon what motive did he act? He had received the Spirit of life, who had opened his eyes, and made him see his guilt and feel his danger. He was enabled to believe the promise of a Redeemer who should save him from his sins and his miseries. He rested on the faithfulness of the promiser, and, having found joy and peace in believing, he set out to walk with God. He left the course of the world, that he might enjoy his friendship, who had said to him—"I am the way." That this a true state of the case appears from Enoch's conduct with respect to God. Two cannot walk together except they be agreed. The spirit of the world is opposite to the Spirit of God: yea, these two are at such enmity, that nothing can make them love one another: but Enoch was saved from a worldly spirit: he was reconciled to God, and walked with him as his loving father through faith: so says the apostle, Heb. xi. 5, 6 He was a sound believer, and he witnessed it in word and deed—going on in the walk of faith, just as many (365) years, as there are days in the year—pleased all the way with God, and God with him; and then he took him to himself This also appears from his conduct with respect to the world. He preached against them. He was the seventh from Adam in the holy line, a preacher of the righteousness which is of God by faith. He lived against them. He walked with God, demonstrating the soundness of his principles by a holy walk. His actions declared that he had found pardon and peace in being reconciled to God through Christ, whose friendship was dearer to him than all the joys of the world; and he prophesied against them. The Holy Spirit had revealed to him the punishment that was going to be inflicted for the universal corruption of faith and morals; from which nothing could save the world but repentance and turning to God. And he was a true prophet; his words came to pass, as you may read, Jude 14, 15. The judgment which he foretold was executed; and God brought a flood upon the world of the ungodly. Moreover, the Lord gave his own testimony to the goodness of Enoch's life, to the truth of his preaching, to the infallibility of his prophecy, by a miracle, as you may read in Genesis, and in Heb. xi. He took him to heaven without dying; hereby giving a demonstration that Enoch was right with God, and that whoever should walk in the steps of his faith, although he might not be translated to heaven in such a miraculous manner, yet he should most certainly follow him to life and bliss everlasting. My promise is at last fulfilled. These are the outlines, as well as I can remember them. The application on the subject of the day was chiefly in the way of exhortation—calling my people to remember Enoch, as I call upon you. The same conviction of sin and danger, the same faith, the same walk of faith, will bring you to the same end.

May Enoch preach to you every day! follow him, and then the year will be happy.

To brother ——'s case I am no counsellor. My judgment is singular perhaps: I am married to my parish: called by Providence; fixed; I do not look out, "should I be better off—more useful,—would it not be of God, if the king should send and offer me the bishopric of London?" I have nothing to do with preferment: it is my honour, my profit, my pleasure, to preach at Blackfriars as long as I do preach. Here the head of the church placed me, keeps me: it is my charge. He can do much or little, as it is his holy will, by me: and the being in his will is my paradise. But I quarrel with nobody who thinks differently from me. Mrs. R. has Mrs. ——'s letter; and I wish her inquiries may be successful; her love and mine to Mrs. ——. The wet morning has kept me free from visitors, and given me a long-wished opportunity of assuring you that I daily remember you in the best moments, and recommend you to our best friend. Do not cease to pray for

LETTER CXXXVII

Letters to W. T. Esq.

Monday, Nov. 12, 1787.

My good Friend.—Having an opportunity, by favour of Mrs. Romaine, to send my respects, I do it with pleasure. The remembrance of my time spent with you affords me many pleasing reflections. It is the most profitable part of the year for myself. I am most alone. I cannot get any such seasons for meditation as you afford me. This visit was greatly blessed, and produced one thing, which, as Providence favours, I am now carrying into execution: it is my last testimony for Jesus. What he is—how he feels—what he has attained—who has been long an experienced believer—and in his own views is near death, and quite prepared to meet his God. I have kept it back for several years, that I might see and try whether any thing new could be suggested on the subject from scripture or from my own life. But I am satisfied with what I had written, and I am now revising my papers. I beg you would help me with your prayers, that I may keep the ark steady, and hold forth nothing but what will tend to establish believers in their most holy faith.

I had a commission for you for some of Mr. Adam's works; but I fear they are not to be had. Prize what you have, and make much of your present set. If I can get you any, I will lay myself out for you. I believe the other books may be had.

Inclosed, to encourage you to pray for me, and for my present work, I send you a little tract (which you never saw before) printed by me, as a companion to an "Earnest Invitation," &c., as you see at the end. It is the only copy I have. Pray lock it up safe till called for. I sold upwards of 50,000 of them. I intended to write till Mrs. R. sent for my letter. I may not add any more, but that if you are not as happy at —— as God can make you, it is not the fault of your true friend in Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXXXVIII.

March 5, 1788.

My dear Friend.—I am in your debt for Jan. 1st, 1788. It has never been out of my mind; but I have really too much business for my age and growing infirmities; yet, whenever I think of lessening my work, Luke ix. 62 frightens me, and I set out afresh to get on, as my Lord shall help me. Our word for this year is preaching day and night to my inmost soul—I am "Looking to Jesus"—a sight that would do an angel good—and much more a sinner; for his name is Wonderful. There is none like him in heaven or earth. Consider his nature, his essential glory, or his offices, his mediatorial glory—from what he saves us freely, and to what he brings us perfectly, even to life eternal: surely he is a matchless Jesus; and he wants only to be known, that he may win our hearts, and we may admire and adore him. Why is not he, then, universally admired? If man had no failing in his faculties, he could not help falling in love with such infinite beauty. But he is blind—yea, truly he is dead. He has lost not this or that thing, but the very Spirit of life, and thereby all communion with the spiritual world; he is actually dead in trespasses and sins. And, when the Spirit of life that is in Christ Jesus frees him from the law of sin and of death, then he receives spiritual senses, and is able to see him by faith, who was before invisible. His first look is generally for healing. He beholds the Lamb that was slain, and finds peace through his cleansing blood. The Spirit gives him to seal the testimony of the Father concerning the Son. He believes, and the more simply, the more virtue flows from Jesus, to purify and to rejoice the heart. He believes on, reads the faithful word, hears it, prays over it, and the Spirit applies it, making Jesus still more precious. Every fresh look to him confirms the reality, and increases the blessedness of living by faith upon him: and thus daily communion with him nourishes spiritual life, and renders it more easy, and more delightful. These were some of the outlines of our new year's sermon—How we get eyes to see Jesus—and how fresh sights make our eyes stronger. The eye-salve of his word and Spirit clears the mental organ, and enables it to behold more wonderful things than Adam saw in paradise. May the prospect brighten upon you; and the more beautiful it is, may he speak to your heart, and say, "All this is yours."

My friend, we proceeded thus: If this be your faith, now try it. The trial is God's way of improving it. Jesus being the author and the continuer of faith, he expects that we look up to him constantly for our

1. Safety, as 1 Pet. i. 5. "We are kept," &c.

2. Growth; being alive by him, we grow by cleaving to him, as the branch to the vine, Eph. iv. 15. "But holding the truth in love," &c.

3. All spiritual blessings flow from him, Eph. i. 3. "Blessed be," &c.

4. All temporal blessings, holy use of troubles, burdens, wants, sickness, trust, as Isa. xxvii. 1, 2, and they will be profitable; and health, and money, and lands, and all good things in life, shall be sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

5. Come what may—Trust on, look to Jesus; and Rom. viii. 28, shall be infallible truth.

6. "But he may lose sight and be blind for ever." 1 Cor. i. 7, 8, 9, cannot be broken. He shall see the King in his beauty.

7. "But he may fall and be lost." Oh, no. Christ's prayer, John xvii. is as effectual as ever. Heb. ii. 13.

8. "But he must die." Well, a dying man, looking to Jesus, may hear him say—"Fear not; I am with thee," Psal. xxiii. 4. He has a good warrant to be comforted as long as the breath is in his body—and then, "all these died in faith."

9. Oh! what will this man find when he opens his eyes, and sees Jesus in his glory. The Lord the Spirit prepare us for that sight, and keep us looking to Jesus by faith till we see him by sense.

Thus I have fulfilled my promise. You have a little sketch of the business of 1788. God make it prosper in your hands. Mr. M. has been here twice: he suffers, but profits. We had a great deal of conversation, and much to my profit. I cannot get him Adams. "Wesley's at Southampton"—do not trouble yourself about them. I was a great horseman when young; and when riding through a village, it was not worth while to stop, though I had a long lash whip, to stay and beat every cur that came out. My dear brother, I hope, will let them alone—and preach Jesus. My love to him, and to all the family. Farewell, and pray for

W. Romaine.

Love to all at Hanover Buildings—God prosper whatever they have in hand!

LETTER CXXXIX.

May 3, 1788.

My good Friend.—I am fully satisfied you do not forget the Master, nor his servant. I please myself with thinking that you are living what I teach, and that our word for 1788, "Looking to Jesus," is realised at ——. I believe he has opened your eyes. You do see him—a true Jesus—but not in all his glory. The object is too great for the eye of faith, and too bright when we come near it. But if you will humbly ask for some of his eye-salve, it will marvellously strengthen the nerves, insomuch that you may see him who is invisible—enough of him to win all your affections. Such sights bring applications. He is matchless beauty, and mine. He is all perfection, and I am perfect in him The wonder of Heaven, and soon I shall see him face to face. This hope makes studying the word, believing, growing up into him, very sweet and improving. Every fresh view of his heavenly person begets some conformity to him, and wishes for more.

So far I had written, when I found the glass must come: and I was not willing to send so much blank paper with it: therefore I kept it by me, till some favourable opportunity should let me go on with this Looking to Jesus—to a real, a believed in, a precious Jesus. So he is, this May the 3d. I have been consulting one who was quite enraptured with his Lord's beauty, who had seen him in his glory; and he gave me great encouragement to proceed in this divine study: for he said to me, "After twenty-three years' happy experience of what he is to me, besides the visions and revelations which I had of him in paradise, still I know him but in part: yet, what I do know has such a powerful influence upon my heart and life, that I am still pressing forward, and I will, God helping me, until I know even as also I am known." Oh this was sweet advice! You cannot think what good it did me; for I found my case and the apostle's were much alike: I do, blessings on him, I do know my Jesus truly, and savingly; yet it is but little; I am not satisfied with my attainments: more, far more remains to be known of this infinite object; and therefore it is not enjoyed: a sense of this keeps alive a constant appetite for fresh discoveries; and this hungering and thirsting is not in vain: it is the vigour of spiritual life in the kingdom of faith. The health of the soul is more seen in its desires than in its enjoyments; for we have flesh and blood; and they let us feel we are not at home. We have also many mighty and cunning enemies, who are always attacking and often robbing us of our sensible enjoyments; and yet faith can live and thrive amidst all: it can break through every obstacle that stands between it and its beloved; trusting to what God has promised, and waiting patiently for his fulfilling it. If he hide his favourable countenance, yea, if he appear as an enemy, the believer trusts, and is not afraid. These are some of the workings of faith, by which its truth, its efficacy, and its blessedness, appear. May the witness for Jesus keep them very strong upon our heart! It is his office, while we are absent from our dearest friend, to preserve longings after him in our souls—warm breathings (such as Psalm lxiii. throughout), fervent desires, not to be satisfied till they get full enjoyment; and in this way the Holy Spirit glorifies the Saviour. What he manifests to us creates such an appetite for him, as only God-Jesus himself in glory can fill. All the grace we now get out of his fulness is but a whet of what we hope to get out of the same fulness in glory. Now, this is living and thriving faith. The more I have, the better I am; and you too are better for my betterness. It makes me wish the best thing for you: although you do not always treat me as I could wish. You would do me a great favour to employ me more. You have a wedding in hand. I expected to be invited to it: not down to Southampton, but up to my Lord. His presence I would have intreated: and he is as famous now as he was at Cana of Galilee for turning cold water into generous wine. My love to them, and my prayers for them, that he may every day repeat the miracle at ——. God bless you all. And remember to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXL.

June 12, 1788.

My dear Friend.—Your last letter brought me down upon my knees.—— Poor W.! I feel for you. I pray you may have a right use of this visitation. It can only be sanctified by the Spirit of God and prayer. May you meet it in faith, and improve it by patience! A child—a pleasant child—of fair hopes—I have lost such a one; and I well remember it gave me occasion to exercise all the grace I could get. I found an infinite fulness; and there is the same for you to go to. And now your children are growing up, they will make you very miserable, or else they will compel you to be daily learning, Heb. iv. 16. Read it. Meditate well upon it. Pray over it. It is a lesson of constant practice. If your children live; if they prosper; if they get on in spiritual success, as well as temporal; if they be sick; if they should die: all will try your faith, and make you feel that your whole dependence for yourself and family is on the Lord who made heaven and earth. Whatever may be the event of W.'s complaint, we know not. But our Lord has taught us to live in subjection to his holy will, whatever he may please to send. Mr. T., you are not to learn this, at your time of day, in theory: but how to practise it is the point; and therein most of us fail. We none of us carry our subjection so far as he warrants us: his rule is "If any man be my disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." This carries the terms of discipleship very high. A man must deny all that he has and is, as a child of Adam—himself—as being under the law, under sin, and under condemnation. No possible hope in himself. And then he takes up the cross, which was the instrument of death, and to which the curse of the broken law was annexed, and executed too, on Adam, and all his descendants. He pleads guilty; owns the sentence just; carries about with him an abiding conviction that he deserves the curse and death, due to sin, as his wages. He puts the life of Adam, what he lives in the flesh, upon the cross, and henceforward lives by the faith of the Son of God—really dead to all hopes—except what Christ is to him. It is a great trial to have your son sick: it will be a greater if God should take him from you. But such a trial does not come up to our Lord's meaning. We call every thing that goes contrary to our will, a cross; but this is far short of the matter. Christ's disciple must not only deny the will of the flesh, but himself: not only all trust in the flesh, but life itself. If he has come aright to Christ, he has come with a halter about his neck: ay, and has it on still—owning, that the cross and curse, due to sin, are due to him. He submits to the penalty; and, moreover, waits with faith and patience for the execution. It is thus the Spirit of God makes Christ his one hope—breaking off all connexion with Adam's world, and with the life we derive from Adam. He quickens us into Christ, and into Christ's world. This is a total resignation: not only the will, but the whole man, is crucified with Christ. The greatest thing we have—life itself—is resigned to him. And thus the disciple is taught submission in all other things. It becomes easy then to say—ay, and to practise too—"Take away what thou pleasest, Lord: not my will, but thine, be done!" Duties are all alike easy, trials all alike tolerable, when we meet them in the strength of Christ; but when we would do them, or bear any part of them ourselves, then we find our perfect weakness. A disciple feels his resistance, and lays the burden upon Christ; who says to him, "I will sustain thee." His almighty power fulfils his word; and through him faith and patience do their perfect work. This is following Christ. May you at this time, and at all times, be one of his happy disciples, denying yourself, taking up your cross daily, and following the Lamb whithersoever he leads you.

It will not be unseasonable to remind you that you cannot lay in a stock of grace, and thereby keep your heart in any preparation to submit cheerfully to God's will, especially when it is much contrary to your own. No past experience can enable you to bear a present trial. You must have fresh grace for the moment, as you breathe, Isaiah xxvii. 3; so is the spiritual life: it is not from yourself, any more than your animal life: we fetch both from without us. Your genial warmth is light in every part of solids and fluids, as electrical experiments demonstrate. And it is the action of the air, by which you breathe, and move, and have your being. The life and liveliness of your soul depends entirely on Christ, the light of life, and on the Holy Spirit, the breath of life; and you can only receive, and can only enjoy, these influences from Christ and the Spirit, as you are living every moment by faith. This is the holy art of believing: by it a beggar is enriched, a sinner pardoned, the weak strong in the Lord, the miserable blessed, the dying disciple lives for ever. May you practise this holy art, and become the happiest believers in the island. W. has a friend in need to pray for the good effect of the waters. When you write, remember me to him and his companion. I charge you to pray for

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXLI.

Aug. 13, 1781.

My dear Friend.—I have not been at all well since I left you: a giddiness follows me constantly, and sometimes I am ready to fall. I am aware of the consequences; and, thank God, I have nothing to fear, come what may. Nay, though it be a fair warning that the house is growing ruinous, yet I have a prospect of another building—a house of Immanuel's making—out of the reach of death and misery—fit for Immanuel's land, which is a country far, far better than Paradise. It is made so to me by free gift, the grant accepted by faith, and the earnest of the Spirit enjoyed. In the grant is death—a covenant mercy—by which we receive all covenant blessings. And for all in hand and in promise, I am kept looking to Jesus. I am afraid to say much of myself, lest I should fall into a mistake which I have often noticed and blamed in Mrs. Rowe, that she talked too much in raptures, and shot too high—far above common Christians' heads. However, let him have his glory. He won the crown: let him wear it. Keep him in sight in all his gifts—in all his graces—every thing will then go well. This is my old lesson, and my new lesson daily. Pray, I charge you to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXLII.

Blackfriars, Nov. 8, 1788.

Friday Morning, Nov. 7, 1788. I sit down to write to my good friend W. T., intending to fill up this paper to-day, if I am able. I owe you for a very friendly note: the contents were all matter of praise. How thankful should you feel, how humbly should you walk, under a sense of such mercies! And even for this, there is an ample provision made. Grace from which all good comes, is ready to make you truly thankful, and to keep you humble; and if you use ever so much grace to increase humble thankfulness, yet, always remember the character of our Jesus. He giveth more grace.

I got no further yesterday—called off by business, visits, &c. Saturday morning. I am looking at that most blessed Giver of more. He is like the sun which is never weary of sending out more light: nor is our sun of sending out more grace—fresh—always adding—more in quantity—more in quality—better and better—and the last the best—even eternal grace—the crown of all. Mr. T., I tell you a great secret; and it is all I have learned in a very long experience. By putting this word to every thing, it makes a miraculous change; it really turns evil unto good. Misery with grace can feel happy; pain is sweet; gracious poverty makes rich; a weak believer, out of weakness, becomes strong—weak in himself, therefore strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. Nay, no dispensation can hurt where grace is exercised; indeed, nothing can hurt, not even sin itself: for where sin abounded, grace did much more abound, &c. Rom. v. 20, 21. Read these two verses, and St. Paul's comment upon them, Ephesians, chap. i. and ii., and then tell me whether the grace of our Jesus ought not to have, and from me it shall have, constant use and employment as long as I have any being. May you, and yours, do the same: and then you will find showers of blessings coming down daily upon you.

All was good in your letter, except what related to Mrs. K.; and even that, put grace to it, will also be good. Grace can extract much spiritual health out of bodily sickness. I hope and pray she may be better for her present complaint, and find under it grace sufficient to make her say, from her heart, and her good man to join her, "Thy will be done!" But mind, this must be present grace, received moment after moment, out of the fulness of the God-man. We have no stock in hand: and when faith lives as it should do, it finds the benefit of receiving all, just as it is wanted, even fresh grace to thank Jesus for his grace.

I had written a long letter to W. on his going abroad; but I did not send it. Mr. I. and I cannot agree about the subject. I can live by faith, under a special providence, and do as well, even for my health, in this smoky and dirty city, as they can do at Montpellier. Happier they cannot be. However, I wish them well. May they come home better in soul and body. Your daughter is going to be married. She has my prayers. May it be such a connexion as my Lord may approve; and then he will bless it. Mr. N. tells me much of your frequent visits, in which I truly rejoice. We have been alarmed at our good king's danger. To-day I hear the distemper has taken a favourable turn; and he is much better. Lord, preserve his precious life! Pray for him; speak to brother K. in public and in private to plead, like the poor widow. Mrs. R. is very hearty in her salutes to Mrs. T., as you know. I could not write from Reading, being quite taken up with visiting and with preaching; and now I do write, what does it amount to, but only a cypher, unless you please to put some numbers to it? I trust you will; and believe me to be, not in word only, but in deed and in truth, your real and fast friend, and faithful servant, in the Lord Christ,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXLIII.

Dec. 20, 1788.

MR. T.—Mrs. K. is sick; yet her sickness is not unto death. Oh what a mercy that her soul is alive—to God—in Christ. United to him, she is one with the fountain of life, and cannot be cut off: see John xi. 25, 26. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. May her partner, and all the family, knowing what it is to be in the Lord, when they sorrow, yet sorrow not as others who have no hope.

You seem to be much affected with the complexion of the times. So am I: and your support is mine also. The Lord reigneth—the Lord Jesus; and blessed are all they who put their trust in him. His subjects have nothing to fear in the worst of times; for their king is Almighty—Almighty to save them from all their sins—Almighty to save them from all their miseries—Almighty to give them all spiritual blessings—yea, Almighty to command the blessing, even life for evermore. Oh what a king is this! Oh what subjects are these! Who is a God like unto thee, God-Jesus, who pardoneth rebels, and makest them kings and priests unto God and the Father, and then adviseth them to sit down with thee upon thy throne of glory? The Lord reigneth in his kingdom of grace, by his word, and by his Spirit, conquering rebels daily, and making them his willing subjects, till they be all brought safe to the kingdom of his glory. Now, what makes these blessed views of Jesus, the King of kings, so quieting and comforting to my heart, is, that he is my King. This crowns all. He is my Almighty Saviour—my Blesser—my Keeper. His providence is over me for good, and he says to me, "Lest any hurt thee, I will keep thee night and day." And as to what concerns life and godliness, he says, "Cast all thy care upon me; for I care for thee." Jesus, Lord, I believe thee—the government is upon thy shoulders—under thy protection I am safe and happy. I know thou canst get thyself honour and renown in the darkest days, and the most stormy weather. Let the tempest rage ever so much, my pilot is Almighty. He says to the winds "Be still," and to the waves "Cease," and the stormy winds and waves fulfil his word.

Mr. T., here is my rest. I use means, as well as you. I am at my prayers. But Jesus is my only hope. The present prospect may appear to you very dark—a black cloud gathering: you fear what may come when it bursts in all its vengeance. My good sir, this is the time for faith, to exercise it—ay, to improve it. What of fair weather, and sunshining faith? How can one tell whether it be true or genuine? But to put to sea in our little boat, in the midst of a storm, the waves dashing over our heads, and threatening to swallow us up every moment; then to be able to say and feel—my Christ is with me in the boat, therefore I will trust and not be afraid; this is the proper working of the faith of God's elect. For thus the command runs: "Trust ye in Jehovah for ever—because in Jah, Jehovah is everlasting strength." Let brother K. turn to his Hebrew Bible, and tell you why I thus render the text.

I have been so much pleased with your thought "the Lord reigneth," that if God spare life and health, I will preach upon it new year's day, and make it my watch-word for the year 1789, giving the character of the person of the King—of the nature of his government, and what a peculiar sort of people his subjects are —saved, pardoned, justified, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ—how they live—and how they die—and how they live to die no more Pray for me, that I may be so enabled to set forth his praises, that he may be glorified in me, and by me, then, and for ever.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXLIV.

Jan. 10, 1789.

Saturday morning. It is so cold, I can scarce hold my pen; but I cannot help writing to you my present thoughts. Pardon failings; as it is written, "Have fervent love among yourselves; for this love shall cover the multitude of offences," 1 Pet. iv. 8. I expected daily to hear of Mrs. K.; and I thank God for her. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they lived in him by his Spirit, the Spirit of life, who had given them faith to receive Christ, by which they were united to him, and had grown up as members under him their head—living upon him as well as by him. Oh blessed life! for it is out of the reach of death, as Jesus said to Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, although he had been dead, yet shall he be made alive; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?" So says he to you: he speaks what is as true to-day as it was then. Believe him, and dry up your tears. Mourn not as they do who have no such hope. Mrs. K. was in the Lord. She is in him now. She is with him now; and like him—like that standard of all perfection. Upon the ground of this faith, you ought to have a family meeting, and join in thanksgiving to our dearest Jesus, that he has vouchsafed to admit one of you to his presence, and into his glory: and then to improve the providence in prayer, that God would make you all ready. You will soon follow her—sooner than some of you think. Take warning. You have nothing to do here, that signifies any thing, but to prepare for death. God help you to live by faith, that the next of you who goes after her may be found in the Lord, and may live with him for ever.

Mrs. T., we have been at prayers for you. The best thing we can do. I know well the tenderness of your heart, and how you have felt your present loss. I believe you go for comfort where I would have you. He who has won your heart, is waiting to be gracious to you. He can supply with his presence your sister's absence. Whatever good you had from her was his gift; and now he takes it away, he can make up your temporal loss abundantly by his spiritual blessings. May you live near to him, and make so much use of him at this time, that you may now find him a precious Jesus; for, "Blessed are all they who put their trust in him." You know this well as a truth, but I wish you to feel its power. May you enjoy the presence and the love of our matchless Jesus, which is blessedness in the supreme. May he whisper to your heart—"I have made your sister as happy as my almighty love can. Wait a little, and I will do as much for you."

Mr. K., I trust we have one spirit, and feel as brethren for one another. I am sure I do for you. Where to go, and how to go for comfort, you know as well as I, even to the God of all comfort. He, and he alone, can give it you at this time. We, your friends, can only pray that you may make good use of, and receive much profit from, your present dispensation. You are sensible that wisdom to do this must come from above; and it is such a wisdom as produces miraculous effects to this, as truly as in the day when James wrote. ch. i. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Probatum est.

Miss K., weep not as those who have no hope. I am praying for grace to teach you submission to the will of our Lord. She was your mother: but remember how she lived, how she died, and where she is now. Dry up your tears. You have work to do for the Lord. You are to fill up, for a time, your mother's place in the family. May my God give you grace, and prudence, and diligence, carefully to follow her steps. I shall not forget your brothers and sisters.

Mr. T., I am to thank you for your information concerning your guest. You have gladdened my very heart with your good account of my old friend. May it prove better than you mention. I am sure that Christ, and Christ only, can make him truly and completely happy. All is vanity besides. I wish he enjoyed what I have little of, and it would make me happier if he had all I wish him.

You see I can scarce hold my pen. It is cold, very cold; but I do not murmur. Frost, and snow, and stormy wind, fulfil his word; and in that word I trust, let the weather be what it may. His will be done. Remember Blackfriars. Here live two of your friends. Pray for them and theirs.

LETTER CXLV.

April 27, 1789.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—Having the favour of seeing Sir Richard, I immediately thought of you; and although Monday is a day in which I am seldom fit for any sort of attention, yet, this opportunity of telling you that brotherly love continues makes me glad to sit down and write as long as I am able. I congratulate you on our late national mercies, which all the people have felt—those of the world in their way, and we in ours—in prayer and in praise, bringing God into our joys, and looking up to him, that he would give us fresh reason to rejoice in his holy name. I believe you and I are in unison; and perhaps I may strike an octave: the touching upon my joy may affect and increase yours. Never was I more disappointed, nor more agreeably, than on the 23d. I expected to be left alone, and to preach to stone walls; but, behold, we had a full church, and a blessed congregation of serious worshippers. Our subject was the 122d Psalm—a short paraphrase on it, with seasonable applications. As I take no notes, I can only give you some of the outlines. May they warm your heart as much as they did mine: for I had some of the prophet's joy, which he felt when he said, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord." They were going up to Jerusalem, as you know they did three times a-year. It was a pleasant occasion to the true worshippers who had received the Holy Spirit, by whom they had living faith in Jesus, and thereby believed and enjoyed the Father's love in him. They went up to the festivals to confirm and to increase their joy; for they knew well that the temple was the type of Christ's body, and all the public services there had relation to him. When they said, "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem," they then felt that true joy and peace in believing, which any of us now feel in reading—Rom. v. 1, 2; for the very word Jerusalem, which means the inheritance of peace, led them to look up to him who only is our peace, who only makes us heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; see Gal. iv. 22, to the end; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. xxi. throughout. And when they came to Jerusalem, how did it add to their joy—v. 3. All worshipping in one place, one object, one faith, and one uniformity of rites and services—v. 4. When the tribes went up, even the tribes of the Lord, they had the same testimonies, i. e. ordinances, as we have, all referring directly to the Messiah. The temple, its vessels, the holy place, the most holy, preached Christ as plainly as I can; for "they went up to give thanks unto the name Jehovah:" he was a person—the name Jehovah, as Exod. xxiii. 21; Isa. xxx. 27—that person who was to be God incarnate, Jehovah Jesus, through whom prayer, praise, duties, all we do is made acceptable, and through him only. In this faith, wherever a Jew was when he prayed, he turned his face towards the temple, acknowledging that the God worshipped at Jerusalem was his God. In this view they might well rejoice when they went up with one heart and one voice to bless the name Jehovah; because to him they ascribe, as in v. 5, their civil as well as religious prosperity. Under him they enjoyed full security for life and property. A good government, according to the word of God, is a great mercy. This they enjoyed: they had a King sitting on the throne of judgment, ruling in the fear of God. Sensible of their blessings, and thankful for them, they exhort one another: v. 6. "Oh pray for the peace of Jerusalem—our church and state." They love Christ, who pray so; who feel for their brethren and their prosperity, and who know and value the house of the Lord our God, they will be much in prayer for the continuance of these inestimable blessings.

These meditations brought us home to England; and to inquire, whether we had not as much reason to rejoice to-day as they ever had on any festival at Jerusalem: we have the same religious, the same civil mercies, as they had, and we come behind them in nothing, unless we fail to-day, in our national praises: for our privileges are uncommonly great, and call for singular acknowledgments. We have religion in its purity—God's word in our hands—men sent of God to open and to explain it—and they are owned of him in their labours. No where in the world is the gospel in its truth, and in its power, as it is with us. Oh, what rich incense of praise should go up to the throne of grace from us this day! Oh what superlative thankfulness do these favours of God require of British believers, of you, and me! The gospel runs and is glorified, and yet the times are quiet. The government is on the side of our most holy faith. Our king, God bless him, is himself a defender of it. May he, by whom kings reign, look down upon him with a gracious eye this day. When he prostrates himself before his God, may the great Angel of the covenant take his prayers, and praises, and perfume them with much of his heavenly incense. Lord God, speak to his heart, and let him feel some of that joy and peace which surpass all understanding.

You can easily add what came in here concerning the day. It was only to call upon the people to thank the Lord our God, and to give him the glory due unto his great name for public mercies, family mercies, personal mercies. How high ought our praises to rise, sinners as we are, helpless, unworthy, yea, unthankful and unprofitable! Oh what a God have we to deal with, who loadeth such creatures with such benefits! What a mercy, that such poor thanks, and these his own gifts of grace, should be accepted at our hands! Holy Ghost, assist us in our prayers; help our infirmities in our praises, and teach us, with increasing gratitude, to adore the Son for his salvation, and to worship the Father for his love in Jesus. To the eternal Three be eternal praise.

What a scribble! But I could not stop. It was a glorious day, ever to be remembered in the annals of British history. Mr. K. got the lead: he will keep it. I have sold great numbers of his sermon, and should have sold the whole impression but for "price one shilling," that kept it out of many hands. My true love to your dear partner. My blessing on the whole family. Add to all good providences, what is really miraculous—Thursday's crowds, Friday's exceeding the day before, and nobody hurt Glory be to him in the highest!

LETTER CXLVI.

Blackfriars, Nov. 11, 1789.

My dear Friend.—I sit down, as your monitor, to thank our physician that you all keep so well, and that I hear Mrs. D. is a great deal better. If you would follow his recipes, all would mend. He prescribes one simple remedy; and that infallibly cures all diseases. Only believe. All that ever tried it, found its virtue never fail—no, not when life itself failed: the experience of every age has set its seal—Probatum est. And yet we have among us many pretenders to skill, who cry it down as a quack nostrum. Our learned doctors have shut it out of the new London and Birmingham dispensaries; and they treat us as rank enthusiasts, who try to keep it still in practice. You know, sir, as well as I, what the great men of the day think of Jesus Christ, and of his remedy: but their opinion does not hurt you or me. We trust to matter of fact. A wounded conscience set at peace—a broken heart healed—a miserable sinner made happy—a dying sinner rejoicing in the prospect of death. Millions of such, who now see his face, and we, who now feel his virtue, are witnesses of his almighty power, and that he still saveth freely by grace through faith. To this truth I set my hand and seal, this eleventh day of November, A. D. 1789. It is all my salvation, and, God be thanked! it is all my desire. You have my living and dying testimony in a volume of sermons, which I have revised and just published. You will please to accept them as a token of brotherly love; and when you read them, may you feel real fellowship with your divine Jesus; as much, more if it please him, than he has most graciously vouchsafed unto me. Perhaps I may seem too warm (a little enthusiastic) in speaking of this happiness to some. Even believers are too apt to rest in the truth: but is it not therefore received that it may produce its proper effects? such as great joy and peace in believing; the unsearchable riches of Christ. What are they, if nobody is to be enriched out of his treasury? "Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty."—Yes, I have had a glimpse of him, and I long to see more of his matchless charms. He hath promised, "they shall hear my words; for they are sweet."—Yes, Lord, I hear the joyful sound; and it is heavenly melody in my ears. "Thy name is as ointment poured forth." I feel its perfume, the smell of thine ointment is to me much better than all spices. "Come, taste, and see how gracious the Lord is." I have come, Lord, and thy fruit is indeed sweet unto my taste. "As many as touched him were made perfectly whole." Glory be to him who enables us still to handle the word of life. These are the five senses of the spiritual man: and each of them finds in Christ the proper exercise of its faculty. The bodily senses take in all the objects of nature: the spiritual senses take in all the fulness of Christ: and in him they have their employment, and will have their happiness for ever. The belief of this, and some enjoyment of it, make me wish that I myself, and you, my Christian friends, may have our senses more exercised in our own proper world, that we may get faster hold of Christ, may find him more precious, and every day may be growing up into him, and that in all things. You have great reason to pray for

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXLVII.

MY VERY GOOD FRIEND.—You know our custom. We begin the year always with a motto. Ours for 1790 is—"Trust in him at all times." A year of especial faith. I would have it famous for believing—our bodies, and souls, and families, the church, the state, at home, abroad, call for much trust in our God. The word trust means to lean upon any thing which you think will support you, and you will do it with more or less confidence, as you are persuaded it is able to keep you from falling. This is a beautiful idea of faith, as it respects the word of God—our ground to lean upon. What has he said in his promise of salvation, and what security have I in leaning upon it, that I shall be a saved sinner? You have the word of truth, which cannot lie—the promise of a faithful God, who keepeth his promise for ever—his covenant, secured by the oath of the eternal Three, and all these guaranteed by the name which the Trinity have taken; namely, to be Alehim, engaged upon oath to be on the side of his people, their sworn allies, to defend them from all evil, and to give them all good in earth and in heaven. Notwithstanding the foundation of our faith is thus immutably laid, so as to render unbelief without excuse; yet, so it is, that they only believe to whom it is given. The Holy Spirit alone can convince of sin, its guilt, its danger; how near the poor creature is to death and hell: he makes the conviction felt and effectual; and the man is in earnest to flee from the wrath to come. Then the divine warrant and the command to believe gain credit, and the truth of the promise is received, and thereby the blessing in the promise comes to be enjoyed. He is made to see that he has good ground to lean upon God's word; and he finds it safe trusting to such evidence, and thereby he experiences how blessed they are who put their trust in such a God, as Psalm ii. 12; because there is great joy and peace in believing.

It may be done safely—it may be done happily, at all times. What more can be said to recommend this leaning upon God's word? No case so desperate, of sin or misery, but the word reaches it with a promise; and faith, mixed with the promise, brings deliverance from all sin, Rom. viii. 1, 2, 3; from all misery—if it continues, it does good, Rom. viii. 28; and in the best time, a happy issue, as Zech. xiii. 9. Oh what a blessing is there in this passage of Zechariah! You have been tried lately in this fire, and you will again, and soon. Read it over and over; digest it; you will find it a sovereign cordial in an hour of need. God give you to see it in my light, and to get all the nourishment out of it of which it is full. Is it so, then, that no guilt, no trouble, should hinder a man from trusting in God: nay more, if these be the special times of trusting, let us consider what encouragement we have to make this year famous for believing, come what may.

First, for salvation, as verse 7. Fallen man is under the law—under sin, therefore dying and without any help or hope in himself; for there is salvation in no other than Jesus Christ. But, whenever any one believes in Jesus, he is saved freely by grace. The law no longer condemns—the lawgiver justifies. All iniquities are freely forgiven, and the peace of God rules (should rule) in the conscience always, and by all means. Death is changed into life, as John xi. 25, 26, even a life that cannot die.

Secondly, Oh what a glorious subject of rejoicing is here, called, verse 7, glory—God himself is our salvation. Here faith may triumph all the year: a paraphrase on Isaiah, chap. xii., especially on verse 3, rendered well; but Mr. K. can tell you that it is the fountain of salvation, which cannot, like a well, be drawn dry.

As salvation is for sinners, joy for the miserable, so the next word, verse 7, strength, is suited to the weak. The weakest believer has an almighty arm to lean upon in every trial, trouble, or temptation: he cannot fall, unless his faith fails. A paraphrase on that sweet hymn, Isaiah xxvi. 1, 2, &c., and on that blessed experience recorded 2 Cor. xii. 7, 8, 9, 10. Strong in faith—strong in all. Thus, for all the possible events of the year, we have, as verse 7, God for our refuge, in the most desperate case that can be. Our Jesus is able to save to the uttermost: you may cast safely all your sins, and all your cares, upon God-Jesus His almighty power is with you, and for you. He said once, and, blessings on him! we find it true to this day—Fear not: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward.—Who can tell the full meaning of this promise. However, leaning upon it, we may go with confidence through all the troubles of life, yea, through the valley of the shadow of death, and fear no evil.

Oh what a year would this be, if we could always bring these principles into practice, without doubt or wavering! For you see that, in all cases, in all times, we are commanded to trust God in Christ; and in trusting we shall find, 1. Salvation; 2. the joys of it; and 3. the security of it: the Lord's strength being our keeper and our sure refuge in life and death from all possible evil.

These are some of our encouragements to set out in this new year with fresh spirits, that we may hold out, and go on from faith to faith. There is no temptation, enemy, danger, or corruption, which should stop us. Nay, these are so many motives for depending on God's promised help; so that neither what we feel within, nor fear without, should make us withdraw our confidence.

Then came the application, 1. To professors who have not faith; 2. To weak believers, who are so because they make not use of Christ's strength; for, under the teaching of his Spirit, the weakest is the strongest; and 3. To sound believers. The motives from this Psalm—a paraphrase wsa given upon it—then desiring them to read it at home, to get it off by heart, that in the shop, in the closet, in the exchange, wherever they were, or whatever they were doing, they might live by the faith of the Son of God; so that it might be a most famous year for the increase of faith.

Thus I have given the outlines of the religious history of the year 1790—Annus Mirabilis. May my character of it be fully verified at ——, in your heart, in Mrs. T., in your children and family—brother K. and his family, in his church, and in the heart and life of

LETTER CXLVIII.

May 3, 1790.

My dear Friend.—I sit down with pleasure to answer two letters. You load us with favours, which I acknowledge in my way; with prayer and praise. Every morning of my life, to these I have a monitor, who reminds me whose honey it is that sweetens my tea. I stand up to beg the blessing of God on the gifts and on the giver. Mr. —— delivered into my own hands Mrs. T.'s presents. I had but short time to talk with him, though he found me alone, and very much disposed to converse with him of the very best things: he put it off till we should meet. Many thanks to my generous friend; but Mrs. Romaine is quite overcome with your kindness. She says, I cannot put her feelings into proper words, nor express to Mrs. T. the grateful sentiments of her heart. So you bind us to you with the sweet cords of love. I send you, in return, some of my good things—a word in season, which was our subject yesterday—and if the Lord please to rain and shine upon it, you will taste some of the rich fruit of the tree of life, which groweth in the midst of the paradise of God. The words were Psal. lxv. 10: "Thou blessest the springing thereof." He is speaking of the beauty of this season, when nature revives from the dark, dead winter, and the grass, and corn, and trees, grow and shoot forth. How verdant are the meadows! how flourishing the corn! what fair blossoms on the trees! promising us, through God's blessing, a fruitful year. Are we only to look at this delightful scene? and is it all to end in admiration? Oh no! A very important lesson is held forth, and made quite sensible. Nature in this, as in all other things, preaches and confirms the doctrines of grace—not by comparison or metaphor; but the God of nature so formed his works, that they should be standing records, outward and visible signs, to give us true ideas of spiritual objects. In the present case we have a fine spring season What is the cause of it? The earth itself is inert matter—acts only as acted upon. What pushes forward the grass, and corn, and trees? An unerring philosopher gives this account, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4: "He (Christ) shall be like the light of the morning when the sun riseth; even a morning without clouds, as the tender grass springeth out of the earth by clear shining after rain." Here has been a fine shower: after it the sun rises without a cloud: and this makes the grass spring out of the earth: the clear shining thins, rarifies the rain, impels it into the tubes of the plant or tree, drives it along as sap and nourishment: so all things grow. Look at Deut. xxxiii. 13, &c., which is a philosophical description of vegetation: "How the light pushes forth the sap, and makes all the precious fruits of the earth to ripen." This is the picture, created on purpose to give an idea of a spiritual spring. Christ is the light; his Spirit is the water of life: all men, by nature, are like winter, till Christ enlighten, and, by his Spirit, revive them: He breaks up their fallow ground, and fits it for the seed, which is the word of God. When the sower, who is the Son of man, puts his Spirit into the seed, then it has life, it grows, it bears fruit, a hundred fold, even fruit unto life everlasting. This answers a grand inquiry in the spiritual life: How shall I know that I have had a spring time and that any of the good seed has been sown in my heart? Answer, I feel I want it; my heart is fallow ground; and I wait on the sower, as Deut. xxxii. 2. "That he would put in the good seed, and give it the early and the latter rain."

But how shall I know that mine is really a true spring? By depending more on spiritual influences. Nothing grows in nature without rain and sunshine: so, in grace, nothing grows without Christ and his Spirit. A conviction of this will lead to the experience of Isa. lviii. 11.

But I do not grow as I could wish. It is a great growth to feel this. I want more showers. Oh, what am I, when the influence of heaven is withdrawn? Then I feel my dependence; then I see it good to wait for the showers of heaven; then I expect gentle rain, dropping, that it may soak in, and come down like dew, unfelt, unseen, only in its blessed effects.

But how shall I be certain that if I have a spring, I have the blessing of God upon it? Truly, thanks be to the Son of man, I have got some of the harvest—I bless him for fulfilling Hos. xiv. 5, 6, 7, 8. And I also rejoice in my God, the giver of my life, and of my liveliness. Psal. iv. 7 is my present state, and that most beautiful spring, mentioned Cant. ii. 10, 11, 12, 13, is what I am seeking and praying for. I wish I had room to give you my ideas of that sublime description. Call upon me for it, if ever I see you, and I give it you under my hand, that you shall know all that I know of it. The seed sown, growing, thriving, will ripen into a glorious harvest. Great joy and peace in believing is the first fruits. Oh how should they adore and worship him who have the foretaste of that eternal spring. It will be the same there as here, only more perfect, and more lasting. May the sun shine and the clouds drop down their influence upon Mr. and Mrs. ——, upon my dear John, upon every branch of your family, that we may all feel his life, his liveliness, and our growth by him into life eternal.

I have read the letter over. I am quite displeased with myself: it is very unlike what I see in nature's spring. Pardon it: and if it lead you to trust less to yourself, and more to the influence of Heaven, I shall be thankful for such a poor essay. Next Sunday I shall be nearer to you, and shall preach the sum of this letter in Reading, and hope to spend some time with my old friend, Mr. S. God bless you all, and pray for

LETTER CXLIX.

My dear Friend.—How much I am indebted to you for so long a letter, I cannot say. I esteem it highly, and you for it. Knowing your great hurry of business, I could not expect it. But you are good, and I am thankful. At present I am also busy about my Bible; being suffered to live to read it over once more. Two things have occurred to me in the present perusal: in both which I am enabled to triumph. The one is a deeper discovery of the horrible state I am in through sin; so that, as a child of Adam, I feel nothing in myself but the working of corruption—by and under the law dead to God, but all are alive to sin—every faculty at work to bring it forth—the mind—the heart—the senses—yea, the very imagination, in prayer disturbing, distracting, quite lawless—I can do nothing but cry out, Rom. vii. 24. Reading verse 25, I get my second lesson, and find employment for my Jesus. A body of sin and death, like mine, wants an almighty Saviour, and I am learning to put more honour upon his word and work daily. I find more need of him than ever; and it is some true joy that he is most exactly suited to my desperate case; having no hope but in his blood; not one ray but in his righteousness; no strength but in his arm; no happiness but out of his fulness. I am led even to triumph in what he is to me. I would lay myself at his feet, and would bless his dear name, that he is become all my salvation; and glory in him, that he is now all my desire. It is the best reading that ever I had. Self was never so brought down, and so crucified daily: nor did I ever see so much reason to magnify the person of God-Jesus. In this spiritual crucifixion of self and sin—in this true growing up out of self into Christ—may the Holy Spirit teach you to profit daily. Pray for yours, in our common Lord,

W. Romaine

LETTER CL.

Nov. 10, 1790.

Mr. and Mrs. T.—Thanks—thanks for P—— mercies—for me and mine. I am told, it is a good thing to be giving of thanks; because it is the right improvement of past mercies, and the best way to secure a rich supply for the future. It keeps the eye where it should be, fixed upon the fulness of Jesus. He gave—he continues to give—and he will continue. All come from him. A mercy—the feeling it a mercy—and the praising him for it—this is grace for grace. It is his way, yea, his delight, to give thus liberally when he gets all the glory of his gifts. In this holy merchandise you may be as rich as you will. My friends, he will withhold no favour from you if you carry him back all his praise. Receiving his gifts, and thanking him for them, is the true spirit of the gospel, and is the practical improvement of it both in earth and in heaven. This is my lesson for the year 1790. I have just finished another reading of my Bible, and, as I told you, my profiting has been in a deeper discovery of the exceeding wickedness of sin, and of mine own heart-sin, deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. If I had been only in the school of Moses to learn, I should, with such views of sin, have hanged myself long ago; but in the school of Christ, his Spirit enables us to feel daily more of the mystery of iniquity, that we may have occasion to know more of, and to trust more in, that offering of Jesus which perfecteth for ever. Thus things go quite right when Christ is exalted—and self is brought down, and kept down This seems to bring our religion into a very little compass; but the practice of this one doctrine is universal, reaching to all times of life, and to all things in life; keeping us ever dependent on the Spirit of Christ to teach, and on his power to enable us to live out of self upon the fulness of God our Saviour. Mr. ——, he can make you a better scholar than I am. For which blessing may my prayer be heard for you in the full sense of the promise —" Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

I am for peace, in the church, in the state, in the family, in the conscience, in life and death—peace everlasting: all this Christ is to his people. Mr. N. is still alive—that is all; he is greatly supported. Pray for him. I am doing the same. Mr. John Thornton gone to heaven! Oh what a loss to the earth! After taking a most affecting leave of all his children, the Rev. Mr. C. asked him, "If he was happy."—"Yes," says he, "in Jesus." Oh! may our eyes never lose sight of him—still looking to Jesus till we see him face to face. Pray for

LETTER CLI.

Dear Friend.—I can only inform you, by the bearer, that we are well. My Lord finds me constant work, and fits me for it. I am now praising him for letting me speak of his most glorious name, five times this week: and am going at it again twice more. Oh! he is a good Lord to me, who does me the honour to employ me still in the service. What are most people good for at my time of life? Yet he gives me a tongue to recommend him to my fellow sinners, and a heart to triumph in his salvation. My best preaching, my best praises, are gifts of his grace. Not unto me, but unto him, be all the glory. Upon his imperial head there are many crowns; and when I am hoping he has one for me, I am quite lost in admiration of such sovereign and supreme mercy. Some of yours are this moment got above me in a higher note of praise; but I shall soon come up with them; and I expect to see you join us, and sing as loud as any of us the glories of Immanuel. I am sure you have as much reason: the door of mercy will not be shut against Mrs. T. May God fit her, and all hers, for that most blessed meeting. I hope and pray that John will be a good boy, and brought to love our Saviour, that he may be where his brother and sister are, in glory. Tell him what that means.

H—— T——, Esq. M.P. laid the plan of the inclosed. The execution by Mr. S. is by no means equal to the plan. What a pity such a bright star should set, and so little notice taken of it.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLII.

May 5, 1792.

My dear Friend.—I thank you for the good account you send me of my doctor. I knew he would not fail you. Thanks be to him for blessing the means for Mrs. T.'s recovery. I hope for his further help. He can still do greater things; for he does nothing by halves: all his words and works are, like himself, perfect. If he undertake, he will infallibly complete the cure. So we read of his patients: however desperate their cases, they were all made perfectly whole. His hand is not shortened. He can remove every spiritual disease, and restore present and eternal health. Such miracles are not ceased. More faith in him would multiply them in number—more faith would increase them in experience—more faith would then bring him more praise: for thus we read of a healed sinner—"Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all within me bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." By this spiritual health, he works a wonderful effect upon the body. It is better than any medicine; not for keeping off diseases, but for bringing in the supports of patience, and the comforts of faith; by which a man, even in bodily pain, can be kept happy in his soul; yea, so happy, as scarce to feel the pain, for the greatness of his inward joy. Thus speaks the word—"My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers trials." And the noble army of martyrs confirmed the word: they met death rejoicing that they were accounted worthy to suffer for their precious Jesus. I want Mrs. T. to come from Bath perfectly cured, as well as he thinks proper in her body, but in the highest health that can be, in her soul. She knows a good deal of his fame: but a great deal more remains to be known. He is not only a most wonderful physician for healing all the diseases of sin, but also for giving his patients every faculty which can fit them to receive, and to enjoy, the blessings of spiritual health. Oh what a Jesus!—what a Jesus!—He creates ears to hear the words of eternal life—eyes to see the King in his beauty, and to be enamoured with his matchless charms: and then to taste and see, what a most sweet Jesus he is!—Oh what a fragrancy! When the Gospel recommends his love, and the Spirit makes his name like the sweetest ointment poured forth, then the believer can, with his hands, handle the word of life: he hears, and sees, and tastes, and smells, and feels that his beloved is infinitely more than all other beloveds. Thus he gives spiritual senses and spiritual enjoyments to the inward man, and, come what may to the outward, he maintains joy and peace in believing, which the world cannot take away. Oh that you and Mrs. T. may go away from Bath, admiring and adoring his wonder-working love, healed in body, healed in soul, happy in both. You never, never can trust him enough, nor praise him as he deserves. His name alone is excellent, and his praise above heaven and earth. May he become dearer to you every day: so he will, if you use him more. Let him be your companion in your journey. Take him to ——. Make much of him. Be intimate with him in your own room. Go not to W. without him. Do nothing without him. Living by faith upon him at all times, and for all things, whatever you take in hand shall prosper. He will bless your substance, your table, your children, your bed, your servants: he will load you with his benefits; and he will do you good all the days of your life; and when they come to an end, he will give you to depart in peace. After that, he will do greater things than I can tell you. My prayers, my letters, my life, are directed to him, that he would vouchsafe to make me any way instrumental in recommending him to you; that you, and Mrs. T., brother K., and all his and yours, may grow in grace and in the knowledge and love of our dearest Jesus. So prays my partner, who is rather better, thanks be to our adorable physician. I am happy in believing that you have a brotherly remembrance of

LETTER CLIII.

Nov. 14, 1792.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—You will receive from Mr. M. a parcel,

1. Containing 100 pamphlets, on the Baptists, which I have for two-pence a-piece; at which price you may have as many more as you please till the new edition be printed;

2. "Horæ Solitariæ," two volumes;

3. A parcel from me, in which are the three keys—a volume on the book of nature;

The experience of Mrs. G.; and

The experience of M.'s daughter.

He has not the "Christian Parent" bound, but will soon send you a quarter of a hundred, at one shilling and nine-pence. I have also inclosed a little ode of Dr. Horne's, made several years ago: it is very pretty, and very seasonable; and the two last stanzas carry such a sweet lesson with them, that I have often made use of them in the pulpit at this season.

I am very thankful for your account of brother K.'s sermon. There is great need of such sound doctrine, and also of much prayer to our God, that he would be pleased to bless it; for the times are very feverish: but he can, and he only can, cool and quiet the inflamed spirits; and he only can keep us from the infection. I am therefore of his party, and of no other: and though we be but a little army, yet we shall prove in the end the strongest side; yea, come what may upon this distracted world, he will keep us safe from all evil. The persuasion of this makes us love him—gives us a zeal for his glory—and a holy sympathy with believers, and for unbelievers. In all which I have received great confirmation from Ezek. ix.; in which I find a fixed purpose to destroy the city, for the abominations committed by priests and people. The execution is ordered, and the destroyers have their commission; but they are not suffered to act till the Lord Christ sets his mark upon his own people, of whom not one was to be hurt. They were his sealed: his Spirit had set on them the seal, and faith received the impression. Their character as believers is beautifully drawn, v. 4. They were humbled, and mourning for unhumbled sinners, and crying and praying to the Lord for mercy for themselves, and for a guilty land. In their number may I be found—and herein exercising my whole system of Christian politics—grieved for my Lord's glory—grieved for those who rob him of it, and praying earnestly to him, that he would grant them repentance unto life—blessing at the same time his dear name for the distinguishing mark of his love, that he has enabled me to set to my seal that God is true. Oh my friend, we are as bad, as ripe for destruction, as Jerusalem was: we have great reason to mourn before the Lord, and to pray that he would spare this guilty land. Whatever he is going to do with us in the way of judgment, I know not; but I have infinite reason to thank him that the destroying angel cannot hurt one on whom is the mark. I verily believe, without doubting, that he has sealed you also for his own; and I can see the impression very legible on Mrs. T. May the Spirit who made it render it every day more plain and more practical—especially by the blessed fruits mentioned verse 4, of the holy mourners—that they may abound in a great harvest at ——, is the hearty prayer of

My good Friend.—I am still hard at work, hoping to get my book done before my life be, that I may leave my dying testimony for my Jesus. LETTER CLV.

Dec. 1, 1792.

My dear Friend.— . . . So much for this affair: now for another; in which more than you and me are concerned. I fear children yet unborn. It is the evil, infinite evil, everlasting evil of sin; on which all the charges are to be laid of national, public, family, and personal suffering. God is angry at nothing but sin: his wrath against it is revealed from heaven—all sin, my sin. It is charged upon me; and I have fled to the city of refuge, sheltered by the sprinkled blood and by the mighty arm of my Jesus. When I live most upon him, he teaches me the true humbling of heart, for myself; and seeing from what he has saved me, my bowels melt over the sins and sufferings of others. Then he makes me plead with him for my fellow-sinners, and very thankful, more than I am, or can be, for myself. This is the only concern I have with the times. He is ruling by his providence, punishing sin, and warning sinners to take heed now he has his iron rod in his hand. Oh! spare Great Britain. Lord spare us, and give not thine heritage over to confusion. I have a long catalogue of national sins to pray over; as long as the prophet had, Ezek. ix.; and, I hope, with some of his faith. I told you before what a great honour it is to be among those holy mourners on whom God had set his mark: for they were not to be touched by the destroyer. How precious is that chapter to me in these times! What full security does it give believers, that God will take special care of them, whatever destruction he may send upon unbelievers. I pray him to set his mark upon you; that is, faith: that when men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming upon the earth, you may not be afraid of any evil tidings, but your heart may be established, trusting in the Lord. The God of peace grant you peace always, and by all means! So prays most cordially

LETTER CLVI.

Feb. 2, 1793.

My Friend Mr. T.—Mr. N. told me you was expected in town; but I hear nothing of your arrival, and therefore I send my messenger to inquire how you all do. Busy you are, I know, and to some purpose. As far as I can help you on, that this great hurry may not stop you, either in the seeking, or in the enjoying of the best of things, I am in my watch-tower, looking up to the keeper of Israel, for you and yours; for the public prosperity; for our king; and, above all, that our Lord would be pleased to revive his work in our land and day. This is much upon my heart, and keeps me watchful and waiting for what the Lord will answer. As his interpreter, reading his will in his present dispensations, I am to plead in his name for sinners, and to give them warning. He is angry at nothing but sin: and his anger has broke out. His arm is lifted up to strike, and his glittering sword has given a fearful blow, as you may read, Ezek. xxi., from ver. 8 to 18; and yet, it has more to slay before it be put up into the scabbard. No repentance yet; no turning to him who smiteth them. I see daily greater necessity for keeping in my watch-tower, as it is my office to be found, waiting upon God, humbled for my own sins, and praying and pleading for those who cannot read his present judgments against sin, and against the greatest of all sins—unbelief. In times as bad as the present, Habakkuk prayed, and kept on praying in his watch-tower until he got a gracious hearing, and a favourable answer. A good example for all who follow the steps of his faith: humbling themselves before God for sin, they will find his mercy for themselves; and it may be such a gracious answer as he obtained. This is my present office, in which I am now waiting—in which I hope to meet you often, as a Christian, a minister, a subject. I go no farther in politics than to be found in that blessed exercise of the prayer of faith, described in Psal. cxxii., paraphrased, from beginning to end, in our sermon, Jan. 30; when one of my parish left thirty shillings for the minister, to recommend "brotherly love and charity"—a far better subject than whig or tory.

I am at present pretty well. So well as to preach Sunday last twice, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and hope to be at it twice to-morrow. Tell Mr. K. of my watch-tower: and pray him to preach with earnestness and perseverance. I will give him a text, seasonable always, but now more so. Three Sundays have I been upon it, Isa. lix., last three verses. May he be made very successful in stopping the deluge of sin and unbelief, more than I have been! Pray for your obliged friend and servant in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLVII.

May 17, 1793.

Mr. T.—I may be ashamed of myself. A man of your great business, and present hurry, answered me within two or three days; and your letter has lain by me as many weeks. But, if I forget to write, I do not forget to pray. It is my privilege and my happiness to have you on my mind and in my heart—you and yours. I am still in my watch-tower, looking out for the discovery of the Lord's mind and will in his present dispensations. Indeed they are alarming: to me more so; because they do not alarm. The public is still thoughtless and secure, as if no storm was abroad, and no danger near them; though, for certain, some of the heaviest judgments of God are in the earth, calling aloud for repentance. And the professing few, with whom I converse, are not humbled, and pleading earnestly with God for mercy, as the necessity of the times require. And truly it is my own grief that I do not grieve as I ought to do for the affliction of Joseph. Great distresses call for great compassion. We ought to feel very tenderly for the sufferers in these wars—to relieve where we can—and where we cannot, to make our constant requests known to God for them. I lament before him that I have not so much as I could wish of that christian sympathy, which the members ought to have for one another. However, this feeling does me good; for it keeps me in my watch-tower, still waiting upon God, in the prayer of faith: and because I cannot see the appointed time for the end of the vision, I therefore cannot get off my knees. Things grow darker and darker. The way of Providence is still in the deep. What he is doing, we see: but his motives and his ends are out of my sight. How his own glory—how his people's good—how his church's increase—are to be brought about and promoted by these wars, and this distress of nations, must be left to him to unravel. I am forced, which ever way I look, still to be humbled in prayer; in which I hope to be instant, and without ceasing, as long as these troubles continue: and it is not unlikely but they may continue as long as I live: for I have got far, many years, beyond the age of man, and am waiting for the fulfilling of Gen. xxv. 8.

LETTER CLVIII.

My dear Sir.—There was certainly something of intrinsic value, which made the widow's mite more than a pound. Some of that magnifying virtue, I verily believe, accompanied your late letter and the present of wine, which came safe. God be praised that brotherly love continues. May it increase and abound yet more and more. If my prayer be heard, you will feel my Lord nearer and nearer to you, and he himself will speak to your heart—"Fear not: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." This will be a perfect antidote against devils as well as French. Fear them not. Why will not brother K. give us the pleasure of seeing his discourse? My love to him; and try for me once more, what you can do.

I preached two sermons on 2 Chron. xxix. The first was a preparation for the fast, on the first four verses, on the Tuesday, Feb. 25. The occasion, in Jehoshaphat's time, was nearly the same as ours. We are called upon to make use of the same means: and have, from his example, encouragement to hope, through the favour and blessing of God, the same success. Not for our fasting—no, no—nor for our real humiliation: this is not our act and deed; for it is a gift of the Spirit—his special gift—to know ourselves; to feel what we are as sinners, what we deserve for sin, and, being saved sinners, to be enabled to give grace all its glory. This is the experience which goes before, and in, a fast. It is God's preparation—the genuine working of faith; so that the business of the day lies upon believers, whom God has humbled under his mighty hand; who for themselves, and for other unhumbled sinners, are warranted to seek the Lord, and to plead with him, as Jehoshaphat and his people did—and they prevailed. So may we.

Then we came to the fast-day, considering the other part of the history, from ver. 5 to 14, their behaviour on that day, and ours on this day. All of us, who are in our right mind, do as they did. A goodly company of penitent sinners are prostrate at one and the same time before our God. Our petition is for mercy and help. Looking at our enemies, and at our dangers, we use means: but we do not trust in our fleets or armies—our help is in the name of the Lord our God, as ver. 12, 13.

Read what follows, and repent, and pray, and hope on. Their fast-day was turned into a festival. So was ours. We joined in thanks for past, for present mercies, so often bestowed upon this favoured land: and from his loving kindness in Jesus, and for the glory of his own great name, we begged for the continuance of them. And though the 28th of February be over, yet, the fast is not. I am still keeping it daily on my knees, not so much in praying against the French (poor things!) as against sin, mine own, the nation's sin—infidelity—with all its infernal fruits; imploring, for mercy's sake, that God, our God, would not suffer iniquity to be our ruin. And for my own part, I am rejoicing; comparing the word and the providences of God together, I fear no evil. Chastisements may come; but they shall be for correction, and not destruction.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLIX.

Jan. 8, 1795.

My dear Friend.—In a long life—fifty-nine years preaching—I was never laid by so much as this winter, with a severe cough, which is better; but I cannot expect it to be cured while this severe weather continues, if then. But all his dealings with me are well. His goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life; and I give him full credit that he will not leave nor forsake me in this last stage of my journey. You may read his dealings with me, in time past, in the "Life of Faith," and then in the "Walk of Faith." And now my present experience in the "Triumph of Faith."

May my God be with you, according to our motto for 1795. It was, "God with us." You will meditate on it; and it is full of marrow. If you can come at it, you will find that, whatever you take in hand this year, God will make it to prosper. So prays LETTER CLX.

March 6, 1795.

MR. AND MRS. T.—You are one: therefore I put you together in my letter of thanks for a very kind and friendly acknowledgment, in your last, for the present of the "Triumph of Faith." I wish I could give you the grace as well as the book: but it is an inestimable gift, and in better hands than mine. One is the author and the finisher; and with him I am pleading for the increase of faith in both your hearts. The more he gives you, your appetite will increase, and you will wait in the means of his appointing for daily growth. With this waiting faith, I hope, I am getting on: and, as I am nearer every moment to the end of my faith, I thank my God that he vouchsafes me very comfortable and believing views of what lies before me: and I doubt not but he will make me a dying witness for Jesus and his love. Do not cease to recommend me to his mercy, as I trust he will enable me to plead for you to the last.

I have received a very obliging letter from brother K., for which I own myself indebted to him; and am repaying him, as fast as I can, with my prayers, both for himself and for his congregation. If he has good times in his pulpit-work, and sinners hear and repent, and if his church-members grow in number and grace, I am helping him as my Lord enables me; and with him I am more earnest, because we live now in troublesome times, when a refuge from the storm, and a sure covert from danger, should be much sought after and highly valued.

My love particularly to Mrs. T.; and I hope she has some of the experience, as well as the knowledge, of the great doctrines in which the Christian triumphs. Because of her stomach's sake, and her often infirmities, I wish her spirits may be kept up by the reviving cordials of the gospel, and she may never want joy, great joy and peace in believing.

My God be with you! a very precious Jesus to parents, children, Misses H., K., &c. &c. So prays

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXI.

Dec. 13, 1782.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I have read in a certain book—"As cold water to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country." You know this is the gospel. Many, thank God! very many times, it has been good news to you and me. And while the blessed sound is joyful in our hearts, it makes all other good news better. So it improved your letter. I received it as one of my covenant blessings. You have your thanks; and God has had his. I am certain, you will not be offended that he had the first and best. The contents of the letter were also every one of them cordials—"As a cup of cold water to a thirsty soul." What struck me first was your noble collection.* Indeed it was great—in itself valuable—but more so from the motive: I believe Mr. —— gives, and teaches to give from faith. Christian charity springs from Christ received, works by Christ's grace, expects acceptance through Christ's intercession, and, done ever so much, or ever so well, refers all to Christ's glory. So again I come to my point. The good minister and the good congregation have my warmest thanks: but to the Lord Christ be all their praise. Please to communicate this to Mr. K., and farther inform him how much he and his congregation are laid in my heart since I have fully discovered the present state of ——. Oh, what deplorable blindness is there in ministers and people! What a fearful opposition are they carrying on against the Lord and his Christ! What have I told them, what had Mr. —— to tell them, but of the Almighty power, of the infinite wisdom as influenced by the sovereign love of God-Jesus, to save all that come to him, to save them from all their sins and from all their miseries, and also to give them all possible good in earth and in heaven? This is the kindest message of the gospel; and it is sweetly recommended by putting the sinner into the present enjoyment of salvation, as the sure earnest of eternal enjoyment. Mr. —— says, This shall not be preached in my pulpit, because my congregation are offended at it. Lord God, open their eyes! In this view, Mr. ——, you see the important stand which your brother ought to make. The good news shall not be suffered to be proclaimed in churches. Not even Mr. ——, among his friends and relations, shall enter the pulpit. In such circumstances, surely, very much depends upon Mr. ——. How earnest should he be in his work! How faithful in preaching! How careful in his walk! How fervent in closet prayer! How constantly dependent on Christ for the success of his ministry! May the Spirit of the living God keep him—his eye single, his heart chaste, his whole soul engaged in magnifying the person and the work of God our Saviour! I shall be often remembering him and you when I am at Court. The King of kings is extremely gracious to me, and admits me into his presence, and sometimes into his cabinet. When he vouchsafes me such a favourable audience, I will not fail to present a petition for poor S. Let me recommend it to you to do the same at your prayer-meetings. God bless them, and be much with you in that hour. May your pleadings for your ignorant neighbours bring down, both on them and on you, showers of blessings.

Your letter was like the aforesaid cordial, because it brought a welcome account of your family. We had been often saying, I wonder we do not hear from ——. What can be the matter? I am afraid they are not all well. At last comes good news from your family and friends; for which I am very thankful. My blessed Master is very kind in taking care of you. He has followed you with loving kindness all your days. And I pray him, I doubt not but he will, keep you to the end. I had another subject of thankfulness from your letters: they came just time enough to inform me of opening the brewhouse. I was present on the occasion, and I am a witness it was consecrated in form. The trade thereof was dedicated to the Lord; and I trust he will have the whole management of it. Please to tell—that I shall continue my fervent prayers for their success. I hope our God will bless them in better things than these, and will give them the upper as well as the nether springs; and then my joy concerning them will be full.

When you have read thus far, you will begin to think that I write in good spirits: and yet I am under the rod; and it is a very sharp one. Mrs. —— called on Tuesday, and my wife could not see her: indeed, she has seen nobody since we heard the melancholy news of my son's death. It has been to us both a very heavy affliction. He was cut off by a violent flux, at Trincomalee, in the island of Ceylon. I feel as a parent: I am not a stone: but grace has got the better of nature. God supports. God comforts. I have a will of mine own; and by it I would have gladly kept my son; for he was a sweet youth. But I can, from my heart, say, "Not my will, Lord, but thine, be done," whereby I have the advantage of finding that my faith, being put into the furnace, is true gold. It is, glory be to grace, proved, and improved. When I first saw the letter which brought us the account, I knew the general's seal to it, and, fearing the contents, I looked up for the presence and for the support of my good Master and my old Friend; and he answered me in the words of a great believer, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away." He has a right to do what he will with his own: then he enabled me to reply, "Blessed be the name of the Lord:" and I do praise him for giving me some of Job's resignation, that I could use his words with the same spirit. My poor wife has exquisite feelings on this occasion. She wishes not to murmur, nor to displease our good Lord by any hard thoughts of him. But the tenderness of the parent, and to a child who never offended her in his life, occasions risings of grief. The spirit is willing to kiss the rod; but the flesh is weak. In the main, she behaves as I could wish. Her faith is supported; her mind grows quiet and calm; and I doubt not but God will soon bring in his comforts, as well as supports. Pray for us, that we may both profit by our loss.

* For the Bible Society

Again and again I beseech you to pray for

W. ROMAINE, and family.

LETTER CLXII.

READING, July 30, 1783

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—Grace with you—and with yours. I very agreeably met with your son in Cheapside. It was a short visit, although sweet. He gave me a good account of you, and of Mrs. T., with her offspring: from whence I got fresh matter of thankfulness to my bountiful Master. He is good, and doeth good. I never think of you without praising him. His favours to you, and to your children, are singular—such as he only can give, and such as even he gives to none but his peculiar. Whenever I look at you, it is with gratitude to him. I have only to wish that he may keep you humble, and you may never rob him of the glory of his distinguishing mercies: and then he giveth more grace. Indeed, he will deny you nothing, if you return him all his praise. I am on a preaching party at Reading, and next Sunday at Wallingford; from whence we go for some days to Mr. S.'s, at Heckfield, near Basingstoke—from thence to my sister Owen's, at Tiverton. Aug. 30, at Mr. Ireland's Brislington, near Bristol; where I am engaged to do duty all the month of September. Whenever we turn homeward in October, Southampton lies in our way: and if it did not, I would take some pains to tell you, in person, how much I am bound to love you, and to bless you. I only write this short note, in answer to your kind inquiry, when it was likely you might see us. Tell my dear brother K. that an old friend of mine had given him very particular directions in every point relating to his ministry. When he and I meet, we may strengthen one another's hands by reading his epistles together. My love to his wife. Will you remember me to Mrs. T., your mother. I have her upon my heart. May my Father be a father to your children—my God their God. And then, but not till then, they will have enough.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXIII.

BATH, Sept. 22, 1783.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—Our good Lord would not have you not to feel for your loss—but to mourn as one that hath hope. We cannot doubt but your mother is with the Lord. And though she had a legal heart to struggle with, and had legal connexions, which cherished a sort of staggering at the promises, yet she was in Christ. All is safe in his hand. I have heard her again and again commit herself into his keeping: and I am a witness, that her confidence was placed on the right object, on which God himself had commanded her to rest her soul. Sorrow not, therefore, so much for her, as to hinder your gratitude to God for his special kindness to her living and dying. You have lost a mother, a good mother, and I have lost a friend: but neither you nor I would wish her back again. Blessed be God, we are following her—very fast I am—Blessed be his holy name, he supported her faith to the last—so he will ours. Let us improve this providence, as much as we can, to be always ready—that living and dying we may be the Lord's.

I write this from Bath, in our way to Bradford: then for a few days to Frome—from thence to Westgate—the day is uncertain; it may be Oct. 4th, if not, it will certainly be the 6th or 7th. God give us a happy meeting. May he bless you with much of his gracious presence in these trying seasons. I feel much, and pray much for Mrs. T. The Lord give her his supports and comforts. My Christian love to brother K. and family—to Walter, Sam, &c. &c.; friend Wingrove's love to you all, with Mrs. R. and

W. Romaine's.

Our kindest love to Mr. and Mrs. Cadogan. I hope he is suffered in public to extol the praises of our Jesus, and to let me hear them.

LETTER CLXIV.

Jan. 21, 1784.

Mr. T.—I am forced—but it is a willing violence—to be Mrs. R.'s secretary. And having a cover to you, I thought it best to inclose hers, and to take the opportunity of addressing two or three lines to yourself. You are in my debt; but I don't stand upon that. Much of our Lord's love saves us from that trafficking spirit, which returns only what it had received—"Love me, and I will love you; give me a pound, and I will give you a pound again." Oh, no. He teaches us his free love, and that makes us like him. I love you in him—for his sake! and the more I know of you, the more I admire his grace and goodness to you. I have now upon my table a precious token of his love—the Magna Charta of his most precious gifts in which he would assure you and me, how he intends to deal with us in another world, and what we have to hope and fear from him. We never could have known this wonderful secret, unless he had revealed it; and being of inestimable value, we cannot prize it enough, now it is revealed. I have devoted it to the use of your intended dwelling. Let it be the first piece of furniture; as indeed it is the best: and for my sake, let it be the family Bible. If it be his sovereign will—I may be your occasional chaplain, and may have it for my morning and evening lecture. It is Beza's edition, and has the best notes that I ever read: I keep it, till I can conveniently send it. I have great faith in the communion of saints—I wish you had as much—you would be oftener than you are, telling me of your wishes and wants. I have not had any thing for a long time to ask for, when I have been at Court, but about a sick child. My Lord loves children. It is his delight to hear parents dedicate, and friends recommend them to him. I hope he has been gracious to my prayers for your infant—and Mrs. T. says, "All is well."

The times are threatening. What a fearful earthquake in Sicily and Italy! what an alarming one in the political state of England! how has God confounded the wisdom of the wise! the French wanted all the trade of America from us; they have lost all their trade by it. The Dutch followed their steps, and have ruined themselves. Mr. I. thus writes me from France: "We went through Cherburgh—Caen—Tours—Poiters—Angouleme—to Bourdeaux; through all the places we passed, the commercial people are tired of the people of the thirteen stripes. All that have dealt with them are bankrupts, and they are every where disliked: one only is left at Bourdeaux, and he is not worth a shilling. People's eyes are now open; and they prove my words true, although they expected to enrich themselves by their commerce with these people. It is impossible to describe the aversion of the French to the people of the thirteen stripes. Now you will have them with you; as no credit is to be had elsewhere. I wish they may not complete our ruin. Bankruptcies are here in all parts; no less than 135 at Bourdeaux, in eight months past. Trade is very dull every where; and specie none to be had." Oh what a happiness in such a storm to be safe in the ark! he need not be afraid of any evil tidings, who has embarked his all with Christ. Noah went through such a storm, as never was before nor since, and he feared not; because the Lord shut him in. May that same Lord take you into his care, and keep you and yours, by his mighty power, through faith unto salvation.

I need not tell you, that I am, with usual good wishes, your friend and servant, in our common Lord,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXV.

July 9, 1784.

MR. T.—I have got a very good letter carrier in some things, but not in all. He very seldom gives me proper notice of his departure. He came to dinner to-day, and said he should go to-morrow morning by the diligence: so that I am only left a little of the afternoon to tell you, what I shall not go through in months and years.—How much brotherly love increases, and ripens by experience. He that teaches it, has made it my request, that it may grow on, until it be perfected in his own world. And I ask in faith, nothing wavering. May you feel the heavenly influence, as I do.

I do not forget my promise. The creed which I mentioned is prepared. Every article is settled, and you shall have it in due time. Only give me patience. I am now reading my Bible through from beginning to end. When this is finished, I hope for some leisure, and Mr. T. shall have his share of it. You have a demand on me, and you shall have your due.

I would gladly serve Mr. Mitchell, but Mr. Serle is now at Bath. If Mr. Mitchell goes that way, he will find Mr. Serle at Mrs. Shaw's on the Parade: who I am sure will do any thing for him that he can, if not by a direct application, yet he can put him in a way. God give success.

We are to have a thanksgiving for the peace. On this occasion I rejoice; for I am not a politician. Lord S. I know not, and I shall say nothing about him. My subject shall be about the peace-maker—Jesus Christ.—How he made peace between God and man.—How he keeps it, and carries it on, till it be peace everlasting.—And how he makes peace between man and God, and reconciles them perfectly by his Spirit through the belief of his gospel. And then he reconciles man to man, and enables them to live at peace with one another. Tell brother K. these are the outlines of my sermon on Eph. ii. 14. He is our peace. On which subject he cannot speak too highly of Christ Jesus, the peace-maker, nor yet of the proclamation upon the word—in which all the articles of it are fully settled—nor yet of the security of believing these articles upon the warrant, authority, and commandment of God, and of living in peace with God, when the Lord the Spirit explains and applies them. May it be a great day of thanksgiving with you!

I do not wish to be released from my chaplainship, or from the duties of it. Mrs. T.'s health restored, and getting about again, will keep me still looking up to my good Lord for her—and for her dear John—his name means one that has found grace, may he be acquainted with his name and enjoy the thing. Tell me —how she does—and how my John thrives.

Admiral M. brings this with many inquiries. We have seen much of him in his present journey; and he has given me great satisfaction, as to the reality of his faith, and to the growth of it: he is indeed one after my own heart.

I commend myself and Mrs. R. to your prayers. We desire very cordially to be remembered to Mrs. T. I long to see Mr. Mitchell. When will he return? Get out of my debt as fast as you can; and pray for

W. Romaine, and all his.

LETTER CLXVI.

Tuesday, Jan. 23.

My dear Mr. T.—I thank you much—I was prepared—my sacrifice of praise was ready—and I offered it up—blessing that gracious, most gracious Lord, who delighteth in mercy. He is, like himself, good, to father and mother, children and friends. Oh call upon all you know, to give him the honour due unto his name. We kept a jubilee last night. Our joyful thanks went up with acceptance. Our supplications for the mother, for the babe, we left with him who, we are certain, will do all for the best. Surely, Mr. T., God's dealings with you have something of peculiar mercy, and call for singular acknowledgments—your person, your wife, your children, your prosperity, in this world, in a better.—Oh what sort of a man should you be, whom God thus loadeth with benefits! I scarce ever think of you, and how whatever you take in hand, the Lord maketh it to prosper, without praying at the same time that he would crown all his favours with true poverty of spirit, and you may walk humbly with your God. Amen, Amen. My beloved partner was very hearty in our prayers and praises. She begs every thing kind and friendly may be presented to Mrs. T. from her, as I also do from me. She desires her respects to Sally; wishes her much joy of her little sister; and hopes she will take a great deal of care of her. This is the way to show that she is a good girl, and loves her father and mother.

This is preaching morning; but I stole this time from reading and prayer, to write these few lines. God make them acceptable.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLXVII.

Sept. 26, 1785.

My dear Friend.—Our last letters met upon the road; but no angry words passed between them. All was peace. I kept my answer to yours, until I should settle my affairs at home, and, taking my autumn ride, I should see you face to face, and just look upon you by the way. But my former conveyancer, the admiral, has again put it in my power to inform you, that I am still employing my interest for you, and diligent in it. As love directs I am constantly keeping a good look up for Mrs. T. And he takes notice of me, who can make her the living mother of a living child: he has answered prayer on the same occasion, and I do not doubt of his good will or power. We who pray now shall praise soon. I hope to see the mother, and to bless the babe. If God send you a son, will you do me the favour to let me give him a name, expressive of our devoting him to our common Lord? We have seen a great deal of the admiral and Mrs. M., who inform me that my John is a fine boy. God bless him. He lays him upon my heart, so that I have him in special remembrance. He is really a favourite. And I show it in my way. He is a child of many prayers, which I trust will bring down upon him many blessings. When I am often thinking of your great business, your great family, your many connexions, your active spirit seems a peculiar mercy. The Bath quaker is not of my mind. He wants to quiet and still you; as if all religion consisted in a calm. But man is not made for still life, nor can the christian man, in your family, and business, and manifold concerns, be of the quaker spirit. I remember he said once to you, "I wish I could stop that activity of yours." I did not take him up; but I have often since admired the wisdom of God in fitting you for your place and station. See him in all; and all will be well: be not slothful in business; but begin it and end it with the Lord: then success will follow. You are a witness for this: so am I in my way. I am in my spirit as active as you can be; but I set the Lord always before me. I take him with me to my reading; visiting the sick; public, private ministrations; and it is wonderful what he enables a man to do, when he works for God. For when we carry him all the glory, he still sends us away with more grace. Go on. Be busy. Do all you can for your family; but sanctify all by the word of God and prayer. I believe you do. God knit all our hearts—brother K.—Mrs.—your family—in one bond, never, never to be broken; no, not by death, that great bond-breaker. So prays your real friend, and constant orator to him,

LETTER CLXVIII.

Friday Morning.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—Although I have not time to write as I could wish, yet I could not neglect the opportunity; if it was only to let you see, that the doctrines of grace are not unfriendly to good works. Though, by the by, the first good work a man can do, is to receive them, and the next, and so on, is to make use of them. When I would tell you of my good works, it is not great I:—Oh no! It is the sun that makes fruitfulness; so does my Sun, my light and my life. He enables me to wish to be like him; and to be doing what he did, and as he did it: on the same motive and to the same end. My love to you is truly his gift. And what if I should say I show proof it, expecting nothing again? I write, and I write, and write again. This is No. 4 since I left S. I take every occasion to mention you and yours to my gracious Lord, and he is pleased to hear me. The very privilege is its own blessedness. It will only receive some addition, when friend T. shall say, "I am doing the same for you and yours." I believe you are doing it. But do it more, and better, and get out of my debt as fast as you can. It will be a good while first; but if you will let me give you a hint, it may be improved for your sake and mine. Make a conscience of remembering me as often as you are going to ——. Pray one for another—so runs the command—mind how faithful he is to his word. Daniel's three friends went to prayer—they besought God with him, to give Daniel the understanding of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and the interpretation: while they prayed, the answer came. In like manner, when Peter was in prison, and to be executed the next day, the church was at prayers all night for his deliverance, and while they were praying, Peter came and told them, "How God had delivered him." Peter spoke very feelingly afterwards, when he said, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver them that are his." Indeed, sir, I want your prayers. I ask them. I have some right to them; and I believe they will do me good. My blessing on all the children. Peace be with you. Amen.

Mr. K. is in my Litany for gospel ministers, when I weekly recommend them by name to the Lord of the harvest. I wish he may do the same for me.

LETTER CLXIX.

Jan. 9, 1786.

MR. T.—I begin with thanks. Blessed be his name, who has spared us another year, and is still magnifying his mercy to us and to ours. He is good, and doeth good; for his mercy endureth for ever. And to whom? Who are the objects of his mercy? Wonderful to consider: all, all of them are rebels—and when pardoned, for their best services deserve nothing but hell: and yet he glorifies his grace in such—giving, increasing, multiplying his mercies, both to their bodies and souls—yea, he loadeth them with his benefits. My friend, take an estimate of them; you have leisure, more than you had at S. I am a bad accountant; but you are well acquainted with figures—try what you can do in casting up this sum—"What has God done for you—When did his purposes of doing you good begin—How many mercies have followed you all the days of your life. And when will they stop." Psalm ciii. 17. I believe it will puzzle all your skill in arithmetic, to give the sum total. A better man than you tried, but he failed; and he thought it his wisest part to end the trial with fresh praise, as you may read, Psalm cvi. 1, 2. It is the right working of divine grace to be willing to ascribe all to grace. And instead of getting out of debt by praises, we are more indebted for our praises, and should be more thankful for more thankfulness. When I have acknowledged your Christmas present, it is no payment. It is only saying Mr. T. is very kind to his friends, and I am among them, much beholden to him; that with you is enough: so it is with our God.

I am much indebted to your faithful partner—tell her so I will acknowledge her letter, when I get time. At present I have more work than I can well get through. My curate is leaving me—and I am not yet provided; so that the parochial duty lies heavy on me. But I serve a good master, and I do not complain. He makes my service perfect freedom.

Mr. Serle will by no means hear of money; and I cannot think of accepting so large a quantity for nothing: you will therefore give me leave to make you a free-will offering. I will take care you shall have the half dozen sackfuls in due time—cut ready and prepared for planting half an acre: which in one year will yield you a sufficient quantity for a very great farm. The Lord of the harvest bless the plough.

I have much to say to you about this new year—but my excuse to Mrs. Taylor must also plead with you. When leisure is vouchsafed unto me, I shall look towards P. G. and often before pray my Lord to look there, and to take you and yours under his special care. So prays my good partner, joining heartily with

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLXX.

Saturday Morning.

My dear Friend.—Put your mercies and your afflictions together—what comparison between them—how many more mercies than afflictions—and how many mercies in afflictions. Oh for a loud, a louder still, song of praise. Who is a God like unto our God, that maketh affliction do us good and bring himself glory? Let songs of triumph be sounded by all your family, that you have no dark side in God's providences and dealings with you. Let your children and friends join with me in adoring him for what he has done, and praying him not to slacken his hand. In this sweet employment I shall be engaged till Tuesday, the day we hope to see you face to face. It must be a short visit—but let us meet and part good friends, expecting that whatever befalls us, the day will come, when we shall meet and part no more. My beloved partner has a share in all my good wishes to Mrs. T. and family, not forgetting my John. Pray for

LETTER CLXXI.

Sunderland, August 1, 1791.

My dear Friend.—I promised that I would write unto you when I came to the end of my journey: and I do not take up my pen to fulfil that promise, but to tell you, that Mrs. T.'s letter came to us yesterday, forwarded by my son from London, and that the contents occasioned great joy and thankfulness in both our hearts. We were very anxious for Mrs. D., and led to pray much for her, and now our prayers are turned into praises; as he said, "What return shall I make unto the Lord for all the benefits which he hath done unto me;" what he has done for you, is for me also. He has given me to share in your good; for which I bless his holy name. I shall keep looking up to him for the mother and her son—for the mother, that she may feel how much she is indebted to the loving kindness of her good Lord Jesus—and for the son, that, whether it lives or dies, it may be the Lord's. Mrs. R. desires to thank Mrs. T. for the good news: it was really so, and helped us greatly to increase the thanks of yesterday. I was favoured with an opportunity of recommending my dearest Jesus in the oldest church in England, called Monk Weremouth, which belonged to the venerable Bede, a very favourite pulpit of mine, and from which his precious name has been often, like ointment, poured forth. When I remove from this place to Northumberland, and get a sight of Chevy Chace Hills, which bound England and Scotland, I shall be reminded of an engagement with Mr. T. Till it be fulfilled, I shall be recommending you, Mrs. T. and all yours, to the care and keeping of my Jesus: so will Mrs. R., who begs, whenever you write to Mrs. D., to be most affectionately remembered to her, as does also

BRISLINGTON, Sept. 24, 1791.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—Although I always look upon you as one highly favoured, yet I could mention a person who has been as graciously dealt with as yourself; and who perhaps may surpass you in the greatness, the number, and the continuance, of divine mercies. I hope to discourse with you upon this subject, and to try which of us can best magnify the special goodness of our God. He surrounds me here with his loving kindness—the family—the place—the weather—Bristol friends—Bristol congregations. I have not a moment, but some of them are saying to me—Here, here is fresh matter of praise. God make me thankful. I wish to bring such a spirit, as I now feel, to P. We leave our friends here Oct. 3d, and staying two days at Bradford, we expect to be at Salisbury the 6th, on Thursday, and meeting your chaise, to arrive Friday, by two o'clock, at P. The Lord Jesus vouchsafe us a happy meeting, that we may help one another forward in our great journey.

My paper will not hold the number of respects and remembrances to Mrs. T. from Mrs. R. accompanied with the salutations of the I.'s, with my own particular good wishes and prayers for every branch of your family. You are all upon my heart, the sick and the well. My Lord, to whom I recommend you, makes his people happy in all conditions; and he often lets them be sick to make them happier. He has a wonderful way of his own, in curing desperate diseases; yea, even of turning death into life. Blessed, blessed for ever, are all they who follow his prescription. Mr. T. you have tried him—go on—trust and be not afraid. If your faith could go as far as his promises, you would find heaven upon earth—the work of faith with power is heaven. May he keep you in it, who is the author and the finisher of the faith. My love to brother K. and family, and to your visitors, if any whom I know. Pray for

LETTER CLXXIII.

Jan. 4, 1792.
First letter of this year.

MR. T.—We have taken our leave of the last year: farewell 1791, thou wilt return no more. Welcome 1792. Our business now is, to try to profit from the past, and to improve the coming time. When a Christian looks back, every thing calls for his praise. And looking forward, every thing calls for prayer, the prayer of faith. On these subjects we employed ourselves on New Year's Day. You know it is one of my festivals. We had a great meeting; and, I trust, many true worshippers. Our motto for this year, and our employment through all our years, is, "Grow in grace." 1 Pet. iii. 18. Take the outlines. Grace means favour, free. In our present circumstances, it is the favour of God to the sinners of mankind; said to come from Jehovah, very, very gracious—from the Father, from the Son frequently, and from the Spirit of grace, to teach us, that in the blessed Trinity, all their purposes, words, and works, are favour, nothing but real favour, to believers. To them who feel guilt and wrath in their consciences, it comes like a cool breeze after a sultry day; and it is also compared to dew, which, in hot countries, is very necessary to all the fruits of the earth, and comes upon them most freely, as you may see, Mic. v. 7.

Hence the necessity of it was shown. It is to the soul what breath is to the body. What the dew, and rain, and the shining of the heavens, are to every thing that grows out of the earth; so is grace, as the apostle proves at large, Eph. ii. And this leads us to consider the objects of grace, not so much in the purpose of the Trinity, as in the discovery of it. They are quickened by the Spirit of life, enabled to receive Jesus for their Saviour and their God, and then to live upon his fulness by faith, where they find all grace for spiritual life, growth, and activity; moment after moment, grace for grace.

To learn this lesson in practice is the sound experience of a true believer—grace to pardon, as 1 Tim. i. 14. Grace to subdue sin—grace to purify the heart—grace to regulate the life; these in use are the exercise and the improvement of the grace of Jesus. He takes all from Christ as mere favour, and wishes to grow up into him in all things. May this prosper in your heart. God is teaching it you, as I observe from your last letter; and I see a legal turn in you that would pervert his teaching. Mr. T. the feeling of what you are should not keep you from Christ, but make you live more on his grace, and endear him to you, as the only refuge for your case. If you grow in self-knowledge, it should be your schoolmaster to teach you more of Christ; because the more you know him, the more you will trust him. He will every day give you more reason to do it; and mind, the more you trust him, the more you will love him. His Spirit will make him to your believing heart a precious Jesus; and the constraining love of Christ will lead you to a diligent use of all the appointed means, in which he has promised to meet, and to bless his people. This is our morality; and all this is favour. He giveth grace, and he giveth glory. Saints and angels are, and will be to eternity, worshippers of our Immanuel: so says Peter, "To him be glory now, and through the day of eternity, Amen." My application was, 1. To the graceless. 2. To seekers. 3. To the weak in faith. 4. To the strong. All is from Christ. May this year be a growing year—downwards and upwards—out of self into Christ—from all creature-dependence to more perfect in and on God, his word and Spirit, as a witness to the fulness of Jesus. Oh, Mr. T., this is fine talking; but, believe me, you may as soon create a world, as learn this lesson without almighty grace. Pray, pray for divine teaching. Pray for a growth in grace, that you may loathe and abhor yourself; and, repenting in dust and ashes, may adore the God of all grace. I am on my watch-tower for you, and for Mrs. T. and for all your family, that they may get it, and use it.

Mr. K. will not be offended at my wishing him more grace in his heart, and in his pulpit, and in his family.

LETTER CLXXIV.

BRISLINGTON, Sept. 13, 1792.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—We have settled our plan, and immediately communicate it to your friends at P. When you were at Plymouth, it would have been a little variety, and not at all out of your way, to have come by Tavistock and Crediton to Tiverton,—a charming road. We came from Plymouth that way

And after refreshing us with the sight of you all, you would have got into your road at Honiton again without loss of time. We purpose, God willing, to be at Salisbury on Tuesday evening, Oct. 2d, where you will kindly engage to send for us. It will give us a very great entertainment to have it under your hand, that you are all well, got home safe, have been remembering that dearest friend, who kept your going out and your coming in. We are here at Brislington with our friends, who talk still of returning to France, notwithstanding the great Apollyon reigns there paramount. The seeds have been long sowing, and now they are manifest in their fruits, marked with savage, more than savage, bloodshedding and cruelty. What can Dr. Priestley say now? Here is infidelity with its natural effects. God keep old England! We have too much, by far, of the French principles; only the Almighty can stop their dreadful effects. May we repent and be spared. I am praying, and preaching, and exhorting all I can, to stop the madness of the times. This is a solemn season also with me on my own account. More than half a century ago, I was ordained to be a witness for Christ in this month of September. Looking backward, every thing I can remember covers me with shame. Doing so little for such a Jesus—grudging to be laid out and spent for him—and, when he did vouchsafe to make use of me, so ready to take his glory to myself. I verily stand amazed at his infinite patience and kindness in all his dealings with me. I feel I must lie at his footstool, and be content (but he must make me so) to be in his debt for all things that belong to life and godliness: according to Mr. Jones's dying triumph, "A sinner saved, a sinner saved."

All here salute you. Mrs. R. in a particular manner to Mrs. T. and yourself, with your faithful friend in our dearest Lord,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXV.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have had to preach twelve times in fourteen days—— and rather not well, till preaching comes, and then I get better. No master like mine. His service is perfect freedom. Our meditation concerning him on new year's day, was on one of his names, namely, Melchisedec. From comparing what is said of him in Genesis, and in the 110th Psalm, with St. Paul's comment upon both these passages in Hebrews vii, it seems to me most certain that Jesus Christ is the person spoken of in the Old Testament. The apostle has explained the word for us, and says it means, "the King of righteousness." Oh what a blessed name! There being none righteous, no, not one, he vouchsafed to be "the Lord our righteousness." He wrought it out for us, and applies it in us. He sends his Spirit to convince us that we want it, and to enable us to trust in his—to plead it in the conscience, and to rejoice in it in the heart, and to be filled with the blessed fruits (as Phil. i. 11) of it in our lives. Consider, he is the King of this saving righteousness—a great King—Jehovah—King of kings—the Creator of heaven and earth—the God of providence, who upholdeth all things by the word of his power—the God of the fathers, worshipped under the tabernacle and temple dispensation—and the God whom Christians worship, it being their distinguishing character, to call upon the name of the Lord, as you may see Acts ix. 14; 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 22. May he reveal himself all the year to you as your righteousness: and this is the proper work and office of faith—with all the confidence of your heart to depend upon him, so as to enjoy peace with God—love to God—and loving obedience. Remember, this year will call for much faith: and you will not exercise it as far as he warrants you. He bids you cast all your care upon him: for Mrs. T.—for children—for business—for death—for eternity: you cannot lay too much upon him—the government of all worlds is upon his shoulders. O precious faith! He is my King. He rules in my heart He has set up there a throne of grace. He keeps under the rebels, and keeps me willing to follow him wheresoever his providence leads. Mr. T., I beg for you, and beg yourself, for more trust in the Lord our righteousness. That you may so grow in grace, as to thank God, who always causeth you to triumph in Christ. Pray for

Dec. 5, 1793.

MY FRIEND.—A goodly company of you met together. Peace be with you, family and guests. You say, I am in your debt—so I wish to be; and so I must be for some time. I have set down in earnest to finish the "Triumph of Faith;" and am now transcribing it for the press. It has grown so voluminous, having been in hand ever since 1771, that I have resolved to throw aside all my papers, and write only just what I myself am at present, an old believer. I am in haste to get it finished, before I finish my course, which is very near run out. Soon I shall enter on my 80th year, and soon be no more here. I therefore leave my experience in the former volumes of the "Life of Faith" and of the "Walk of Faith" in this concluding treatise, which contains what I am still learning and living. Some years ago, I published a volume of Dr. Smith's portraiture of old age, explaining the 12th of Ecclesiastes. Now am made to feel the symptoms therein described; which is practical knowledge, and the truest comment upon the Bible when the Holy Spirit writes it on the heart, and brings it into use and experience in the life. Now I have told you my present state—I am as busy, in my way, as you can be in yours. The preparing for the press is not the whole of my employment. I would be found much in prayer for direction, for assistance, &c.; and, above all, for a blessing from God: without which, the book may as well be burnt as see the light. Herein you, and my friends with you, can help me much; and you will, if brotherly love continue. I beg, for my Lord's sake, that you would plead with him for his direction—his assistance—his blessing, on my poor attempt to spread his matchless fame, and to encourage believers to trust him more and better.

Take this excuse: for it is a true one. Oh that your account of Mr. T. may be matter of fact: I rejoice and am thankful.

May you take Mrs. T. home as well as I wish her. M., I find, is to learn a little longer in our Lord's school: may he prove a good scholar till faith and patience have done their perfect work. My love to Mr I. He is in my debt, and can get out of it when he will. I wish him one of your blessed gospel-winters. Mrs. I and her dear children are in my litany: so are yours. If you have any regard for me—remember my "Triumph of Faith." Pray that I may live it, and, in due time, die it. So wishes my good partner, to you, and yours, and all your guests. In the holy bonds of Christian love, I am, truly, your friend and servant,

LETTER CLXXVII

Jan. 1794.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—May this be the happiest year of your life, and Mrs. T. and all your children. He can make it so, in whose hands are your time. And he can do it in a marvellous way. He can bring in comforts, by taking away comforts, and I hope he does. Mr. I said in a letter, "You have heard of the melancholy death of Mr. D." I had a letter from S. about a fortnight after, which made no mention of it; so that I did not know for certain how it was, till I met Mr. B. who showed me a letter from you, giving an account of it. You see here is another breach in your family—a loud warning to you all, young and old, to be ready; that is, take care that ye be found in Christ, living and dying.

Our motto was this year "The God of hope." Rom. xv. 13. I purpose to give you the substance of my observations some other time. Last week I was enabled to preach eight sermons—and this week seven. It is better to burn out than to rust out. If Mr. K. does not preach so often, may he do it more fervently, and with more success. I can wish you nothing greater, than the continual experience of Rom. xv. 13. May the power of the Holy Ghost show what great thing, exceeding great, you have to hope for from God in Christ, and put you by faith into the present enjoyment, Mrs. T. and all your children. So prays

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXVIII

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I give you the earliest intelligence of our motions, in which you are pleased to interest yourself. It is our year to visit my sister at Tiverton, to whom we go the beginning of July; afterwards, I have taken the care of Mary Portchurch, in Bristol, for four Sundays. After which, I hope God will open a way for us to see our friends at P., and to help one another forward in the best things—which will be (if all things favour) in October, and of which I shall inform you again and again in the course of the summer. May our hearts meet often in the centre of union.

Your late sickness had a voice—it spake—and you heard it say—"In the midst of life we are in death." How short is life—how uncertain! How certain, infallibly certain, is death! How necessary is preparation for it! How dangerous the least delay! How comfortable a well-grounded hope of safety in death, and of joy beyond it. Mr. T. you know these things—Oh, for more practical knowledge, and lively experience. There is an antidote against the sting, ay, and against the fear of death—an infallible cure—true faith believes, and takes it. The conscience feels the sovereign virtue—the blood of the Lamb cleanses it from all sin: and when guilt is gone, the heart is saved from every enemy it had reason to fear, and is entitled to every blessing that God has promised. It is upon the 'ground of this warrant, and nothing else, (pray mind that,) that any man can look forward to death and judgment, with a hope full of glory and immortality. What said the blessed company of Old Testament martyrs? All these died in faith: to whom the New Testament church in perfect unison replies—Thanks be to God, who giveth us also the victory over the law, over sin, and over death, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Mr. T., you have their faith—God help you to make good use of it! If you live long, you must expect trials: the prospect which faith opens into the other world, will marvellously support and comfort you under them. God has given you many, many temporal blessings; this faith will improve them, and exalt them into spiritual and heavenly mercies: it will teach you to sit loose to them—God in them, and not they alone, will be your portion. You will taste his goodness in them; and when he calls you to leave them, you will be—he will make you—as ready to leave them, as a poor beggar would be to fall asleep, if the Almighty had promised that he should awake a great emperor: our Jesus is this Almighty—He has promised to be our shepherd through life and death. May he magnify his tender care over you, by making you feel happy in him, as happy as the 23d Psalm promises he will make you.

I know you will excuse my long sermon: but truly I am so sensible of the importance of preparation—the dreadful danger of delay—that I could not help thanking my God, who had spared you. This sickness, I trust, was for his glory in your good—as Lazarus' was; but Lazarus died afterwards. May you live to die as Lazarus, and be where he is now. I assure you, the christian hope has its present harvest of blessings. May you enjoy them abundantly, through life, and for ever and ever.

Mrs. T. is in my eye, and in my heart. What I wish you, I also wish her. She carries about with her a constant monitor, a weak and crazy body; and he says to her, "Be ye also ready." I know she believes: and whatever bad nerves may suggest, and they are terrible enemies to the comforts of Christ, yet he is on her side; and he will prove himself, in every time of need, to be her Saviour and her God. She is persuaded I make use of my interest with him for her, and for all she loves, especially my John, whom God bless. B. K. gave me yesterday a good account of his father—I was in prayer for him—and have now been giving of thanks: may he be preserved, for the sake of his church, his family, and his friends. Mrs. R. desires the kindest things may be said for her to Mrs. T. and all true and real. We join in constant prayer for you, and hope to join soon with you; and it warms my very heart and soul with feelings inexpressibly blessed, that I hope, ere long, to join all my P. friends, in the praises of God and the Lamb, which will never, never end, but grow better and better to all eternity.

W. Romaine.

To Mrs. T.

LETTER CLXXIX.

Nov. 28, 1785.

My dear Friend, Mrs. T.—I was interested greatly in the birth of John—and, if I remember well, I sent you on that occasion, some reflections to stir up your gratitude. My heart has been with you on the present mercy, for which I joined in prayer, and now join in thanksgiving. You will not be offended, that I send you what has been upon my mind lately, and what I trust has been also upon yours—may he, who commands the blessing, make it the means of exciting and increasing the praises of your heart. I suppose you in your closet, and in the presence of God.

Oh, how many are my mercies: and these new mercies are calling for a new song of praise.

Bless the Lord, Oh my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name:

Bless the Lord, Oh my soul, and forget not all his benefits:

For surely his mercy and goodness have followed me all the days of my life.

Oh what was I, that God should set his love upon me before time, and in time call me to the saving knowledge of his Son, whom to know aright is life eternal?

And what am I even now, since I have felt something of the power of his precious gospel?

Why me, Lord? what was I, what am I, that I should be chosen, and called, and accepted in the Beloved? Not unto me, in the least, not unto me, but unto thy sovereign grace be all the praise.

Oh help me to ascribe unto thee, the glory due unto thy great name: for I am surrounded, I am loaded with thy benefits.

All thy dealings with me show forth thy loving kindness; and in temporals, as well as spirituals, I am singularly favoured.

I cannot count my many, many outward blessings, nor can I be thankful enough for a spiritual use of them.

When I survey my situation in life, my kind relations, my friends and substance, my house and servants, they all proclaim the bounty of heaven to my soul.

Thanks be to thee, thou that delightest to do good! I see thy hand, I taste something of thy love in all my enjoyments.

I thank thee for thy gifts—I use them by thy grace—and I bless thee, that they are in any measure sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

Oh how are my mercies increasing! they abound in number—in quality they grow more excellent; for I get two in one—first a mercy, and then a thankful heart to acknowledge it, which is grace for grace.

Let me, deeply impressed, lift up my heart to bless the Lord God, for my husband, my children, and especially for my new-born son—whom I devote to thee, and to thy service. Oh, be with him through life! Thou knowest my heart and the feelings of a mother: let the bowels of thy tender mercies in Christ be towards him. I ask nothing more for him—and thou wouldst not have me ask any thing less—than that thou mayest be his portion, and his exceeding great reward.

And now, Father of my mercies, who hast been the guide of my youth, into thy care and keeping I commit me and mine.

Here I am at P——, a miracle of thy goodness: let me live here a life of praise—and whatever blessings thou givest, crown them with a humble and a thankful heart.

O let me never be suffered to rob thee of thy glory; but help me to give it all, where it is due, in life, and death, and to all eternity—to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Amen.

When this shall be completed, W. R. hopes to be in company, and to join in an everlasting Hallelujah.

Ay, and before too: the well-grounded expectation of this feeds and nourishes our gratitude at present. Already I feel some of its heavenly influence, and my design in writing, is to suggest something which may give you a new relish of it. Though we cannot enjoy so much, nor praise so well, as our elder brethren, who are now round the throne, yet surely we may taste and see, as well as they, how gracious our Lord is; and although they are banqueting at the marriage supper, yet we, the friends of the bridegroom, are invited to rejoice in our Lord as well as theirs, and we are commanded, too, to rejoice in him always: and again I say, rejoice.

My dear Mrs. T., I know your weak frame, and your poor nerves—I make allowances for your bodily infirmities; yet it is upon account of these very things that I would try to stir you up the more. You want fresh encouragements to believe, and by believing not only to go on your way, but also to be able to go on rejoicing. Happy am I, if my good master pleases to bless any thing I write to the increasing of your faith and of your joy in him. Be assured, the more you trust him, the greater reason you will find to trust still more: and when you are quite satisfied that you are safe in his hands, as he warrants you to be, then will your love to him abound; for faith first worketh love, and then worketh by love, keeping the heart warm, in its grateful attachment to a precious, precious Jesus. May this be your portion! So prays

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXX.

May 12, 1788.

MRS. T.—Tuesday, one o'clock—just come from church. This is my day for preaching to young people: we had a congregation of at least two thousand children; and, what made me wish I had seen all your dears before me, was that my Lord might have laid his hands upon them, and blessed them; for he was with us of a truth. He repeated Mark x. 13. Our text was Psalm cxix. 9. Our nature is defiled—the fountain is pollution; so are the streams. Thoughts vain—play foolish—tempers rebellious and headstrong—end is destruction. Our Jesus is almighty to save us. He can teach the ignorant, wash the filthy, pardon the guilty—subdue every bad temper, and set in, and keep in, the way of life and salvation. He invites young people to come to him: promises to give them better things than play or pleasure: makes his promises good—gives exceeding great and precious things, and these for ever. Many intreaties were used, and much prayer for success, that the work of the day might prosper. He did his own will: to him be all the glory.

My kind love to Mr. T., and thanks for his kind letter. God has prospered, God does prosper, God will prosper, him. So prays

W. ROMAINE, for him and his.

LETTER CLXXXI.

Mrs. T.—You gave me great pleasure in your last letter. I am much beholden to you. I speak not after the manner of men, but from my heart. I feel thankfulness: It is no bad wish to pray you may feel as much: for I am sure you have as much, if not more, reason. You have a friend who has done wonders for you, and who expects nothing in return, but an humble acknowledgment: and that also he must give you. I often think of his goodness, and bless him for you. If he took away a parent, he was better than a father. He himself brought you up, and made your guardians so careful of you, and so kind to you. He sent you your husband, and put you into such circumstances, that your heart cannot wish for more. Look back, Mrs. T., look round, and see whether our God hath not dealt bountifully with you. May all his temporal mercies stir up and increase gratitude in your soul. But what are these, though they be great, and many, and undeserved, compared to his special favours? I knew he loved you: but I am happy to have it under your hand. Whatever Almighty love can do, he will perform. Oh what a debt do you owe him—for his unspeakable gifts—himself—What a sum is that! His Spirit, to unite your spirit to Jesus—Oh what an infinite mercy! And to abide with you, to keep you in union, and to establish communion with God your Saviour; that in his fulness you may find and enjoy all the blessings of the Father's love—his Father, and in Jesus your Father. By what gracious providences has he led you to this experience! Your relations, friends, acquaintance, and education, all kindly overruled by him to train you up in the good old way. Your present settlement, the family you are in, the ministry you sit under, Oh what mercies! The Bible opened to you—the promises credited, put in suit, applied. Prayer a delight, in some measure—praise at times very encouraging—a humble walk, as I can witness. My dear friend, raise up your heart, and bless his holy name. If your heart be cold, like the weather, warm it at his love: for all his gifts are but a little earnest in hand. At present, your best is but a foretaste. Look forward, and see what an estate you have in reversion. True, it is only in promise; but that credited is as good as any freehold. Trust, trust him, be not afraid. It is yet but a little, very little while, and he will put you into full possession. And I hope to see it, and join your eternal song of praise to God and the Lamb. Your friends die. The year is just dead. I am tottering over the grave: but he says to me, and he keeps up my spirits, "Because I live, ye shall live also." In this confidence, come what may, I go on my way rejoicing. Prav for

To one of his Sisters, &c.

LETTER CLXXXII.

My dear Sister.—I always loved you as my sister, now I love you much more than ever. I trust in God you will soon stand related to me by a more closer and dearer bond than nature can tie. Only go on, and you will be happy. God has begun his work, let him finish it. All my prayers shall be offered for your speedy experience of his pardoning love; and, until you taste of it, let me entreat you to be earnest in the careful use of all the means of grace: be much in prayer, in reading, and meditating on the word of God; but then take care that you build not on these duties. You are not to fancy, that any thing you can do, is able to justify you in the sight of God. Your justification is a free act of God's grace without works.

W. Romaine

LETTER CLXXXIII.

My dear Sister.—I saw Mr. R. last Sunday, who gave me a very pleasing account of your growth in grace. It was said formerly, that the distinguishing love of God chose two of a city, and one of a family; but now what reason have we to magnify and to exalt the love of our God, who has been so exceedingly gracious to our family? I trust, he has greater blessings for us all, even in this life, than we have yet received. Only do you wait upon him, and be found in those ways wherein he meets his people, and he will carry you on safely and sweetly to the end of your journey: it is but a little way, and a short time, and we shall be at home; so that we ought every moment to be pressing forward; and may God keep you from being weary or faint in your mind! You have afflictions and troubles in the way, and so have all God's children. You have them, because you want them. You could not grow in grace without them. How could you take up your cross, and deny yourself daily, if you had not daily troubles? And it is the exercise of faith to bear them, and to believe that God deals them out by number, weight, and measure. You have not one pain more than you stand in need of. And farther, "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." If we do but attain to this glory, it signifies very little by what way we come to the attainment of it. Think on these things, and, through the blessing of God, they may help to make you see and feel, that the way of suffering is the royal way to the kingdom.

My tenderest duty waits upon my dear mother. I hope God will finish his work in her, before she goes hence. I trust we shall meet once more in this world; and I doubt not but we shall meet, where we shall part no more. I send inclosed, a little piece of Mr. Mason's. I hope God will bless it at this time, as it comes seasonably, and particularly to my sister M., who will, I expect, be able to read it with profit, about the time it reaches you.

Why do you want so much to have texts, and pieces of sermons? Have you not the Bible? One word of it is worth a volume Read and pray much; and God will do more for you than all his ministers can.

I commend you to God, and to the riches of his grace, praying him to do for you all exceeding abundantly above all that you can ask or think. I remain, your loving brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CLXXXIV.

July 18, 1758.

My dear Sister.—I can now acquaint you, with great thankfulness to my good God, that my wife is brought to bed; she had a pretty good time, and has a boy likely to live. In a little time, I hope to be able to get my churches provided for, and then I shall inform you when I shall set out for the north. In the mean time, pray for us, and especially for me, that I may come unto you, with the demonstration of the spirit, and of power: and if God opens a door for me, it certainly shall be so. There seems to be a great hungering and thirsting after the word in most parts of the country; I pray God some persons may be sent to break the bread of life, and to distribute the waters of comfort to them. The work of God still prospers in this city, which is the only token we have for good—for it shows that God, in the midst of wrath, remembers mercy; and if his wrath should increase, may the work of God prosper in your soul and mine, that if he should come to punish, and to destroy this sinful nation, he may find no sins in us to punish, all being covered with the Redeemer's blood.

I hope to find my mother better, to whom give my duty, and my love to my sisters. May you all grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: so prayeth your friend and brother,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXXV.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I thank you for your kind letter. I think since I left St. Olave's I have more business than before: always some call to visit the sick or other duty; but not so much taken up, as to hinder me from writing every post, if I thought it would be any comfort to my mother. If she is waiting on God, he will not leave her. If she is desiring the fulfilment of the promises, God cannot deny himself: his word cannot be broken: he will give her her heart's desire, even himself to be her God, and her everlasting reward. My wife has been very ill; thank God, she is now pretty well recovered, and sends her duty to my mother, and her love to you all. The children are well.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXXVI.

I CAN say nothing yet about coming down. I have had sad troubles at St. Dunstan's with the new vicar. He will let none preach for me without a license, which puts me to great inconvenience: but all is governed by One, who knows what is best, and does what is best, for his own glory and his people's good. I desire to be more and more thankful to God, for his mercies both to me and to you. How can we thank him enough, for that so many of us are seeking happiness in eternal things, while so many are content with the happiness of time and sense? How can we do too much to show our gratitude? Oh, let us do, or suffer any thing our God calls us to! Surely, the time is short, and this short suffering is the way to an eternal weight of glory, &c.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXXVII.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I am glad to see your handwriting. I received your bill, and have sent you two books stitched in blue paper. You know, I suppose, why we did not all come as we intended; my wife is poorly: as soon as she is any thing better, I hope to see you. I send you inclosed two letters of Mrs. Love's, the most extraordinary I ever saw—Her faith was as strong as Abraham's, in offering up his only son. May God give you and me the same faith! And I doubt not but he will, if he calls us to the like trials; for I am certain, I find it by experience, that he gives his people strength for their day. Religion is in a very flourishing state among us. We have great additions of people, and several ministers lately come out. This is indeed a day which the Lord hath made. Oh that I may find him present with his divine efficacy, when I come down! Help me with your prayers, both before and when I am there, that the work of the Lord may prosper in my hands. Yours most affectionately,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CLXXXVIII.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I have been very poorly a long time, but, thank God, I find sickness better for me than health; and I am sure, when the Lord sees best,

I shall be restored to my former state. The main thing is to be secure of our eternal health; of that I have no doubt. Blessed be God for his unspeakable gift. I believe not one tittle of the word can be broken, but that to the uttermost it shall be fulfilled, even to me. This gives a relish to every thing God sends; because, whatever comes from him, comes always sanctified, and generally sweetened. What the enemy attempts against our peace, God overrules to the establishing of it; and his temptations against our graces are made to strengthen them. This is my experience; I hope it is yours. Rejoice in having an Almighty friend. Be comforted in him. What signifies all that Satan, or the world, or our own hearts, can do against his power? We are his. That is enough. He will keep us. He will strengthen us. He will justify us. He will sanctify and glorify us. Yea, he will do this for such as we are. Oh let us then fear nothing but displeasing him; and while this holy fear is in our hearts, we shall go on safely and sweetly homewards. There may we meet, even in our Father's kingdom, and inherit all that Jesus purchased for us!

My best respects, and duty, and prayers, attend my dear mother. I have not the least uneasy thought about her. She has God's promise. This she shall find. The Lord keep you and all friends.

LETTER CLXXXIX.

DEAR SISTER.—Your letter gave me greater joy than I can express. I hope all will soon be well with your soul. You may examine yourself by these following rules, and I hope God will give his blessing to them.

First, look back and see from whence your conviction of sin arose. The scripture says, true conviction must come from the Holy Spirit; and when he is come, says Christ, he will convince the world of sin. It is his business and his office; and, when he acts in it, conviction has these properties different from the conviction of natural conscience. It respects not so much acts of sin, as the sin of our nature; that entire pollution and depravity of the faculties of soul and body, which render us by nature children of wrath. Again, it is deep; it goes to the bottom of the heart, and lays open all the lurking places of sin. Further, it is lasting, it continues its hatred and opposition to all sin, until it be not only seen in the heart, but also driven out of it.

Secondly, if, after examining your conviction by these rules, you find it right, and peace and joy begin to arise in your conscience; if it be the peace and joy of the Holy Spirit, it will make you continue to hate sin, and every thing sinful. It will leave you more in love with God than it found you. You will love prayer more, and will have a freedom and liberty in it which you had not before. You will love God's word more, and will understand more of it, being enabled, by his grace, to find instruciton in it, suitable to all your spiritual wants. My meaning in all this is, if the convictions have brought you to Jesus Christ, you will know it by its fruits. You will find yourself grow in grace, and more in earnest about the salvation of your soul.

Thirdly, examine your growth in grace by this rule. We remember the sin which did so easily beset us; look at that; see whether you hate it entirely, and whether you have entirely got the mastery over it. God has promised that you shall have grace to help in time of need. Apply to God for the fulfilling of this promise; and be more concerned about this grace, which you always want in time of need, than about sensible comforts; because, in the one you may be deceived, but in the other you cannot. My dear sister, you have chosen the better part. The kingdom of heaven is worth millions of worlds. May God enable you to seek until you attain it. My prayers attend you.—Remember me to my sister.—My duty to my dear mother. Adieu.

LETTER CXC.

Grace be with you, my dear sister, and with my dearest mother; thanks for your kind letter. I am glad to observe the spirit of it. While Christ is dear and precious, all will be well. Lay him as the foundation, and build all upon him; then foundation and building will never, never fall. Oh, my dear sister, you cannot make too much of him. Faith, resting on him, finds a free, full, eternal pardon for all sin; and faith, living upon him, finds power over sin, deliverance from temptations and enemies; and, by and by, sin shall be no more, but only heaven and glory, the purchase of the Saviour's blood. The believer's motto is, "Christ all, I nothing." For he cannot live upon Christ, unless he feel his want of him. More wants, more faith, As they increase, so must faith, that the believer may get a supply, and the Saviour may get the glory. May that precious Saviour, eternally, infinitely precious, be your keeper! May you love him more than I do; live more upon him than I! May my dear mother get established in him! Jesus keep you! Jesus bless you! My dear sister, yours in him,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXCI

My dear Sister.—I have been waiting to answer your kind letter, with something satisfactory about my outward affairs; but, not being able as yet to do it, I could not put off my writing any longer. You tell me good news indeed; which makes my heart glad and thankful. Oh, what reason have I to bless the good and gracious Lord, who is still infinitely loving to me and mine! He hath brought me once more to St. Dunstan's, and through many miracles of mercy which I have experienced both in my body and soul for these last six months. Now I can sit down, and, looking back, adore and bless his rich grace; in all things, and for all things, I can give him thanks. Nothing have I to mention all the day long, but mercy upon mercy; great measure, pressed down, and running over. Every moment brings some increase of mercies to body, or soul, or children, or friends, or substance; and leads me to magnify the goodness of my dearest Lord. He hath showed himself, by numberless acts of grace, so entirely my friend, that he has enabled me to trust all my mercies in his hands. He knows what is best for me; and I am sure he will give it me. Thus he is glorified, and I am happy. You have heard of my being a candidate for a church in the city. My friends put me up; and I am as if I were not a candidate, for I have scarce a thought about it. One wish I am sure I have not but that Christ's will may be done. Would he employ me in a larger field than I have at present, "Here am I, Lord, send me." If he would have me to stay, and work where I am, I am content. Be thou, Lord, but with me, then I shall be and do what thou pleasest. Thus have I cast all my care for this and all other things upon the Lord, knowing that he careth for me. You will suppose, then, that I am happy: and so I am; very, very happy. I have got the pearl; let them take the field that will. For one end and purpose only do I now live. I see in this pearl of great price, the infinitely rich Jesus, far more wisdom, righteousness, holiness, strength, and blessedness, than I have yet attained; and I hunger and thirst for more, still more. I know it is all mine; and therefore I keep pressing forward. In what method, and on what motives, I do this, I will tell you.

1. As to myself, I find, that to this moment, I never go to Christ for any thing, until I feel the want of it: so that, the more wants I have, the more I make use of him; for which reason I am not afraid to discover what is in myself, be it what it will, because it does not drive me from Christ, but leads me to him. By this means self is kept down, and Christ is exalted. For,

2. As to Christ, I grow in the knowledge of him by finding every day more, that without him I can do nothing. Hereby my faith is increased, and I live in a more settled dependence upon him. My hopes are enlarged, and laid up with him within the veil, which is the death of worldly hopes and fears: and my love to him abounds from daily experience of his rich love to my soul, which crucifies and kills the creature-love.

For these two things I am pressing forward, desiring to be more emptied of self, and to live more out of self; that I may be filled more with Christ, and live more upon his fulness; and this I am sure is the way to be holy and happy. Now at Christmas, I would wish to feel in myself what a lost and eternally miserable creature I should have been without Christ. Here lies the ground of dependence on him, and thankfulness to him. That believer will spend the best Christmas, who is most experimentally acquainted with his own ruined nature, and thereby knows what a mercy it is, that God should take our nature, to save us from all the sins and miseries of it; and, being thus saved, what will he be doing all the Christmas, but praising and blessing that dear Jesus, to whom he is infinitely, and will be eternally, indebted? May nothing but praise come from your lips, and mine, and my dear mother's! May she know that Jesus was born for her, and be glad now in his salvation. I am, yours in everlasting bonds,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXCII.

LAMBETH, July 7, 1764.

GRACE and peace be with you always, my dear sister, and always increasing; this I heartily wish and pray for, both for you and myself—Indeed, it is all we want, to partake of the grace of God, and to have peace, the sweet sense of it, ever upon our minds. This ruling in our souls is heaven upon earth; and this promised is enjoyed by believers. "The peace of God rules in their hearts, alway, by all means." Of this I am a witness for God. Glory be to sovereign grace. I am obliged to go down to Brighthelmstone before I come into the North, so that I shall not be with you, until the first week in August; but you shall hear from me again, before I come down.

I asked your curate to accept of some of Lady Buchan's legacy—he seemed willing, and although I have not received the money, yet you may pay him ten guineas; and inform him, that it is part of what I intend him of this legacy. Other matters I refer till I come. You need take no receipt of him, only pay him (the first opportunity) the money.—I am but poorly in health: the weather is so hot, and our congregations so large, that I am quite faint; but to-morrow is my last day. A little air and exercise will, I hope, set me up again: but it matters not; Christ is mine, and he knows how to order my affairs. He can bless sickness as well as health; nay, he does bless all things to his people. So I find. I have nothing to fear on his part, though every thing on my own. I am going into a den of lions. Pray for me, and pray for my journey down, that it may be to God's glory. My wife and children join with me in duty to my dear mother, and love to you. I am, for that precious Jesus' sake, your loving friend, and affectionate brother,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXCIII.

LAMBETH, Sept. 29, 1764.

MY DEAR SISTER must not accuse me of neglect. I have been about my Master's business, preaching at Bath, at Bradford, at Powsey, &c. and being now returned to London, to preach three times to-morrow, I could not help giving you an account of my matters, and of my dear Jesus' great goodness to me. He has travelled with me, and been with me of a truth. Oh what have I experienced of his love, since I left you: he has not only let me taste that he is precious, but he has made me also live upon his grace. He lets me have nothing but love, free, rich love, and my very physic is given by, and tastes of, his love, and always works greater love in me to him; so that Jesus is become exceeding dear to me. His cross endears him, as well as his crown. Indeed his cross is full of diamonds within, as his daughter (that is, every true believer) is all glorious within. But why do I speak thus to you? Is not that precious Immanuel lovely in your eyes? Yes, I know he is; and I speak of him to you, to encourage you still to go on expecting to receive every day of his fulness more than you received yesterday. Do not stop; do not think you have attained all he has to give; but keep pressing on—still there is more wisdom; you know but in part; still more growth in knowledge of Christ's righteousness, it is infinite and everlasting; still more holiness in Jesus' fulness than any one living has yet received, because not one on earth loves as they do in heaven; still more strength, because every day is to bring us more sensible of our weakness, that we may be strengthened more by him, and that his strength may be perfected in our weakness. The Lord give you his mind and Spirit, that you may be growing up into him in all things. You have great reason to bless the Lord Christ, for his goodness to you in the North; but he has a dear people, and a numerous one too, in the West, and growing. It will be a vast multitude when they all get together; and that puts me in mind of my dear mother, who, I am sure, will not be wanting, when the Lord counteth his jewels. Mine and my wife's duty to her. The children are well, we hear. Remember us kindly to Mr. and Mrs. Callender, and Mr. and Mrs. Parker. Jesus be with you all. I am, for his sake, yours most affectionately,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXCIV.

Lambeth, Nov. 6, 1765.

My dear Sister, whom I love in the Lord, peace be with you! Although I have nothing particular to communicate, yet I could not help writing on the old subject, which will never be exhausted.

While there are angels to sing, and saints to shout, to shout aloud for joy, they will be telling of the love of Jesus to all ages. How great is his goodness! how great is his beauty! matchless both; as I can witness for one. I am loaded with his benefits. If I should begin to number them, they are more than I am able to express. To my body, my substance, my children, my soul, all, all is mercy; and mercy, too, that endureth for ever. May the God of all mercy secure to himself, from me, all the glory that is his due. You ask about Blackfriars; the cause stands still: it was to have been heard the first day of this term; but the lawyers were not ready. They begged for more time, and my Lord Chancellor granted it to them. When it will come on now, I cannot tell. But I can tell much of Jesus's goodness to me. He does not let all this waiting time be lost. He is teaching me to make up all my happiness in himself, and is kindly cutting off one and another view of rest, short of him, who is our only rest. And because I am a very dull scholar, and the master is meek and lowly, he therefore bears with me, and takes a great deal of pains to instruct me in my lesson. I think this is one great end and aim in all his dealings with his dear people. He would have them to trust him, to live on him, and to love him, always. But how can he do this so effectually, as by bringing them off from trusting to, living on, and loving, other things? He would take these out of the heart, in order to make room for himself. He is a jealous God. He will not sit on the same throne with idols. If there be one still in the heart, it must come down.

The more we cleave to it, he will put forth the more of his strength to divorce us from it. While he is in much mercy doing this, the foolish heart thinks Christ is hurting it, and intending it evil, when he means nothing but good, and is taking the best means to bestow good. He is removing the shadow, to make way for the substance. He is deadening the soul to sensual enjoyments, that it may be thereby more alive to God, and fitter for closer communion with him. Graciously is he teaching me these blessed lessons. What he takes most from me, I gain most by. For I am an immense, yea, an eternal gainer, when he fills up with himself the want of that which he takes away. Whatever brings me this blessing, I can welcome it. Welcome the loss of Blackfriars. Welcome every cross which brings me nearer to my Jesus, and makes me live in stricter fellowship with him; and then I can say, and feel it too, farewell fine world, farewell all thy fine things, farewell for ever! when they would keep me one moment from the enjoyment of my greatest good, and from the love of my best and eternal friend, my Jesus. I have not one uneasy thought about my mother. I have seen the Lord's love to her, and I know he changeth not; what he hath begun he will carry on. I can only pray, she may be as much satisfied in her own heart as I am about her. Sweet Jesus bless you in body, and soul, and substance. Give me an interest in your prayers, who am, your most affectionate brother,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXCV.

BRIGHTHELMSTONE, Oct. 8, 1765.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I have been waiting for an opportunity to write unto you, and it is now come. You love to hear, and I love to write, about our common friend, that matchless, loving, lovely Jesus, a subject one is never tired of; the more we dwell on it, the sweeter it grows; the longer we enjoy its sweetness, the more of heaven will come down to us, till we get up into heaven itself. To see Jesus in heaven and to enjoy him is the bliss of heaven. Thanks be to him, he is the joy of your heart and mine. Although we do know him, and rejoice in him, yet we know but little of what is to be known; for he is an infinite subject, and we can but know him in part—but let us press on to know more. And, as we grow more humble and teachable, he will show us more of the excellency of his knowledge. Pray earnestly for more deep heart-humility. Mind—what he hideth from the worldly wise, he revealeth unto babes, unto them who are child-like, and simple. The Lord make us more so daily, that we may know him aright; and then we shall always see our salvation from sin, and hell, and our title to heaven and glory, in him. We cannot know him truly without believing in him. When we understand his power, God-man—his errand into the world, to save sinners—his Almighty arm, and the love of his bleeding heart to save them; and what an innumerable company he has plucked out of hell's mouth, and raised up to his heaven; the more we know of these things, the more we can trust him. He says to all sinners, "Come to me, and I will save you." Oh what grace is in these lips—that you and I have heard his voice, and have come, and are saved. We do believe—Lord, increase our faith! let us pray much for it; because, as our faith in him increases, so will our love to him. I cannot believe he has finished salvation's work for me, and daily experience miracles of his love, without loving him in return; and as his miracles increase, I would love him more and more. Oh for more love to this best and dearest of friends! I am sure your heart says, Amen. Now the way to have his love both growing and increasing, so as to abound in us, is to be continually making use of him. He has all good in him; and he has it for you and me. He has the fulness in him of a fountain, to communicate of it. Of this fulness he would have us to make free; he invites us, commands us, to come with strong faith, and much love, that, by receiving from him great grace, he may get much glory from us, while we get much happiness from him. His generous offer is, "Come with boldness—all I have is for you." Faith replies, "Lo! I come, sweet Jesus, at thy bidding, every moment, for every thing, for grace and glory; I am content to receive all at thy hands, and to be indebted to thee for all, and that for ever and ever." While you live thus, my dear sister, in constant fellowship with your Saviour, he will give you continual reason to love him, and to bless him. He will so treat you, so comfort you, so strengthen you, will make you in him so holy and so happy, that every day he will enable you to trust him more and to love him better. Thus you will come to enjoy more of him, you will delight more in his company, you will get greater intimacy with him, and will walk in close communion with him, which is heaven upon earth. This growing fellowship with him will increase the joys of your present salvation. So that, when doubt of his love, sense of indwelling sin, earth or hell, would tempt you from Jesus, he will speak in his word, and will speak to your heart, by his Spirit—"I am thine, fear not. I will guide thee with my counsel, and, after that, will receive thee into glory." You will believe steadfastly what he says, and will thereby resist and overcome the temptation. He will keep you; and you shall hold out unto the end, and shall know it too, and praise him for persevering grace. He will bless you in death; and the happiest time you ever knew will be, when he lays your body in a sweet sleep, and your spirit, with open face, shall see Jesus in the highest glory. To be with him for ever is the highest bliss. To this, I trust, he will bring you and me, that we may praise the riches of his grace, and get more in his debt for ever and ever. He is now teaching us this heavenly employment. You can, and I can, take the crown of all our graces, and throw it at his feet. Soon, very soon, we shall do the same with the crown of glory. O what a thought is that! The good Lord is preparing my mother to do the same. I heartily pray for her establishment in the faith; and am, with my wife's duty and love, your faithful friend, and affectionate brother, in our precious, most precious, eternally precious Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXCVI.

Lambeth, Dec. 27, 1763.

All the joy of this good season be with my dear sister, and my kind prayers for my mother's rejoicing also on this occasion. I thank you for your last letter, and would have answered it sooner, but have been busy from morning to night in transcribing my book for the press, which will come out with convenient speed; but I may not hurry. It is a deep subject, and depends much on experience; I therefore let it be read by my friends. Mr. Madan has read it, and approves of it. I send it to-morrow to Mr. Mason; and then I shall let it go. May the Lord Christ go out with it! Pray, my dear sister, for a blessing on the publication. I have been very ill, but am, through the goodness of my master, much better. I have not been once kept from duty, although I have got a little chapel, at which I preach twice on Sunday, and a third time, at night, at St. Dunstan's. I commend you and my dear mother to the mercy of Jesus; and may his grace be with you living and dying. My wife and my children, both at home and well, desire their duty to my mother, and love to you. I am, with great respect and love, your affectionate brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CXCVII.

Aug. 20, 1765.

My dear Sister, to whom I wish an increase of grace and peace.—I could not withstand the persuasion I had to come to London; and, following it, I found my wife had been given over for some days. But God had mercy on her, and on me also. Dr. Griffith prescribed something which the Lord blessed, and she grew so fast better, that she herself insisted on my going to ——, from whence I returned last night. No time could I get to tell you of all this till to-day. My wife was and is better; my journey was prosperous in the Lord's matters, and I find all things well at home. "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in." So he promised—so he fulfils—as I can witness. I want nothing but more faith, to trust all with him, who, I am sure, freely loveth and blesseth me. The Lord increase my faith and yours! My duty to my dear mother; she is safe. Not only I say so, but so says the word of God. Die as she is, she cannot perish—only she wants the present comforts of our salvation. She dares, she does, venture her soul in the hands of Jesus, who never did, nor can, lose any thing committed to his care. With him she is safe. Under his care, she is;—and, rejoicing in him, she will be, whenever she is able to separate believing from the fruits of believing. The Lord teach her, and do the good pleasure of his will in her with power!

Remember me to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Parker, and to Mr. and Mrs. Callender. The good Lord bless them all! May you enjoy much of his presence, and be guided till his Spirit bring you to the vision of Jesus!

LETTER CXCVIII.

LAMBETH, April 14.

THE Lord enrich you with all spiritual blessings, and keep you rejoicing in his precious love. He has let a little glimpse of his glory pass before me; and what I have seen, that I declare unto you. Next week, I hope to send you an hundred of my experiences, entitled, "The Life of Faith," where you will see how the Lord has taught me. When you read the book, I beg of the Lord to shine upon it, that you may have a right understanding in all things. Our kind love and duty to our dear mother, and hope her soul prospers in the knowledge and faith of the Lord. I wish to hear of it. Pray for your loving friend and brother in Christ,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CXCIX.

LAMBETH, March 3, 1764.

GRACE and peace be with my dear sister, and with my mother. I thank you for your note by the penny post. Our God is good. Oh, he is good indeed to us! Not a family perhaps in England so blessed of the Lord as we are. Why us; why us? Grace, grace has done it. Grace, grace must have the praise for ever. The time is at hand. The Lord hath spoken, "They that wait upon me shall never be ashamed." My mother is waiting. She trusts the Lord, but has not the comfort of believing. She shall not be ashamed. God will appear for her, and she shall rejoice in his salvation. I believe it, as much as if I now heard her in the "Triumph of Faith." My little book is almost printed off. Please to send me word how to send them, and what number. My dear sister, pray for it. Let it be a book of many prayers. Beg it may be a means of increasing faith in the hearts of all that shall read it.

I have got more preferment; God be thanked I am turned out of my little chapel. Rejoice with me, that I am counted worthy to suffer shame for his dear, dear, dearest of all names, Jesus. I do love him more for this mark of his love. 'Tis worth more than a thousand a-year. I find to lose for Christ is vast gain. Who would not part with farthings for guineas; oh, I cannot tell you, words fail, how he has made up this loss to me, and how he has won my very heart by it, and endeared himself beyond measure to me. Let me entreat you to press on. Look at nothing but the way of duty. Go on in that, and there, by faith, all things will work together for your good. Believe me, it is so. I find he makes all things, what the flesh hates most, do good. Fear nothing, then, but sin. And let the world rail, persecute, it matters not. You are safe in Jesus' love, and happy. I am rich. My heart, too, is open. I desire nobody may want, while my purse is full. My wife is well, and the children. We join in duty to my dear mother, and in love to yourself. I am, in the closest bonds of brotherly love, yours, for that dear Lamb's sake,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CC.

My dear Sister.—Having two or three minutes to spare, I could not avoid informing you of the Lord's great goodness to me and mine. Indeed, it is marvellous. How many blessings have I which numbers want! And how many have I, in not desiring what I do want! Whichever way I turn myself, blessings meet me, and yet I know not why I am so highly favoured, unless it be that God may be highly honoured. For none can be more unworthy, and therefore from none can grace get so much glory. My election is not ended about Blackfriars. Law goes on. But I am quite out of it. My mind is at peace. Thanks be to the dear, ever dear Jesus. It is my one desire to please him; but how or where is not my business. He must look to that. All his flock is infinitely precious; and none of them shall perish for lack of knowledge. If he want me to feed his sheep at Blackfriars, I shall go. If he does not, I trust I shall not go from him. Forbid it, Lord! and if his presence does but go with me, wherever I am, then I shall be there doing his will. So be it, sweet Jesus!

Your last account of my mother was very reviving to me. I hope I shall see her once more on this earth, (I have no doubt of seeing her in heaven,) and rejoice with her in the goodness of the Lord to her soul. When it will be I cannot tell, on account of this lawsuit. But, God willing, nothing shall hinder my calling upon you some time this summer. Yours,

LETTER CCI.

My dear Sister.—I thank you for your kind letter, and for your care of the enclosed. It was the last sheet of my sermons. I used to think I should never live to finish them; and yet God has lengthened my life, and this part of my work is done. These are some of my last thoughts; what I now think about religion; the thoughts which support me in the near views of death and judgment. I am wholly now for magnifying the grace and love of our dear Redeemer. He deserves more of me than I shall pay him to eternity; and therefore I would desire with Paul to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified. To know him as crucified for me, and to feel the power and efficacy of his oblation on the cross, crucifying sin in me—to know this, is enough. Nothing more need be known. All besides is vanity, and will be vexation of spirit. Believe me, my dear sister, I have tried all that you can try out of him; and it is now grief to my heart. I not only renounce it, but also renounce it with sorrow, and that I should set up any thing against my precious Saviour, and leave him to seek for any elsewhere. He is all in all. What would ye more? For, "it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell." May you and I dwell where all fulness is! I would have wrote sooner, but Mr. Grimshaw promised to send you a letter as soon as possible he could after we parted. Blessed be God, I bore my journey well. Nothing happened of what Mr. G. told, till I got home. I found my family well. As to myself, I am neither well nor ill: but it is best to be as God would have us to be. His will be done! I hope my dear mother will soon receive him, whom her soul longeth after. I do not doubt it. He has promised, and he cannot break his word. "He filleth the hungry with good things." My love to my sisters. I will send you some sermons soon. Pray for your brother in the strongest bonds,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCII.

LAMBETH, April 23.

GRACE and peace be to my dear sister, from that ever, ever blessed Jesus. Glory be to him. What wonders is he now doing in the earth! What miracles of love! Can there be greater than that you and I, such poor sinners, should have daily reason to praise and to bless him, and that we should have so many reasons to believe he will let us praise and bless him to all eternity. Oh! sister, is not this astonishing goodness? In sin dead, and liable to the second death, from hence he has raised us to a state of grace, and ere long will raise us to a state of glory. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name.

He that is so infinitely kind to private persons, is the very same to his church; for that is only a congregation of private persons. What seems to hurt some of them is for the good of all. For the government of all is upon his shoulders, and he looks to the least as well as to the greatest of his matters. Not a hair falls, and much less a minister, without his appointment. I dare not therefore think one hard thought of his taking dear Mr. Grimshaw to himself. His work was done. The Lord took him to rest; and, as to his people, they will be well looked after. Their Shepherd will see to it, that they lack nothing. "But where," say you, "shall they go now, to find green pastures and the waters of comfort?" Why let them go to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls. Himself will feed them, as Psalm xxiii. "But he does it by means." That is true; and is not he the Lord of means? Cannot he find out means, when we are at a loss, if we look up with faith to him? I verily believe that Mr. Grimshaw's death will be as useful as his life; and the work is not yet come to its height in Yorkshire. No, it will spread farther, and deeper still; ministers' removals, yea, the most useful of us, shall tend to spread it. For all things work together, under God, for his glory and his people's good.

The more I think and preach about the infinitely rich Jesus, and his love, the greater still does he appear. My heart grows warmer to him. His cause grows more amiable; and nothing gives me pain, but that I do so little for him, and speak so poorly of him, and that this lazy body is so soon tired in his work. But I would do better, and shall too, by and by.—Ay, that is my comfort. I shall not always live at this poor rate. When I see him, I shall be like him. Farewell, then, to sin and sorrow. Temptations, farewell. Corruption is no more. Oh blessed time! Lord Jesus Christ fit you and me for the sight and enjoyment of himself!

LETTER CCIII.

GRACE and peace be to my dear sister.—I can thank the God of all grace for what he has already done for my mother; and I have no doubt but that he, who has begun the good work, will perfect it in her. She shall have peace: not because I say so, but God. He has promised it to her. She is seeking; she shall find. Trusting to this word, which cannot be broken, I am as easy about her as if I saw her in heaven. Which of us shall be there first, I know not; but I am waiting, not knowing when my Lord will come. On him I rest to carry me through life, through death; believing that, when he calls me hence, I shall see him face to face, to my eternal joy. And in his presence I shall find my dear mother, and you; yes, you, my sister. Only hold fast the faith, and soon you will win the crown. The devil has a vast spite against you. He begins to despair of drawing you from Christ, and then his malice puts him upon plaguing you. He will make your way as troublesome as he can. One of his grand engines against believers is error. If he can get the judgment wrong, he hopes thereby to prejudice the will, and so gain upon the heart. Thus he has always been undermining the church. Oh! beware of this temptation. He commonly introduces it thus; "You are in Christ, and you are a believer; but you want light in such a doctrine." He allows the doctrine, but draws a false inference from it, under a pretence of illustrating the doctrine. Would you, my dear sister, not be ignorant of his devices? pray to be humble. Much humility is better than much knowledge. Many knowing persons have been lost; but none truly humble. The Lord Jesus keep you, and make you, in him, complete and happy. I have not forgot the Catechism, but I have not settled since I left you. I am at Brighthelmstone, in Sussex, and shall not be gone till November. The Lord has been wonderfully with us here, and many souls are awakened. Some walking rejoicing in the Lord, and vast congregations. I am, with great truth, your loving brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCIV.

Lambeth, Aug. 12, 1762.

Grace and peace to my dear mother, and to my sister.—Thanks be to the Lord for your kindness to me. I am much in your debt for many favours; but especially for sparing me in the article of writing. I am indeed a bad correspondent. Truth cannot be denied. When I shall mend, I know not. But, surely, between this and my next visit, I shall write more than four times. Matter enough I have to write about. My last journey gives me a large subject, but I forbear at this time, excepting what relates to my dear mother, of whose salvation I have no more doubt than of mine own. Her evidences were good to me, though they cannot be comfortable to her, till the Lord please to make them so. Such a conviction of sin, such humiliation for sin, could not be, but by the grace and Spirit of God. From him, also, is that reliance which she has, and will not let go, upon the word and promise of the Lord Christ. By and by he will seal them to her heart. I am, your truly loving brother, in the Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCV.

My dear Sister, to whom I wish an increase of grace.—I could delay no longer to thank you for your kind present, which came safe, and for your kinder letter. Your good wishes and prayers are the best present. Let me still share in them. I never wanted them more. My affair at Blackfriars is not settled; and I have strong applications to go to America, to a church in the city of Philadelphia. The Lord must determine. I would not have one wish against his will. Being bought with an infinite price, all I have and am should be at his service. He has a clear right to all. "Take it, Lord. Let it be thine for ever." But I shall not be in any hurry. Waiting is good—on the Lord. I will tarry his leisure, and look at his providences. My friends, in general, are for my staying in London; and so am I in my own mind. But I dare not choose, till my choice is made plain to me. Perhaps, the Lord may fix me at Blackfriars; and then the matter will be ended at once.

My hearty prayers are for my dear mother, that this year may be the happiest she ever saw. May she find Christ in it. He has sought her out, and found her; but she has not, in comfortable enjoyment, found him. That I wish and pray for, not doubting of the event; because I have his word that I shall succeed. "Seek and ye shall find," says he. His word is infallible. May she soon experience it in the joy of his salvation!

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCVI

LAMBETH, Jan. 7, 1776.

MY DEAR SISTER.—Although I am greatly hurried, yet I could not help informing you, that this day my cause, about Blackfriars, was finally determined, and in my favour. I have retired and been alone this afternoon to abase myself. This is to me an amazing event. That such an one should be made a pastor; one that is plagued to death with his own heart, to make him a watchman over others! What is the Lord doing? With the most utter abhorrence of myself, and of my being unfit to be minister of a great parish, in the midst of this great city—I have been forced to leave it to the Lord.

I have heard, in my heart, a voice say, "Whom shall I send?" And I have been compelled to say, "Here I am, send me." Trusting, then, sweet Jesus, to thy grace and power, depending upon thine arm and blessing, out I go, not only unfit, but also averse to the work. It is thine, Lord, "to work in me both to will and to do."

I believe you love me; indeed, I do not doubt of it; and therefore I give you this notice, to pray your Master and my Master, to fit me for this new work. He knows my heart: I never had one desire for this new work but that I might have more room to glorify my Jesus. I would not look at any thing but at his glory and at my humility. Will you intreat him, then, thus to set forth his praise? Beg of him to help me to exalt him, and to keep me down. Your affectionate brother,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCVII.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I have longed for a little time to write you a few lines—to thank you for your last letter, and for your kind remembrance of me at our court. Pray continue me that favour. And, when the King smiles upon you, and you have freedom to approach, and have access with confidence into his royal presence, then make request for your brother. He knows, for he sent me upon, my present work. I find myself as unfit for it as a dog that cannot bark, and therefore for grace, for gifts, for success, I am forced to depend upon him. Most gladly would I live as a minister, in the same way that I live as a Christian, "by the faith of the Son of God," trusting in him to do all for me. There is my own safety. As a sinner, I have no confidence in any thing, but the finished salvation, the blood and righteousness of the Lamb of God. This being a sure foundation for a sinner to rest upon, and having myself found how sure it is, I can, therefore, write freely, and mightily encourage all that hear, be they who they will, to venture upon this foundation, which God hath laid; leaving the success (but oh that it may be abundant!) to him, from whom alone it cometh.

Being safely built upon this foundation, I find continual matter of rejoicing. Whichever way I look, comfort presents itself. To be saved from what I was once, brought to what I am now, the God of all consolation become my God, his Son my Saviour, his Spirit my leader to Heaven, his promises mine; all, all mine, now enjoyed by faith; for ever, in full possession! What divine comforts are these? With these I would encourage the miserable to come to Jesus; that, having trusted themselves with them, he might have the glory of making them happy. Oh that I may prevail! Say, I want for this "Grace every moment." I call, and he, in whom all fulness dwells, says to me, "I will water thee every moment." I believe it—I experience it. Grace has made me willing to live out of myself—upon the fulness of Jesus. In him I have what I want; yea, from him I gain by my wants. I grow richer by my poverty, and happier by my misery. Whatever it be, that brings me to live more upon his grace, is the means of my getting more grace, and thereby proves to me a real blessing. As I have freely received this grace, so I freely make the publication of it with all its benefits. I can tell my people, and boldly, that we are saved by grace; kept by grace; comforted by grace; sanctified by grace; and, although this be the doctrine against which the wicked one, the wicked world, and above all, the self-righteous world, fight with all their might: yet I am not discouraged, because Jesus is my strength. On him I depend for counsel to set about the work, for success in it, for a blessing upon it. If opposition arise—and it cannot but be that he who is born after the flesh should persecute him that is born of the Spirit—to my almighty King I fly, and on his promised help I trust. Oppose what will, Jesus is on the throne. All power in heaven and earth is his. By faith, strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, I have seen the most formidable opposition fall before me. Therefore, let us go on, walking straight forward to Jesus, whatever may stand to stop us in the way. If war arise, hot, fierce, and long battles; many enemies, mighty and strong, all the hosts of earth and hell; then Jesus is my victory. He arms me for the battle with the whole armour of God: clad in which, he teacheth my hands to war and my fingers to fight; strengthens the heart to hold out in long battles; discovers plots and wiles of subtle foes; gives courage to meet the roaring lion; brings the soldier off conqueror day by day, and more than conqueror at last, his enemies all eternally vanquished; he then sits down upon a throne crowned with everlasting glory and honour. It is blessed fighting through Jesus our captain: Oh! what will it be to reign with Jesus our King! Heaven it is upon earth to enjoy him; and there is heaven in every thing which brings me to more enjoyment of him. This the apostle had in his eye, and he had a great deal of it in his heart, when he called upon his Ephesians, to grow up into him in all things, who is the Head, even Christ. Mind, all things, while we live by faith, shall make us grow up into Christ more closely and intimately; finding you want him daily more and more, for life and godliness, for body and soul, for time and eternity: so that, without him you can do nothing. The abiding sense of this will keep you in your right place, as a poor helpless creature, hanging on the arm, living on the bounty, of the infinitely rich Jesus. This is the believer's growth. He grows more up into Christ. Taught by the Spirit of Jesus, he sees and feels his want of every good; and he is made to see and feel this continually, that he may not live upon self, upon any creature, upon worldly happiness; but that, finding his need of Jesus every moment, he may be receiving, every moment, grace for grace out of Jesus' fulness. Oh for more of the teaching of that Spirit, to humble us, and to glorify Jesus! Oh for more fellowship with him in his fulness of grace! Heaven is nothing more than fellowship with him in his fulness of glory. May my dear mother know him thus! I cease not to remember her at his throne. Her case is safe. I only wish her more happy in believing it. All here are well, and desire to be remembered to you, with your truly affectionate brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCVIII.

1766.

My dear Sister, grace be with you.—I begin to think it long since I heard from Hartlepool; but supposing you make nothing of the note which I sent from Helmsley, I must therefore write first, which I gladly do, embracing this and all occasions to tell of Jesus' love. His mercies have followed me all the days of my life—most free and undeserved—to body and soul. Surely a greater monument lives not. He brought me home safe—keeps me in health—gives me enough and to spare of this world's good; and I taste the love of the giver in his every gift. What would I more? Why, truly, nothing in this world. But, if I am thus indebted for temporal blessings, where shall I begin to set forth his infinite grace in spirituals? I am that brand, such as the like is not, plucked by Almighty love out of the burning. I might have been in it forty, ay, fifty years ago, and in it for ever. Oh what patience was there in the Lamb! But he was resolved to have all the glory: and indeed he richly deserves it—both for saving me out of hell, and for giving himself to me to be a Saviour; and for giving his Spirit to bring me to know myself, and to know him, whom to know is life eternal. All the angels, all the saints, could not tell how great his love already experienced is to me. How far short must I myself fall! I am content he should have the crown. It well becomes the head of King Jesus. I pay him willing homage, and am glad to take a free pardon, a perfect title to heaven, at his royal hands. Indebted to him for heaven, makes the thoughts of it sweet. I would not be out of his debt if I could.

Are not you glad? I know you are, that to me Jesus has been so exceedingly kind in all things. Yea, to mine, my family, and relations. What grace has been shown! How much are we bound to acknowledge his bounty! Oh let us with our lips and lives show forth his praise! and let my mother join. I am sure she ought. Blessings on her from the best of friends. So prays yours and hers in a precious, ever precious Saviour,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCIX.

LAMBETH, 1767.

MY DEAR SISTER.—I was in hopes you would have disposed of my charity before this, and would have let me know to whom I am to pay the money. I am thankful you had my commission, for I think it can never be more wanted. The good Lord secure to himself all the glory of this, and of every act of kindness to his afflicted members. I am praying for my dear mother, Jesus hear me! that this may be the grand year of her life, when she will say,—"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name, for he hath forgiven thee all thy sins. He himself is become thy salvation." Oh what a journey should I have to Hartlepool, if I was to come and hear this voice of joy and thanksgiving. Well, I do not doubt of it. All is now safe. All will be comfortable, when the Lord pleases. Let him do what seemeth him good. A happy, happy year, to her and to you!

Through mercy, I am going on very well. I want nothing but more capacity to praise and to enjoy Jesus. He is very near to me, and he makes himself very dear. He still smiles on our meetings, and is in the midst of us. Blackfriars is owned by him. He has set to his seal that God is there. Oh for more of his presence to fill the ordinances with life and power. Pray for us, my dear sister, and you will not lose any thing by our having much of Christ with us. We will pray for you in return. To him I commend you, whose love is truly heaven, even upon earth. May you never want it till you enjoy all its fulness, together with your loving brother,

ALL spiritual blessings be with my dear sister.—I thank you for your last favour, and for being my almoner. I hope you will write to me soon, and let me know how my mother does. As she is in the Lord's hands, all will be well. Before she goes hence, he will open her mouth to speak for Jesus. I go on with my prayers, that the Lord's good pleasure may be done in her. Here is good news of the increasing kingdom of Jesus. More ministers, especially, are raised up. We have more awakenings among us. More refreshing times Things wear a very promising aspect. Thanks for these blessings! May they bring down more! Oh praise the Lord with us, and let us magnify his name together! May we join to thank him for poor Hartlepool sinners! I charge you not to forget me, or Blackfriars, in your prayers. I cannot forget you. The precious Lord Jesus be your companion and guide unto death. I am, very heartily, yours in him,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXI.

Lambeth, June 27, 1767.

My dear Sister.—I have been waiting for a long time to write to you, that I might fix the time of seeing you, but have been prevented hitherto, by my being disappointed of three curates. At present I am without one; and I know not when I shall get one to my mind. I am obliged to stay till I do. Your letter this morning would not let me delay any longer. As to the contents, having received no hint from any quarter, I was indeed surprised at ——'s affair; and, as to your own connexions, you are of age, and the best judge. Whatever you do, my prayers and best wishes shall attend you, married or unmarried.

If any thing can bring me down soon, it will be your account of my mother. I know she is safe as to her state, but is puzzled about the evidence of it; which robs her of her present peace, but cannot hurt her salvation. Of this I have no doubt. I have conversed with her for several years upon this point, and am perfectly acquainted with her state. All here join in prayers for her, as long as we know her to be within the reach of prayer; and, if God permit, I will come and pray with her.—I commend you and her to the care of our dear Jesus, and am, very heartily in him, your friend, and loving brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXII.

Blackfriars, June 28, 1768.

My dear Sister.—I purpose, through God's blessing, to be at Northallerton, Monday next, July 4th, and desire my old fellow-traveller may meet me there with horses the same day, time enough for me to get to Yarum that night, if we cannot reach Hartlepool. I hope to be at Northallerton about noon, or soon after. Once more, the Lord in great mercy will bring us together, and will, I trust, accompany our meeting with his blessing. If it be agreeable, I will be either at Hartlepool or Strantum, on Sunday, July 10th. Remember me, with my best prayers for my dear mother; my love to brother Heslup. I am, with great truth and love, your affectionate friend and brother,

LETTER CCXIII.

Blackfriars, Nov 19, 1768.

My dear Sister.—I thank you very much for your last letter, and for the contents of it—particularly for the good account of my mother's welfare. The Lord prosper her still more and more. I am still praying for her life. If the people at Hartlepool knew how much depended on it, they would do the same.

You tell me good news of poor sinners converted, and of believers settled and established in their most holy faith. My heart rejoices to hear of any increase of Jesus' glory. He is the prince of the kings of the earth—to whom all blessing is due.—Yea, he is above all blessing and praise, and that for evermore; because he humbled himself, God was made man; Oh wonderful humiliation!—He went lower; humbled himself to become obedient—obedient unto death—even the death of the cross—therefore he is highly exalted.—King of kings—crowned—many crowns upon his head. Oh how I triumph in my inmost soul in his love!—He loved me—I pay him homage—all within me, all without me, blesses his holy name. He is my king—my royal Saviour—I pay him my allegiance with heart and hand. Not that he may be away—Away with that proud thought!—But because he is mine:—therefore I would walk before him, without fear, in holiness and righteousness all the days of my life.

My kind love to Mr. Heslup, and desire him to exalt Jesus. He cannot set him too high. He cannot think of him so high as he is; so high as he deserves. The higher he is exalted, the more will every thing, sin especially, bow before him.

When you write to Sunderland or Newcastle, pray remember me to my sisters, their husbands, and to their families. I desire and beg for an interest in your prayers, and am, with my duty to my dear mother, and prayers for her, your affectionate friend and brother,

LETTER CCXIV.

Nov. 7, 1769.

MY DEAR SISTER, grace and peace be multiplied unto you.—May you be growing and increasing in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and have a sweet and abiding sense of it in your heart, enjoying daily more of that peace of God, which is heaven begun. I pray you not to rest or stop in any attainments. Keep going on. Be pressing forward. Faith should grow. We read of going from faith to faith, from one degree to another. There should be a progress, both in the knowledge of your interest in Jesus, and in the enjoyment of the good things, in which you are interested. If faith must grow, then hope must also; for hope is the daughter of faith. By faith we trust the word of God, by hope we wait, till we receive the promises in his word. Hope is never disappointed, nor does it ever make ashamed. It gets many a pledge, and brings in sweet foretastes of the things hoped for. A true believer therefore never says, I have enough. No, no; his hunger and thirst increases by tastes and crumbs of glory: what falls from his Lord's table whets his appetite for the marriage supper. So the apostle prays for the believing Romans—"May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope by the Holy Ghost." Now in proportion as faith and hope grow, so does love.—We love God, because we believe he first loved us; and this love increases, as faith gives a more substantial presence to the things hoped for. Love is now in its infancy—the greatest love upon earth is but one ray of the morning dawn, compared to the shining of the perfect day. Oh my dear sister, never think you have attained perfect love, till you get into a perfect heaven. Be still going on growing in grace, and in the knowledge and love of God your Saviour. There is room enough for this, both on Jesus' part and on yours also. He can give more; you can receive more. And, as faith enlarges your vessel, you will hold more. As hope increases, you will enjoy more. And this I pray heartily, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge, and in all sensible feeling, that you may walk in love, till faith and hope leave you in full possession of the love of God in life everlasting.

I write thus, because I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy. I am afraid you should stop by the way. Many do. They set out well, but fall asleep, and dream of being in heaven, while their welfare is carrying on upon earth. They fancy to themselves a triumphant state, while they are militant. A sad delusion!

Because it tempts them to rest, when they should be fighting; and to sit still, when they should be pressing forward. Are you a believer? Yes. Well then, the gospel says,—"Forget the things which are behind, and reach forth unto the things which are before." How long must I do this? Till you have laid hold of eternal life. Faith should be growing, hope should be increasing, and love abounding, unto death; or, as the Apostle has it, 1 Thess. i. 3, faith should be at its work, love at its labour, hope at its patience, waiting on patiently, till we have finished our course with joy. I pray God you may be thus employed, when death calls you to judgment.

Remember me, with all duty, to my dear mother. I bless God for his great grace to her, and doubt not but he hears prayer for its continuance. My love to Mr. Heslup, and let him read the former part of the letter, and study it. I would have him not grown up (till he is dead), but growing up into Christ Jesus in all things.

I have been trying to spread the fame of our precious Jesus in various parts of England—a journey of near eight hundred miles.

I rejoice with you in the spreading of the gospel in your parts. It is the Lord's doing; and it should be marvellous in our eyes.

You must not forget me in your prayers. I want them much. At present, I am in a great difficulty. My lecturer is gone, and I am forced to do the duty myself—for fear a false prophet should get in. I did not seek it; but I hope the Lord, now he has called me to it, will give me will and power, and if it please him, success. Desire your friends to pray for me.

My wife travelled with me. We found the children well. I have nothing to tell of but mercies—May the giver add one to them all—even a heart to praise, and to bless his goodness. Amen. I am, with great truth, your loving brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXV.

My dear Sister, it is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good.—So says faith: so should you and I say. My thoughts upon this occasion have not been improved, as I could wish, through great bodily pain and indisposition; but such reflections as these have greatly tended to quiet my mind, and to produce a willing submission:

First, My mother's true conversion to the Lord. She knew in whom she had believed; and she was in Christ, Christ was her gain, both in life and death. Glory be to him for this great grace.

Secondly, She died in faith: Oh what a mercy, to finish all well! What are we desiring for ourselves, as Christians, but the same mercy, that we may hold out to the end, and finish our course with joy? Therefore,

Thirdly, We are not to mourn as those who have no hope. Our dearest friend is with her Lord, with whom we expect to be soon. We have only parted a moment, that we may meet for ever. It looks to me, in my near view of death, only like my taking leave of my dear mother, to go yearly to London. I shall go to her—blessed, truly blessed prospect! and I do not wish her to come back to me:—because—

Fourthly, I do indeed find, that the Lord supplies the want of all creature comforts with his own presence. When he takes them away, it is to make more room for himself in the heart. A sweet exchange! we live upon the fountain, when the streams are dried up. He dries them up to make us come nearer to the fountain, and that the absence of temporal mercies might be supplied with an happy enjoyment and communion with God himself.

She had lived to a blessed time—even speaking after the manner of men—she died in a good old age, full of years—and was gathered to her people; to whom I am going. Now it is my turn. I know of nothing worth living for one day.

We are now travellers; and what traveller does not wish to be at rest? We are now absent from our Lord; and home is home. What soldier, after a hard campaign, does not wish for winter quarters? What man in love, does not wish the moments to fly swiftly, to bring on his wedding day? Oh for that blessed consummation which will last for ever and ever to all eternity.

I shall love you, my sister, as long as I live, for your attention to my dear mother. You have done your part. May you do all as well as this! I thank you for my part, and honour you greatly. My kind love to Mr. Heslup. He has been tried with his attention to my mother; the good Lord repay his kindness a thousand fold. Mine eyes overflow with tears, while I am thinking of both your goodness to her—God bless you both—God bless you. My kind love to my sisters, and their husbands.

Poor Hartlepool! few know this loss. It is the greatest the town could have.

LETTER CCXVI.

BLACKFRIARS, Sept. 6, 1771.

GRACE be with you and your yoke fellow. I know we are in a dying world—I see it, and feel it. It is my heart's desire to live under the constant impression of this truth; there is but a step between me and death, but a step between me and the full enjoyment of what I have now by faith. It is not that I love you not—God knoweth my love to you is double—you are twice my sister, born, and new-born. And I truly esteem you both in the flesh and in the spirit. But I could not come and tell you this face to face, but I shall come, God willing, and tell it you, and the reasons too, that you may be satisfied. Only wait patiently, and see how good the Lord will be to us in this, and in all other things that we wait upon him for. It is my fixed purpose to visit you, as early as I can in the spring; but the great Disposer of all our purposes has us in his hands. Our will must bow to his sovereign will; and, in submission to it, we always speak of to-morrow, not knowing what a day may bring forth.

I can very well supply my absence. There is no want of preaching; we have enough of that, and too much in the preacher's strength. We want prayer greatly—a dependence on the almighty Head to bless preaching to his people. This seems to be wanting both in preachers and hearers. I can do something towards the supply of this want: and am trying at it. Oh that fervent effectual prayer was but ascending more and oftener to the throne of grace; we should have more showers of blessings coming down. I beg not to be forgotten by you at any time before the throne. May I never forget you nor yours.

Errors and heresies are rampant. God keep you! I beg of Mr. Heslup to be much at his Bible; he reads other books too much. I am sure, God the Holy Ghost is the best writer; and I find him the best expositor upon his own writings. Tell Mr. Heslup so. I repent of years wasted in fruitless study, and am, just as my studies are over, got to be right in them. I wish he may improve by my mistakes, and now in earnest resolve to be a Bible-student, and a Bible-christian. Farewell, my dear sister. May all the rich covenant mercies of our Jesus be yours. My wife joins in every christian wish. The children are well. I am for his sake, very sincerely, your loving brother,

LETTER CCXVII.

BLACKFRIARS, Oct. 27, 1771.

MY DEAR SISTER, often remembered, and interest made for you at our court. I have been upon the King's business, travelling from place to place, to exalt and honour him, for near three months. He has been pleased to bring me safe home for the winter, and I sit down the first opportunity to thank you for all your kindness to me at Hartlepool. I did not doubt of your love, but my visit this year confirmed me in it. Your whole behaviour convinced me, that I was a welcome guest, and has kept a warm desire upon my mind to see you again. Thankful am I, for what I met with of the same kind, both at Newcastle and Sunderland, especially at the latter, as I was never so highly honoured before, as to be suffered to speak for my glorious Jesus. Although things were not so pleasing at Yarum, yet I forgive from my very heart Mr. O.'s treatment; for I believe G. M. is a dear child of God, and was misled by his partner, who misrepresented me. People will quarrel; I would hinder them, if I could; but quarrel I will not: no, not with Mr. O. Thanks be to the Prince of peace—he has taught me better things. I know him God-man; I believe in his work—it is the greatest work of God—a complete, an eternal salvation. Oh, marvellous grace, I enjoy it. While others dispute about it, I am possessing it. They busy themselves about shadows, and I am rejoicing in the substance. Would to God Mr. O. had the same fellowship with Jesus. Poor man! he would not talk of himself before the Lord God, and plead his own doings—he would not urge this plea; "Lord, my works last July were very meritorious, for I stood and tried to stop all I could from going to Yarum church, to hear that heretic Romaine, who was going to teach them, that they were to be saved wholly and solely for what you had done and suffered, and all glory as well as all grace by the way, was to be had entirely out of your fulness." But enough of this: Mr. W. forgives him; so do I: Christ forgive him.

My motto has long been, "Cease ye from man." All my experience leads me to trust man less, and God more. My Bible is my study, and the Holy Ghost my commentator. I have done with names—great authorities—and living popes—for we have an English pope. In opposition to whom, I am a protestant. I protest against the merit of works, and all its long train of errors; but I will not dispute with any pope: I will rather pray for him, as I do. God open his eyes, and turn him from darkness to light, from blind popery into gospel liberty.

My love to Mr. Heslup. I fear for him, lest these times should take him off from Christ, and get him into disputing. Desire him, from me, to read his Bible more, and not busy himself about opinions. What has he or I to do with Mr. Wesley? Let him go on in his way; and let us go on in ours. But let us be as diligent as him—our lives as exemplary—our good works as many. And let us beat him all to nothing in charity. If he revile, let us pray. If he be dogmatical, let us be meek and lowly. I cannot give any account for my writing about him, for I do not love to have anything to do with him; but it came upon my mind—and I let it stand. I should rejoice to hear from you. We are all well. I am yours and Mr. Heslup's very heartily,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXVIII.

Nov. 9, 1771

My dear Sister.—I wrote to you some time ago, and hearing Mr. Parker was ill, I got a frank to Mr. Callender, in which I sent a long letter to him, and another to Mr. Parker. None of you have thought it worth while to send me an answer, at which I am a good deal surprised. I therefore beg the favour of you, upon the receipt of this, to give me some account of my sisters, and their husbands, and families: and also how you go on at Hartlepool. You must not think me indifferent to the cause and interest of God anywhere; but surely not among our own relations, and least of all among relations hitherto so kind and obliging to me. I send you my written sermons, when I cannot come to preach in person, but I am waiting in hope, when I shall confirm my doctrine by word of mouth, and find a proper time to bear my testimony again to the divine glory of the person of Jesus, and to his absolutely perfect salvation. Be assured, my dear sister, it is complete, lacking nothing. We carry nothing to him, but receive all from him. We have, from his fulness, change of state, of tempers, of life. He is the author of all our good thoughts, words, and works. If these have any merit, it must be put to his account, and not to ours; for he worketh all for us and all in us. And he will and must have all the glory too. Oh that you may be willing to give it him! That is true holy humility. You cannot think what grace he gives to them, who are willing to return him all his glory. Try, pray for a growing sense of your own unworthiness, and the lower and viler you are in your own eyes, the more will he be honoured for his grace, and therefore he will give you more; for he giveth grace unto the humble. Nothing stops the current of his favours so much as pride: he resisteth the proud; he is at war with them. A sad war! a proud sinner fighting against an holy God. Who, think ye, will conquer? And how low will the proud be laid? Oh beware of all high thoughts. Take heed of admiring your own greatness or goodness. Self-delight is a very pleasing sin, but more odious to a jealous God than the gross sins of the flesh. I see those, who fall in love with themselves, do not think with me about my heavenly lover: I am sure, the more we love him, the less we shall admire ourselves. The Pharisee, full of self-complacency, remained in his guilt; the poor publican, who loathed himself, went home justified: so must we go to heaven, pleading all the way, and pleading there, too, mercy of God through Jesus Christ, and nothing else.

You will say, what is all this to me? Why, truly, sister, you want it. There is no perfect humility but in heaven. Till we get there, we should be learning, and every day seeking for more grace to humble us—learning of our master to be meekly and lowly. May God make you and me better scholars, and Mr. Heslup; for he wants much to keep him down. My kind love to all friends. Do not fail me in writing the first post. I commend you to Jesus' care and love, being truly yours in him,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXIX.

Dec. 22, 1772.

MY DEAR SISTER.—Although I have not heard from you for some time, yet I cannot help wishing you every Christmas blessing. And what these are, how many, how great, none can tell. It is the great mystery of godliness—God manifest in the flesh—God born for us in the flesh—born in us by the Spirit. Then we keep our Christmas, when we are new born, the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. This new birth of Christ, formed in us, and dwelling in our hearts by faith, appears, as our birth into this world does. The new-born babe enters the world with crying: so they who have received the Spirit of adoption cry, "Abba, Father." They are the brethren of Christ, one with him; and his Father is their Father. Oh inestimable privilege: what a blessing to believe it! What blessings come from enjoying it! How many soever they be, I wish them yours. When the infant is born, it cries for food; in like manner, believers, as new born-babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby. In Christ their souls live, as their bodies do in this world: on him also they live, and by feeding on his word, and mixing prayer and praise, they grow up into him in all things—doing nothing, either temporal or spiritual, but by the faith of the Son of God. For ever blessed are they who keep such a Christmas—who can call Christ their brother, his Father their Father, by the indwelling Spirit; and who can evidence this to themselves and others, by a conversation directed to the glory of God.

Thus would I live, thus may you live!—in Christ, and on Christ, and to Christ. If we receive much from him, let us not rob him of his honour. If we do much for him, we have nothing to boast of; for he worketh in us both to will and to do. I am for good works, as much as any of them; but I would do them to a right end, and upon a right motive; and, after all, having done the best that can be done, I would not lay the weight of the least tittle of my salvation—no, not one atom of it, upon them. It all rests on Christ—he is my only foundation—he is my topstone: and all the building, laid on him, groweth up into a holy temple in the Lord. He has done all for me. He does all in me. He does all by me: to him be all the glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Times are very hard: but the best things are the cheapest. You may have Christ for nothing: and the more freely you receive, the more freely you will honour him with his gifts. So I feel it. Remember me to your poor: I beg their prayers; for I want them much.

My kind love to Mr. Heslup. I wish Christ and he were better acquainted. I am sure the more he knows of Christ, the more he will love him, and his word and ways, because of Christ himself revealed in them. Farewell, my dear sister; and I charge you not to forget, in your daily prayers, your true friend and brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXX.

June 26, 1773.

My dear Sister.—I am obliged to you for your last favour. You would have received my acknowledgment sooner; but I was waiting to see how my way could be directed this summer. I have waited so long, that I am quite ashamed to be silent any longer; and, therefore, take my pen to tell you, that there is at present nothing determined about my travels. I hope to be where the Lord pleases, and to be found doing his work. Then all will be well, wherever I am.

My thoughts often run about poor Hartlepool. I believe the Lord has a people among you, and I wish he may honour Mr. Heslup, by making him useful to gather them together, and to build them up in their most holy faith. My prayers are not wanting for him and them; particularly I desire the Prince of peace to keep him from a disputing spirit. I do not know that he is given to it, but I know many who are: whose principles, as well as tempers, incline them to be of a self-righteous, and therefore of a censorious and wrangling spirit. I have suffered more from such than from all the world beside. Bid Mr. Heslup take warning from me. I advise him to avoid controversy, as he would the plague. And, if he would be kept entirely, I will tell him how I am kept. The doctrines which others are disputing about, I am living upon. They have ceased to be with me matters of controversy. I have brought them into experience. By which means, I not only am certain of their truth, but also receive from it great profit. Doubting and disputing are at an end; for what room can there be to question any doctrine, while it is really practical, and brings in a great revenue? Thus a man gets to be settled. Others quarrel about the shell, he feeds upon the kernel; and often feasts upon it.

My wife is in good health. We all desire to be kindly remembered to you and to Mr. Heslup, especially, your loving brother,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXI.

May 24, 1777.

My dear Sister.—As to the particulars about house and land—I write nothing. Hope to see you in June, as I promised, and see nothing at present to stop me. If I keep my word, will not God? And what is faith but taking him at his word? What is all religion but trusting to his faithfulness? Is not this the highest service of the heart? and if it be real there, the service also of the life? For the obedience of faith is the obedience of the whole man. What honour does this put upon God! His wisdom in contriving such a salvation—his love in revealing it—his power in working it out—his promises of giving it freely—and his fulfilling them perfectly—these, and all his attributes, are glorified in believing: for then we set to our seal, that God is true. We are of one mind with him; of one will with him: and, if we can trust simply what he says—yea, trust, when difficulties be in the way of his fulfilling his word; then we show that our faith is strong: but, if we can trust against seeming impossibilities, against hope believe in hope, then we prove ourselves the children of believing Abraham. I can assure you, sister, that my highest lesson is this; and I learn it slowly. I want to honour God in his word, by believing against sense—sometimes it is well with me—but presently I stagger. Yet I aim at stronger standing in faith daily. Pray for me. My love to Mr. Heslup. I have no advice to give him till I see him; only I wish he may not move, till the cloud moves. Mr. M. breakfasted with me to-day, who is still misinformed, and lives at a very low rate in believing.

Mrs. Petre must send me another receipt for ten pounds—her salary is so much this year—signed as before, only the sum altered. You may pay her, if she wants it much. My love to our friends at Newcastle and Sunderland. I am, very sincerely, yours, in our common Lord,

W. ROMAINE

LETTER CCXXII.

Aug. 5, 1769.

MY DEAR MOTHER.—This is the first letter that I have had time to write since I left Hartlepool, and as you have a right to my daily remembrance, I begin my correspondence where it is first due. My journey was very pleasant, not hot, nor dusty. All quiet and happy within. The Lord's countenance shining in an unclouded sky. Mercies upon mercies—heaped up and running over. It seems as if I was singled out to be a witness for my God, that his mercies are above all his works. I arrived safe, and visited my house, and found fresh matter of praise and thanksgiving. All glory be to free grace!

When I look back to Hartlepool, and review the dealings of a precious Jesus with you and with yours, my debt increases: and when I consider his goodness to Hartlepool sinners, and Bishopric sinners—how many of them he has called from darkness to light. Oh what a tribute of praise ought we to be continually paying to the Saviour of the North Country! And, if we particularly consider our relations, one by one, whom it has pleased our good God to work upon by his Holy Spirit, we should call upon all within us to bless his holy name, and all without us to join in showing forth his praise. This, for my own part, I would most gladly do, having seen so much in my last journey, both of his presence with me, and of his grace working by me, that I am ready to join all that are praising our good God, and to crown our royal Lord and Saviour, the free giver of all blessings both in earth and in heaven.

I have had a good time at the assizes, and preached to a vast congregation. The seed was sown; but the great Sower is the Son of man himself—unless he rain and shine upon the word, man's ploughing, and harrowing, and sowing, will come to nothing. I would therefore preach as well as live, in a constant dependence upon the blessing of Jesus. After mentioning the loving-kindness of the Lord, we should remember our want of it still, and how we are to receive the supply of our continual wants. We have a prayer-hearing God. He has answered all our petitions for you; whereby he has encouraged us to come again without doubt or wavering. This I hope to do for you, my dear mother, as long as you or I are within the reach of prayer. He has let you live to a good time. You know him; you believe in him, as your Jesus. He is your Lord and your God. It is our part and duty to beg of him, that you may be every day growing in grace, and in the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus; and that, whenever he shall be pleased to take you to himself, you may witness a good confession, and confirm the truth by your death, as you do by your life. I beg my love to Mr. and Mrs. Heslup Pray tell them that I never had so pleasant a journey in all my life, so many gracious providences, and so many outward mercies, besides the peace in my own soul;—encouragements these not to neglect coming another summer. Oh that, whenever I do come, it may be to the praise of the glory of rich free grace; and, if I stay longer than I used to do, which all appearances seem to favour, may the good Lord overrule a longer stay for greater good.

And, as I hope there are several in Hartlepool who have nearness to the throne of grace, I desire you would, one by one, desire them to make use of their interests for me. If you see my brother Parker and wife, or Callender and wife, intreat the same favour of them: I ask it of none but those who are already in my debt, and who ought to get out of it as fast as they can. I am, with my duty to you, and my love and respect to all friends, your affectionate son, and most obedient servant,

W Romaine.

LETTER CCXXIII.

July 26, 1793.

My good Brother.—I was very glad to see your testimony, at last, concerning my sister—and thank you for it. She was the Lord's; she lived to him and on him—and she is with him—where I hope you and I shall soon be with him, and like him for evermore. Till that happy day, you are called upon to be a public witness for him. May you preach him in his glorious fulness, and may the Holy Ghost come down from heaven upon your preaching, that Northumberland sinners may hear and live. Do your best. Exalt him with all your might in your pulpit and in your living, you will do but little. I am an old preacher, and have seen enough of his glory to be ashamed of myself; I reprobate all my services; and, if I were to begin again, I would try to shoot higher—and I do. Blessings on him! He is above all blessing and praise. Perhaps, before I see you I may see him face to face, when he will enable me, without one selfish thought, to give him all the glory: to him I commend you. May he supply my sister's place. You will miss her more every day. Your lesson is to pray him to fill up her absence with his presence. Pray for it. So does

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXIV.

Dec. 28, 1762.

My dear Friend.—I do not forget you nor your last favour. Till memory fail me, I hope in a grateful mind to retain a sweet sense of your kindness to me. Blessed be his name! I have a desire put into my heart by my heavenly lover to spread his fame and glory as far as my tongue can reach: and for what else do I take up my pen but to make mention of him, even of him only?—The favourite theme of his redeemed on earth; the triumph of the same redeemed, when they come to Sion with everlasting joy upon their heads and in their hearts. My meditation of him is now sweet: in one single point of view I am beholding him, and in that he is all glorious. Oh that the faithful witness for him may give you to feel what I have felt of his incarnate love! May the Spirit glorify in your soul that greatest, that standing miracle of Jehovah's everlasting grace, by letting you know, that, for you a child was born, for you a son was given, even Immanuel himself—God with us, and God for us. I will try to lead you, by the light of revelation, into some of the wonders of this transaction, as they have been manifested with life and power unto my own heart.

The scripture is a full description of the purposes of the divine will from eternity to eternity. Therein we find a council held, before all worlds, between the Holy Trinity, and the decrees of this council, confirmed by the covenant and oath of each of the divine persons. This was the great contrivance of heaven, and it lay in the bosom of Jehovah with infinite delight. He viewed it as the richest display of all his divine perfections, in which, and for which, his glory would be admired and enjoyed by his creatures for ever and for ever. Immanuel was the centre of this covenant—his becoming surety for his people—taking flesh for them—living and dying, that the divine honours of the holiness, and truth, and justice of the Godhead might shine forth in full-orbed glory, for showing mercy to poor sinners. This was, this is, this will be the eternal subject of praise. Hear how the Father triumphs in the Son of his love: Behold my servant, whom I uphold: mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth. And again, with a voice from heaven, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. All the counsels, decrees, and works of Jehovah terminate, yea begin and end, in this blessed Immanuel; and, therefore, when the angels were created, the purpose of Jehovah's taking flesh was manifested to them; and proclamation was made: Let all the angels of God worship him. Pride arose in the heart of Lucifer and his companions: their will opposed the will of the eternal Three in this matter, for which they were cast out of heaven, and have opposed Christ and his people ever since.

Then this world was created for the carrying into execution the purposes of the everlasting covenant. Man, the object of the Deity's delight, as made in the image of God—part of two worlds: a body of earth, an immortal spirit—by the one connected to matter and sense; by the other to God, the father of spirits. The enemy of Jesus attacked Eve, and beguiled her through his subtlety. Adam was not deceived, but fell by listening to his material and sensual part. He preferred his wife to God, and so lost his image, knowledge, righteousness, and holiness.

Upon this the revelation of the covenant was made, and the incarnation of Jehovah was made known, as the ground of faith and hope, and of return again to God in the way of love and gratitude. As clear as words can speak and signs declare, the promised seed of the woman was to attack Satan, and was to bruise his head, where his poison lies, and thereby to deliver his people. For this purpose the Father sent him into the world, that he might deliver us from the power of darkness, and translate us into the kingdom of his dear Son. I believe, from the evidence of scripture, that Adam, and all believers downwards, had as clear a view of the incarnation of Jehovah, and of the reasons for his taking flesh, as you and I have; and with as warm hearts as we can, have they rejoiced in the God of their salvation. Hear one of them, how he stands amazed at this miracle of mercy: "But will God indeed dwell with men on the earth?" And mind the pious breathings of his holy father—how he longed for Christmas! "Oh that the salvation was come unto Israel out of Zion! Oh that the Lord would deliver his people out of captivity! Then shall Jacob rejoice, and Israel shall be glad." That he would come, was the ground of hope to all believers in every age; and there were many of them waiting when he came, who blessed God for letting them see with their eyes his great salvation. At the fixed moment, when the fulness of time was come, there was a chosen vessel most graciously fitted and humbled for this miraculous conception. She was highly favoured, high in grace, meek, and lowly in heart; and of her, by the power of the Holy Ghost, was that holy child conceived; of her, the virgin mother, was he born; a babe, helpless as we are. Here is love! Oh what a miracle—God incarnate! And yet like us in all things—an infant. Be astonished, ye heavens! and adore, thou earth! this miracle of miracles!

He is born among us; grows up as we do: a child, a youth, a man—true and very man. But, oh the rapturous thought! he is Jehovah. Think, oh think what that blessed woman felt when she broke out into this sweet hymn: My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. There is my honour: not that he is my son, but that he is God, my Saviour. He took my nature, that I might take his: he lived for me, that by his obedience I might be made righteous: he suffered my punishment, that I might never suffer it: he bore my curse, to redeem me from the curse of the law: he was forsaken of God his Father, that I might never be forsaken: he died to give me life: he rose again, to take possession of life for me: he ascended in our nature, and is glorified in it. What he has, I shall have: his honours, his crown and dignity, his fulness of joy and bliss—all, all are mine. What he is, what he was, is for me: for he is God, my Saviour. Happy, thrice happy, Mary, virgin mother! Yea, happy, thrice happy too, Mrs. ——. Is not the new-born King your King? Is not the child Jesus your God? He is, he is; you cannot deny it. Oh, come then, my dear friend, let us praise his precious name, and let us magnify his love together. Soon, yet a very little while, and we shall be with him; we shall be like him. Oh, what a thought is that—like him! Yes, when we come where he is, the glory of that sun of righteousness will shine upon us, yea, will shine into us, and he will make us what he is. We shall then be happy partakers of all that was with delight in the breast of Jehovah from eternity; all will be fulfilled. The Father's richest love, the most exalted grace of the Spirit, will flow, through the infinitely blessed Immanuel, into all his glorified members. This is the accomplishment of the everlasting covenant. In this the eternal Three will take eternal delight. Jehovah will rest in his love. And through that God-man will the Godhead have full, perfect, and everlasting glory, honour, worship, blessing, and praise, from the full choir. You will sing aloud, in as high a key as any one of them all. Complain you may, and of yourself you ought; but then it will be all praise—all wonder—that you should be chosen, elect of God, partaker of his covenant-love: this distinguishing grace will make you a happy, willing debtor to Immanuel, for ever and ever.

Thus, looking backward or forward, I see all the purposes and works of God bearing respect to this wonderful person. He was set up from everlasting as the Alpha, and he will be to everlasting the Omega; for in all things he must have the pre-eminence. He has it above. Oh that we may ascribe more of it to him below: and you will, if you can pierce with the eagle eye of faith within the veil. There you will behold Immanuel enthroned, and all the host of heaven worshipping at his feet, admiring and adoring, because sharing in, his divine excellencies. The beauty of this sight makes an eternal heaven. Then, if your faith has any ears to hear, listen. Oh what melody do they make!—what notes do these golden harps strike!—what voices accompany them!—what a harmony! The words I understand: they are singing salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever. But their manner of singing is peculiar to the place. The air can form no such sounds: they can be only in the element of heaven. When your faith comes down from this high flight, and it is not capable of being long there, then look around you; and whatever object your eyes first fix upon, if they be spiritually exercised, you will see some ray of our Immanuel's glory. The book of nature is the outward record of his fame. Some of his great achievements are engraved in every part of the creation. The sun, moon, and stars, the earth, with all its productions, in full concert join the choir above, and in perfect unison sound forth the glory of our Immanuel. And suppose I direct your eye to an object which I know you do not like to look at—YOURSELF, even there I can find (Oh! that you may,) as great a proof of the Redeemer's glory as any where else upon earth: for, what are you? Are you not a poor, miserable, helpless sinner? His crown depends upon his saving such. What do you feel within you? Tell all your complaints. These just fit you to live upon the Saviour's fulness. Look at your outward estate: tell me that part of it which does not display the Saviour's glory. What does fortune say, and health, and friends? (I put myself in.) Let me be their mouth:—We are all the gifts of Jesus' rich love—love him for bestowing us upon you; and the more you have, love him more. And, mind, you cannot, you never will, love him too much. Try, put forth all your strength; he will still be above your affection, the best, the utmost of it. I wish you much of his company this Christmas: many a sweet visit from him. When you are very familiar, put a word in for me. Oh, how I long to be more intimate with him. But he is kind indeed; exceedingly kind. Dearest, dearest Jesus! May he never leave you without some token of his love!—Paper fails.—Farewell.

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXXV.

LAMBETH, Jan. 18, 1763.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I often remember you in the best place, and for the best purposes, but cannot bring myself to love writing of letters; yet I have again taken up my pen, to wish you every spiritual blessing purchased by the life and death of our incarnate God, and that will make you as happy as you can be on this side of heaven. In this new year, may you grow in the knowledge of the excellency of his most adorable person, of his complete finished salvation, and of your own particular interest in it; and, having these believing views, may you glorify him by living happily upon his fulness! I know a little of these matters, and but little; yet I am sitting, abashed at my ignorance, at my Master's feet. He has made me willing to hear his words; and I find his lips so full of grace, that I cannot spare a moment for my Homer or Virgil, my favourite Tully or Demosthenes. Adieu for ever to all the classics. I see a heavenly life, as well as a matchless beauty, in my Lord's words; and though I am a dull scholar, yet he is a blessed master. He keeps me waiting upon him day by day, trusting nothing to my own understanding, but listening continually to his instruction; so he gets all the glory of making me wise unto salvation. To this great prophet may you repair for instruction all this year! He teaches, as never man taught. His doctrine is with power and demonstration of the Spirit. He can so humble your pride, that you shall be as dependent upon him as a new-born babe; and then having emptied you of your own carnal reason and false wisdom, he will enlighten you, by his word and Spirit, with saving truth. Here the humblest scholar learns the most; indeed he has learnt the most; for our highest lesson is to learn how to live upon him, who was made of God unto us wisdom; and he who relies most upon him for that wisdom will certainly be the wisest. If the whole world was mine, and I could purchase what I would with it, I would give it all to be a scholar made poor in spirit at Christ's feet. And what then can I wish my dear friend better than to be one of his little children, whom he teaches his mind and will? Only I could wish you more humbled, that you may may more perfectly learn the two blessed truths which he is exalted to teach his people; namely, to believe in his blood and righteousness, and to live upon his grace and power.

His prophetical office is to teach us how to be always safe by believing in him, and always happy by living upon him. He has the residue of the Spirit with him, and he sends him into the believer's heart, to be always preaching this most comfortable doctrine, that whatever he wants for his acceptance at the bar of justice, it is perfectly to be had, and freely in the fulness of the Lord Christ. Sins as red as scarlet, sins as numerous as the stars, or as the sand upon the sea-shore innumerable, and nature as black as hell, a heart as wicked as the devil, the divine and eternally precious blood of Jesus can so cleanse and purify, that not one spot shall remain; for he is Almighty. He has all power in heaven and earth to pardon sin. If I had been guilty of all the sins of Adam and Eve, and of all their descendants to this day, yet believing in him I should be safe, because his blood cleanseth from all sin. And in Christ the believer has a better righteousness than that of the angels; theirs is finite, his is infinite:—a better righteousness than that of our first parents in paradise; theirs was the righteousness of a creature, and they lost it; this is the righteousness of God, and it is an everlasting righteousness, never to be lost. It is the righteousness in which the saints stand before God for ever and ever. When the Holy Spirit takes of these things of Christ, and preaches them to the heart, oh, what a sweet peace follows!—for the believer then finds himself saved from all the miseries of sin, and entitled to all the blessings of eternal glory; and, being thus persuaded of his safety by believing in the atoning blood of our great High Priest, then the Holy Spirit teaches him how to live upon Christ, and how to make use of Christ's fulness. On our learning this lesson depends our comfortable walk heaven-wards: for Christ does not give us a stock of grace, and expect us to improve it by being faithful to grace given. No, no; that is not his way. Our souls must depend upon him, as our bodies do upon the elements of this world. Every moment we must live by faith upon his fulness, and be every moment receiving out of it grace for grace. And this is our happiness—to have all in Christ. A beggar in myself, but rich with unsearchable, eternal riches in him. Ignorant still in myself, but led and taught by his unerring wisdom. A sinner still, but believing in his blood and righteousness. Weak and helpless still, but kept by his almighty love. Nothing but sorrow in myself, nothing but joy in him. Oh, this is a blessed life. No tongue can tell what a heaven it is, thus to live by faith upon the Son of God. Thanks be to him, I know a little of it; and I cannot but heartily pray that you may know more of it this year than you ever did. Surely I could not have thought, some years ago, that there was such an heaven upon earth as I now find. Blessings for ever on the Lamb! May you find it more and more! Sweet Jesus keep you, my dear friend! Yours,

W. Romaine

LETTER CCXXVI.

Lambeth, March 26, 1763.

Thanks to my dear friend for her kind letter this morning. The subject inquired after, is what I have been long exercised about, both in my own soul and in my ministry: and for the sake of weak believers, and to save myself great trouble in continually conversing with these persons, I resolved to write a little treatise upon the subject. I trust my time and strength, what I have and am, is now the Lord's. I wish he may use me as he pleases, for his own glory. My writings are to set forth his praise, and to exalt his salvation. The inclosed plan will show you what I propose: and, to make it more easy to be understood, I shall relate it by way of experience, giving an account of the "Life of Faith," as it was begun in one of my acquaintance, and carried on to this day, he being now a father in Christ; and I shall make remarks upon it as I go on. The subject is but little known. I pray you, my dear friend, forget not me, nor my book. Beg of the Lord Christ to bless it. If he smile upon it, it will be useful to his people. That is my highest wish. May it be profitable and useful to your soul!

I have many letters to write to-night, and yet I could not help acknowledging the receipt of yours. To a precious Jesus I commend you. To his love and to his power leave all your matters. What cannot, what will not he do for you, if you do but trust him? Are they not all happy in heaven? It is his happiness. They have it from him. Trust him, and he will not only bring you safe there, but also make you happy by the way. Oh, what a savour is there in his name! I did but just mention him, and I can scarce stop my pen, his love so warms my heart. Dear precious Jesus! thou art above all blessing and praise; fill my friend's heart with thy love, and make her rejoice in thy finished salvation. My kind respects to Miss ——: and pray tell her she cannot possibly think too highly of Christ, nor love him too much, nor live too much by faith upon him. His salvation is infinite and eternal: the love of him for his salvation is heaven upon earth; and living by faith upon him, for the present graces and the future glories of this salvation, is getting every moment fresh tokens of his love to us, and exciting fresh love to him. In short, I wish she may be married to Christ; and then, his person being hers, his honours, his estate, and all he has, will be hers also. Once more, to that dearest of all names, Jesus, I commend you; and am yours unfeignedly for his sake,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXVII.

LAMBETH, May 14, 1763.

BLESSED be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed you with so many blessings already, and who, having begun, will not cease to bless you in life and death, and for evermore! Your letter of May 2nd puts me in mind of his goodness, as I wish all things may. It rejoices my very heart to see him displaying the glories of his grace far and wide. From London through Europe, from Europe to America, yea, as far as the sun travels, his fame is spread. And does he not deserve it? Oh, my friend, what have we to tell of but the loving-kindness of Jesus; and what to praise, but his wonders in saving such as we are, and in saving so many of us? Blessings for ever on the Lamb! May we glorify him by resting upon him for righteousness and strength, and by living wholly upon him for grace and glory. Then all goes well, when

> On all besides his precious blood,
> On all besides the Son of God,
> We trample boldly, and disclaim
> All other saviours but the LAMB.

As to what you write about, I know not what to say. It is in the best hands. He knows what to do. Let him alone. Remember he is the Head of the church, and he will look after his own matters, and well too. At present I see not my way clearly from London. Here my Master fixes me, and here I must stay till he call me to some other place. When he would have me to move, he will let me know his will. Besides, what am I? What does it signify where I am? A poor dumb dog, the vilest, the basest, of all the servants of my Lord. If you could see what is passing for any one hour in my heart, you would not think any thing of me; you would only admire and extol the riches of Jesus' love. Wonderful it is that he should set his heart upon such a very incarnate devil, and humble me so as to make me willing to be saved by his sovereign grace; and that he should send such an one to preach his gospel, and bless it, too, to many, many souls (while every sermon covers me with shame and confusion.) Oh, this is wonderful, wonderful, eternally to be admired grace! What cannot he do, who can form a preacher out of such a dry rotten stick, fit for nothing but the fire of hell? Glory, glory be to him alone, and for ever, and for evermore. All the tongues in heaven and in earth, men and angels, throughout eternity, cannot praise him enough for what he has already done for my soul, and therefore I am, and I am content to be, a poor broken bankrupt debtor for ever. Hereby I shall be enabled for ever to exalt him, and to put the crown upon his head, and that is all I want. It will be heaven enough to join that blessed company, who are crying, "Worthy is the Lamb (but none else) to receive blessing and glory," &c. Nothing is mentioned among them but Jesus' goodness, and he does not leave himself without witness among us poor sinners. He has been doing miracles of mercy for Lady H——; and as she herself says, "In the midst of judgment he remembered mercy." You have heard, I suppose, of Lady S——'s illness. She had a violent fever for about seventeen days, and the physicians did not apprehend she was in any great danger, although she was near her end. On Thursday morning, about four o'clock, the Lord took her to himself. "Oh, what a stroke was that," say you, "to Lady H——!" No, indeed, it was all mercy, all love, like the rest of Jesus' gracious dealings with his people. During her illness, Lady H—— had every day many promises given her of God's kindness to her daughter; all which she interpreted in a carnal sense, like the Jews, and thought her daughter would recover, and do well again. By this means she was wonderfully supported, and her spirits were kept up to the last. And when the Lord let her see things were otherwise intended than she thought, then he had prepared for her a fresh fund of comfort. For such was Lady S——'s behaviour, and such her speeches, from the beginning of her illness, that there is no doubt but she died happy in the arms of Jesus. My dear friend, if I had time to tell you all the particulars of her death, your soul would abundantly rejoice, and all that is within you would bless the God of your salvation. To him she committed herself, trusted him, found him faithful, and declared, over and over again, that in him she was happy. Her last words to her mother, when she took her leave were these: Lady H—— had said, "My dearest child, how do you feel your heart? Are you happy?" —She answered, lifting up her head from the pillow, which she had not done for several days, "I am happy, exceedingly happy in Jesus"—then she kissed Lady H——, and presently went home. Although my lady bears this loss so well, yet she feels it. She is but a woman, and though a gracious one, yet grace does not destroy nature. She is a parent, and at present incapable of writing. I am yours in Jesus,

LETTER CCXXVIII.

My dear Madam.—I cannot resist the opportunity, though I can write but two or three lines, to thank you for your last letter, and for your kindness to me expressed in it. I thank God for the contents. What you say of yourself is to me very comfortable, because I see how the Spirit of God is leading you. He is taking you up into the highest form in the school of Christ, and is teaching you an experience which is not only next to glory, but is also glory begun. This being the hardest to learn, no wonder you should complain. I take notice of your account of your present state, of your trials, and of the exercises of your faith. A great part of your letter is upon these points, describing your self-abasement and loathing at the sight and sense of what you are in yourself, and wondering that such an one as you should be brought to know, to believe in, and to love our Jesus.

Now, my good friend, I must tell you, if you had written to me, and desired me to give you the character of a true Christian, I should have copied it from your letter. I could not have left one circumstance out. All that you mention of your being tried, afflicted in body and mind, brought low, and kept low; sometimes mourning at the strength of corruption, and at the weakness of your graces; at your love to earthly relations, and at your love to our Jesus—one so strong, the other so weak; your trials on these, and many other such like accounts, are such as no true disciple of Christ, in your circumstances, could be without. My answer should have been, "He is exactly what Mrs. —— says she is." For in reading the scripture I can find but these two things spoken of the office of the Holy Spirit: he first enables the sinner to receive Christ by faith; and then to live upon him, so received, for all things. If you examine these two rules carefully, you will see that all the teachings of the Holy Spirit may be reduced to them; and if you examine yourself by the light of the word, you will have no doubt but that you are among them to whom the promise was made: all thy children shall be taught of God. For, have you not renounced your righteousness as well as your sins? Have you no more dependence on your good works than on your bad works? Is not the holy nature of our Immanuel, his infinitely holy life, his everlastingly precious death—is not this complete work of his the only ground of your hope? "O yes," say you, "on this rock I lay my foundation; I build all on it for time and for eternity." Very well! then certain it is, the Holy Spirit has done his first work in you. He has enabled you to receive Christ; now he is carrying on his work, the second part of the same lesson, which is enabling you to live upon Christ received. This is very hard to learn; it is against nature; against our natural love for law and works, our legal lookings at self, our foolish hope, If I live longer I shall be better. Oh it is hard, I find it to this hour, like leaping overboard in a storm, to cast myself simply on Jesus for every thing; but it must be done. The Spirit abides with you for this purpose—"that he may take of the things of Christ, and show them to you, and so glorify him." When he is teaching this heavenly truth, we kick against it, we pervert it. When we go on the best, we think we are at the worst. But he abides, to conquer our opposition, to set right what we pervert, and to convince us all is and shall be well. May he thus bless a word spoken to the Saviour's glory!

My dear friend, you know it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell in our Jesus: it pleases the Spirit to witness of it, and to glorify it. How? in what way?—why, just as he is teaching you. He is bringing you to live out of yourself upon the fulness of Jesus. Mind how he does it. He shows you first that you want such a thing; then that you cannot get it any where but from Jesus, and then he leads you to think, that, trusting to his faithful word, you may experience how ready his heart, how able his hand, is to supply all your need. This is a beggar's life; here is nothing but alms. We do not like it. We want some stock; if we could get it, we should like an independent fortune. But it cannot be. The Spirit of Jesus will witness of nothing, and glorify nothing but the Saviour's all-sufficient grace; and therefore he sets himself against all our greatness and goodness—that he who glorieth may glory only in the Lord Christ. And when he is bringing us to this true glorifying of the Lord, we mistake, we pervert his lessons; I know I do, and I think you do. We both fail in our our experience, as your letter clearly proves to me.

If you ask me, how you may become a better scholar? as I have been taught, I would gladly inform you.

Read and pray for more self-knowledge: God's word and Spirit will teach you nothing about yourself, but what will humble you to the dust, and keep you there. Read and pray for more knowledge of Jesus, of his person God-man—his salvation-work infinitely and everlastingly perfect: he is yours, now he is received, and all he has, and all he is, as Jesus, yours in title, and, so far as you believe, yours now in possession.

Read and pray for more faith, that what you have a title to, you may take possession of, and so make constant use of it. Your estate is great, immensely great. Use it and live up to it: as you do in temporals, so do in spirituals. Your money, your land, your air, your light, your meat and drink, and house and clothing, these you use: but you have not them in you; only, being yours, they are used by you. So do by Christ. When the Spirit would glorify Jesus, he humbles you. When he would glorify his fulness, he makes you feel your emptiness. When he would bring you to rely on his strength, he convinces you of your weakness. When he would magnify the comforts of Jesus, he makes you sensible of your misery. When he would fix your heart on his heaven, he makes you feel you deserved hell. When he would exalt his righteousness, you find you are a poor miserable sinner. Can you, my friend, practise this? let nothing keep you from Jesus. Whatever you need, whatever you feel wrong, may it bring you to the Saviour's fulness! Oh that all things may help forward your acquaintance with him! I except nothing, neither sin nor sorrow; I would carry all to him, as one great lump of sin, and receive all good from him, as the only storehouse of good for wretched sinners. In this communion I desire to grow; for this I desire to live. Oh that you and I may learn it more, and get every day nearer fellowship with our sweet Jesus—growing up into him in all things.

See how my pen runs on as fast I can write. My very heart and soul are enamoured with him! I love his name; I adore his person: he is my heaven. Oh what treasures are there in our Jesus! May his glorious Spirit witness for him to your heart. Believe me your very sincere friend, a well-wisher in that matchless lover of sinners, and of the chief of them,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXXIX.

BRIGHTHELMSTONE, Sept. 1, 1763.

I HAVE at last got a spare hour to write to my dear friends at ———, and to tell them how much I wish all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus may be theirs.

Since I left you, all has been hurry, travelling from place to place, till kind providence has brought me to Brighthelmstone, where I hope for a little rest—not so much to my soul; blessed be the grace of sweet Jesus, I have that—but rest from distraction, hurry, dust, heat, and want of sleep. This is a kind of haven after a storm. Not that I expect a continual calm here: it would be a sad place indeed if there were no enemies, no warfare, no trials and troubles in it. These I must have wherever I go; because they grow in my constitution, and are nourished in the body of sin; and because without them I should not know how to prize Christ. But I find my retired and private times are the best for my own soul, as more public times are for others: and yet that sweetest blessed Jesus, when I am in his work, takes care of me; and when I am watering others, he does not leave me unwatered myself. I am a witness for him. I have been preaching of his salvation many years in the midst of a crowd, living all the time in a great hurry; and yet I gain every year some fresh knowledge of myself, some more knowledge of my incarnate God, and some steadier trust and dependence upon him; and I can say it is good for me that I have been a poor despised preacher of Christ Jesus.

Now, what can I wish my dear friend more for her peace and blessedness, than that the dear Saviour may do for her what he has done for me, only in a greater degree? For I am sure it is a growing thing. In the knowledge of ourselves we may certainly increase. There is a mystery of iniquity in us, which we shall not perfectly comprehend so long as we live. But as we make fresh discoveries of it, we shall see our want more of Christ, and thereby get more knowledge of the great mystery of godliness. The sense of our manifold wants, will magnify the riches of his grace in supplying them. So, the lower man is abased, the higher is the Saviour exalted. And this will of course bring us to make more use of him, to trust him more, and to live more upon him, which is the blessedness of faith. When I feel the depth of my distress and wants, and the infinite riches of Jesus' grace to supply them, then faith does its office aright, when it is not discouraged by a sense of many increasing wants, but is thereby made to cleave closer to Jesus, and to prize him more. This is my present state; and in it I have at times a pleasure which cannot be described. The height of Jesus' grace is so exactly suited to the depth of my distress, that I am ready to glory in it. I would not be without one single want. My wants are my happiness. They make Christ so exceedingly desirable, that fresh wants add to him in my eyes fresh beauty. It is a pleasure to be in his debt—yea, the greatest I know of. I would not have inherent righteousness, if I could get it for nothing. I would not be rich, and increase in goods, and have need of nothing from him, if it was possible. His glory is my heart's delight; and therefore I love to glorify him, by living upon his fulness. I nothing—he all in all. When it is thus with me, I am safe and happy. I am the greatest fool that ever lived—I feel it! and that makes his wisdom so precious. I am the chief of sinners—I find it daily; and that makes his blood and righteousness my continual delight. I have as many evil tempers as the devil: Oh, how they stir, and fight against the Spirit! But Jesus is my sanctification. He has given them their death's wound! and by and by they will expire and be no more. In myself I deserve hell every moment; but Jesus is my redemption, my eternal redemption. Oh, how my heart loves him! He knows it well. And if I am ever vouchsafed (why should I doubt it?) to see him face to face, I will acknowledge him to be all in all, and rejoice to acknowledge it for ever. And it will be the very heaven of heavens (truly I taste something of heaven in thinking of it) to give him the glory of my crown, and to lay it low at his feet.—Worthy is the Lamb. Thanks be to him, I can sing this song now, but in a poor strain to what I hope to do soon. Sweet Jesus bring you and me safe to the eternal enjoyment of him and his glory.

I am sorry to stop, to tell you of two parcels I left at ———, one for you, and another for Mr. ——, I hope they are come safe to hand. Inclosed in yours was a Field's Bible, the best present I could think of for your kindness to me, and another little pocket Bible for dear ——. One favour would I beg, if you would grant it me; and that is, for you both to read the Bible over once in these little keepsakes. I have many reasons for asking this favour; but one is peculiar to myself, namely, that it will often put you in mind of your faithful friend in the bond of the Spirit,

LETTER CCXXX.

THE presence of dear Jesus be with my dear friend—that presence which turns darkness into light, sin into righteousness, misery into heaven. What can you want, if he be with you? He has such a miraculous virtue, that he can turn your weakness into strength, your mourning into joy, your death into life; so that there is not in you any evil effect of sin, but his almighty grace can make it work under him for his glory and for your good. Oh! may this presence be with you as long as you are in this state of weakness, and mourning, and death. Sweet Jesus keep you; nay, I know he will. His tender, loving heart, loves to the end. Oh, my friend, what a Saviour is he! Oh, how I love him! He knows I do; and yet I am ashamed to think how far below his deserts. By and by I shall do better, when you and I meet before his throne; then, then——But I stop.

"Would —— be worthy my acceptance?" The worth of it does not come before me, but what my Master expects of me. His will must be my rule; and it has been a long time as plain to me as that two and two make four. I am stationed by myself. I am alone in London: and while he keeps me there, I dare not move; as, when he has a mind to remove me, my way will be as plain from London as it is now to abide in it. If I hearkened to self, and wanted to run away from the cross, I know of no place so snug as ——; but would you have me such a coward as to fly, and such an one to stand by me—one who has kept me in many battles, and one who, I trust, will presently make me more than conqueror.

I have not time to answer your letter in other points. Only be assured of my prayers (such as they are) for your reading the Bible. Remember again, Christ is the sum and substance of it all. May his Spirit breathe upon it as you read, and lead you beyond the letter to the life-giving sense.

I have great faith about ——. You will be taken care of. Do not doubt it. The government is on Christ's shoulders, and he does all things well. Leave it to him. But he does use means; therefore pray write as soon as you have fixed on a proper person. My kind love to dear Mr. ——. I wish him as happy as my master can make him, and then he will be one of the happiest men in this world. Our friends with you have my hearty good wishes for their better acquaintance with the precious Lord Jesus, and more faith to get more out of his fulness. To him I commend you all, and your present case at ——; and am, with my wife's respects, for his sake, your faithful friend and servant,

LETTER CCXXXI.

LAMBETH, April 17, 1764

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have just now received your letter, and thank you for the kindness you express in it to me. I am pretty well in health, and loaded with benefits—nothing but mercy, rich mercy every day. All the dealings of my most precious Jesus with my soul are grace and love. He not only promises, and by faith makes me rely upon him for heaven, but now, even now, I am as it were in heaven; for I live upon his heavenly blessings. Vile and base as I am, yet he lets me approach him, and converse with him freely. He vouchsafes to admit me into fellowship with him, and he opens his treasures, and says, "All these are thine; I bought them for thee with the price of my blood, but I give them to thee as a free gift. Take this for the earnest—accept this for the pledge of all the rest; and all mine are thine." Yes, Lord, I believe it: on thy word do I trust, and I rely upon thy faithfulness to make it good to me. I desire to glorify thee amidst all my wants, and sins, and miseries, by living out of myself upon thine infinite fulness. Empty me still more, blessed Lord! be daily emptying me more, that I may be capable of holding more of thy good things. What do you think of this? is it not heaven begun? What is heaven, but the perfection of this life of grace? Believers now live with Christ; they now live upon Christ. Christ is their all; for the life which they now live in the flesh, they live by the faith of the Son of God: and what a blessed life this is I have in some small degree experienced; and what the Lord has taught me I have endeavoured to set forth, and make public, for his glory, and the comfort of weak believers. The little book is finished. May my ever dear Jesus shine upon every page as you read it, and strengthen your faith, and warm your heart with his heavenly love. I beg your prayers for a blessing on this book: I beseech you do not forget it, for your own sakes and mine, and all the household of faith. To Jesus' love I commend you and Mr. ——; and am, by many ties, your servant in the gospel,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXXII.

July 3, 1764.

I have my dear friend's letter of the 19th of June by me, and thank you for it. You may be sure I am glad to hear the little book agrees with what God has taught you: not glad for the author's sake, but for Christ's sake, and for yours —for Christ's sake, because I live, and preach, and write, to exalt that royal Saviour: oh! how my heart longs to see him crowned in your soul, when you will go forth as the command is, and see king Solomon with the crown of grace and glory on his head, wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart; then all within you will gladly bow to his sceptre. And for your sake, because he has begun to be crowned, since you say you have experienced some of the things in this little book. I wish I may help you, God helping me, to experience more of the glorious majesty of our King of kings, when I come down and preach at —— upon that text; and when I am setting forth that sovereign Prince and Saviour, may his Spirit then crown him in your conscience, and enthrone him in your heart. But I cannot come the day you mention, because it is my last Sunday at St. Dunstan's; and the week after, I go down to Brighthelmstone, and shall be there for a fortnight, and then set out for your place.

Till that time come, I will be wishing you what I am always desiring for myself, a stronger sense and clearer feeling of my wants, and more faith to live upon Jesus for the supply of them. When you have nothing in yourself to be pleased with, all wretchedness and helplessness, then should Jesus be most precious—he being the Almighty Saviour of such a wretched helpless creature. A man that has a plentiful table thinks it a happiness that he sits down hungry and thirsty—so should you, when every thing within you is saying—"Here you can do nothing, there you can do nothing, without Christ." Then faith should say, It is true, I cannot; but he has in him that very thing which I want, and he has promised to give it me, and on him I depend for it. Such a dependence is heaven upon earth. I find it so: nor would I have it otherwise. What would become of me, if I was rich and increased with goods, and found no need of any thing? Why, then I should not feel my want of Christ; I could not live upon him, and so should become comfortless. My dear friend, believe me, I have been trying all ways to happiness, but all have failed me, till this one—and here I am settled. I want nothing but Christ. People tell me, I must submit to this ordinance, and be joined to such a church, and come under church discipline, and must be dipped, &c. &c. I have Christ—I want no more. This is making Christ of him. And this saves us from ten thousand thousand snares and troubles in life. I assure you, it has brought me such peace, as I scarce thought it possible to have in this world. Excuse me, then, when I wish you poorer and poorer every day, that you may be richer in Christ. I shall not cease to remember you as above, till your hear farther from yours in that most sweet and lovely Christ, the fairest, yea, the very beauty itself, of all the fair. Oh! how I love him, and he loves a poor wretch.

LETTER CCXXXIII.

HARTLEPOOL, Aug. 7, 1764.

I RECEIVED my dear friend's letter, and think she overlooks our ever adorable Jesus, in setting any value upon a poor dirty worm. If his grace raise it from a dunghill, and set it upon a throne with his princes, who shall have the glory,—the worm, or Jesus? Shall any of his due praise be given to it? God forbid! There ought to be an holy jealousy in you and me, that we rob not our God of his glory. If we do rob him of ever so little, he will wither all our comforts and graces; but if we give him all the glory, which we cannot do unless he be all and we be nothing, then every thing will go well with us. We get exalted as we are humbled. The lowest is the highest; which makes me fear to look at any good in myself, unless the kind hand which gave it me be seen at the same time; and afraid to hear of any thing good in myself, unless I am sure my Master has all the praise. The plan upon which I act herein, is this: (long experience and many humblings have brought me to it.) I have grieved to see how much of my time ran to waste, partly for want of knowing what to do, and partly through perplexity about what was done, lest it was not done aright; and therefore I was led to endeavour to bring the business of every day into a little compass, that, at one view, I might satisfy myself whether I had answered the end of living, another day.

There is no doubt left about my belonging to Christ; so that this matter is not to be brought into court again. It has been tried and determined, and is now a settled point. What have I then to do? What is the work of every day? Why, it is to be living still in a constant dependence upon the Lord Christ, and to be growing every day in the knowledge and experience of that dependence.

The dependence is thus expressed, "The just shall live by his faith:" being justified, or made just, he shall not live by any works, by any stock of grace, by being faithful to any talents received, but he shall live upon the Lord Jesus Christ by faith, receiving from him continually grace for grace.

The believer's growth in this his dependence is thus spoken of; "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge and love of God our Saviour." Grace is the free love of God to poor sinners in the whole plan of salvation—from first to last, all is of grace; and in the knowledge and experience of this there is a growth. The believer learns more clearly that all is of grace, and that he has no hand in saving himself, but an empty receiving hand. Grace comes to pull him down, and to set Christ up. When the heart is established with grace, the creature is stripped quite bare, without a rag to put on, or money to buy any, or wisdom to know where to get it. Grace pulls down all high things, levels all distinctions, and leaves the poor creature nothing at all to trust in, or to boast of, but to live upon Christ's alms: so that the sense of our lost, guilty, helpless state, is the only thing which can make us willing to receive a whole Christ, and the abiding sense of this will keep us willing to live upon a whole Christ. And while a believer lives thus, how can he grow in grace, if he be not discovering every day more of the depth of iniquity which is in him? Grace cannot be magnified, unless nature be humbled. Jesus Christ cannot become more precious, unless self becomes more vile. As the believer sinks in his own eyes, Christ rises in his esteem. And this, in my opinion, is growing in grace. Growing in the sense of our weakness, magnifies Christ's strength—our sinfulness his righteousness—our folly his wisdom—our misery his happiness—our outward sorrowful state, his inward peace and joy. Thus the growth in the knowledge of Christ is closely connected with the knowledge of self. And that makes me afraid of any thing which tends to weaken this view of things; because it would weaken my dependence upon Christ. I should not see nor feel my want of him so much, which would stop the working of faith, and thereby eclipse the glory of Jesus. You see my jealousy. And indeed I have great reason for it. After all my experience, which you have read in the "Life of Faith," I have a revolting heart. Still I would turn from and live without Christ, if I could. Pride puts me upon it. Oh, it is the very devil, that pride; it attacks not the heel, but the heart of Christ, and wants to rob him of his crown. And I have so smarted for it, that the most distant approach is terrible to me. Think what you will of me, but never mention me without mentioning the grace of my dearest Lord, who has made me all that I ever shall be, but sin and misery.

My sweet Jesus hath contrived so much work for me in these parts, and he is so evidently and powerfully with us, that I cannot leave my neighbours, who crowd to hear, far more than ever, and they are to me as my own soul. We are beyond all description happy in our loving, lovely Lord. Such meetings I never knew—and twice a day—and many churches open. Oh! that I could but stay—I am so knit in heart to my neighbours, and the most of them come and sit quietly to hear, that I know not how to leave them. But it must be. Adieu, my friend; remember yours in our precious Immanuel,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXXIV.

Dec. 29, 1764.

All the blessings of this good season be with my dear friend. That man, for whom Christ was born, is the greatest, richest prince upon earth—his revenues, his honours, his mighty allies, his everlasting kingdom, are beyond all conception. Compared to what he is and has, crowns and empires are but playthings for little children. And he comes to all his dignity by Jehovah's taking flesh, through which wonderful event he can be made one spirit with him: he took our flesh that we might take his spirit—he was born on earth, that we might have a new birth from heaven—he took our sins, that we might take his righteousness—and our miseries, that we might be heirs with him of his happiness. Oh, what an astonishing transaction is this! How full of the richest grace, flowing over with everlasting love! This great and blessed event lay in the breast of Jehovah in eternity. He ever had it in his heart; it was his beloved plan and purpose that he would take flesh, and display all the glories of his Godhead in the person of Jesus Christ. This was his gracious will and everlasting counsel, to which all his works have tended, and for the executing of which in its full perfection all things are now working together. When the fulness of time was come, oh, what joy was there in heaven among the angels, who kept their first estate! They thought it a very high honour to be the messengers of it, even to poor shepherds, with whom they could rejoice, that their God and our God was become incarnate.—"Behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy,"—glad tidings, indeed; for they include all the good which infinite mercy has to give, and the sinner can receive. Hereby light comes to them who are sitting in darkness, and life to them who are in the shadow of death, pardon to the guilty, comfort to the mourning, liberty to the captives, strength to the helpless, and heaven to the miserable. How blessed a change do they experience, when by faith they know and can say, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given!" For this is the saving truth, Jesus is the Christ, the man is Jehovah, God and man in one Christ, the child born is the mighty God, and the Son given is the everlasting Father—the Virgin's Son is Immanuel, God with us, and her infant babe is her eternal Saviour. Except she had believed this, she could not have been saved, nor can we; and yet it is a truth so far out of the reach of man's understanding, that he never could have thought of it, unless it had been revealed; nor can he now comprehend it, unless he be taught it of God, for no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, is Jehovah, but by the Holy Ghost. Here, then, my dear friend, is matter of thankfulness to you and me, that we are taught this of God. Happy Christmas to us, since we have lived to hear and understand the great mystery of godliness—God manifest in the flesh. Happier still, that we believe it; for whomsoever the Holy Ghost enlightens with the knowledge of this saving truth, he also gives faith to receive it, to trust in Christ as God, to depend upon him as the Almighty Saviour, to rely upon his finished work, and to lay no other foundation for any grace or glory, but the life and death of this ever blessed God-man. This is the way in which the Holy Ghost glorifies Jesus, he gives the believer such views of the infinite fulness and everlasting sufficiency of Immanuel, that he is quite satisfied with him. His conscience is brought into sweet peace through the sprinkling of the blood of the Lamb of God; and when guilt would arise, and unbelieving fears disturb, he is enabled through faith in Jesus to maintain his peace: because whatever rendered him hateful to God, he sees it removed by his adorable surety; and whatever God could love him for, he finds himself interested in it through the infinitely precious obedience of the Lord our righteousness. Thus he enters into the promised rest; thus he maintains himself in it. He can desire nothing, but the Saviour has it; and when he asks, he receives it from him: so that the Saviour more than fills up all his wants—for he satisfies all his wishes: he says, by sweet experience—"This is all my salvation, and all my desire."

And what greatly adds still to this happiness is, that it is ever, ever growing—may you and I find it so! As the believer is made to see his absolute safety in Jesus, so does he partake more of his graces and blessings. In hearing and reading the descriptions of the Lord Christ in his divine person, and in his most gracious offices, the Holy Spirit sets in with those descriptions, and presents the inestimably glorious Saviour before the eye of faith with the most attracting loveliness. All the sweets, and beauties, and joys scattered throughout the universe are only little drops out of the ocean of Jesus' fulness. There is not any object made to gratify any sense, but the Holy Spirit shows the believer that very thing in its highest perfection in the infinitely rich Saviour, and gives him a delightful earnest, and by faith a foretaste of it. By which means his whole heart and soul grow entirely in love with that beauty of all beauties, and he says, and it is heaven to feel it, "This is my beloved, and this is my friend."

I have more, far more to say, but —— is waiting. Pray, my dear friend, leave for ever out of your mind and writing "if I knew—if I believe." Oh, why do you doubt? The good Lord keep you and yours. I am, in bonds which cannot be broken, yours in Jesus,

W. ROMAINE

LETTER CCXXXV.

Feb. 14, 1765.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I shall be filling up this paper with—First, Thanking my dear master for his great kindness to you. From my heart I praise him—may you and yours give him the whole glory of his temporal and spiritual blessings.

Secondly, I pray him to continue his kindness to you—a thankful temper always has fresh matter for thankfulness. To praise him for the past, is the sure way to secure future mercies. Prayer and praise live and die together.

Thirdly, I tell you of his goodness to me. I am nothing but a miracle of his goodness—the most astonishing that ever was! All, all, from my first breath to this I am now drawing, is mere mercy and grace, and so it will be for ever and for ever. My ministry is wonderful, that such a dumb dog should speak—such a very devil in flesh should feel what he says of that eternally precious Jesus, and be the means of making others feel it, and should have no doubt of feeling it blessedly to eternity. Oh, what delightful views do these things give me of my sweetest Lord and dearest Jesus! He seems willing I should preach more, and have a church in the city: but he will not let it come too easily, lest we should have whereof to glory. We are at law about it, and are like to be a great while, but in the mean time he is doing all things well. The very moment all things are ready, the church will be opened: and if it never is, he does not want me there, with which I am satisfied.

Fourthly, Does all this teach you and me to trust this dear Lamb of God? It should teach us; I hope it does. How safely may we trust his faithfulness; how happily rest upon his almighty love. All things for the good of soul and body are promised to him that believeth. Oh, that the Lord may increase your faith and mine! In an hour of need may you find him very, very near to your heart, and filling you with joy and peace in believing.

To Jesus I commend you and yours most heartily, being tied to you in him by the bonds of his everlasting love. Jesus bless you. Amen.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXXVI.

May 25, 1765.

My dear Friend.—Having an opportunity of sending a note by dear Mr. ——, I could not withhold my pen. What thanks ought we to give to our gracious Lord for his mercies to you? What ought you yourself to give? Can you look back upon any part of your life, especially the last part of it, and is there any thing upon which you cannot write, "this is mercy?" Oh, it is all, from first to last, to them who are chosen, and called, and believe, and live by faith of the Son of God, mercy—from everlasting to everlasting! A mercy before time, a mercy in time, a mercy beyond time! Where is the fountain-head, the spring of this mercy? In the covenant of the eternal Three. What gives rise to it? Nothing but the mere grace and free love of the divine persons. A motive cannot rise but in the purpose and breast of God himself. But on whom do the streams of this fountain flow with their quickening, comforting, sanctifying, glorifying streams? On the miserable, and none else; for none else are the objects of mercy. On such as you and me. Mercy has made a rich provision to supply all our wants, to pardon all our sins, to save us from all misery, to entitle us to all glory. And what? is mercy chiefly glorious in reserving all its blessings to another world? the greatest it does, but not all. All are now enjoyed in reversion by faith; and all things are working together in Jesus' hands to bring about the full and final enjoyment—that the mercy which is above all the works of God may have for ever and ever all the glory.

So far I wrote on Saturday night, on Mr. —— sending me word he should go on Monday.

Sunday Morning.

What a mercy does this day call to our remembrance! The Saviour, risen and ascending, sends down the divine and faithful witness for himself—"He shall testify of me"—bear witness to my person, to my work, that they are both divine—my person, Jehovah self-existent—my work as perfect as Jehovah could make it. He shall testify of my grace, how free it is, how full it is, and shall enable the sinner, any poor wretch, however vile in his own eyes, to trust his soul in the hands of Jesus. And having enabled the sinner to do this, then he will testify of Jesus, that he has received him, that he is safe in the arms, and may be happy in the enjoyment of Jesus' love. Thus he will make the soul enamoured with Jesus; there will appear such consummate beauty, such infinite loveliness in his precious person, as will eclipse the glory of all other lovers. There will appear such true happiness in fellowship with him, as will quite dethrone the former idols. And when the foolish heart would depart, he will not let it. Then will he testify of Jesus, "To whom wouldst thou go? Who has eternal life to give, but him? Turn, turn again to thy rest, oh, my soul."

If the soul is mourning? He will testify of the joy that is in Jesus. If the soul be burdened? Cast the burden, says he, on thy Lord. If the soul has lost any creature-comfort? Let it go, says he: Jesus is still thy salvation, and thy great reward. If the soul be grieved with indwelling sin? It is pardoned, says he; and the Spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus, hath made thee free from the law of sin and of death.

Whatever the wants of the believer are, the Spirit's office is to testify of Jesus, there is the thing you want, and to glorify Jesus—there you have it freely.

My friend, what mercy is this! The Spirit Jehovah abides with you, to testify of Jesus, and his perfect salvation; and to glorify Jesus, by enabling you to live safe and blessed upon him, making him not only all, but also all in all. And when he has taught you thus to glorify Jesus, he will keep you (oh, that is sweet!) by his almighty power, till he bring you to the heaven of heavens—the sight and enjoyment of dear Jesus, eternally dear and lovely Jesus.

Is it indeed so? Why, then commit yourself to this glorious Immanuel. Wait for the Spirit's teaching you all his ways, and showing you all are well. Remember, he has lent you your chief earthly comfort, only just so long as he pleases. When he takes it, hush, not a sigh: "Be still and know that I am God, a sovereign"—This commands resignation: but the Lamb's voice is all love. I take it away, that you may love me more, and be happier in my love. Let it be so, my dear Lord; be thou but present, all is well. The Lord bless you and yours,

LAMBETH, July 13, 1765

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I could not answer your kind letter till this day; my cause has been to be heard from day to day, before my lord chancellor, but put off, and, yesterday, was put off to the next term: so that I have, through the good will of my God, an opportunity of seeing you once more, and to talk together by the way of our ever lovely, infinitely precious Jesus, who has so won my heart, that I have no relish (like one in love) to talk of any thing but my Beloved. Tuesday morning I purpose to set out, and hope to be at —— about noon, Wednesday next, where I shall be glad to meet (at the old house) some of my dear fellow-travellers from ——. Oh, that our meeting may be to Jesus' glory. I am, in the best of bonds, of Jesus' own tying, yours,

LETTER CCXXXVIII.

LAMBETH, Aug. 20, 1765.

MY DEAR FRIEND, in our common Lord—of whose mercies I am an amazing monument—what can I say to you of me and mine, but write upon all—grace—grace. I will give you an account of my life some weeks past, and you will see the goodness of my kind Jesus in all his dealings with me. When I was at Hartlepool, I heard from London that Dr. Griffith thought my wife was sick unto death, and he had no hopes of her recovery. This alarmed me; and I set out immediately, and stopped not till I got to London, where I found things as bad as I had been made to believe: but Dr. Griffith gave her something, to which the Lord gave his blessing; and it abated the fury of her distemper, God having mercy on her, and on me also. Lady H—— pressing me still to come down to——, my wife gave leave for me to go, and I went down to Derby Saturday se'nnight. We had there a most refreshing time—Fifteen pulpits were open—Showers of grace came down—Sinners in great numbers awakened, and believers comforted. Mrs. —— was taken ill, and was ordered to Bath, which broke up the family. They went away two days after I got down: but I staid to preach all the week, and especially on Sunday last at Derby, where I was much opposed by the mayor and the churchwardens, and the Arian party; but the Lord stood by me, and I was in the morning at the great church, and the afternoon at St. Werburgh's. In the evening I got into the fly alone (in good company); and upon coming home last night, I found my wife had relapsed, and was again in danger; but again the great physician had interposed, and we are in hopes all will be well again soon. Mercy, mercy is above all his works.

In these proceedings of Divine Providence, I admire several things; such as—

First, how odd it appears, that friends so dear and beloved as you at——should be passed by. When I went through ——, it was night: and thinks I, who would have thought I should have gone by Lady M——'s door without calling? It is the Lord's doing. As to you, I only sent my prayers for you, of which I hope you had the benefit.

Secondly, Here is a plain lesson for you—Did you not expect me? Did not you build upon my coming? You were disappointed. Why? That you might cease from man. Oh! it is good to be weaned from creature props and dependencies. Whatever does this, is a great blessing. If therefore, my not coming has made you come nearer to Christ, I would therein rejoice; yea, and therein I do rejoice. What of me? Down with me, and up with Christ. But,

Thirdly, I can assure you my heart was divided. I wanted to be at home and I wanted to stay. Duty and affection called me one way; in spirit I was and am with you, and hope ever so to be. I am, with great respect, your obliged friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXXXIX.

Nov 1, 1765.

My dear Friend.—Your letter of Sept. 9th would not have lain so long without an answer, but it was at my house at Lambeth, to which I expected daily to go from Brighthelmstone to Bath. But Lady H—— having excused my attendance at the dedication of her new chapel, I therefore sent to town for my letters, and, among the rest, found yours: for which what shall I say? What am I, the very vilest of the vile, that any of the Lord's people should look on me? But to think of his looking on me, whose eyes are a flame of fire, and yet to look with love; Oh what an humbling thought is that! I declare, the more I daily learn of myself, I grow more amazed how Jesus should love such an one. But he is all grace, or rather grace is Jesus—not something distinct from him, but he himself—his name, because it is his nature. Unto him be the praise of your kindness to one who has not a single thing to recommend him to your regard but what Jesus' free grace has most marvellously bestowed upon him. Let him have the glory; for he richly deserves it all. Whatever good I receive in this world, spiritual or temporal, I am indebted for it to his mere bounty—I crown him for it, take it off my head, and put it upon his. This is heaven below; for they are doing the same in heaven above. As we throw the crown of grace at his feet, so do they the crown of glory. Thus through him I thank you for your letter, and for all your favours.

As to what you write about my not calling on you in my journey, your disappointment was not, could not, be greater than mine. I learned from it a good lesson. It is very profitable to take notice of what providences say: they have a tongue, and speak loudly; and the spiritual ear hears, and receives instruction. You see what man is, and what dependence is to be laid upon him. As I was going along the road, I heard a voice saying, Cease ye from man, from yourself, from others; put no confidence in them, in your own good, in their good, or in any good to be received from them. The command is, Put not your trust in princes, nor in any child of man, be he wise, or great, or esteemed good. Nay, look not at them, but with a single eye look unto Jesus. In him you will see every thing to put your confidence in—Grace, matchless grace in his heart and lips, beauty beyond compare, riches unsearchable, honour infinite, righteousness everlasting, holiness holy making, and that for ever. And all these he has to give, freely to give, to the unworthy. Look at him, believing, and he is yours, and all he has and is. The sight will change you into his image. As the sun shining puts his glory upon every object, so does Jesus. Oh cease then from man—look not at blind man, dark and benighted—look not at this heavy thick earth, nor at any of its glittering toys: they shine only as shined upon. Cease from them all, and look to Jesus. The good Spirit direct and fix your eyes and mine upon him, till we see heaven in his face.

The same voice still pursuing me I perceived that I was not only to cease from looking to man and all human things, but also to cease from depending on them. I was not to live upon them. I could, as it were, hear a voice, Live not upon us, but live upon the Prince of Life. He is a never-failing fountain of life. He speaks, and the dead live. His voice makes and keeps alive. We live by him, and live on him, and in him. All other persons and things but him concern only the perishing, dying life of the body; but the life which he gives is his own spiritual, divine, eternal life. I cannot wish you a greater blessing than to hear with power, and to find what I did in my journey—Cease ye from living upon man, and live upon me. So we do, Lord Christ; the life which we now live in the flesh, we live by the faith of the Son of God.

From hence I was led to see the necessity of ceasing to hope for happiness from all these things about us. They have it not to give. It grows not out of that earth which layeth in wickedness, nor can it be increased by any good under the sun; because it is one of the perfect gifts which cometh down from the Father of Lights. And when it is given by his grace, and received by faith, then this true philosophers' stone turns all things into gold. Faith living upon Jesus can turn those things into happiness, which, in their own nature, could produce nothing but misery. Wonderful transmutation! it changes darkness into light, death into life, weakness into strength, sin into righteousness, mourning into joy, hell into heaven. By this faith we have Christ in us, the hope of glory, Christ dwelling in the heart; and where he is, there all he has is. All things are ours, salvation from all evil, a title to the love of God, and to the glory of God, and a fitness also and meetness for the eternal enjoyment of God in his love and glory. Cease ye from man, then, and all is yours. Oh may you and I learn to cease from all schemes of happiness in any object but in Jesus. The more we live to him, the more dead he will make us to every thing else. He will let you love your relations, nay, he commands you to love them; but then you must take them from him as his bounty, and use them as his gifts, dependent on his sovereign will, free to give, free to take away, when and what he pleases. When your will can be made thus really resigned to his will, then he will make you happy, and you will feel something of their blessed oneness with him, who have no will but his, and therefore follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. I mark what you say upon that point. A resigned will is, not where there is no rising of the flesh against God's will, but where there is victory over the will of the flesh. Pray take notice of this; and try whether you have not this evidence of your adoption, that you desire the Father's will, and not yours, may be done.

I am labouring at Brighthelmstone among a sweet people, with whom I am exceedingly happy. The work of dear Jesus prospers among us. His person grows more beloved, his work more precious, fellowship with him more close and intimate, and therefore more happy. Our hearts, warmed with his love, are warm with brotherly love; stirring up one another to press forward for the prize of our high calling, that is, to win Christ, and be found in him at the hour of death, and at the day of judgment. May the same Lord Christ grow dearer to you and yours every day.

I am always bound to pray for your welfare, being by many ties yours,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXL.

ALL spiritual blessings be on my dear friend! whatever the tender heart, or the almighty arm of the loving Jesus has to bestow, may it be all yours! You made me promise to inform you of my motions, which I now fulfill.

God willing, I shall be next Sunday at Mr. C.'s; on Monday morning in Y——; from thence I shall make the best of my way to T——, and if I hear nothing of you there, I shall proceed to A——. My time is short, so that I can but just stay to take my leave of my friends. What a life is this! hurry, hurry, hurry, from place to place, from this object to that;—weary with seeking, but never finding rest.—Happy Christian who is fixed to a point!—Go where he will ONE object is his ALL. The crucified Saviour is his happiness; his perfect, everlasting happiness; and this heaven he carries about with him. No time, no place, no circumstances, make any change. He has one Lord, one faith, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Come pain, sickness, poverty, death, the Saviour's love and power bear him up. Come temptations of all kinds, I will be with thee in the hour of temptation, says the Lord God. Where he is, nothing need be feared, because nothing can hurt. Oh, my friend, the true knowledge of Jesus Christ is an infallible cure for all the miseries which come into the world by sin. There is no evil of mind or body, temporal or eternal, but our precious dear Lord is by office engaged to remove it. And shall not you and I value and love him? What can we set our hearts upon; what can bid so high for them as this adorable Saviour? May he enable us to give them to him, and then he will sanctify all their inferior loves; will let us love them as flowing from his grace; so that this love will make us love him more. This love is heaven. All joy and glory is in it. And as for the happiness of his redeemed people, we shall never know how great it is till we join the church above. It will be a glorious meeting. Jesus bless you! Amen. Amen. I am, for his sake, your faithful friend,

LETTER CCXLI.

Nov. 25, 1765.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have much to tell you of that ever dear and precious Lover—your best friend and mine. I had a token of his goodness in your last, for which I thank Lady M——t, but, above all, her Lord and mine. I have a tale to relate of his free and kind heart, which will last longer than this world. It is really heaven to be relating it, and I cannot hold my tongue. He makes himself so lovely by continual favours, that my heart is quite won, and by his sweet constraint is now fixed upon him. I would turn to other lovers, but sweet Jesus will not let me. Oh, the boundless grace of his most amiable breast! Finite nature cannot tell (how should it?) his infinite love. But as we get emptied of self, we know and experience more of his love. This I wish you, and my very dear Miss ——; growth in grace, that is, self-abasement, and growth in the knowledge of God our Saviour. May he empty you of self, and fill you with more of his good things. We have very much of his presence and glory in our assemblies this winter, more than ever. His work revives amongst us: and, cold and frosty as the weather is, our hearts burn within us. Last night St. Dunstan's was a very Bethel; it was like the dedication of the Temple, when the glory of Jehovah came down and filled the house. I was preaching on these words—"My meditation of him shall be sweet" And so it was, indeed. When I was setting forth his undertakings, his suitableness to fulfil them as God-man, his actual fulfilling of them, his power to apply and to make them effectual; how he does this by his word preached, in the hand of the Spirit made the means of working faith in the heart, and of producing the fruits of faith in fellowship with Jesus and his fulness, by which Jesus grows sweeter and sweeter, and so brings us to the end of our meditation, the sweetest of all even of divine sweets, the enjoyment of Jesus in his kingdom of glory; oh, what a seal did he set to this preached gospel! He made it the power of God. The meditation of his goodness yesterday has still a relish and delightful savour! To-day it is sweet, very, very sweet indeed. Pray mind I do not make this my salvation. No, but these sweet streams lead me to the fountain. I do not rest in them; but, if these be so sweet, what must the fountain be? If little faith finds Jesus so precious, what must precious Jesus be, when faith yields to sight and sense? My dear, dear friend, prize this pearl, it is inestimable. Two things I would beg your notice of; I know you have received him. The First is, press for more knowledge—read, pray, hear, to be made more teachable and humble, that Jesus may have the glory of such discoveries as he makes of his person and of his work. And do not stop; press on, as long as you live, sit very low, very low at Christ's feet, to hear his words. The Second is, make use of his fulness; you are welcome; you cannot use it too much. Hence comes sweet fellowship, and by it all things will do you good. Carry them to that best friend, pour them out into his loving bosom. He delights in familiarity. You have been ill; that is the best for you: live by faith, and Jesus will make it plain to you. Yours, in that incomparable Lover,

LETTER CCXLII.

LAMBETH, Jan. 16, 1766.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have several reasons for writing to you at this time. The first is, that ever so long ago I wrote you a huge scribble; to which, having received no answer, I thought it was high time I should get a little out of your debt, and pay off some of my old score with these scraps of paper. I hope you will take them, according to the American phrase, for paper currency. Put every letter to account, and, having rated them just what you please, make me creditor for it.

My second reason for writing is to inquire after you. How can I help being concerned for those whom I love, especially in the Lord? Such friends I have at ——. It would be a real pleasure to me, and a profit to yourself, if I knew what to ask for you, when I go to Court. How is your bodily health? I know you are generally weak and low, and I know it is good for you, yea, the best of all for you. The Physician who never mistook a case prescribes to your tender constitution. His prescription is perfect love. He could not bring about his gracious designs any other way; he wants to wean you from a life of sense, therefore in infinite mercy he takes away sensible enjoyments. He would have you to go on from faith to faith: but how could faith grow so fast, as by keeping you from those things which are its very bane and destruction? He is bringing you to more fellowship with him than you have had, therefore you must have less fellowship with the world. Fewer outward comforts will certainly make you experience more spiritual comforts. This is our Physician's fixed parctice—he never varies from it, not in one instance: mind one of his favourite patients, thy rod and thy staff comfort me: the afflicting rod could not comfort, pain could not be pleasure, no chastening can be in itself joyous; but the staff, the being supported under the rod, and the feeling of that support, he found faith and patience bear him up under the rod, which brought him to such close communion with his gracious Saviour, that he was comforted under the cross. This is also the experience of one highly favoured, as you may read, Rom. v. 3, 4, 5. Let me know, then, how your soul prospereth under Jesus' care.

I have also a third reason for writing, which is to wish you a happy new year, the happiest of all you ever saw, and therefore I wish you more, still more enjoyment of our infinitely rich, everlastingly precious Jesus. You will live to a blessed purpose, if every day of this new year you get more out of self, and live more in and on Jesus. We have had a most remarkable time this Christmas of his grace and love. I have scarce an acquaintance who has not been favoured with blessed visits from him. Oh how great is his goodness! how great is his beauty! Incomparable both! May your dear heart, my friend, feel what I did at the Lock on Innocents' day, when I was preaching on these words of Psal. lxxxvii. "All my springs are in thee." I gave them first a translation of the psalm, then a paraphrase, then application; the substance of the two first I send you: the psalm literally rendered runs thus: Title is,

"For the sons of miserable man a psalm to be sung."

Ver. 1. He is to be established in the mountains of his holy one. Mind, how sweetly the Holy Spirit begins; he mentions not who this He that was to be established is, for all who are under his teaching know.

2. Jehovah loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

3. Weighty things are spoken of thee, thou city of Alehim. Selah, attend to this. What this love in v. 2 was for, what these weighty things in v. 3 were, the next words show, where God the Father is introduced speaking:

4. I will cause it to be remembered by them who knew me in Rahab and Babylon, behold Philistia and Tyre, the people of Ethiopia—here was the name born—born in Zion, to be the Saviour of Rahab and Babylon, Philistia and Tyre, and Ethiopia, even as many as the Lord our God shall call in these countries.

David speaking by the Holy Ghost, adds in verse

5. And of Zion it shall be said, a person and a person (God and man) shall be born in her, and he himself the Most High shall perfectly establish her. (Namely, the church founded upon the incarnate God, against which, he says himself, the gates of hell shall not prevail.)

6. Jehovah shall record it, when he is describing the people, that here was the name born; that divine name in which alone there is salvation, and from which all true joy both in heaven and earth ariseth, as the saints sung in the Old Testament, as the angels sung at his birth, and as the redeemed of the Lord will sing for ever.

7. And the singers, as well as the players on instruments, shall say, all my springs are in thee (all, all the springs of grace, of glory, all arise from Jehovah manifest in the flesh.) Oh that such a spring as we had at the opening of these words may flow into and refresh your heart quite through the wilderness till you come to the fountain-head; may you still drink of the water which flows through the rock Christ, till you drink of that which flows from the throne of the Lamb. And so it will be: the Rock will follow you, and you will have the comfort of it, if you keep in mind that little word in, all my springs are in thee, not only from thee, through thee (which is true), but in thee. If faith fix here, all will be well. For if at any time the stream fail, then you may go up to the fountain-head, making up your happiness in Jesus, get you whatever it be, little or much, in present comfort out of his fulness. Yet still he, and all he is and has, is yours.

My paper grows short, and my fingers are so cold I can scarce write; yet I have a fourth reason for writing—upon Mr. Alexander Cole's death. I wrote to Newcastle for his papers, especially for a book in manuscript, after the manner of the Pilgrim's Progress; my brother sent me word, his daughter at —— had been over, and carried away all her father's papers. I wish you could get this book and read it, and send me your opinion of it. —— perhaps could help you, to whom give my kind love.

One thing more, and I have done. Yesterday I dined with Mr. Berridge. He was making great complaint of his debts, contracted by his keeping, out of his own living, two preachers and their horses, and several local preachers, and for the rents of several barns, in which they preach. He sees it was wrong to run in debt, and will be more careful. But it is done. My application is to Lady Margaret. Will you stand my friend with her, and tell her Berridge's case? If she pleases to assist him, I should be glad to convey her charity to him. You will be the judge whether this be proper or not to mention to her. I beg my kind love to her. Nothing is yet done at Blackfriars: but Jesus does all things well, he times all things for the best; I am sure of it; therefore I wait my Lord's time, and blessed waiting it is.—May he bless you and yours in body and soul, and that for ever and ever: so prays,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXLIII.

LAMBETH, Feb. 4, 1766.

ALL the blessings of Jesus' love be with dear ——. I was not in a hurry to answer your letter, because Mr. Berridge promised to make his acknowledgments to ——: and because the time was at hand when my lord chancellor declared he would end the affair of Blackfriars. You have heard of the event. My friends are rejoicing all around me, and wishing me that joy which I cannot take. It is my Master's will, and I submit. He knows what is best, both for his own glory, and his people's good. And I am certain he makes no mistake in either of these points. But my head hangs down upon the occasion, through the awful apprehensions which I ever had of the cure of souls. I am frightened to think of watching over two or three thousand, when it is work enough to watch over one. The plague of my own heart almost wearies me to death; what can I do with such a vast number? Besides, I had promised myself a little rest and retirement in the evening of life, and had already sat down with a "soul, take thine ease." And lo! my fine plan is broken all to pieces. I am called into a public station, and to the sharpest engagement, just as I had got into winter quarters—an engagement, too, for life. I can see nothing before me, so long as the breath is in my body, but war—and that with unreasonable men—a divided parish, an angry clergy, a wicked Sodom, and a wicked world; all to be resisted and overcome: besides all these, a sworn enemy, subtle and cruel, with whom I can make no peace, no, not a moment's truce, night and day, with all his children and his host, is aiming at my destruction. When I take counsel of the flesh, I begin to faint. But when I go to the sanctuary, I see my cause good, and my Master is almighty—a tried friend; and then he makes my courage revive. Although I am no way fit for the work, yet he called me to it, and on him I depend for strength to do it, and for success to crown it. I utterly despair of doing any thing as of myself, and therefore the more I have to do, I shall be forced to live more by faith upon him. In this view I hope to get a great income by my living. I shall want my Jesus more, and shall get closer to him. As he has made my application to him more necessary and more constant, he has given me stronger tokens of his love. Methinks I can hear his sweet voice,—"Come closer, come closer, soul; nearer yet; I will bring you into circumstances that you cannot do one moment without me." Oh that you could always hear that voice, it would be your heaven! and indeed it is his language—nothing but love is on his tongue; but the noise of the flesh sometimes drowns his small still voice.—Comfort would flow into your heart, like a river, if the ears of faith were but open to attend to the endearments of Jesus. "Soul, thou shalt not live at a distance from me; I bought thee with a great price; thou art mine. When I afflict, it is to bring thee nearer to myself; to make thee glad in me; to bring thy heart to me. Thou shalt not make up thy comforts in the streams; come, come up nearer, nearer still, to the fountain-head. To make thee, to force thee to live happy in my fulness, I will dry up the streams, and so will I teach thee to make me all in all." The infinitely lovely Lamb of God teach you this lesson! All his word preaches it, all his providences proclaim it. Every cross says—Go to Jesus, live near his bleeding heart, or else I shall break the back of your patience. Every difficulty says, Go to Jesus, and he will make you strong in the power of his might to overcome. The world, and all the things in it, say, and the believer has ears to hear, Go to Jesus, there is no good in us—it is all in him. Whatever comes, I go to Jesus with it, and all is well—his smiles are humbling, his rod is sanctifying; in all his dealings he is good, and doeth good.

I know these things as well in theory, as I see the words upon the paper. But to practise them is indeed hard, except in his strength, to whom all things are possible; in it and by it all the things we meet with will not only bring us to live more upon Christ, but will also bring us to live more to Christ. By doing the one we do the other. He that makes him all, shows forth most of his praise. What can glorify Christ like that believer who attempts nothing without consulting him, undertakes no work or duty but in his strength, rejoices in nothing but in Jesus, and in his salvation? Oh that you may learn, my dear friend, thus to exalt King Jesus! I would have you to be ever bringing some honour to him, by making him your all in deed and in truth. Praise his fulness by living always upon it, and then he will make you always happy. Let him be all your salvation, and all your desire—all your salvation, as to the merit of it; all your desire, as to the efficacy of it; all your salvation in purchase; all your desire in enjoyment. So he is in heaven: Oh that we could make him so upon earth!

I have one favour to beg of you. Do not refuse me. You see my station: you hear my difficulties. Will you remember me to him, who calleth the things that be not as though they were. He can send to war at his cost, and for his glory. If you love me, make mention of me when you go to Court. Pray for usefulness and for humility. I cease not to mention you.

I have received Lady B——'s money, and have been much in gaols of late. I am confined to church people; and when I see a prisoner, a dissenter, and cannot relieve him, with a wife and several children, it makes my very heart ache. So I thought your gift was from heaven. I have made one family happy, and shall make others, and by and by will send you the particulars.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXLIV.

July 22, 1766.

My very dear Friend.—I am wishing for your prosperity in body and soul; but above all, that your soul may prosper: and it is in the most thriving state when you are lowest and vilest in your own eyes, and Jesus alone is eyed and esteemed. This is growth. And self is kept down, so Jesus is exalted. Oh, what views have I of this manner of growing in grace! Let me talk to you freely of it at our next meeting, as I have learned it not from books, but from God's word, and God's teaching.

I am learning, though dull, how to eye him in all things: as it is my privilege, so I find it my happiness; but, alas! alas! I am a miserable learner. However, I set out afresh, and resolve not to give over aiming at my lesson. Do ever so well, I would do better, for I see in him worlds of beauty and glory, which will take up a long eternity to study, and, what is best of all, to enjoy. To my dear, dearest Jesus, I commend you and all yours. I am, very sincerely, yours in our common Lord,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXLV.

Lambeth, Sept. 30, 1766.

My dear Friend.—I have been carrying here and there the sweet savour of Jesus' dear name ever since I left you. I was in Sussex for a month, and have heard, since my return, a better account of your health, for which I am thankful. The Lord having appointed you for his heavenly kingdom, has also appointed all the steps which are to lead you thither. Every pain is in the covenant. Your confinement, your miscarriages, your faintings, your disappointments, not one thing that thwarts your will, but it is in God's will. Nothing can befal you but what is ordered, contrived for you by wisdom, brought upon you by love. Oh for eyes to see, for a heart to receive, all God's dealings with you, in this covenant view! How sweet would be your many trials, if you found them all appointed and managed for you by the best of friends. Learn to receive them thus.

I am going to Bath, and hope for a little leisure there to write to you a long letter. My subject is ready. After you receive it, I shall be glad to hear how your sentiments and mine agree. Pray remember me with many thanks to ——. I am in debt more than I can acknowledge. My best respects to her. Pray for a poor worm,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCXLVI

LAMBETH, Nov. 15, 1766.

I AM indebted much to my dear friend, but, among other things, I owe you a note of hand, which I am now ready to pay. I wanted to talk with you at —— upon the temper and disposition of a true believer; but, being prevented there, I promised to send you my thoughts upon this subject, which I am the more ready to do to-day, because the reason of my making the promise not only still subsists, but is also increasing. A temper directly contrary to the Christian is spreading among professors. I see the delusion grow, and I am a witness to the baneful effects of it. How many have you and I heard of, who want to be something in themselves, and, rather than not be so, will be beholden to Christ to set them up with a stock of grace? They would gladly receive a talent from him, that, by being faithful to grace given, and trading well with it, they may look with delight on their improvements, and thereby hope to get more grace and more glory. This is the Popish plan, the Arminian, the Baxterian, the Wesleyan: very flattering to nature, exceedingly pleasing to self-righteousness, very exalting, yea, it is crowning free will, and debasing King Jesus. I would be more jealous than I am over you in this matter, if I had not seen how the Lord teaches you, and warns you of this rock. Your frequent indispositions are his sweet lessons, by which he would bring you to the true gospel frame of spirit, which is this:—It is the proper work of the grace of Jesus, to humble the proud sinner, to make him and to keep him sensible of his wants, convinced always that he has not any good of his own, and cannot possibly of himself obtain any, either in earth or heaven, but what he must be receiving every moment out of the fulness of Jesus.

The devil fell by pride, and he drew man into the same crime. He promised him independence, and he still persuades deceived man to set up for himself. That is the scheme of all unawakened men: they are resolved to be happy in spite of God. The Spirit of Jesus is sent to humble this proud sinner, which he does by giving him a view of God's holy nature and God's holy law. This makes sin, and consequently the sinner, hateful; discovers his guilt and his danger: if he attempts to do any thing to make God love him, the Holy Spirit humbles him for that very thing, by showing him the sinfulness of his motive, and the imperfection of the action. Whatever he seeks to rest in, the Spirit of Jesus detects the false foundation, till he leaves him no resource but to believe in the only begotten Son of God; so that when he comes to Jesus, he is stripped of all, quite naked and blind, moneyless and friendless, empty of good as the devil and sin could make him. This is all the fitness and preparation for Christ which I know of. And when Christ is thus received, the same Spirit which would let him, the sinner, bring nothing to Christ, will now make him bring all from Christ, and so keep him sensible of his wants. He will teach the believer more, daily, of his poverty, weakness, unworthiness, vileness, ignorance, &c. that he may be kept humble, without any good but what he is forced to fetch out of the fulness of Jesus. And when he would go any where else for comfort, to duties, frames, gifts, and graces (for pride will live, and thrive too, upon any thing but Jesus,) his Spirit makes them dry and lean, and will not let him stop short of the fountain-head of all true comfort: in short, he will glorify nothing but Jesus. He will stain the pride of all greatness, and of all goodness, excepting what is derived from the fulness of the incarnate God.

I know one who learned this very slowly, but has had much pains taken with him; and to make what I have been saying more plain, I would illustrate it by his experience. He was a very, very vain, proud young man: knew almost every thing but himself, and therefore was mighty fond of himself. He met with many disappointments to his pride, which only made him prouder, till the Lord was pleased to let him see and feel the plague of his own heart. At this time my acquaintance with him began. He tried every method that can be tried to get peace, but found none. In his despair of all things else, he betook himself to Jesus, and was most kindly received. He trusted the word of promise, and experienced the sweetness in the promise. After this, he went through various frames and trials of faith, too many to mention, and he is now got, where may Mrs. ——, your dear sister, get, and as far beyond it as you can.

First, he has been brought to a clear conviction, that all fulness of good is in Jesus, as clear, as that all the sap in the branch is from the stock on which it grows, as that all the nourishment in the member is from the body. What has the branch or the member, except what they receive? Now this continual receiving from Jesus every thing, saying, "You must go to him, you must go to him," is a most humbling lesson. And my friend says, it is nothing but this which crucifies his pride; he has been attempting for many years to be something, to do something of himself, but could not succeed: disappointed again and again, yet he would not give it up, till God made him feel, in him, that is, in his flesh, dwelled no good thing: and now he writes folly, weakness, sin, on all that is his own; not only clearly convinced that all fulness of good is in Jesus, but is also, in the second place, content it should be in him. It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell. It pleases the Holy Spirit to testify of his fulness, and to glorify nothing but it: and by his teaching, it pleases the believer. He is made quite satisfied that all fulness should dwell in that dear God-man: content to have nothing but what he must go to him for; yea, happy to go to Jesus for those very things of which he himself is empty, and which he cannot have any where else. My friend's heart glows, and his very countenance brightens up, and one catches fire at his words, when he is talking upon this subject. "Oh," says he, "that you did but know what I experience in living upon the fulness of Jesus! God's will and mine are one in this matter: this subjection to his will is heaven regained; so I find it. I rest perfectly on the fulness, and I enjoy most sweetly, what God has laid up in it for my use. My conscience has a peace, that passeth all understanding, through faith in the blood of the Lamb. I see myself in him perfectly accepted, perfectly justified, perfectly comely in his comeliness, perfectly happy in his love: all the desires of the soul satisfied with Jesus' person and Jesus' work. This, this is the death of pride. Here free-will, self-righteousness, a legal spirit cannot work. The Spirit and power of Jesus in this his glory makes them hide their heads."

This is living like a Christian. It is a life, in one respect, only below an angel's; and yet, great and blessed as it is, I have heard my friend talk in a very uncommon strain upon a state even beyond this, which he calls heaven enjoyed, and that is,

Thirdly, he is thankful that all fulness dwells in Jesus—not only is convinced of it, and content with it, but also blesses God for its being in Jesus. This is all they do in the highest heaven, and he has most of heaven who does this most like them. My friend describes his meaning thus: "I live out of myself—I nothing have, I nothing am, but folly and sin—Jesus is my life; in him is the fulness of its being, and of its comforts: whatever I want, I find it in him. I experience day by day the kindness of his heart, and the bounty of his hand. Blessings on him, my heart enjoys what no tongue can describe. Whatever I go to him for, he always sends me away with matter of thankfulness. Constant fellowship with him endears to me his person more and more. Communion with him in his offices makes him infinitely lovely. Partaking of his overflowing love, makes it everlastingly precious. And living upon the fulness of these, is the fulness of joy. Glory, glory be to God-Jesus for ever and ever: Heaven and earth say with my heart, Amen."

Thus does my friend illustrate the definition which I give you of the true gospel-frame of spirit. I hope we shall live to talk of it, and live to enjoy it more. Nothing else is worth living for. All means of grace are only useful as they help us to live thus. All providences, sicknesses, losses, successes, are only so far blessings, as they lead us more out of ourselves into the fulness of Jesus. My dear Mrs. ——, I can write to-day upon nothing else. I hope I write seasonably. When you open this letter, you will want this lesson. I am sure you will, and God bless it to you; I follow it with my prayers, and I can do no more; but our common Lord will hear, I know he will; and will accompany my poor words with his presence. To the care of his dear loving heart I commend you you and yours. Wonder not I have not written before; I have been in a more preaching way this summer than I ever was in my life, and travelled much more, and have had with me a sweet savour of Jesus' dear name. Oh he is precious to my soul: how much, even now, I shall want time in eternity to tell: so precious, that I think I have not long to be here, or else the matchless lover will make this earth a very heaven. But I say, I, the vilest worm that ever crawled or escaped hell, not to set me up, but him, the high exalted worthy Saviour. Again to him I commend you. Yours truly in him,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXLVII.

Lambeth, Jan. 24, 1767.

My very dear Friend.—I have waited till I am quite wearied out. Many a look and prayer have I sent ——ward, but all in vain. No tidings could I get till Mr. —— told me of your state. And on his information I am encouraged to inquire after you and yours, and after a very, very long letter, which I wrote upon my coming home from Bath. Pray give me some account, for indeed I long to know about these matters. The letter was upon a subject that I scarce ever mentioned before to any body; it was my own experience; and I would not have it lost for a great deal. I have been trying it by scripture, and I could give you infallible proofs of its being agreeable to the word of God; and perhaps may, when I hear from you next. It will be some satisfaction to me (as I never take copies of any thing) to read my own history at ——. Before that time I may have got a little lower, and have drank deeper into the knowledge of Jesus. That seems to be the end of living, to have self abased, and Jesus exalted; and these two are inseparable. As self sinks in esteem, Jesus rises. When self is nothing but sin, then Jesus is a glorified Saviour. When self is nothing but misery, then Jesus is all heaven. I have been led to take particular notice of this lately from these views:

First, the person of Jesus; he was Jehovah. All the glory of the Godhead was in the man Jesus. And what was his appearance! mean, to the last degree. A worm, and no man, the very scorn of men, and the outcast of the people. What was his form? a servant, a poor servant. What were his tempers? meek and lowly, yea, meekness and lowliness itself; a perfect original, of whom all his disciples may learn to be meek and lowly. His way to glory was humility; so is ours. His glory, indeed, was his humility; so is ours. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted," was true of the head as well as of the members. Oh that you and I may be in this conformed to him! because herein,

Secondly, our fellowship with him consists. Whatever a man sees in himself great or good, is an absolute hindrance to the enjoyment of Jesus. Whatever he sees vile and wicked; therein (if he has faith) he will enjoy the Saviour. The more he sees, the more enjoyment: for that which humbles the sinner brings him nearer to the Saviour. The humblest sinner is capable of the closest communion, and is thereby fitted for the largest communications of Jesus' love. The emptiest hold the most, and the emptiest receive the most. Oh for daily emptying! This self, this full self, what reasonings, what legality, what self-righteousness has it, and all to keep us from being filled with the fulness of Christ; this is your grand enemy, that idol self. The Lord crucify it by his own almighty grace! and to induce you to apply to him for this power, I would recommend it to you.

Thirdly, in reading the Bible, take notice of the persons to whom the promises are made. Their character is always one and the same: the poor in spirit; the contrite and broken in heart; the hungry; the thirsty; the meek and lowly. Take this general promise as an instance, God giveth grace to the humble, and with grace he gives all things. See how I get writing on without intending it; I only sat down to inquire about you, and all our dear friends; Miss —— at the head of them. Lo! here is a long scroll started up. In love remember me to all friends, and, if you please, with my hearty prayers for their welfare at ——. Mine eyes have tears for them. Dear Jesus reveal himself so to you in his glory, as to eclipse all created good, and yourself especially. So prays a poor sinner.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCXLVIII.

March 21, 1767.

My dear Friend.—I would not have let your long and kind epistle be so carelessly passed by, but that I am at present left to myself without a curate. All my time is taken up with parish duty; a great deal of it very unprofitably spent. But I am called to it, and I must, and do, submit. I have sat down, and I will write on till I am interrupted. And I begin with telling you how your last refreshed me. It was a seasonable feast; for I was in a sad taking about the account which I had sent you of myself, having never found any freedom to do it to any body living before; and I feared either it should be lost, or fall into any other person's hand. I am glad it is in yours. Now you know whereabouts I am, and what my present state is, it may be of some use to you to be informed how I was brought unto it. God's dealings with me have been wonderful, not only for the royal sovereignty of his richest grace, but also for the manner of his teaching, on which I cannot look back without adoring my meek and lowly prophet. He would have all the honour (and he well deserves it) of working out and also of applying his glorious salvation. When I was in trouble and soul-concern, he would not let me learn of man. I went every where to hear, but nobody was suffered to speak to my case. The reason of this I could not tell then, but I know it now. The Arminian methodists flocked about me, and courted my acquaintance, which became a great snare unto me. By their means I was brought into a difficulty, which distressed me several years. "I was made to believe that part of my title to salvation was to be inherent—something called holiness in myself, which the grace of God was to help me to. And I was to get it by watchfulness, prayer, fasting, hearing, reading, sacraments, &c.: so that after much and long attendance in those means, I might be able to look inward, and be pleased with my own improvement, finding I was grown in grace, a great deal holier, and more deserving of heaven than I had been." I do not wonder now that I received this doctrine. It was sweet food to a proud heart. I feasted on it, and to work I went. It was hard labour and sad bondage, but the hopes of having something to glory in of my own kept up my spirits. I went on, day after day, striving, agonizing (as they called it); but still I found myself not a bit better. I thought this was the fault, or that, which being amended, I should certainly succeed; and therefore set out afresh, but still came to the same place. No galley slave worked harder, or to less purpose. Sometimes I was quite discouraged, and ready to give all up; but the discovery of some supposed hindrance set me to work again. Then I would redouble my diligence and exert all my strength. Still I got no ground This made me often wonder; and still more, when I found, at last, that I was going backward. Methought I grew worse. I saw more sin in myself, instead of more holiness, which made my bondage very hard, and my heart very heavy. The thing I wanted, the more I pursued it, flew farther and farther from me. I had no notion that this was divine teaching, and that God was delivering me from my mistake in this way: so that the discoveries of my growing worse were dreadful arguments against myself, until now and then a little light would break in and show me something of the glory of Jesus; but it was a glimpse only—gone in a moment. As I saw more of my heart, and began to feel more of my corrupt nature, I got clearer views of gospel-grace; and in proportion as I came to know myself, I advanced in the knowledge of Christ Jesus. But this was very slow work: the old leaven of self-righteousness, new christened holiness, stuck close to me still, and made me a very dull scholar in the school of Christ. But I kept on, making a little progress; and as I was forced to give up one thing, and another, on which I had some dependence, I was left, at last, stripped of all, and neither had, nor could see where I could have, aught to rest my hopes, that I could call my own. This made way for blessed views of Jesus. Being now led to very deep discoveries of my own legal heart, of the dishonour which I had put upon the Saviour, of the despite I had done to the Spirit of his grace, by resisting and perverting the workings of his love; these things humbled me. I became very vile in mine own eyes, I gave over striving: the pride of free-will, the boast of mine own works, were laid low. And as self was debased, the scriptures became an open book, and every page presented the Saviour in new glory. Then were explained to me these truths, which are now the very joy and life of my soul. Such as,

First, the plan of salvation, contrived by the wisdom of Jehovah Alehim, fulfilled in the divine person and work of Jesus, and applied by the Spirit of Jesus. The whole was so ordered, from first to last, that all the glory of it might be secured to the persons in Jehovah. The devil fell by pride; he tempted and seduced man into pride: therefore the Lord, to hide pride from man, has so contrived his salvation that he who glorieth should have nothing to glory in but the Lord.

Secondly, The benefits of salvation are all the free gifts of free grace, conferred without any regard to what the receiver of them is; nothing being looked at by the Giver but his own sovereign glory. Therefore the receivers are the ungodly, the worst of them, the unworthy, the chief of sinners; such are saved freely by grace through faith, and that not of themselves: it (namely, salvation by faith) is the gift of God, not of works, lest any man should boast.

Thirdly, When I considered these benefits one by one, it was the very death of self-righteousness and self-complacency; for when I looked at the empty hand which faith puts forth to receive them; whence was the hand emptied—whence came faith—whence the power to put forth the empty hand—and whence the benefits received upon putting it forth? All is of God; he humbles us, that we may be willing to receive Christ; he keeps us humble, that we may be willing to live by faith upon Christ received: and as it is a great benefit to have this faith, so it is,

Fourthly, A great, inestimably great benefit to live by faith; for this is a life in every act of it dependent upon another. Self is renounced, so far as Christ is lived upon. And faith is the most emptying, pulling down grace; most emptying, because it says, and proves it too. In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing, and therefore it will not let a man see aught good in himself, but pulls down every high thought, and lays it low in subjection to Jesus. It is called the faith of the Son of God, because he is the author and the finisher of it; he gives it; he gives to live by it; he gives the benefits received by it; he gives the glory laid up for it; so that if I live to God, and in any act have living communion with God, it is by nothing in myself, but wholly by the faith of the Son of God. When I wanted to do any thing commanded, (what they call duties), I found,

Fifthly, A continual matter of humiliation. I was forced to be dependent for the will and for the power, and, having done my best, I could not present it to God but upon the golden altar that sanctifieth the gifts; not the worthiness, not the goodness of the gifts, but the sanctifying grace of the great High Priest alone can make them holy and acceptable. How low did this lay the pride of good works; since, after all, they were viler than dung, unless perfumed with the sweet incense of Jesus' blood and righteousness! Here I learnt to eye him in all my works and duties, the Alpha and Omega of them; the life and spirit of all my prayers, and sermons, and hearing, and reading, and ordinances; they are all dead works, unless done in and by faith of the Son of God. Against this blessed truth, of which I am as certain as that I am alive, I find my nature kick. To this hour, a legal heart will be creeping into duties, to get between me and my dear Jesus, whom I go to meet in them. But he soon recovers me from the temptation, makes me loathe myself for it, and gets fresh glory to his sovereign grace; and as all the great and good things ever done in the world were done by faith, so all the crosses ever endured with patience were from the same cause, which is,

Sixthly, Another humbling lesson. I find to this moment so much unbelief and impatience in myself, that if God was to leave me to be tried with any thing that crossed my will, if it was but a feather, it would break my back. Nothing tends to keep me vile in my own eyes, like this fretting, and murmuring, and heart-burning, when the will of God in the least thwarts my will. I read, the trial of your faith worketh patience; the trial of mine, the direct contrary. Instead of patient submission, I want to have mine own way, to take very little physic, and that very sweet: so the flesh lusteth. But the physician knows better. He knows when and what to prescribe; may every potion purge out this impatient, proud, unbelieving temper, so that faith may render healthful to the soul what is painful to the flesh. And as no cross can be endured without the faith of the Son of God, so, Seventhly, and lastly, There is no comfortable view of leaving the world, but by the same faith. These all, who had obtained a good report in every age, died in faith. On their death-bed they did not look for present peace and future glory, but to the Lamb of God. Their great works, their eminent services, their various sufferings, all were cast behind their backs, and they died as they lived, looking at nothing but Jesus. He was their antidote against the fear and against the power of death. They feared not the cold death-sweat; Jesus' bloody sweat was their dependence. The dart lost its force on Jesus' side. The sting was lost in his corpse. Death stung itself to death, when it killed him. There is life in its highest exaltation and glory, in not breathing the air of this world. This life, through death, Jesus entered on, and we enter on it now by faith; and when our breath is stopped, we have this life, as he has it, pure, spiritual, and divine. Because he lives it, we shall live it also. Yes, my dear friend, we, and you, and I, after we have lived a little longer, to empty us more, to bring us more out of ourselves, that we may be humbled, and Jesus exalted more, we shall fall asleep in Jesus, not die, but sleep; not see, not taste death, so he promises us; but in his dear arms sweetly go to rest in our weary bodies, when our souls shall be with the Lord. And then we shall be perfect in that lesson, which we learn so very slow in this present world, namely, that from him, and of him, and to him, are all things: to whom be all the glory, for ever and ever, Amen.

These are the things which God himself has taught me. Man had no hand at all in it. No person in the world, not I myself; for I fought against them as long as I could: so that my present possession of them, with all the rich blessings which they contain, is from my heavenly teacher alone. And I have not learned them, as we do mathematics, to keep them in memory, and to make use of them when I please: no, I find in me, to this moment, an opposition to every gospel truth, both to the belief of it in my head, and to the comfort of it in my heart. I am still a poor dependent creature, sitting very low at the feet of my dear Teacher, and learning to admire that love of his, which brought me down and keeps me down at his feet. There be my seat, till I learn my lesson perfectly. That will soon be. There is nothing in his presence but what is like himself. In heaven all is perfection. The saints are as humble as they are happy Clothed with glory and clothed with humility, with one heart and one voice they cry, "Worthy is the Lamb." They look not at, they praise not one another; but the Lamb is glorified in his saints, and will have from them never-ending praise and glory for the glory which his sovereign grace has bestowed upon them. In a measure I now feel what they do. My heart is in tune, and I can join that blessed hymn; looking at him as the giver of grace (and grace is glory begun, nota bene) as they look at him the giver of glory. I can take the crown, most gladly, from the head of all my graces, as they do from the head of their glory, and cast it down at his loving feet. "Worthy is the Lamb." He is—he is—. blessings on him for ever and ever!

Ought not I to say so, indebted as I am to that precious Lamb of God? You see how he has dealt with me: the kindness, the gentleness of his ways, his royal bounty, the magnificence of his love. Adore and praise him with me and for me. And learn, my dear friend, from what I have here related, to trust him more. When he shows you your vile heart, your poor works, when dreadful corruptions stir, and are ready to break out, go to him freely, boldly; stop not a moment to reason with your own proud spirit, but fall down at his footstool. Tell him just what you feel. He loves to hear our complaints poured with confidence into his bosom. And never, never on earth, will you get such fellowship with him, so close, so blessed, as when you converse with him in this poverty of spirit. Let nothing keep you from him; whatever you meet with, let it drive you to him; for all good is from him, and all evil is turned into good by him. Oh wondrous Saviour! Here I was going on, and I hope in this theme never to stop; but the Rev. Mr. —— is come in—one just ordained. I do not leave Jesus to talk to him, but I am going to talk to him of sweet Jesus. To him I commend you and yours. Believe me very truly yours in that most lovely Lord Christ, most precious Jesus,

LETTER CCXLIX.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—I have been waiting for good news, but in vain. I wanted some satisfactory answer to your last, and though I can give you none, yet I take up my pen to make an apology for the great Lord (who will not send you a minister) lest you should begin to think hardly of him, and of me too, his poor servant. I would have you to remember, that the government is upon his shoulders—the government of heaven and earth. His church is the object of his special government. It is his body—bought with his blood—quickened by his Spirit—kept by his power—blest with his love. All its concerns are upon his heart: his eyes are upon ——: he sees his people there with perfect complacency; and they shall want nothing that he has to give. Among the rest he beholds you and yours, and is managing all for your good. All shall be blest to you, your relations, your house, your substance, your state of body and of mind, your life and death, things temporal and spiritual. He will turn all things into blessings; for he does all things well. He does not, he cannot make one mistake in his government; no, not the least. He is wisdom, he is love, he is power itself. Infinite wisdom directs his love, and sets it to work; and, being almighty, he makes all things work together for the best to his dear people. You are as dear to him at ——, as we are at London. When he knows it to be right, he will send you a pastor after his own heart: and when he does not want one there, you cannot get one. When it is right you should be comforted, you shall be humbled, and then your consolations shall abound: and when it is right you should be low and mourning, he will bring good, yea, joy out of heaviness. Think of all that his power can do; his love disposes, his covenant binds him, to do it for his people.

Oh, blessed Mrs. ——! What a happy woman are you! Jesus is yours. All he is, all he has (and mind, he is Lord of all things) is yours. Who is like unto your Jesus? None, none in heaven or earth: for your Friend has all power in heaven and earth, and he will use it for your good, to keep you, to guide you, to give you what is best, what he knows to be best; and has, as such, appointed for you in his wise counsel and purpose of grace. Leave yourself, then, to his care and management; yourself and yours. Trust him for a pastor. Faith is the best way to get one. Ask of him, believing, and Mr. ——, or some you never heard of, shall be sent. Believe for your mercies, and you cannot want your mercies. If you take notice of God's dealings, you will find that God never takes away what you are enjoying by faith. All things are possible, both to get and to keep to him that believeth. And when belief goes, all goes. And well it is so: for that which is not enjoyed by faith, is not worth enjoying. It can bring no real good to us, and no glory to God; therefore we had better be without it. In this holy art of believing for our blessings, I wish you most heartily a great proficient. Faith alone makes the difference. I would have you daily to practise it for every earthly good thing you enjoy; then shall it produce a gladness of heart—but without faith it will not be to your true solid comfort, because not sanctified. You see how open I write, my very heart appears. For I know your weak side. There I fear for you: and my fear is an holy fear. I fear for God's glory, in the use of a comfort so near your very soul, and I know of no way but what I now tell you. Believe for your mercies. That will secure God's honour, and your comfort. To the sweet arms of your divine lover, I commend you and yours, that he would give you grace to trust all your earthly comforts daily in the Saviour's care. This I shall entreat for you, being very heartily yours in that loveliest of all loves.

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCL.

Blackfriars, Oct. 27, 1769.

My dear Friend.—Finding the cover of this letter yesterday, it put me in mind of our past correspondence, and brought back into pleasing reflection many agreeable interviews with you and yours. I was resolved therefore to make use of this cover, Providence, I thought, had put in my way. It is to be sent as directed, to be a witness for me of my constant attachment to you and your family, as of my uninterrupted affection. Go, letter, and say so. Assure them that I am still the same in heart, in deed, wishing and praying to approve myself to be unfeignedly theirs. And tell them my reason; it is because, through grace, I am the same in heart, in deed, to my spiritual friend; wishing and praying to approve myself to be unfeignedly his in all things. Upon better acquaintance I am become settled in my love, and rest in it. I have some little intimacy with the friend of sinners, and what he manifests to me of himself increases affection. He teaches me to loathe myself; every day he lets me see and feel the total ruin of this body of sin and death, and will not let me look at any thing in or of myself from whence I may draw one moment's comfort. Thus he makes himself more lovely. Self-loathing renders him precious. The more we get out of self, the more we grow into Jesus. Tired of our works and duties, we learn to value his righteousness. Feeling we cannot keep ourselves, we know how to trust his faithfulness, who hath undertaken to keep his people unto the end. Oh what a friend is this! whose love is like himself; the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. This sense of his love makes his people loving. And his love to them is the bond of all their holy love to one another. Having put on Christ, they put on with him kindness, brotherly love, bowels of mercies, &c. Some of these, but I do not boast, I feel to you, and my dear friends with you. May our love be mutual, increasing continually in every sweet and holy affection. The love of Christ will constrain to this; it spreads like leaven. Every act not only brings forth, but also diffuses, its sweet influence. Whenever I remember you, and make mention of you at our Court, the King not only hears, but approves, and makes the love expressed to be love abounding. The holy flame spreads as it burns; so that every affection, as it increases in its attachment to our glorious head, makes us more truly loving to all his members.

My dear friend, I wish you was more intimate with this loving Jesus. And why not? what has he done to make you shy of him? all your complaints about yourself are no bar: they are so many ties and bonds constraining you to love him; yea, he will love to hear them from you, as matters of faith. Whatever you are, or feel of sin, misery, helplessness, &c. if rightly managed, should increase your knowledge of and dependence on the Lord Jesus Christ. Indeed, all that you meet with, till you meet him face to face, should bring you into more experience of his perfect salvation, and of his free love to bestow it on such as you. By which means you would be growing daily in the excellency of the knowledge of your Lord, and would be more conformed to his image and example. May you and I increase daily in this heavenly friendship, and love him in our measure, as he loved us. I am just returned from a journey of seven hundred miles; ashamed and confounded at his mercies to me and mine; and yet to pour my praises to his grace, so mean my services in his own work, that I am forced to cry for mercy on my best sermons and labours. I am returned home self-abased, carrying this truth written on my heart, and desiring to manifest it in outward conversation. Let him that glorieth, glory only in the Lord Jesus. I saw Lady H——, who was pure and well, and preached at her chapel at Bath: she had not received satisfactory, or I think she said no answer at all from the lord chancellor; but he must give such an answer as our Lord Chancellor pleases: that is our comfort. My love to Mr. ——: I am going to pray for him. All covenant blessings be with you and yours. The Lord spare —— for his mercies sake! I do not know what you would all do, if he who gave him was to take him away; and, remember, he has a right to do it when he will. Farewell, farewell. I am yours in our dear Lord and Keeper,

W. ROMAINE

LETTER CCLI.

May, 1768.

THANK you, my good friend, for remembering me. I begun to have some hard thoughts of you, but they are gone: time has taught me that old friends are better than new, and grace has improved this experience; for friends in Christ will be so for ever. We may part, but only to meet again. Love can reach from London to ——; yes, a great way farther. I feel my heart just now united to ——, and rejoice from my soul that Jesus has taken her up to himself: thanks be to him for the grace she had, and the glory she had received out of his fulness. Blessings on him, that we are going the same way, to meet our best friend, and all our friends; and to be with him our heaven-making Jesus, and to be with them for evermore. I was led from reading your letter to a very comfortable view of the Prince of Life. I thought I saw him in that character, exceedingly amiable and glorious: and the more I considered it, the more lovely it grew to the eye of faith. For it seemed to me that sin and death came into the world with all their train of evils, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby. Wonderful is his name, who can bring righteousness out of sin. What a miracle-working Jesus is he, who can make life out of death! Indeed, all he does is in this strange way, peculiar to himself, that his might be the crown of crowns. As a Jesus, he not only saves from the evil of sin and death—this is the least part of his matchless work—but he also, in the free gift of his sovereignty, bestows righteousness and life; and, to the everlasting praise of his sovereignty, bestows them on the most unrighteous, and on the most dead in sin. In this praise, how glorious is our Jesus! My heart is now captivated with this inimitable loveliness, although I see him through a glass darkly: what must he be in full and open view, when the display of his beauty will make an eternal heaven! I knew one, who was admitted as that happy soul was, Cant. ii. 9, to see the divine lover looking forth at the window, and showing himself, or, as it is in the margin, flourishing, open and expanding like a flower his beauties and fragrance through the lattice window. It was a ravishing sight. If the eye and senses of faith can be thus highly delighted, what will it be to see him face to face, and to enjoy his fulness of glory? since he thus by the death of our friends can let us behold some fresh discovering of his life-giving charms. What—oh what will it be to us, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life? Yet a little, a very little while, and this shall be. In the mean time, may you and I be growing in the knowledge and love of the Prince of Life. I got a good advancement by the death of Lady M——t, and was led into a sweet path of meditation, in which I went on meditating and contemplating, till my heart burned within me. Methought he had given a noble display of the riches of grace in his dealings with her, and had made her a happy partaker of that life which he came to give unto his world. You can witness that he had repealed the sentence of death. She was freed from condemnation, and was passed from death unto life. He gave her to know it, to enjoy it. Many a time my spirit has been refreshed with hearing her relate simply and feelingly how Jesus was her life. And in consequence of this, having peace with God, through Jesus Christ her Lord, she had an attachment to his person. You can tell, better than I can, how she showed this. She was certainly spiritually alive, and he who made her so kept her so, to as great manifesting of his power as if he had preserved the burning bush in Horeb in flames, and yet unhurt, from Moses to this day. This spiritual life bodily death cannot touch, because it is rooted and grounded into the divine life. And the keeping of it is laid up with Christ in God, safe, happy, out of the reach of storms and enemies. What did I say, bodily death cannot touch it? I retract that word: bodily death does what the angel did to Peter in prison; knocks off his fetters, and sets him at liberty; the angel of life takes down the mortal, that he may perfect the immortal life, and so we die to live;—die to the world, to live with him; die to time, to live for ever; yea, die in faith, that this body of death, which we leave behind us, shall soon be raised to life and immortality. Is death our enemy? What has he done to hurt?—Only fulfilled the kind will of Jesus who wanted her company, and would have her with him, to live as he does in his life of glory. Blessed death, heavenly comforter, thou art a loving friend indeed to Jesus' friends! Your letter was the means of my entering on this meditation, and blessed it was. Oh what a sight and sense had I of the incomparable grace of life-giving Jesus! While I am writiing, he makes himself, beyond what any words can describe, lovely to my eyes, and precious to my heart. He is my life. I find it, enjoy it, in him; and let me speak, my dear friend, a word for him to you; for him, as I am in duty bound—to you, as love constrains me. For him I speak, a most complete, absolutely and eternally perfect Saviour. His person, his work, possessed of all the glories of the Godhead. What he did and suffered, in order that he might save to the uttermost, admits of no addition. It was once done and perfected for ever. My friend, have you the benefit of this? Do you enjoy it in your conscience; and there read, and there maintain, a full and everlasting repeal from the sentence of death? This is the honour Jesus claims of you, and it is the highest you can pay him. You can do him no greater homage, no more acceptable worship, than to put your entire dependence, without any the least drawing back, or wavering, on his life and death, as your whole deliverance from sin and death, as your clear title to heaven and glory. When faith shows you the divine majesty of Mary's Son, and the everlasting honours of his obedience unto death, then will the peace of God rule in your heart, and thereby you will glorify the blood and the righteousness of the Redeemer, more than any angel, more than any happy spirit around his throne.

The enemy long, too—too long, kept me from that enjoyment, by wiles and snares, chiefly legal views and self-righteous plans. Still he now and then gets an advantage of me. But I beg, my friend, you would beware of his devices. Are you resting upon Jesus? and do you find the sentence of death is no longer in force against you? Read, study your Bible, pray and beg for an increase of faith. This is the use of all means. May the Lord the Spirit bless them to you! Faith is your shield against the accuser of the brethren, and against your own legal workings. If you grow in this experience, you will grow more and more alive to God; you will believe, and find more of the love of a reconciled Father. The more you rest on the finished salvation, you will certainly abound more in the blessed fruits of it: such as, seeing yourself perfectly saved, your hopes will all cast anchor within the veil; your affections will get fixed on their everlasting object, and you will come under the sweet government of King Jesus. Thus living in him, you will live to him, which is not only spiritual life, but is also, indeed, spiritual liveliness. And if you ever find this decay after you once had it, mind and attend to the cause of its decay, and you will see this was the only cause; namely, your faith was therefore not lively, because you were not resting perfectly upon Jesus, as your Saviour from the sentence of death. This was the worm which eat into the gourd, and made it wither. Keep this out; it will flourish and grow as long as you have any need of faith for protection, or for happiness: and when the time comes that faith is to be no more, what is dying? Is it not in the hand of Jesus? Does not he appoint it, fix it, send it? has not he promised to be with you in the hour of death, to keep you from the fear and from the power of it? is not he faithful, almighty, all-loving? His love wants no power to make his promises good to his dying friends; yea, he does make them good every day. He will to you, doubt it not. I have written till my time is up. You are sure my subject is not exhausted; no, never will be. But I am forced to stop. My dear friend, pray for me. You know my profession of love for your soul. God knows my heart. Adieu.

LETTER CCLII.

June 11.

THANKS to my dear friend for her last. It was a great refreshment to me. Oh, how does my spirit rejoice to see the blessed Jesus crowned and exalted in your soul, and no other name mentioned in your lips, no dependence upon any being or thing in your heart or life, but that God-Man. This is the point. Here may we fix. But, alas! although I would fix, and never so much as turn my eye from hence, I find so many enemies within and without, that it is hard keeping our hold, and never letting it go. In this warfare the flesh and the Spirit fight without ceasing; the flesh against Christ's sufficiency, and the Spirit for him. But, thanks be to his grace, the Spirit is almighty, and he has given the flesh in all believers a mortal wound, of which it will ere long bleed to death. And then, oh, blessed prospect, we shall see the Captain of our salvation, through whom we conquered, face to face! That is enough. There is heaven. May you and I, till we get there, learn daily to make more use of Christ. Our dear fellow soldier, Lady H——n, fights bravely. She went to Brighthelmstone this day se'nnight. I had a sweet letter from her this morning. She is happy in the adorable Immanuel, and lives to him and for him. Her only view in Sussex is to carry his glad tidings to a wretched, ignorant people. He has hitherto prospered her design, and while he smiles upon it, I believe she will not give it up.

God willing, I shall leave London on the 20th of this month; but am not yet determined how I shall travel. In hopes of the pleasure of meeting you, I will trouble you with a line, as soon as I know whether I ride, or come in the coach, or in a post chaise. My dear, ever, ever dear Lord and Master keep you! To his sweet and tender heart I commend you, and am, for his precious name's sake, your faithful friend and servant,

LETTER CCLIII

BLACKFRIARS, May 2, 1769.

I WROTE to my good friend at Christmas, and got an answer at Easter. Indeed, I began to think you had dropped me; for I make myself sure of nothing, but of my dear Lord's unchangeable love. Yet I corrected myself for thinking so of you: but I was tempted, and I have combustible enough to feed any, yea, every temptation. The Lord keep me from others, as he did from this.

You ask my opinion of inoculation. People, who reason upon worldly motives, may do as they please. To others I would relate the case of a great doctor in divinity, and a great Christian, who had an only son. His wife was for, the doctor was against, inoculation. They had many disputes about it. The doctor said he could not do it in faith—the wife said she could do it, because she believed it to be for the best. Neither side would yield: so they agreed to put it off till the one or the other should give up their opinion, and both be of one mind. The child was thus left in God's hand—he got the small-pox in the natural way, and did well.

I attend to your complaints of yourself. They are true. You might make a thousand more, and alike true. But, my dear friend, what of all this? Is not Jesus the Saviour of such sinners as you are? Pray, take heed of getting into a complaining temper, and contracting a habit of it; for there is no greater enemy to Jesus, to the growth of your communion with him, and to the liveliness of your heart towards him. I would have you sensible of all your causes of complaint, but satisfied under them, and willing to be just what you are. In this poverty of spirit, needy, sinful, helpless, dependent temper, consists the very life of faith: for while you feel thus, every thing in you and about you says, "You must go to Jesus—you can do nothing without him—he must counsel, and strengthen, and comfort—he must save—he must be a Jesus to you every moment, and in every thing." What reply does the believer make? "It is true, without him I can do nothing—I am helpless, and his strength is perfected in my utter weakness; most gladly, therefore, do I glory in my weakness, that the strength of Christ may rest upon me." Oh, for more of Paul's happy experience! He had no such gladness as that which arose from communion with Jesus, and he gloried in that, which helped him to this communion, by making it absolutely necessary for him. He did not commit sin on purpose; but, being a sinner, he did not wish to be one in himself; it was his joy, yea, his crown of rejoicing that God-Jesus and sinful Paul were one. Here he found his heaven; Jesus was united to the sinner, as meat is to the hungry; and Paul lived upon him, feasted on him, enjoyed Jesus, as the hungry do their meat. It was such a feast, that Paul would not wish to have no appetite, but rather to have it enlarged, that he might live more upon the bread of God, and grow up more into Christ Jesus.

What! must I always be this poor needy sinner? Yes; always, till you get into heaven. And then you will be perfectly humbled, and have nothing within you to rob Jesus of any part of his glory. All your salvation, from the councils of eternity to the eternal fulfilment of them, will then be made plain; you will see, confess, and be happy in confessing, that sovereign grace did all for you, and in you. And in the perfect sense of this you will triumph in being a sinner saved, and in this you will triumph as long as heaven is heaven.

But thus you keep on complaining—"I find myself too often poring over my own inward sinfulness and misery, and consequently giving way to unbelief, whenever my poor reason tells me, I should be rejoicing in the God of my salvation." And what, then, unbelief is in you, felt or not; and unbelief given way to, is your burden—this makes for you. And it only proves that you are still at school, learning your second lesson, and that is, how the God of your salvation, being received, is to be enjoyed. You own he is received. You call him, the God of my salvation. Observe, my dear friend, now this Jesus is yours, all is yours. You have an undoubted right and title to Him, and to His—improve it, then, and make use of his fulness. Your estate is clear and boundless; you have only to receive the income of it in grace, as well as in glory. I pray you, my dear friend, to study this lesson, and if the Lord the Spirit help you to learn it well, it will save you from many an aching heart. Observe, Jesus is yours: after this, you are not to seek for any new title to any part of salvation. This is also secured; but you are called upon to enjoy the purchased salvation, and to be a happy receiver out of the Saviour's fulness. Suppose you live thus ever so well, receive ever so much, what you enjoy in Christ is no part of your title to Christ; what you receive from Christ is not your title to pardon, to righteousness, or to holiness. He is received for these purposes. He, Christ himself; and your enjoying him for these purposes is not your title to pardon, &c. What Christ does for you, or in you, or by you, is not to be looked at so as not to look still simply at Christ himself. What he is, and what he did for you, here is all your salvation. What he does in you, or by you, here is the enjoyment of this salvation in its fruits and effects: but these fruits and effects do not make you holy;—oh, no, the poor beggars who are fed at our king's table will never say—we pay the king for our meat by eating a great deal; or, his meat feeds us, and therefore we make ourselves strong;—or, his grace nourishes us, and therefore, we make ourselves holy. No, no; they are taught better. They will always acknowledge—the more we receive out of the fulness of Jesus, we find ourselves more happy, and the fruits of our interest in him are more abundant to our comfort, and to his glory, but our debt increases; and the better we are fed and clothed, and kept up with his royal bounty, he leaves us nothing to glory in, except his overflowing grace. In this spirit his people hear, and read, and pray, and attend means and ordinances; they do not seek holiness in these—not to be made holy by them—but they do attend in faith, sanctified first by the faith that is in Jesus, and in that faith enjoying him in all they do. Christ is my sanctification before I can do any thing aright, and what I do aright does not make me holy, but shows that I am holy. Every living branch is ingrafted into the root and stock of holiness, and its leaves and fruit do not make it to be in the vine, but only prove that it is in it. A member is not made living by doing its office. The eye does not live by seeing, but it is a living eye, and therefore sees. You must be a living member in the mystical body before you can do your office in it. Doing your office does not make you, but only shows that you are a living member. My dear friend, weigh these things well. I verily believe the Holy Spirit is now teaching you this lesson; for I see you cannot be content with yourself, nor your graces, nor gifts: improve this divine teaching, and learn to build all your hopes of holiness on Christ, made of God sanctification for you. And the more clearly you believe this, you will love the God of your salvation more; your spiritual enemies will be more subdued, and in heart and life you will be more devoted to God, to his ways and will. I give you this advice from my own knowledge. Give me credit, and try, and you will soon find cause to give God his glory.

I hope to look upon you, and say on this subject more than I can on paper. Remember me in love and respect. The good will of your unchangeable Friend be with you and yours, and me and mine.

LETTER CCLIV.

BRIGHTHELMSTONE, July 20.

JESUS be yours, all he is, and all he has! Then you will be as rich as an archangel. I hope he will be my guide, and bring me to —— on Friday next, between one and two. I am not sure, because I have not taken a place in the stage, nor shall, till I go to London, which will be on Tuesday next. If I cannot come in the stage, perhaps I may see you before. We go on sweetly in this place. Christ is indeed exalted, and reigns glorious in many a heart, as I wish he may in yours. He does—but not as you could wish. May he captivate you more with his infinite beauty, and enable you to live more blessed upon his infinite fulness, that he may keep his royal court in your soul! The more you are acquainted with him, you will grow in love: for he is altogether lovely; an immense ocean of everlasting love. The whole world is but a drop of his love—what must heaven be, where his love is to be glorified and enjoyed for ever? There we shall see him: oh, for that day! But even, by the way, as he walks with us, he makes our hearts burn within us. These sweet foretastes of his love draw us on, and whet an appetite A few more of these, and we shall get to the fountain-head, and drink rivers of pleasure for evermore. To his precious dear heart's love I commend you and yours, and am, for his sake, your friend and servant,

LETTER CCLV.

Sweet Jesus be with my dear friend! I promised you a note as soon as I was determined what way I should travel. It is now fixed for the —— stage, in which, God willing, I shall reach —— on Friday, the 24th of this month, about 12 o'clock at noon, where I hope to see some faces from —— to rejoice my heart, with whom to talk a little of our time away about that dear, dearest of all dears; the only one worth talking about. I know not of any good use the tongue is at present, but to be telling of his salvation from day to day, in the praise of which salvation it will be employed for ever and ever. May your heart and mine be ever warm with his love, and then our tongues cannot help telling of what our hearts feel. To his precious love I commend you and yours, and am, for the sake of that dear man of sorrows, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

P. S.—Strange doings at ——! A party for me, another against me. Violent on both sides. Alas, alas! what is all this about? I sent word I should preach there on Sunday, the 26th; I know not whether they will let me: if they do, I hope you will mount me on that very quiet mare I heard of last year. But more of these things when we meet. Jesus be with you. Amen, Amen.

LETTER CCLVI.

Blackfriars, March 5, 1770.

My very dear Friend.—I waited on ——, and he told me he was to call at —— in his way home. I could not resist the opportunity of sending in writing my thanks for your last kind letter. My heart rejoices, and is thankful for many things which you say in it, of your dependence on the finished salvation of Jesus, and of your desire to experience more of his graces and blessings. I see what stops you; the very same that stops me. And I would lay before you the gospel motives and encouragements to get on, revealed in the word, and I hope in some measure made useful to me by the Spirit of God.

I have remarked in conversing with you, and in all your letters, the workings of a legal and self-righteous temper, apt to nurse guilty fears, and to cherish misgivings and suspicions of your interest in the great salvation. The same are daily disturbing my peace, and are the very plague of my life. The only remedy against them is to look well to the conscience, where they have their rise, and to use all appointed means for establishing it in the peace of God. This is the main point. A holy walk, and successful warfare, depend entirely on the testimony of conscience. The believer's chief business is to learn to resist and to overcome guilt, fear, and unbelief, that, these being kept out of his conscience, the peace of God may rule there always, and by all means. Then it will be what the Scripture calls "a good conscience." And when this is good, all goes on well. Now, that is a good conscience which witnesses to the truth as it is in Jesus. Conscience, I suppose, is that faculty of the soul which, under the teaching of the Holy Ghost, compares the sinner's heart and life with the holy law of God, brings him in guilty for transgressing its precepts, and leaves him under guilt and condemnation, to suffer its just penalties. The gospel sets forth to him an infinitely perfect righteousness to satisfy the precepts; and an everlastingly sufficient atonement, even the sacrifice of Jehovah Jesus, to satisfy the penalties of the law. When he is enabled to believe in this righteousness, and in this atonement, his conscience is saved from guilt and condemnation; yea, it acquits and justifies the sinner, and brings in a true verdict for him. It says the same that God himself does: pleads its discharge from the express words of the great charter of grace, under the broad seal of heaven. With the royal grants and immunities therein graciously vouchsafed, it stops the mouth of unbelief. "Thou art freely forgiven all trespasses; thou art justified from all things; thou art a son of my love, and shall be an heir of my glory; I, even I, the Lord God, am thine, and thou shalt be mine for ever." Here the believer triumphs; and why may not you and I too? I do, thanks be to infinite grace. I believe these words on the testimony of God, as spoken to me. My conscience bears witness to the truth of the divine record. It is now a good conscience: it agrees with God, and looks upon him as reconciled perfectly; it fears to dishonour him, by calling in question the infinite value of Christ's righteousness and atonement, or by doubting of their being mine, while I feel my want of them, and have any dependence upon them. Thus the peace of God rules, takes the lead in the conscience, and subdues guilty fears; rules always. The covenant is like the divine Covenanters in the Godhead, always the same; the free grant of the righteousness and atonement of Immanuel always the same; my want of them always the same; and mine interest, though not in my sense, yet in God's purpose, always the same. These gospel motives should teach you and me to maintain this peace always, and by all means. Every thing should help to promote it. Corruptions, enemies, temptations from every quarter, should, by all means, establish our hearts in the peace of God: we should be trying at it, fighting for it; and, as it is our privilege, we should never yield, but fight hard to keep a conscience void of offence. This is warring a good warfare, when we hold the mystery of faith in a pure conscience.

Believe me, my dear friend, the management of your conscience is the first and great lesson in the school of Christ. And your chief mistakes and falls come from its not being governed by the Word and Spirit of God. Look to it, then, and hear, and read, and pray, and walk; that the testimony of your conscience may be agreeable to the truth, as it is in Jesus. Insomuch, that, when you feel any thing wrong, when you are low in spirits, your sins displease, your duties cannot please you, you should remember that these very things, rightly managed, will establish your conscience in the peace of God; because they will bring you to live entirely by the faith of the Son of God. Every new day you live to learn from them, that you have nothing to trust to but the righteousness and the atonement of Jesus; and, therefore, depending on this sure foundation, you may safely build your hopes of God's being in friendship with you, yea, in an unchangeable and everlasting friendship. Oh that your heart may be sprinkled from an evil conscience; and mind, that is an evil one, which, through unbelief, refuses to build its peace upon the life and death of Immanuel. And that is a good conscience, which has peace with God through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord, and expects all the love of the Father to come freely through his Son. This is the second lesson in the school of Christ—"How shall the heart be made and kept happy in the love of God?" I answer, by believing that he is perfectly reconciled, and loves you. While there is guilt in the conscience, and you look upon the law broken, the punishment deserved, and the almighty Judge engaged to inflict it, you can no more love God than you can love pain. But when you hear the Gospel preaching peace by Jesus Christ, and can mix faith with it, then God is discovered as related to you in the closest bond of love, even your dearest Friend, your most loving Father; which will draw out the affections of your heart to him: "For we love him, because he first loved us." His love is first, yours is second: his is the cause, yours is the effect. He enables you to believe his love to you, and that excites your love to him.

You see, then, how much depends upon the testimony of the conscience. When this is on Christ's side, and bears a faithful witness for him, then your heart will be happy; you will have joy and peace in believing, "God is reconciled to me; he is my God; we are agreed, and now we walk together. He bids me call him Father; and I know he has bowels of love and fatherly affection for me: he sees me, accepts me in Jesus, and rests in his love to me. My title is clear to all spiritual blessings; because, God being my God and Father, all things are mine."

If you live like a Christian, these should be the constant breathings of your heart. Your happy walk depends entirely on the belief of God's being perfectly reconciled to you in his Son. And, therefore, you should not be aiming at getting any new title to your heavenly Father's love, but at new enjoyment. All is yours in title; but you are to seek for more, still more possession; every day you should be seeking to believe more, to enjoy more of the riches of your Father's love in Jesus. And nothing will stop your growing enjoyment, if the peace of God rule in your heart always, and by all means.

My dear friend, attend closely to this: for want of it, oh, what sad mistakes have I made! You will always find, when your heart departs from the Lord, that there has been some guilt laying upon the conscience, and representing God to you in some other light than as your most loving Father. But, pray mind, he has always the affection, as well as the name. He changeth not in his love. He is to all his children ever of one mind. And, therefore, when you desire to enjoy his love, and in the enjoyment of it to find your heart happy, look at nothing to bring you to the Father but the Son. Read your share in his love; take possession of it; for nothing done in you, or by you, now, or at any time, but only in and for the salvation of Jesus, in whom his Father is your Father. Thus walk with him; making Christ your way, and Christ your end. Keep walking on, leaning upon Christ every step for strength, for victory over all corruptions and over all enemies, which would try to stop you from the enjoyment of your Father's love. Trust in Christ for all the blessings of it, for every thing that can keep you safe, and make you happy all your way: and depend upon it, through Christ, you will find the company and presence of your God and Father a very heaven here, as well as in glory.

Mrs. ——, would you daily walk with a happy heart? Then you must learn to make up all your happiness in the love which the Father bears to you in his dear Son. This is to be all your salvation, and all your desire. You must look quite away from your graces, your gifts, your duties. God does not love you for these: he loves you in his Son; and you in believing this are to exercise your graces and gifts, and to be found in the way of duty, that you may have fellowship with him in his love.

This is the hardest task of all. I find it so to this day, and I know your temptations: therefore, I would finish this long scrawl with an account of the influence of the former truths. Get a ready answer to this question—"How are my tempers to be regulated, and my conversation to be so ordered, that I may night and day enjoy the peace and the love of my reconciled God and Father?" The way is, to walk humbly with your God. Do not disown what the Holy Spirit has taught you: give him the honour of his own grace: he has, indeed he has, learnt you to say, Abba, Father, God is your Father in Jesus. Walk humbly with him, as such: so will you enjoy his sweet peace, and partake of his happy love. While these rule in the conscience and in the heart, the tempers opposite to them will be resisted and overcome. The Divine Teacher will discover the secret workings of guilt and unbelief, and keep them from destroying the peace of conscience By his almighty grace he will mortify carnal affections, and crucify every idol love: he will preserve the heart, as a chaste virgin, for its heavenly Lover. Rebel nature will resist, yea, always; but it cannot overcome the Lord God omnipotent; he will bring all things into subjection to himself. He will; nay, let me say he has. I appeal to yourself. Speak out for God. Does not your conscience say, "I will have nothing to do with any pretensions to be my own Saviour; the righteousness of Jesus and his atonement on the tree, are all my salvation." Does not your heart say, (I am sure I have heard you say) "This is all my desire." Do not your hopes say, "We have cast our anchor upon Jesus; thank God, we can never be disappointed." Do not your fears say, "I would not for the world do any thing to displease my God and Father. Blessed Spirit, rule in me, rule over me mortify the old man, and quicken the new man day by day."

Since God has done all this for you, oh, do not dishonour his work by hearken-

ing to proud self, the old man of sin, who is ever reasoning within you against the glory of Divine grace. He would have you to look at yourself, and to draw your safety and happiness from some pleasing views of your own goodness. He will be always tempting you to this: but remember, that you are not to look at, or to depend in the least upon, yourself, but wholly upon God reconciled in Jesus. Whatever is your own, and comes from self, is to show you the necessity of walking humbly with your God. Do not you feel to this hour, that self is made up of sinfulness, wants, temptations, and miseries? None of these should stop you, but each should help to make you walk more humbly with your God. They are to show you your constant need of salvation, and to keep you always dependent on God for it. No failings in duty, no sense of indwelling sin, no weakness, no opposition should separate you in conscience or heart from your reconciled God, but should bring you to walk in nearer fellowship with him: by which alone you will enjoy more conformity to him. Pride will be hid from you. Every high thought will be brought down: grace, sovereign grace, will reign. And the Lord will receive all, I am sure it is his due, all the glory.

Here is a wide field before me: but I stop. When you send me word that you have learnt so to manage the weapons of your warfare as to be able to maintain peace in your conscience, and happiness in your heart, and victory in your tempers and walk, then I will take up the subject where I leave off, and go on with it. In the mean time, remember this great truth—God is your Father in Jesus; you know it by faith; yea, you enjoy the comforts of it; and, therefore, the end of your walk is not to procure a title to your Father's love, but to maintain the enjoyment of it. May the Lord the Spirit make you a happy partaker of it every day more abundantly.

I hear of the goodness of our dear Lord to ——. I bless him from my heart for her. May she never want his rich cordials to comfort her soul as long as she has a body of sin and death to struggle with. My respects to all that family. May God sanctify the present dispensation to every one of them.

My kind love to Mr. ——, and to Mr. John, and every good wish for that favourite child. He grows a fine boy, and says many pretty things. Take care, my friends, of your hearts; he has rather too much room in them. Grow in love to the Giver, as you grow in love to him, and all will be well.

Recommend me to Mr. B——y; beg him for Jesus' sake to put up prayers for a cumberer of the ground. I am sure I do not forget him. May he never forget me before a throne of grace.

See how I scribble on! Throw a veil of love over all, and believe me to be in bonds never to be broken, tied by the hand of Jesus, your friend and servant,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCLVII.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I have many reasons to remember your being last year at Bath. Among other things I sent you down the first lesson, which the great and good Master teaches all his scholars. I cannot tell how well you learned it. But I understand he is very kind to you, and is taking a great deal of pains to make you a proficient. He sees how desirous you are of going to heaven, with this and the other comfort by the way: you are apt to think, as I do, that being such an infinitely loving Lord, he might very well spare it you—you might keep it, and yet keep his love. But herein we form a wrong judgment of him. For he does all things well—yea, he intends to do better for you, far better than you can even imagine. He loves you more than you can possibly love yourself; and he will send you nothing but what is for your real and best interest, and he will let you find it so. His love is almighty, and it is unchangeable. What cannot he do, what will he not do, when his heart is set upon blessing his people? It is a common thing with him to bring spiritual good out of temporal evil: he can extract pleasure out of pain; yea, he can enrich by impoverishing, and turn losses into gain. Unto you it is now given, as a matter of his choice favour, not only to believe on him, but also to be conformed to him by bearing his cross. This he is aiming at. He is going to advance you to great honour, and to make you comforted on every side. At this very time he is training you up for it. He is now going to confer some of his special mercies, some of the greatest blessings he has to give on earth; which he bestows in so certain and fixed a way, that I know his mind and will concerning you, as plainly here in London as if I was with you at ——, and you were to tell me all your thoughts: for, indeed, our Jesus is very communicative. He keeps nothing from his friends—"And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" &c. Gen. xviii. 17, 18, &c. No: He is of my court, and I will make him of my cabinet; Abraham shall be my privy counsellor. And the same Lord has raised you and me to the same dignity. Thus our patent runs: "Henceforth I call you not servants: for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth: but I have called you friends, therefore all things which I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." Our divine teacher still makes known to us what he doeth. He reveals his will, and lays open his heart. And according to what I have discovered of it, your second lesson is this. May he breathe upon it by his Spirit, and bless to your soul every line you read. Oh that all within you may say from a feeling submission to his loving correction—"Lord Jesus Christ, not my will, but thine be done."

The second lesson of the cross—or the exercise of faith in suffering.

1. They that have their portion in this life prosper in the world, they increase in riches, they come into no misfortune like other folk, neither are they plagued like other men.

2. But whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

3. He dealeth with them as with sons, having chosen them all in the same election of grace, prepared for them the same inheritance, and decreed that they should go the same way to it.

4. He will not exempt one of them, no, not his only begotten Son, who went to his crown carrying his cross; and whom the Father did foreknow, them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son.

5. Of this he has graciously forewarned them, that they might not think it strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try them, as though some strange thing had befallen them: he has also promised to be with them, when they walk through the fire, and they shall not be burnt, neither shall the flames kindle upon them. And,

6. When they come out of the furnace, they shall find many blessed fruits of righteousness, which could not have grown or been ripened by any other means.

7. Art thou, then, oh my soul, expecting the cross as thy portion, prepared to take it up as the honourable badge of thy discipleship, and ready to carry it daily, following Jesus?

8. Canst thou take it up in faith? Is this the right frame of thy heart, "God is my God, my Father in Jesus. He loves me with an unchangeable love, which influences all his dealings with me, and especially his present dispensation: for,

9. He not only loves me with an everlasting love, but he is also now waiting to communicate it to me: my present cross is his way and means of bringing it to my heart, and of bestowing on me some of its richest blessings."

10. True it is painful to the flesh: but the flesh fighteth always against the spirit, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; and therefore the cross must be laid and must be kept upon it, in order to weaken its power, and also to strengthen the new man day by day.

11. There is a needs must for the daily cross to keep down pride, and to bring every high thought of self into subjection to Christ Jesus, that we may be always learning of him to be meek and lowly.

12. Looking at the cross in this light, as the loving appointment of the Father's will, and as the means of improving faith in the Son's salvation, through the grace of the eternal Spirit, how dost thou, oh my soul, find it when it comes?

13. How is it with thee when the cross is upon thy back, and thou art carrying a heavy painful load after Jesus?

14. Dost thou see Him before thee, who went in the same way? and dost thou honour his promises, and rely upon his faithfulness to carry both thee and thy cross?

15. When thou art chastised, and sharply, canst thou kiss the rod, and bless the kind hand which takes such pains to purge out thy corruptions?

16. And when the smart continues from day to day, dost thou so far profit from it, as to be able to say from thy very heart, Father, thy will be done? Happy soul! for then thou art a partaker of his holiness.

17. When it is the will of the Father to spare the child, what profit has appeared, after he has removed the cross for a time?

18. Are there any peaceable fruits of righteousness growing or ripening in the heart? Is there more joy and peace in the Son's salvation, and more happy enjoyment of the Father's love?

19. Has the Holy Spirit deadened the life of sense, by putting the cross upon it, and thereby produced more liveliness to spiritual and to eternal things?

20. Say, is the harvest good and plentiful? Do the graces flourish? Have faith and patience been in exercise, and improved? Has resignation to the divine will been in practice, and the good of submitting to it learned by experience?

21. Thrice happy soul to whom the cross is thus sanctified! yet a very little while, and faith and patience having done their perfect work, the cross will be no more, but the crown will be for ever.

My very dear friend, this is my present lesson; and though I am a dull scholar, yet I get on a little. I wish you may get before me; for I am told the Master takes great pains with you; and I believe it. I am very certain you must carry your cross all the way through this valley of Baca. And what can I wish you better than that you may find the rain filling the pools, and you may go from strength to strength? When the Lord strikes at your comforts (and mind, your cross grows out of your comforts), oh that your heart may then feel submission, whatever nature feels! may all within you, guided and strengthened by grace, be able to say, Lord, take away what thou wilt, only take not away the light of thy loving countenance. When thou removest any of my comforts, let me not forget they were thine: thy free gift, lent me by thy love, and kept long for me by thy bounty. And now thou art pleased to require them, Lord, make thy will mine, and fill up the place which they had in my heart with thy precious love. So be it, Lord Jesus. Amen.

LETTER CCLVIII.

Nov. 13, 1770.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND.—Since last Thursday I have been in your service, heartily in it. I cannot charge myself with any neglect: and I went on more cheerfully, because I thought it was my dear Master's work, which made it pleasant. But when I heard the living was last night given to a Mr. ——, judge what a blow this was; I felt exceedingly for you. I thought of Mr. M——, and the poor people at K——, deprived of the greatest blessing short of heaven. Oh my friend! indeed I was grieved sore, and began to complain and murmur—"Why could not the Lord have given his people a pastor after his own heart? Would it not have been for his glory? Are there not many precious souls in and about K—— who will now want their daily bread?" Thus my heart was grieved; and it went even through my reins; so foolish was I, and ignorant. But I am recovered, and got into my right mind. Now I confess the Lord reigneth. He can make no mistake in his government. He does all things well, both for his own glory, and for his people's good. Mr. B—'s removal, a poor dead stick in his room, the joyful sound heard no more in K——, the mourners going about wringing their hands in the streets, &c. &c. &c.; put as many more complaints as you please, yet every one of them shall be made to work together for good. He has said it, and shall he not do it? yes, he will do it; and you shall know it, too. This very visitation shall be overruled to bring about many gracious purposes, perhaps such as these;

First, a submission to his sovereign will; that you may say, "All is well."

Secondly, self-examination: was it not for my fault, my not valuing, not being thankful for, not improving the blessed gospel, that the Lord has removed our candlestick?

Thirdly, living upon Jesus more. When the streams dry up, then people are forced to go to the fountain-head: so the means failing, his people must live upon the Lord of all means.

Fourthly, living more upon the word. If it cannot be heard, blessed be God, it may be read; prize it, meditate on it, lay it near your heart. May it be as sweet as honey, and as precious as gold, yea, as much fine gold. One single sermon to an hungry soul will be as blessed as ten thousand to one who has no appetite.

Fifthly, trust the Lord for making an opening for the gospel, even at K——, in his own way. You cannot see how; why, then, that is the time to trust, pray, believe, wait. For,

Sixthly, if the shepherd has any of his flock at K——, which I cannot doubt, then they cannot perish for lack of knowledge. He will either send the gospel to them, or them to it.

I own it is a trying time. If I was in your circumstances, I should want all that can be said to make me think the Lord was doing right; and therefore, my dear friend, I would lead you to some comfortable view of this matter. The blessed God enable you to give it up to him, and in patience to possess your soul! If your private loss be very distressing, try to divert the grief, and look at the public loss. Oh what has the church suffered in the setting of that bright star which has shone so gloriously in our hemisphere! Mr. Whitfield's preaching is over: now he is praising. We have none left to succeed him: none of his gifts, none any thing like him in usefulness. But the same glorious Jesus, who gave him to us, has taken him away. If he wants another such, he can make him out of a stone. Well, then, let us submit; let him alone, let him alone. His interest at K——, his interest in England, is as dear to him as the apple of his eye. He is managing all for the best. May you and I bow the knee, and say, "Thy will be done."

I have no more time but to follow this letter with my prayers, that the great Head of the church may teach you practically what I have been mentioning. And, depend upon it, a day will come when you will see this was right. Only wait; blessed are they that wait for him. Farewell, my good friend, and believe me to be yours in that dearest, sweetest Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLIX.

Nov. 27, 1770.

Dear Friend.—I hope we are not going to try our skill at saying fine things in the way of complimenting: I confess myself to be a malevolent creature, and have no good, and do no good, but from mere grace. Let it have all the glory. It is true, my heart is in the affair of K——, but I need not tell you, at this time of day, how much I am interested in the welfare of you and of yours. At present, it wears a promising aspect. This morning I breakfasted with my Lord C——r S——, and lady. They do not see you have the least reason to doubt but in a short time Mr. B—— will be vicar of K——, and they said many kind things of you and your family. I long for the day when my letter is to be directed to the Rev Mr. B——, vicar of K——. It cannot be far off, if the commissioners' calculation be true, that they have had a living vacant every fortnight and two days.

You cannot think how much I felt myself obliged to Mr. —— for his very kind letter. I know he does not love writing, which made it more acceptable. I beg my sincere respects to him. The matter must rest as it is, till there be a vacancy. The Lord will give you waiting faith; it is the strongest faith of all! And you will have this, and every thing needful, if you continue asking in that dear name, which carries all causes in the court of heaven. Oh keep on praying. I do love these meetings of prayer. The living of K—— was actually given away, the presentation was signed, and yet Mr. S—— cannot get it. Your prayers have prevailed. If ever there was an answer to prayer, this is. Oh that God may make it an encouragement to all of you to pray without ceasing! I am sure it has done me good, and opened mine eyes to see more of the glory of a prayer-hearing God.

Excuse my going on; my time is not mine own; I have lent it to the public, till this book of the "Walk of Faith" comes out. It was to have been about the size of the "Life of Faith;" but is already got much larger. My friends, who have seen it, will not let me abridge it, but say I must add a little more, and it will be two small volumes. My dear friend, pray for it. May God make it a sweet savour of his adorable name! It is a book of many prayers, and is the life and character of yours, in Jesus,

My wife thanks Miss B—— for her polite letter. The civilities she received were very hearty and sincere. As my wife was but poorly all the time they were in town, it is very kind in Miss B—— to look upon them in so favourable a light.

My love to the Rev. Mr. B——: I am also overpaid by his note; so we need say no more of that. I desire to share in his prayers: and do very particularly beg him to ask for a blessing upon my little books; they have been very much blessed to the author: may the same blessing attend all that read them. Mr. M—— is in my prayers. My love to Miss W——. I desire to be remembered to Mr. John, and to all the M——s. My blessing on that dear boy! God bless him!

LETTER CCLX.

Dec. 13, 1770.

My dear Friend.—I have been offering up my thanks and praise to the loving Head of the church for bringing this matter to an happy issue. Glory be to him; his delays were not denials. He only wanted us to take it from his hands, as his gift, and therefore he laid difficulties in the way. When faith was tried, he removed them. Every thing is at last ended favourably. The presentation is sealed, and is safe in my study. Although I have been more than a little hurt by dancing attendance here and there, yet now I seem ready to do a thousand times more to oblige such dear friends. You have it in your power to reward me a thousand fold. Lay out your thanks and prayers for me and mine, and especially for my little book, which is swelled now into two volumes. It is a child of many prayers; I scarce ever sit down to write, without asking a blessing upon every line. Beg it may come out with the unction of the Spirit, and carry, wherever it goes, a sweet savour of the precious name of my Lord and my God.

I would rejoice with Mr. M——, and inform him, that he must not fail to write a short letter of thanks to my Lord C——r B——, expressing his great obligations to him for keeping the living of K—— vacant, till the Rev. Mr. S—— was provided for; acknowledging how much he is beholden to him; and desiring to express it on all occasions. I mentioned, in my letter of yesterday, the necessity of writing to my Lord C——r S——.

My kind love to my dear brother, the vicar of K——: I wish he may lie low in the dust, as unworthy, utterly unworthy, of this great trust committed to him. But there is grace sufficient in Jesus; I wish he may live on that, and do all in his parish in a settled dependence on the assistance of the great Head of the church.

My prayer is for the family of the B——s, that this may be a favourable providence for them all; may the Miss M——s enjoy present and eternal salvation by means of it. But why do I leave out Mr. I——? Why, indeed? May his heart leap for joy at the good news out of Mr. B——'s mouth, and children yet unborn bless God for this happy event!

My dear Miss W——r will be among the foremost! Oh let him have his glory! pray let there be a public thanksgiving. If I was at K——, I would preach on the occasion, and recommend praise to a prayer-answering God. I wish you a warm Christmas, and warm hearts; I am sure they ought to be so; and may you and yours rejoice in the glad tidings of the birth of our dearest Immanuel! Continue your prayers for your servant in Jesus.

The Lord keep Mr. ——, and be his Jesus in the evening of his life, and his strength in age, and his comfort in weakness. So prays

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXI.

Blackfriars, Dec. 27, 1770.

My dear Friend.—Having an opportunity of sending a line in Mr. B——'s frank, which I had out of Mr. Whitfield's study, I could not help wishing you a happy new year. Happy in Jesus; happy in growing intimacy with him. I have enjoyed a little of it, and it is, indeed, heaven upon earth. Oh for more of it at K—— in seventy-one than ever before!

Acquaint dear Mr. I——m, that, at last, with great difficulty, I have settled this affair. Christmas is a casting up time with booksellers. The whole of what I have paid is only a small sum.

Expect peace only a little while. You see, lest you should be lifted up above measure, thorns grow with roses. One, two, three trials come along with the good news of success about K——. It is not your rest. Thank God it is not. You are not at home. Get ready to go when your Father calls for you. Somebody must follow Miss B——. Who can tell, but God, whether it is you, or some of her sisters? Oh, be prepared! The door is open, step into the ark; there death cannot hurt or frighten. St. Dunstan calls—farewell. Blessings on you and yours. Thank Mr. M—— for all his kind expressions. I give them their value. Pray for yours, in Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXII.

March 30, 1771.

My dear Friend.—Although I have but time to write a line, yet I could not longer forbear acknowledging your favour. My whole time has been employed this Lent with preaching and printing. My first volume is finished, and I hope to send you one by Mr. I——m, who is in town. The report you heard of my mother's death is true; she is gone a little before, and I shall soon follow. The goodness of God to her was very great all her life, but extraordinary to the moment of her death: so that we sorrow rejoicing. I really thank you for interesting yourself in any of my concerns. As to my usual summer journeys, one great motive has ceased; I can say nothing at this distance of time. I leave the Lord to plan for me: and I wish to follow no will but his. Where I shall go next summer, I have not so much as a hint yet.

My kind love to your vicar. I hear good of him. The Lord bless him in all his designs for the glory of Jesus. I desire to be remembered by you in all your prayers. Every good wish I heartily offer for Mr. M——. I am yours, in Jesus,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCLXIII.

Aug. 20, 1771.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—I have sent you in a parcel, directed to your brother I——, three volumes of the second part of the "Walk of Faith," as before, unbound, with one set bound for yourself, another for Miss W——r, a third for the Rev. Mr. B——: they come to K—— with many prayers. I have prayed it over in writing; and I am daily begging the free Giver of every good and perfect gift that he would go out with it, and own it to the hearts of his dear people. My design in writing the book was for his glory, and their good. The plan is simple. It was to show, that Christian principles are sufficient for all the purposes of Christian practice; so that whenever we fail in practice, we have first failed in principle. How should it be otherwise, since the principles are mighty through God? The same grace which teaches them, as the truth of God, gives also the experience of them, as the power of God. If, therefore, peace rules in the conscience and love in the heart, the effect will follow, as light does when the sun is risen. There will be a dependence on the promised power of God to do and to suffer his will; and this power will as certainly be put forth as God is true; so long as peace and love are maintained. Try yourself. Observe narrowly how it is that you fail in practice; and you will always see your faith gave way, and you were not living up to your privileges. I know not how I have succeeded in describing this grand mistake in the Christian walk, or in rectifying it: but this I know well, that the salvation of Jesus is absolutely, infinitely, everlastingly perfect in every part, and at the very given moment, and the belief of it will produce an even, holy, happy walk; and if this belief was perfect, (as it should be) an enjoyment of this salvation would be upon earth what it is in heaven. I pray God to carry you and me on from faith to faith, that we may daily bring greater honour to his word and to his work.

If any light or love, or joy, warm your heart in reading, remember me. My trials are very great. I have the old burden very heavy indeed—a vast body of sin, under which I groan, and great bodily pain, hard to bear. I have been to the sea for relief; but my Lord thinks proper to refuse it. When I had other trials he spared me, and never let me know what bodily pain was: but, now outward trials are in a great measure removed, this is my cross. He is merciful in all his dealings; blessings on him for his kind rod! You will find in the second volume a chapter on the outward cross, and another on the inward: they are the longest chapters, because I felt what I wrote, and because all God's children carry these two crosses to the grave. I beg your attention to the inward cross, and when you have read the chapter, be so good as to tell me how you like it. To manage it well, is the greatest lesson in the school of Christ. Oh that he may teach you, as you read, and be your prophet, to enable you to live upon him as your priest!

Many years ago I chose my motto—Cease ye from man. You see how needful it is. Place your happiness on any thing but the heavenly Lover, it makes itself wings and flies away. How many sweet hours (the remembrance is sweet) have I spent at K——! Yearly visits, pleasing and profitable; but I am debarred this enjoyment. I must learn my motto in an instance of hard self-denial. Happy for you and for me if every such disappointment lead us nearer to God. I beg your daily remembrance, as you are in mine. Every good wish to Miss W——r, and desire her acceptance of a bound set. My kind respects to Mr. M—— I wish Mr. J—— may walk with us in our way, and all his sisters

I wish that little dear, dear boy does not get some of Christ's place in your heart: God bless him, and make him a comfort to you! Write my motto upon his forehead, and remember it whenever you look at him. My love to Mr. I——m. May every blessing of the everlasting covenant be yours on earth and heaven! So prays yours in Jesus,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXIV.

Feb. 1772.

My dear friend has been thinking—"Well, I could not have expected such neglect; a letter sent in October, and not answered in January; I am surprised what can be the meaning of it!" I answer, to my shame, that I am grown very lazy, and good for nothing. It is high time I was dismissed from the vineyard; and any other master but mine would have had nothing to do with me long ago. I cannot but loathe myself, and stand wondering daily at his kindness. Never was self lower, and his loveliness higher, than in this new year. Worthless as I am, beyond all conception, yet he begun the year with vouchsafing me some delightful Pisgah views. You must know it has been a custom with me for many years to have a sermon on the New Year's Day, and to have the text of a sort of watch-word, something very short and striking, and which may serve the believers to feast upon a twelvemonth. I have found this very useful to myself, and so have others. Our text for 1772 was, "Christ is all." I send you some remarks, believing you will have fellowship with us in them, as you certainly have in that adorable person of whom they treat.

Christ has all the fulness of salvation in him, as God-man; and he has it to the glory of the Father, and of the eternal Spirit: for it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell, as in the head for the use of his members. And it pleased the Holy Spirit to testify of his fulness in the scripture; and it pleases him by his grace to bring believers to use it, and to live upon it; and then they are truly converted. All other experience is not worth one farthing. The great work of the Holy Ghost is to pull down self, and to exalt Christ. This he does effectually, and this he has done in you. Think what your debt is; try to cast it up; and send me the sum total. Say, how much do you owe to the Holy Spirit for enlightening your understanding, and convincing you that Christ is the one sun of the spiritual world. What a most blessed change has he wrought upon your mind! He has stripped you of the knowledge that puffeth up; and has sent you to Christ, and to none but Christ, to be taught the things of God. He has brought you humbled to the Saviour's feet, where you are sitting among his lowest scholars (and that is the best place) to hear his words. Thus he has glorified your divine Prophet in you; and in the matter of teaching he has made Christ your all. The Bible, and ministers, and means, have now got their right place; they are subservient to Christ's teaching. He is exalted by your use of them: for you do not go to them, but to him in them, to receive lesson upon lesson, and line upon line. Thus may you and I be found waiting upon our great Lord and Master through the year seventy-two. And when we thus put honour upon his office, and give glory to his teaching, we may expect to learn much of him: he will guide our feet in the way of peace; he will enlarge our faculties to know more of the wonders of his grace; and he will enable us to enjoy more of the heavenly sweetness of his precious love. Yes, Lord, we have great expectations from thee: thou canst teach us far more than we have yet learned. Oh make us every day humbler scholars, that, whatever we learn, the praise of it may be thine, and our growth in saving knowledge may add to thy fame and renown!

Methinks I hear you ask, "But how shall I know for certain that I am one of Christ's scholars, and that he has indeed taken me into his tuition and teaching?" My dear madam, you are to know it from what you have learned of him. You cannot be certain of it any other way. He would have you to look at his revealed truth, and to try yourself by it. Has he not made you wise in it unto salvation? Oh do, pray do, acknowledge what he has done for your soul. When you were sensible of your fallen state, in which you inherit a corrupt nature, and felt that in it you could do nothing but sin; when guilt was in your conscience, and fear was in your heart, what was it which brought you relief? To what did you look for pardon, and from whence did you expect peace with God? Your answer will show whether you are Christ's scholar, and how far you have advanced in his school.

I can make you reply (for I have heard you say as much), "Why, to be sure, I have no hope but in that offering which perfecteth for ever, and in that righteousness which justifieth from all things. This is my salvation—this, and nothing else—Christ is all: I expect no pardon but in his blood; no justification but in his obedience; no safety but in his keeping me; no happiness but in his love; no heaven but in the enjoyment of Immanuel."

Very well! this is a good confession. But who taught it you? Was it not Jesus, he who alone teacheth man saving knowledge? Has not he opened your eyes to see, and your heart to receive those most blessed truths? Yes, he has. And do you praise him as he deserves? Oh no. A thought often comes into your head, "If I had learned those things of Christ, how could it be that I am so little and so seldom comforted by them? They are full of all consolation, and I am sometimes quite empty: how can this be?" I will tell you, my good friend. The very same thought comes into my head, and plagues me. But I get the better of it. Consider where it is written, "He that is comforted shall be saved!" You are called upon to trust the work of Christ, and to trust it for yourself upon the word of Christ. His work is your whole salvation; his word, and nothing in yourself. (Here I should stop. This is the end of my paper But I cannot get done; you must let me finish my sentence, although it be to your cost. Well, you will forgive me, I proceed.) His word, and nothing in yourself, is to be your lawful warrant to call this salvation your own, and to use it for your own. Rest here, giving credit to the free promise of salvation to all that will receive it, and I will lay my life of it you will not want comfort long. You will have God's faithfulness for your security that you are a saved sinner; and the belief of this cannot but bring peace and joy into your heart. According to your faith, so will your comfort be. But if you rest not here, get comfort where you will, it will not be true; it cannot be lasting. Not true; because all comfort dwells in Christ; every thing else is emptiness and vanity. Not lasting; because frames, feelings, habits, graces, joys, &c. &c. ebb and flow. Only Christ abideth the same for ever, and only his unchangeable word can fix your comfort. Trust it; make it your constant warrant to go to Christ for comfort, and he cannot deny his word: according to your faith, so will he give unto you.

Do not think, my good friend, I would have you to walk mourning and melancholy. No. There is nothing in Christ to make you so. He is all light, and life, and love, and joy, and that without ceasing; an infinite and everlasting fulness of all blessings. I would lead you to him in the direct road, which is to lead you out of self entirely. Christ is the way: look more at him, and less at self; trust more to him, and less to your faith or comforts; live upon nothing in yourself, but live every moment upon him; do not eye his gifts so much; fix your heart upon the Giver; be always thinking of his fulness whenever you feel your own emptiness: whatever you are, or do, or suffer, let all things bring you to make (forgive me, I must go on: I take up another half-sheet, and I beseech you, again and again, let all things bring you to make) use of Christ. Read about him. Go to your closet to converse with him. Go to church to meet him. Make him your companion. Accustom your mind to meditate upon him Pray without ceasing to him as your bosom friend. Do not be shy of him; he hates shyness. Draw near; he bids you come with boldness, vile, unthankful, unprofitable, as you are: his dear heart is always open to hear your complaints, and to relieve your distresses, be they what they will. Remember, he is the Sun of our world, and you cannot be thus always in his presence without being enlightened by his rays, and cherished with his warm beams. When any are very cold within doors, and see the sun shining sweetly, they do not use to ask, "Is it my sun? May I go out to walk in this noon-day brightness, and get myself warm in this delightful sunshine? Is it for me?" Yes, make use of it, who will; it shines for you; Christ is as freely yours as that sunshine. You may walk in his light, and enjoy his comforts. You may take him for your righteousness, and your holiness; you may live on him for grace and glory. He is yours, and all he has is yours also, and for your use, to-day and for ever.

Thus you see, my good friend, how we intend to live in London through the year 1772. Christ is our all, not only in our title to salvation, but also in our present enjoyment of its blessings.—We expect a great income, and all from Christ. Our faith in him is not an empty notion (as the world thinks), but it is a reality. Christ is the substance; all besides is shadow; and by faith we now take possession of the substance. We live by him, and we live on him. We need envy nobody. What are princes to us? our estate is vastly beyond theirs; the inheritance is sure; the riches unsearchable; and the income—ask and have; and that increasing through eternity. Oh blessed, most blessed, inheritance! The prospect is not like that of Moses. He only saw the country, but we go over Jordan. We, who have believed, do enter into rest. We are living in the land which floweth with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands. An heir of this country may live in the poorest cottage at K——, and yet be richer than a king. If he live this year, as he should do, by the faith of the Son of God, what are the riches of emperors compared to his? He can look into his title-deeds, and there read two clauses, which make him rich, even beyond conception: "All things are yours—and yours for ever."

I know what you will think, as well as if I heard you tell me your thoughts. I am acquainted with the vile suggestions of the enemy. He may tempt you to doubt of these truths on account of your having still so many wants. But, my friend, the more the better. We should glory in our wants. They make us rich: for we can want nothing but it is in Christ's fulness, and laid up there for us. This makes way for a constant intercourse between you and Christ, and keeps up a holy friendship in giving and receiving. By this means a sweet familiarity will be maintained, and a growing intimacy cherished. Christ requires you would be free with him, and draw largely upon his bank. Every moment you want something, Christ says, "Here it is; come to me for it. I can deny you nothing." Oh go to him at his bidding, and put honour upon his love. Your many, your great wants, will only give him an occasion to show how much he loveth you. He has for you bowels of the tenderest compassion. He feels for you more than you can think. Blessed is that want, look at it by faith and you will find it so, which brings you to Christ for a supply.

"Do you want Temporals, read my grant, Matt. vi. 32; or Spirituals, trust my promise, Eph. i. 3; or Eternals, look at my gift in Rom. vi. 23; and be assured I will withhold from you no manner of thing that is good." Stand upon this ground, and here survey your wants; be they what they will, trust Christ for a supply. Live like a Christian, by the faith of the Son of God, for temporals, spirituals, and eternals: this is living. This is holy living; for you cannot be thus receiving every moment out of Christ's fulness, but you must feel some gratitude to your divine friend, and a growing willingness to be his debtor for grace, and to be one of his pensioners for glory. This is high living; for then has the Holy Spirit magnified Jesus in you upon earth, when you make him all and in all; and then he has given you the certain earnest that he will bring you to heaven, where you will find Jesus all, and in all, for ever and ever.

This is a little touch of our new year's gift. Pray tell Miss W——r it is our standing dish for 1772: I wish her a good stomach to feast on it with us; it is food and physic: I know she likes it. I do not doubt but in a very little time she and I shall sit down at the King's own table, and feast with him, and on him, and bless him, as long as we have our being. Pray tell them at next door, Christ is all. And tell my dear little vicar, to whom my heart is knit, to exalt Christ. Up with him, Mr. B——; come, try; up with him a little higher. Pray, and preach, and live: that Christ be exalted. God bless the lifting up of Christ in K—— pulpit! Amen.

There is nothing I wish myself of good, but I wish it to Mr. M——. I really love my K—— friends, and often think of that precious child. Oh Lord, keep him! Jesus, save him! may death never part mother and son. I wish my prayers may be heard for him. His portion with us is worth a thousand K——s. May he find with us Christ his all!

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXV.

Blackfriars, May 6, 1772.

My dear Friend.—Indeed you serve me right: it is good to settle an even account with me. I was so many months in writing; so will you be, to a day. This is rather a too hard and strict way of learning me to write oftener. I could have wished you to write again and again, and to set me an example of what I ought to do. But I submit to your judgment, and stand corrected in your way.

Hearing of Mr. I——n's coming to town, I did think of some little note; such as, "We are much hurried; time taken up greatly; so many interruptions, that when I have proposed to sit down to ask my good friend how he does, I am called away."

Nothing came, however; I am resolved to grow better. My acquaintance are still much upon my mind and heart. Distance of time and place have made no change. I love them in the Lord, and for the Lord's sake, Oh, he is kind to you. How many singular blessings have you! How highly favoured in temporals! Try to number them, if you can. How most highly favoured in spirituals, which are inestimable and eternal blessings! I feel thankfulness for you, and pray for the continuance of all your mercies, with a growing sense of your unworthiness of the least of them. Mr. I——n presses me much to say that I will come into the north this summer; but I cannot answer him directly. If I do, it will not be without spending some time at your house. He gives me a good account of Miss W——r, to whom I desire to be remembered, with my best wishes. All manner of blessings rest upon Mr. M——: may the Lord take that Isaac of yours in his arms, and lay his hands on him and bless him. Good success to my friend the vicar: tell him the king has appointed Mr. I. S. a prebendary of W——r. The hearts of kings are in the hands of our Jesus: if he be ours he will make all things ours. Remember in your prayers a friend to you and K——,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXVI.

Nov. 23, 1773.

My dear Friend.—As I have not been permitted to talk to you face to face this summer, why should not I converse with you in another way? I think it right to tell you my present feelings, and how I stand affected towards you. I believe that all the true love in the world comes from the infinite fulness of Jesus. It has no other source: and he has (eternal blessings on him!) warmed my cold heart with some of his precious love. I feel a ray of it drawing my affections to my dear friend. Its sweet influence is from above: its origin is divine: it is indeed of heavenly extraction and birth. No thanks to me that it partakes of some of the gracious properties of the fountain from whence it springs: for some of them it has, my conscience bearing me witness. And these, I confess, are not natives of mine own soil; not being planted in it, am I able to make them grow and flourish? Oh no! The God of all grace is the free giver: he is the mighty continuer: without him they would have never been; without him they would have died at their birth, and gone out like a spark in the ocean. But I do really find some of the image and likeness of my loving Lord upon my heart, and that towards you. There can be no true friendship without an union of spirit. In order to be pure and steadfast, it must be refined from selfish views and carnal motives: it must spring from no outward attachment, but from a real agreement and harmony of soul: such is the nature of Christian friendship. It is beyond all Plato's rules and Seneca's morals. They had no idea of it. Reason, the most refined, could never understand our doctrine. He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit; a most wonderful union; big with blessings, temporal and eternal. Among its temporal blessings, it is not the least that he reforms the heart and makes it loving like his own; capable of receiving his heavenly friendship, and capable of showing it to his praise by especial love to his brethren and our brethren.

In whatever view I am considering our divine friend, there is always something which gives him, and most justly, the pre-eminence. He is, and will be for ever, the most blessed head, which communicates life, and breath, and all things, to every member. In the character now before us, oh how exalted, how glorious is he! Yes, he is beyond all blessing and praise, for being a present Saviour to his people; as he mightily delivers them from the tyranny of their vile tempers, and renders them happy in one another. It is from his grace that they put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, &c. He plants those virtues in the heart; he waters them with the rain of heaven; he shines upon them; and he makes them flourish in spite of all the opposition of selfish passions and inbred lusts; indeed he does. There are persons in the world who are infinitely indebted to Jesus Christ for that brotherly love which is the bond of perfectness, and who, in some measure, walk in love, according to his teaching. But they mourn, I know they do, because they find so little gratitude to him, and so little conformity to his example. Yet some likeness there is, and they are striving every day for more, still setting out afresh: not content with any past attainment, they study both to love him more, and to draw more virtue from him, that they may love others, as Christ also loved them.

Methinks I see one of his disciples warm and eager in this pursuit. I stop him, and ask, "Sir, upon what principle is it that your heart is so set upon being like Christ? You are quite unwearied in having your own hateful tempers subdued, and in putting on the sweet dispositions of the meek and lowly Jesus."

His answer, I am sure, would be, "The love of Christ constraineth me: Oh, how I feel the blessed effect of being one with my Lord! He has taught me in my very heart to love God, and man for God's sake · to this dearest Jesus I am indebted for my paradise restored; and I am never happier than when I am sensible of my vast debt; for then I love him best, and am most enabled to manifest it to men. Beyond description, beyond conception of any, yea, all the glorified saints, is the love of Immanuel to my soul: it is, like himself, infinite and boundless; it is quite free, given to the unworthiest and to the most unthankful; a perfect love, nothing but love, such as excludes all shyness and coldness, prevents misconstructions and quarrels, yea, removes the very cause and ground of them. A communicative love, most generously bestowing a right and title to all blessings upon the beloved; for thus the grant of the great charter runs; 'all mine are thine;' and, to crown the whole, it is a lasting love, yea, everlasting, reaching from eternity to eternity. The more I study and experience of this heavenly love, the more I find my heart affected with it, and the more I wish that all my friendships may reflect some image of, and bring some glory to, the friendship of my Jesus."

Having read this passage over carefully, I can, if called upon, set my hand and seal to it. "All this I know to be true. W. R." Some little spark of this holy flame (but, though little, inestimable,) has long ago thawed my frozen heart, and has kept a warmth of affection in it, which he that kindled often hears of, in prayer and praise for you, and of which they who know you, and come in my way, hear also. Some kind providence will, I doubt not, ere long, let you hear it with your own ears. With pleasing hope I look forward to a present, because I am sure of a future meeting, which will never end. Our friendship will run coeval with our being: it is an union formed by the divine hand of Jesus, who has won our hearts, and made them one in himself, in a bond which he will not, and none else can, break: so that we may sing, in humble confidence, all our way to Zion,

The love divine
That made us thine,
Shall keep us thine for ever.

Tell Mr. B—— he is in my debt, and I wish him to get out of it; but he must pray a good deal for me before he does; so must you. Pray the more for me. Ply the throne. Mrs. Romaine joins in all.

LETTER CCLXVII

GRACE and peace be abundantly multiplied to my dear friend from the Lord Christ; may all whom she loves partake of his love! I have been kept from writing to you, and acknowledging your many favours to me and to mine, by my Master's business. As soon as I came home, I was invited to preach in Buckinghamshire, where we have had the Lord with us of a truth. Oh, what am I, that mine eyes should see such things as I see? I, who am the veriest filthy dunghill sinner that ever God suffered to live; that I, even I, should partake of his grace, as well as preach it. Oh, it is astonishing! Surely, if ever I get to heaven (and I must not doubt of getting thither) I shall beat Mary Magdalen, and Paul, and Peter, and Manasseh, all to nothing. They had not half to pardon that I have; and yet, glory, glory, glory be to Jesus, I am among his pardoned ones. Who, then, shall sing his praises in such a high note as I can? None, no, not one of them all. I am the most indebted to free grace of all that ever were saved out of hell. May my experience tend to the strengthening of your faith!

Dear madam, you almost overcome me with kindness. I shall be afraid to call and see you, lest you make me proud; for what have I good in me? Nothing. What good do I? None at all. Whatever good is in man, whatever good is done upon earth, the Lord doeth it himself. Down, then, with man: lay low his lofty looks, and up with Christ. Exalt him—too high we cannot raise him, too low we cannot humble the sinner. I would have you, therefore, not to look at me, but at my precious, dear Master. Look unto him, and you shall be saved. Look unto me for any thing, and you shall infallibly be disappointed.

Present my hearty love in the bowels of Christ Jesus to your sister W———r. I find great fellowship with her as a member of the same body, and actuated by the same Spirit: and tell her from me, that "she cannot make too much use of Christ." The more she uses him in all things, the happier will she be. To this I can set my seal; Probatum est.

I fail not to remember Mr. M——, when I am near, and have freedom with my precious Master. May you never want his presence! My wife joins in thanks, and is, with me, yours in the Lord Jesus, LETTER CCLXVIII.

Oct. 28, 1775.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—Having an opportunity of sending my hearty love to you by Mr. I——n, I could not avoid embracing it. You are often on my mind, and in my prayers. Really, my dear madam, you are one of them by whom I find the truth of what I believe concerning the communion of saints. I experience it in its comfort; for I feel with you, rejoicing in your joys, and taking part in your sorrows. I have a good account of your health, a great blessing (may it continue) and of your spiritual health, which is a greater; may that increase! and it will, as you live more in, on, and to Christ Jesus: coming daily as a poor sinner to live on a rich Saviour. This is the great secret of the gospel. Nothing should keep you from Christ. However you feel, whatever you have done, at all times, in all places and frames, go to Jesus. I have been at this lesson a great while, and though very dull and stupid, yet, through marvellous grace, I have learned something. When things go well, we are apt to rest in them: I do not. My Jesus makes them well; I thank him, and rest in him, and not in his gifts: I enjoy him in them; and when things go badly, inward or outward, I would not stay from him to complain or murmur one moment, but rejecting myself entirely, take him for my whole complete happiness. Let things go as they will, I look at Jesus through them, and would make use of them to lead me to live more upon him. This seems easy; but try it. I wish you a better scholar at it than I am. I hear you had a warning to be ready at the next door. I pray for its good effect. When the messenger comes, may every M—— lift up his and her head with joy!

I grow old, and find marks of the tabernacle's wearing out fast; but I know in whom I have believed. To him I commend you and yours. Mrs. R. joins in every good wish to all yours and you. Do not fail to pray for

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXIX.

Blackfriars, June 24, 1777.

My very good friend.—Our journey is settled for Thursday morning next; we move slowly. Hope to be with you on Saturday, perhaps to dinner. Will you desire Mr. B—— to give me leave to speak to his people, Sunday morning. I shall take it as a favour. I have seen poor D——: he is a very great penitent. The Lord has brought him through the fire, a miracle of mercy. Before this reach you, it is likely he will be adoring the love of a triune God. My journey has been with much prayer. He that makes men to be of one mind in a house, will, I hope, unite us to himself by his loving Spirit, and render us useful to each other, as iron sharpeneth iron. I do not, I cannot forget your family, Mr. M——, and your beloved Isaac. I often have them on my mind. I am, with great respect, in our common Lord, yours,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXX.

Aug. 2, 1779.

My dear Friend.—We remembered you and yours very particularly on the 7th of May last. Blessings on the birth of that day! I know more about it in 79 than I did before; and more reason to honour and esteem you. I send you inclosed a little token of respect. You had it in the last war, and it is now again expedient, yea, necessary. I hope for your helping hand in this good work. Some must fight, and others must pray. One is as much wanted as the other. If Moses does not pray, Joshua does not conquer. Prayers gained the victory. Asa has a great army of one million one hundred thousand good soldiers; but he does not trust so much to them, nor conquer so much by them, as by his prayers. Jehoshaphat's prayer of faith vanquished a vast host without fighting Read 1 Chron. v. from the 18th to the 23rd verse. On this account I beg of you, my dear friend, to join us. You have some praying people at K——: call upon them to unite on this occasion. Remember, "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," Jam. v. To-day it will avail as much as it did in the time of Elias. May God give you the spirit of prayer, that you may join the goodly company throughout the land, who will be on their knees next Sunday at eight o'clock. It is your duty. May you esteem it your privilege! and I wish you growing communion with your God; more delight daily in approaching the throne of his grace, and more blessings coming from him on you and yours. We have already many hands lifted up to engage the Lord of Hosts on our side. Mine are engaged, and I trust will not hang down till peace return.

Mrs. Romaine is with me, and well. With her and my best wishes, I am, in our dear Lord, your friend and obliged servant,

W. ROMAINE.

LETTER CCLXXI.

BLACKFRIARS, Nov. 30, 1779.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I have been taught to weep with them that weep. They cannot but feel with and for one another, who are joined to the Lord in one Spirit. That you suffer seems grievous to the flesh. I sympathize with you; but I also find the Lord is with you, supports you, yea, he comforts you: therein I do rejoice. My prayer is for much patience under his hand, and much profit from his rod. Let me direct your attention to Heb. xii. from the 5th verse to the 14th. The whole matter turns upon the character of the Person who afflicts. Is it in wrath or in love? Does he punish as a judge, or correct as a father? Mind how the sentence begins—my son; keep this upon your heart; you have fled to Jesus, you have taken the benefit of his atonement and of his righteousness; you are therefore the adopted child of the most high God. And you must not think he changes his love when he changes his dispensations. He is always your Father; and say, his rod is for the present not joyous, but grievous; yet mind, ver. 11, it only seemeth: the flesh seems to be hurt, but really it is not; it is only in appearance; look nearer; you may easily see love sending, love inflicting; and wait a little, you will have reason to thank your Father for the blessed fruits of his love. If you live, you will find them very rich and ripe. If he spare life, my first journey shall be to K——. I have great fellowship with the afflicted. I shall hope and pray for your support and comforts; my God has promised both. May they be abundant! This summer has given me great occasion to learn the same lesson with you; and I can set to my seal that God is good, and doeth good, nothing but good, to his children: to his tender care I commend you and yours. Look above, live above, both your joys and sorrows; make Jesus, at least you wish to make Jesus, your ALL. I shall be thankful for a line when convenient, to tell me more of his dealings with you; and am, in him, your faithful dear friend and servant,

LETTER CCLXXII.

Saturday, March 29.

MY GOOD FRIEND.—I have an opportunity of sending my respects to you by Mr. I——n: but I chose to give them to you under mine own hand. Although I do not see you, yet you have a place in my heart, and in and for the Lord's sake, who changeth not. I remember K—— in my best times, you and yours. One proof of it I hope to give this summer, if I am spared. Age is coming on fast; infirmities many and great; travelling is a burden. But before I go hence, I purpose once more to visit my Y——re friends; I feel towards them some of that grace mentioned Rom. i. 11, 12, which grows by giving and receiving; as, indeed, all the gifts of Christ do: the more you use, the more you have: you become richer for what you lay out. Such a wonderful fulness flows from Christ, that he who spends most for him, gets most from him. Oh that my journey may be of this kind: to your profit and mine, and to Christ's glory! I know not what time it will be; but will not wait on you without first acquainting you, and knowing what time will be to you the most agreeable.

Your dear boy is often on my mind. I am sure you do not wish him better than I do. All my advice is turned into prayer. You will give my love to Mr. B——y, of whom I hear good things. Mrs. R. desires her kind love to you and family. We had yesterday such a solemn time as I never expected to see in London. It was very truly a good Friday. My hopes revive for this guilty land; for, them that honour me, says God, I will honour: I am sure he was honoured yesterday. Let me, my good friend, not in compliment I ask, be remembered by you in prayer. My time is short. Pray that I may be kept humble and thankful. I am, with true Christian affection, in and for my dear Lord's sake, your friend and servant,

W. Romaine.

LETTER CCLXXIII.

Nov. 16, 1780.

My dear Friend.—Wave after wave—trouble after trouble—no ceasing till we get into the haven. I do not wish you out of them, but to profit by them. The furnace is to refine gold; so faith; proved, improved, yea, perfected by trials. Mind what the great Refiner says—"I will bring the third part through the fire, and I will refine them as silver is refined, and I will try them as gold is tried. They shall call on my name, and I will hear them. I will say, It is my people, and they shall say, The Lord is my God." O blessed furnace!—What! is this the effect of being put into it? does the Son of God appear for and with his suffering members?—Does he keep off the evil of suffering—give patience under it, profit from it—deaden the life of sense—quicken the life of faith—and thus bring more real good to his people from their trials than from all the comforts that ever they had? Say—It is great, an uncommon great trial: the furnace is heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated Still, this is not to destroy faith, but to refine and exalt it. The plain lesson from hence to be learnt is, we must now trust more to the Lord, and less to self. His strength must be our safety, and not our weakness. His blessings must be our happiness. I write these things, because I am praying for them. It is not so much advice as prayer. I know my Lord can, I believe my Lord will, help you in this time of need. Whatever interest I have with him is yours. None feel for you, or can more than I do.

I am thankful, however, for the grace of God given unto you at this trying time. The furnace is intended, in the Father's hand, to prove faith, and to improve it. He puts it into the fire like gold, that, upon trial, it may appear sterling; and that, losing nothing but dross, we may learn to trust him better. You now see and know that his trials of faith are acts of love. The burning bush, so far from being consumed in the flames, is cherished by them, and grows. Blessed be the name of our God! I find the miracle repeated in our visitations. In faith and patience you possess your soul; yea, the smell of fire does not pass upon you. Where could you have learnt what God has been teaching you so soon, or so well? All is well. May you see more of his love in every dispensation! Trust him. Go on trusting, without doubt or wavering, and he will grant you your heart's desire. I commend myself very earnestly to your remembrance in the best place. Mention me to your divine and almighty Friend, in whom I am, with my very best wishes, your obliged servant,

W. Romaine.

P. S. Our text to-morrow is—"We are the true circumcision," &c. Phil. iii. 3. God fulfil it, and give us this communion with the Trinity!

LETTER CCLXXIV.

May 16, 1782.

My very dear Friend.—I could not neglect this opportunity of assuring you how much I remember you in the best place. Our Lord knows the needs must of suffering. He loves you too well to deprive you of your portion. He himself went, and all his go, the same way to glory. They drink of the brook in the way; and they drink it out of the cup of salvation. True, it is bitter. I find it very bitter; as unpalatable as you can find it. But I am praying it may prove more salutary to you and to me; and this it cannot do while we murmur and complain. It is sent to stop this working of self-will. The flesh is impatient, and frets; the spirit stops its rebellion, and says—Not my will, Lord, but thine be done. Amen! May this be the end of all your trials! May you come out of them like gold out of the fire.

I hear you have a present exercise; viz. your young and beloved Isaac to be parted from you. There is grace sufficient even for this. You do not love your son more than I did mine; it cannot cross your will more than it did mine: but my son went into the army, and I do not repent; it was his choice. He has been kept, as far as I know, from army-sins; and the same good God may also keep your son. Trust him in his loving and careful guidance; and the Lord will do what is best both for him and for you.

——— Your one business is to trust your all in the hands of Christ; having received him, then to live upon him. Remember, he is to answer every purpose, body and soul; you and yours; earth and heaven. You are not living up to your privilege, if there be any person or thing that you keep back from Christ, and do not leave to his absolute management. The command runs—"Trust in him at all times, ye people." Pray him to make you willing to part with your son, as he did Abraham. Pray him to give you more faith to trust him in the Lord's hand: and then follow him with your daily prayers that the good Lord may keep him from all evil. When you have done this, the rest must be left. The Lord will do what seemeth him good: yea, he will enable you to say, Come what may, all is well.

In a bond never to be broken, I am yours in Christ. My blessing on your dear son, and prayers for him!

W. Romaine.

THE DIVINE LEGATION OF MOSES

DEMONSTRATED FROM HIS HAVING MADE EXPRESS MENTION OF, AND INSISTED SO MUCH ON, THE DOCTRINE OF A FUTURE STATE: WHEREBY MR. WARBURTON'S ATTEMPT TO DEMONSTRATE THE DIVINE LEGATION OF MOSES FROM HIS OMISSION OF A FUTURE STATE IS PROVED TO BE ABSURD AND DESTRUCTIVE OF ALL REVELATION.

PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, AT ST. MARY'S, MARCH 4, 1739.

The foundations of all religion lie in two things; that there is a God who rules the world, and that the souls of men are capable of subsisting after death: for he that comes unto God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that seek him; so that if these things be not supposed as most agreeable to human reason, we cannot imagine upon what grounds mankind should embrace any way of religion at all.—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacræ, b. 3, ch. 1, sect. 1

And Jesus answering said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven. And as touching the dead that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.—Mark xii. 24, 25, 26, 27.

THE New Testament is full of passages in which it is asserted, that Moses hath directly treated of the state in which man was at first created;—of the laws which his Creator gave him;—of his violation of those laws;—and of his forfeiting thereby life here, and happiness hereafter;—of the method of his being restored and again enabled to attain that happiness;—and of his having instituted many types and figures expressive of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of that person who was to restore man to happiness. Though these truths frequently occur in the New Testament, yet many persons have been at a loss where to find them in Moses' writings; and there hath not been a more common and popular objection against them, than what hath been drawn from hence, viz. "That the Deity could have no other end in the creation but to communicate happiness, that therefore, whenever he reveals his will to his creatures, this revelation ought to contain some means to attain happiness: because if it doth not in fact promote the happiness of his creatures, then it must either be made in vain, or to promote misery, both which are ends unworthy of the Deity, and inconsistent with his moral perfections. But the law by Moses doth not contain any means to promote the happiness of God's creatures: because there is no mention made in it of that happiness for which man was created: and because man could not answer the end of his creation, if he was ignorant of that end. The law therefore by Moses could not be a revelation from God; for God never acts in vain, and could never be the author of misery in keeping men ignorant of that great truth, which it was of the utmost importance to their happiness to be acquainted with."

It cannot be concealed, that the answers hitherto made, have given little satisfaction to the objectors. A late performance indeed promised to clear up this point, and to demonstrate the divine legation of Moses from his omission of a future state, even upon the very principles of those who rejected his authority. But this design can never answer the end, but must rather promote that very cause which it pretends to overthrow: because it strengthens and confirms the objection, and because the very foundation upon which it is built is weak and false: for it is a matter of fact, that a future state is mentioned in Moses' writings, and is so far from not being to be found there, that it makes, if not the whole, yet a very great part of those writings, it being delivered there in such plain, literal terms, that he who can barely read, may read and find it there. To those modern Sadducees who will not see it there, one may safely say upon Christ's authority in the text, what he said upon the very same occasion, "Do ye not therefore err because ye know not the scriptures," (and therefore if they had known the scriptures, they would not have erred, so that the doctrine they deny, must be contained in the scriptures) "neither the power of God:" "for have ye not read in the book of Moses," (in that part of the scriptures in particular,) "how in the bush God spake unto him saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?" (their God after they had departed this life, and therefore they existed in a future state, because) "he is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living; ye therefore do greatly err." If we may take it for granted that our Saviour hath here made a just inference; then Moses will be found not only to teach a future state, but a resurrection also of the body. "And as touching the dead," says Christ, "that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham?" Now if saying the Lord was God of Abraham, was saying that Abraham was to rise from the dead, it follows that the Jews, if they understood their own language when Moses wrote, must have known that this doctrine was taught in his writings. And if calling the Lord the God of Abraham proves his resurrection, then calling him the God of the Israelites must prove theirs: so that they must have known that they also were to rise from the dead. This conclusion cannot but be just, because Christ hath made it: and they who allow it to be just, must own that there are numerous arguments in the Pentateuch for the doctrine of a future state.

I might here show wherein the justness of our Saviour's inference consists, but that will be more properly considered in another place; however, it must be sufficient to a Christian audience, and if Christ hath said that a future state is to be found in Moses, I am satisfied every one here present will conclude that it actually is there.

But our adversaries require other proofs: their ignorance hinders them from seeing wherein the force of our argument lies, so that they are not convinced by it; but send us to Moses himself, and desire we would show them some plain texts in his writings, where a future state is expressly mentioned.

"As it was the doctrine of the reformation, and is still of the Church of England in her articles and homilies, that Moses hath treated of a future state:—as this is a subject that will give us an opportunity of clearing up the design of some part of Moses' writings:—as truth, the glory of God, the honour of Moses, and the revelation by him are concerned in this inquiry:—and as we must be forced to give up Christianity, if we cannot show where a future state is mentioned in the law, because it is all throughout the New Testament said to be there; so are we forbid by these reasons to be unconcerned in this point; they call upon us to use our utmost diligence, and require the most careful study of every Christian to find out the places where it is directly mentioned, and to give light to those where it is taken for granted and hinted at."

It would be needless to prove that there shall be a future state. This others, assisted by revelation, have sufficiently done. It will abundantly answer our purpose and fully convince every reasonable man, if we can prove the truth of these three propositions.

First, That if the doctrine of a future state could not be directly found in the law of Moses, yet there are many strong and unanswerable arguments, which suppose that it is, and prove that it ought to be there.

Secondly, That the doctrine of a future state actually is to be found in, and doth make a very great part of, the writings of Moses, the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony, being enforced upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments.

Thirdly, That therefore the divine legation of Moses may be truly and properly demonstrated upon these principles.

If these propositions could be fairly proved, there would be no room to impeach the moral perfections of God, or to accuse Moses of imposture. The very supposition upon which these accusations are grounded would appear false and absurd: and it would be seen, that they, who could not find the doctrine of a future state in the writings of Moses, did not understand those writings: that he, who pretended to give some reasons why Moses did not mention a future state, could neither do Moses nor religion any service by such a false representation of the case: and that they who believe this to be the case, are either enemies to Moses or to truth; though in the point before us he must be an enemy to both, who is so to either of them.

There will appear reason enough for these and many more such like observations when it is proved.

First, That if the doctrine of a future state could not be directly found in the law of Moses, yet there are many strong and unanswerable arguments, which suppose that it is, and prove that it ought to be there.

This will appear from arguments drawn from reason or the nature of the thing, and from the scriptures of the New Testament. And, first, from the reason of the thing. A future state ought to make part of the law, because, upon the supposition, that God intended man for happiness, it is inconsistent with his attributes to make a revelation of his will, and to omit such a doctrine in it. God hath all perfections originally in himself; among the rest infinite wisdom, because that is a perfection: as, therefore, he must know the value of every thing, both as omniscient, and as he made every thing, it follows that he can never form a wrong judgment, and being also infinitely good, can never prefer a lesser good to a greater: for nothing can appear to us with greater certainty, than, that he who hath all perfections, cannot be imperfect; or, that he who is omniscient, cannot but know, that eternal happiness is a much greater good than temporal; or that he who is infinitely good, cannot but be concerned to promote this greater good in opposition to the less. So that the supposition of the revelation by Moses coming from God, and yet omitting a future state, hath these manifest absurdities chained to it, that God must either not have seen the Jews' greater good, their eternal welfare, or if he did see it, could not have been concerned to promote it,* i. e. he is either not infinitely wise, or not infinitely good; both which are infinite contradictions. And, therefore, if eternal happiness be a much greater good than temporal, and if the Deity be infinitely wise and good, and, of course, must know and prefer this greater good in opposition to the lesser, it is almost a demonstration, that, whenever God reveals his will to his creatures, he must act consistently with those attributes, and that therefore the revelation by Moses ought almost entirely to treat of—however, to contain something concerning—a future state. If God indeed could promote the Jews' eternal happiness more effectually by keeping them ignorant of it, then this argument would not be conclusive; but this, it will soon appear, he neither could nor did intend to do.

Secondly, But farther God actually did see this greater good and did promote it, because he gave man freedom of will. For what was the intention of the Deity in creating man? Was it not to make him a free agent? To give him certain laws? To place him in a state of trial, where he was to give proof of the right use of his free agency by observing those laws, and after a sufficient time of probation to admit him to his favour and endless happiness? That this was the original intention will be readily allowed by most persons. Was man then created for such ends, and was not he to know the end of his creation? If he did not know it, how could he answer it? Being ignorant of the end for which he was created, it was impossible he could know the true reason why those laws were given him, which were designed to answer that end. So that he could not have any reason to follow those laws which were the right means to attain the end, if he knew not that there was any end, or that the means tended not to it; because if he was ignorant of the true intention of the laws, no motive could be drawn from hence to enforce his observance of them, and because it is a contradiction to assert, that a reasonable being acts without some motives, or evidence, i. e. without a reason; and it must cease to be reasonable, when it acts where it hath no end in view, or where it proposes nothing by acting: for there can be nothing to determine a reasonable being to perform any action, which he cannot discover hath any consequences, or what he cannot propose any end in doing, i. e. what he hath no reason to determine him to do. Man then being a free agent, could not be treated as such, unless he knew the end, that he night judge whether it was worthy of his choice, and would be a sufficient over-balance to the disadvantages which attended the practice of the means.* As he was to choose for himself, the case ought to have been fairly and fully stated to him: but what room was there to choose, if he was suffered to know only one side of the case, and yet it was expected of him, that he should determine upon both, and in favour of that side for which no evidence appeared; than which nothing can be more absurd and impossible. These things then being neither known nor offered to man's choice, man was made a free agent, and yet had no opportunity of giving any proofs of the right use of his free agency, in that point for which only he was made a free agent. To affirm therefore, that there is no mention of a future state in the revelation by Moses, is upon these accounts absurd, viz. That it supposes God created man a free agent for certain ends, and yet that he was not concerned to promote those ends, or to let man know that there was any end at all; and that he who made man did not know that he made him a free agent, or after he had made him, did not think fit to treat him as such; created him a being endued with a soul, an immaterial principle, equal to the angels; and yet used him as if he had given him only a body, equal to the brutes; thus preferring the lesser good to the greater, which the deity cannot do. And therefore it is a necessary consequence, that if God made man a free agent for certain ends, and yet did not reveal those ends in the revelation by Moses, he could not have treated the Jews as free agents, which he certainly did intend to do by making them such, or have promoted the greater eternal, in opposition to temporal happiness, which he always must and will do.

But in another view. Man was made a free agent, and had certain laws given him. But why was he to be punished eternally for breaking those laws? The justice of this proceeding was founded no doubt upon his knowing the consequences of breaking them; for it cannot be consistent with the justice of God to punish men for those crimes which they did not know deserved to be punished, i. e. did not know to be crimes. If men found it right to do certain actions, saw plainly that they would promote their temporal happiness, and had no other to promote, what can there be criminal in such actions? Where virtue often exposes men to dangers and hardships in this life, and vice often seduces by promises of temporal welfare; in such cases it must be fit and right that they, who have no notion of a future state, should be obliged to consult their happiness in this. Strict justice certainly cannot censure such a conduct, or punish men for doing what, according to the best light God hath given them, seems to be their duty to do.

And how is it that human lawgivers † proceed? Do they not promulgate the laws and their sanctions together? Knowing that is not a law but a matter of prudence, which they recommend to the practice of others without any sanctions. And was is not always reckoned the highest injustice to make punishments bear no proportion to crimes, to require obedience in certain points, to conceal the intention of requiring this obedience, thereby to punish the offenders not according to any prior law, but the present absolute will of the judge. This proceeding can only answer the ends of the most arbitrary government. A just lawgiver publishes his laws, shows men the reasonableness of observing, and the penalties they incur by breaking, them; thus he sets before them life and death, so that when they transgress, they know the consequences, and when they suffer, can blame none but their own sinful selves. Had not the penalties been known, the action had been indifferent, and it would have been extreme injustice to have punished, i. e. to have made that criminal afterwards, which was indifferent when it was done. But when the laws are fit and right in themselves, when the sanctions are known, and free agents have it in their power to choose, if in such circumstances they transgress, then and then only punishments are accounted reasonable and necessary.

And shall mankind act with so much wisdom, justice, and goodness? And shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Shall he alone promulgate his laws, and not show his servants the reasonableness of observing them, or the consequences of breaking them? Blind obedience, as it is not a matter of choice, can never be required by, or recommend us to, the Searcher of hearts. This is our merit in his eyes, if we have any merit in ourselves, to know our duty and the consequences of it, to be tempted by present advantages to neglect it, to prefer future expectations to those advantages, and so to resist the temptation. God himself * in scripture hath every where approved of this motive, hath mentioned the hopes of another life as the strongest motive to obedience, and therefore it cannot be consistent with the divine justice to require universal obedience, and yet to refuse men the strongest motive to it; or consistent with infinite goodness, not to communicate what infinite wisdom hath approved. If God does not afford this motive, how can he punish men for not attending to it? They are to be treated hereafter according to the choice they have made here; but if they could not think that a bad choice, which they could not discover had any bad consequences, why were they to be punished for not having more knowledge than their Creator was pleased to afford them means of attaining? Is it not cruelty that he who did not treat men as free agents here, should yet treat them as such hereafter? And what proceeding can be more unmerciful, more barbarous, than to condemn those to eternal misery, who could not know that their actions would lead them to it, and who might have been influenced to a contrary practice, by being informed that they might thereby have avoided that misery, and obtained happiness? For if happiness and misery were not offered to their choice, how could it be known which they would choose? Or if they did choose the means that led to misery, what more extreme injustice than to punish them for a choice occasioned by involuntary ignorance? If God then made man a free agent, put it in his power to make a wrong choice, and did not let him know the consequences of it, was not this, as it were, ensnaring him into misery, and intending him for destruction? † But this is the business of that being, who is the very reverse of the Deity. And therefore if the Jews were free agents, if God was concerned to treat them as such, and if without he revealed to them a future state he could not treat them as such here or hereafter, we may fairly conclude from the reason of the thing, that the law by Moses ought to contain something concerning a future state.

But to advance one step farther. The ignorance of a future state tended directly to destroy the practice of the means that lead to happiness, so that man, being a free agent, could neither be treated as such, nor attain the happiness he was intended for, without the knowledge of a future state. To this purpose, revealed reason will inform us, that the Deity is chiefly concerned to propagate wisdom and goodness: for as wisdom is the knowledge of what is right and fit in every case, and as goodness is the practice of such wisdom, these must be the chief objects of the divine care, the great points about which man's free-will was to be employed, and must comprehend the means to all human happiness. And the same reason will also tell us, that if the law contained nothing about a future state, it could make the Jews neither wiser nor better, and therefore could not treat them as free agents; so that the end the Deity proposed, by making man a free agent was, defeated by himself, and the law, a divine revelation, by the very nature of it, promoted misery. But wiser this great silence about a future state could not make the Jews; because it fixed all their views on this life; it made only the good things of this world the centre of their joys, and therefore shut out every thought of that happiness for the enjoyment of which man was created. And this must have led them to the grossest ignorance of their duty. God every where in the Scriptures claims the heart and affections of man. He cannot suffer any rival in our esteem. He expects that all our faculties should be at all times consecrated to his service: for as he alone deserves our praise and worship, he therefore expects they should be paid to him alone: hence the necessary duty of setting our hearts entirely on things above, of directing all our actions to an heavenly country, and disengaging our affections from the world. But how can man give God his whole heart and affections, and withdraw himself from the things of this life, attentive to those of another, and how can God in justice expect those duties, if he doth not reveal to man that he doth expect them? For is it not impossible that men should be more conversant with those subjects which they have no notion of, than with those of which they are masters? Was it ever expected that men should be professors of any science before they were instructed in it, or could be perfect before they had begun to learn? Is not this to require men to see without eyes, and to hear without ears? The Jews therefore could not possibly have been made wiser by being ignorant of a future state, but must have entertained these absurd notions of the law, have taken the means to be the end, or that there were means which led to no end; or that man was made for some other end than he really was; or made for no noble end at all, made only for this world to get provisions, to propagate, to die, to rot.

If then we may be allowed to suppose, that God could not make the Jews wiser by keeping them in ignorance about a future state; and indeed there is something very paradoxical in imagining, that men may be made wiser by being kept in ignorance of that end, about which all their wisdom was to be employed, we may proceed to inquire, whether this ignorance could make them better? * And here one might insist on the necessity of adding knowledge to virtue, lest men should err by following a false rule of duty, or by acting upon wrong motives. One may show, that it is of the essence of every good action, that it should be free and matter of choice, and that it cannot be so in the present case. † And farther, that the Jews must have wanted the most powerful motive to the practice of virtue, that which takes strongest hold of the conscience, hath the greatest command over our hopes and fears, influences our thoughts as well as actions, and which alone can be an adequate foundation of universal obedience. But it will be sufficient to observe that virtue, or to act conformably to the known laws of God, supposes that free agents either know why they act so, or not. If the Jews had reasons which induced them to act virtuously, then it must be either the love of the law itself (but this it could not be, because they thought it was a real pain, yoke, bondage, slavery, and called it by almost every name that denotes an unwillingness of mind, and an uneasiness of body to observe it); or the love of its consequences; that future reward which they might hope for; but this they are supposed to be ignorant of, therefore they had no reason to be virtuous; and consequently, as they were free agents, they could not be virtuous at all. ‡

But it hath been said, that we are to practise virtue because God commands us. We may perhaps in our circumstances: but if God's laws had made us miserable here, and we had no expectations from him hereafter, what was todetermine us to observe his laws? We are told that gratitude would, and that this calls upon us to make all possible returns of thankfulness to our benefactors. But if gratitude be a just sense and acknowledgment of favours received, it cannot be expressed to any being who makes us miserable. If our pleasures lie within a small compass, if there be ever something that embitters them and dulls their relish, if indulgence in them creates real pain, and if even a great part of those we are capable of receiving are forbidden, what room is there for thanks and praises? If our pains exceed our pleasures, it is absurd to be grateful: because to be pleased with pain is a contradiction in terms: and therefore, setting aside all hopes of an hereafter, there could be no room for gratitude, when we are made miserable by being brought into being. But if God should give us all the good things of this life, and make us really happy in this world, would not this be a sufficient motive to obedience without the knowledge of a future state? Neither could this of itself possibly answer the end proposed, because if men were absolutely free from wants, there could be no temptation, consequently no state of trial, and therefore no room for voluntary obedience.

This great silence about a future state, then, could not make the observers of the law either wiser or better. Every one will draw the inference, what therefore it did make them. And shall we suffer men to say that the law had such a design? That a revelation from God proposed such an unworthy end? That the moral perfections of the deity could authorize such immoral proceedings? Let us remove such unjust aspersions from the Supreme Being, and suppose a present that if we could not find out and prove that a future state does make part of the law, that however the perfections of the Deity, the end of man's creation, and the necessity of answering that end require that it ought to be there, and that our not seeing it immediately might perhaps be owing to our own ignorance, to our little insight into the customs, manners, and ceremonies of the Jews, the genius of their language, and the received opinions of the time when Moses wrote: to these and many other reasons a good man would be inclined to attribute his not discovering it immediately, before he would impeach the wisdom and goodness of God, and make him an imperfect being rather than own himself to be such an one.

But farther, the revelation by Moses could not come from God, without the doctrine of a future state was contained in it: for though it be true in fact, that God did see and prefer man's eternal happiness to temporal, though he made him a free agent, and he also might see and prefer it, and actually taught him the means to prefer and thereby attain it; yet man preferred an imaginary to a real good, made a wrong use of his free agency, neglected the means that lead to happiness, and chose the means to misery. As a consequence of this, God could not reveal his will to him whilst he was in this state, because as a sinner he was an object of the divine vengeance, of that justice which he had provoked, and of that punishment which he deserved.* If God had only left man in this state to himself, he would have been sufficiently tormented with his own terrors and despair. But that God did afterwards converse with him is a demonstration that his justice was appeased, that something had interposed to satisfy and avert the divine vengeance, and to restore man to favour and happiness. And that therefore the law by Moses, being given to those who had sinned and forfeited happiness, ought to contain the conditions upon which they might again attain it, and consequently not only the knowledge of a future state, but also the means of attaining an happy one.† For if Moses hath said, that man sinned, offended justice, could not of himself satisfy it, and that nevertheless God revealed his will to this sinful creature, is it not certain that justice was satisfied, and man again restored to favour? Otherwise what could have induced the Jews to the observance of the law, if it had not taught them some means of making this satisfaction, of reconciling them to God, and restoring them to happiness and heaven? For if they knew that God was offended with them, they must first be assured the service they paid would render them acceptable to him, before they could pay it: unless we can suppose them so stupid as to worship God without any reason, or served him to offend and provoke him more. If, then, we can prove that the law came from God, and that the Jews ever observed it as such, it must certainly follow that it ought to be full of the doctrine of a future state.

There is an objection, which too much affects what hath been already observed and is too common not to be taken notice of, that many and repeated promises everywhere occur in the law, which relate only to the good things of this life; and this hath staggered even those persons who have been influenced by arguments drawn from the nature of the thing, to own that a future state ought to have made part of the law. It is indeed true in fact, that many of the rewards and punishments in the law are temporal; but then let it be remembered that the very ground and reason of insisting so much upon these was, that it was known there was also eternal. For I would observe, that at the time when Moses wrote, the greatest part of mankind had corrupted themselves, had withdrawn their allegiance from the true God, and set up the work of his hands in opposition to him. Most of those ancient idolaters (as it might easily be proved from numerous * authorities both of sacred and profane history,) worshipped the heavens, to which they attributed very great and extraordinary powers. It is very obvious to every one who is but superficially read in the Eastern histories, or the scriptures, that the host of heaven, the queen of heaven, the sun, the light, the moon, and stars, are everywhere represented to be the objects of their worship. In consequence of this we find they asserted, that the heavens were the givers of all temporal happiness, the causes of motion, of light, of heat, of the earth's motions, of the seasons, of vegetation, the flux and reflux of the sea, the supporters of the animal economy, and of every operation in matter. But they did not stop here, they supposed them also to be independent, thought that they, whom they saw the chief rulers in this system, had this power originally in themselves. They who set up false gods, set up at the same time false redeemers, and therefore can have no benefit from the true. If then God was at all times concerned to prevent this false worship from becoming universal, lest the grand scheme of redemption should be defeated (for universal corruption must have brought on a universal destruction), then he must have been particularly concerned to keep the Jews from this crime, not only because they were the sole people upon the earth to whom he at that time chose to reveal his will; but also because it was determined that the Messiah should descend from a branch of this nation. And what was the most likely method to keep the Jews from this idolatry? If God had indeed given to the objects that were worshipped, a delegated power, he could not take it from them without destroying the system. But if he could prove himself superior to those his rivals, and demonstrate that they were absolutely dependent on him; if he could support his followers without their assistance, and destroy those who expected protection from them, this method will certainly preserve them from the false worship, and attach them to the true God: and there would be no fear of success, if God would grant the Jews all the temporal blessings which his rivals were supposed to give, and defend them in the possession of those blessings which though the false worshippers expected, yet could they not receive from their gods. And this indulgent method the Deity was pleased to take. Did his rivals pour down all temporal blessings on their worshippers? So did he on his. Were they the known causes that a land flowed with milk and honey? The God of Israel was infinitely liberal to the Jews of those favours. Were they the givers of wine and oil, and bread? Jehovah was to give these even by a miracle rather than the Jews should want. Were they imagined to be able to avert distempers from their followers? Every obedient Jew had an assurance that he should never experience sickness or pain. Did they make their followers prosperous, give them fruitful seasons, great increase of flocks and herds, rain to refresh and enrich the thirsty ground, and whatever filleth the heart of man with joy and gladness? The worshippers of the true God of heaven were indulged even to luxury in those blessings. Were they the givers of long life, of a numerous issue, of victory over enemies, of success in every undertaking, or whatever advantages the false worshippers expected? Those Jehovah was pleased to engage his omnipotence to secure to the Jews. And to prove his superiority in every respect, he by many unquestionable miracles (suited to this end) delivered his servants from the slavery of one land, and put them in possession of another, where his rivals being worshipped and overcome, made it almost impossible for any thinking Jew to doubt whether they had any power in themselves independent of Jehovah the God (Elohim) of Israel. So that this truth was fully demonstrated, that there were no other gods to whom the worship and service of man was due, but the Lord alone. This was one reason (among many others) why the good things of this life are so often promised in the law. The Deity could not have made a more glorious display of infinite wisdom, mercy, and power, than by such a condescension to the circumstances of mankind, unless by the scheme of redemption, to which this also related and was preparatory: he could not otherwise have demonstrated his superiority, or brought about his gracious designs. If this then be one undeniable reason why God insisted so much on temporal blessings, it is manifest that a future state must have been taken for * granted both by the Jews and idolaters, otherwise the end of being so very much concerned about them is lost, and the scripture must be false which asserts that God chiefly granted them with an higher view, with respect to eternal blessings.

Many authorities will be produced from Moses to prove this point, but let the argument in the text suffice at present. Thus (Exod. xx. 2.) "I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt have none other," implies they were to worship the Lord alone, because he was their God; then the sanction of this commandment, which forbids idolatry, is not present happiness, but future; or, as Christ hath inferred, the resurrection of the body. So that the blessings of heaven itself, as well as of this world, were promised to be the rewards of those who kept themselves free from idolatry. And that the idolaters also expeeted a future state is certain, because they all did something for their dead, † sacrificed to make their gods propitious to their departed friends, anointed their bodies with what was consecrated toi, and descriptive of what was to entitle them to the favour of, the gods, and afterwards carefully laid up their bodies in monuments representative of those powers which they thought their gods had to raise them from the dead. Thus much we find they did even in the time of Moses. A future state then seems to have been known both by the Jews and idolaters, and therefore if the general object of the heathens' worship were the heavens; if God was concerned to prevent this false worship from becoming universal, to effect the greatest and most merciful design, the redemption of man; and if the method he took was the best and wisest, viz. to grant the Jews all those blessings which the idolaters expected, and to secure the enjoyment of them which he alone could do, what can be more plain than that a future state ought to make a great part of the law: because we can give a rational account why God insisted so much on temporal blessings; and because it hath appeared that even these were founded upon a supposition that it was known there were also eternal; so that the objection, that temporal promises and threatenings everywhere occur in the law, need not now be a stumbling block to any of Moses' friends. It is a sufficient answer (even if we could give no better), that the Deity was with no other view so much concerned about the temporal happiness of the Jews, but as it was founded upon and tended to promote their eternal; ‡ that he was indulgent of the good things of this life, to engage their affections to him, and the good things of another; and that if he had not been pleased to proceed in this merciful manner, neither they nor we (if the vices of mankind can defeat the gracious intentions of the Deity towards them) could have had any happiness here or hereafter.

Let it be sufficient to have observed thus much from reason, or the nature of the thing, that the doctrine of a future state ought to have made part of the law by Moses. We are now to inquire what proofs there are in the New Testament that Moses hath wrote about a future state: but before we proceed to this inquiry, it will be proper to show what weight such proofs ought to have with us.

1. Then the Old and the New Testaments contain two dependent parts of one grand dispensation, viz. Christianity. This will not be disputed by any one who allows that they both came from God after the fall, and that "Christ was the end of the law," Rom. x. 4.

2. As they came from God, and proposed the same end, they must therefore be true and infallible: for God cannot deceive or be deceived, and the same end cannot be attained by contrary means.

3. Having the same end in view, and being both of them infallible, they must therefore confirm and strengthen each other's evidence: for they are both means to attain one and the same end, and one truth cannot overthrow or destroy another truth.

4. And therefore if they should contradict one another, this is a sufficient proof that they could not be two dependent parts of one grand dispensation, nor come from God, and that therefore one of them, if not both, are false and forged: because if they be false in any one point, it cannot be proved that they are infallible in all, and because the same proposition cannot be both true and false at the same time.

5. If then it cannot be asserted in the New Testament, that the doctrine of a future state is delivered in the Old, without destroying its own authority, if it be not in it, and if notwithstanding this, it is directly asserted in the New Testament that it is in the Old, and yet is not, as some men think, in fact to be found there, is it not a plain consequence that they who maintain this are inconsistent with themselves, if they do not deny and give up the authority of one of the Testaments? There cannot be a more effectual method taken to overthrow revelation than this, and I wish it may not be the cause that the author of the Divine Legation and his followers would support: they cannot be ignorant that they are labouring to set one Testament against the other, thereby to overthrow the authority of both. We grant them, indeed, that if either of the Testaments contradict each other, they cannot both be the word of God: but then we insist that they nowhere contradict themselves, and that in the present case the doctrine of a future state (as will hereafter appear) is as plainly delivered by Moses in the Old Testament, as it is asserted to be there by Christ and his apostles in the New.

From these promises it may be justly concluded, that it is an infallible proof to us, who hold the divine authority of both Testaments, that Moses hath treated of a future state in the law, if it be affirmed in the gospel that he hath treated of it there: for these are obvious and certain truths, that God cannot contradict himself, that infinite wisdom cannot be deceived, that infinite power need not, and goodness will not, deceive, and that therefore there must be a perfect harmony and agreement of all the revelations from God.

The passages in the New Testament, in which it is asserted that Moses hath treated of a future state, are so many and plain that their meaning cannot be disputed. The parable of the rich man and the beggar is a remarkable instance of this truth. (Luke xvi.) Dives, being in hell, entreats Abraham to send Lazarus to his father's house, to testify to his brethren, lest they also should come into that place of torments. This certainly was to let his brethren know that there was a future state of rewards and punishments, The answer is, "That if they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Then there is greater evidence for this truth in the writings of Moses and the prophets than even a message from the other world would be.* This inference is so direct, that whilst the words have any meaning, it will be impossible to elude the force of them, or to explain them away.

Agreeably to this place we find St. Paul preached a future state and resurrection of the body upon Moses' authority, (Acts xxvi. 22, 23,) "I continue unto this day witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come: that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first (which necessarily implies that others after him were also) to arise from the dead." Doth Moses, then, say that Christ was to suffer and to arise from the dead? And doth St. Paul affirm that he doth say so? And can any Christian after this doubt whether such doctrines are really taught by Moses? It is almost a demonstration, that if St. Paul was inspired, of course infallible, and therefore could not possibly be ignorant of what was contained in Moses' writings; and that if he hath said a future state was mentioned there, that therefore it must be there.

But let us hear Christ himself preaching the same doctrines from Moses that St. Paul did. All his disciples after his death doubted of his resurrection, and yet before they could preach this fundamental article to others, they were to be convinced of it themselves. To this end in his conversation with two of them, who were going to Emmaus, he reproves their slowness in believing that he ought to have suffered, died, and rose from the dead, as Moses and the prophets had foretold. The words are these, (Luke xxiv. 25, &c.) "Then he said unto them, O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets he expounded unto them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself," viz. what Moses and the prophets had wrote about his sufferings and resurrection.† In the following part of the chapter this truth is more fully expressed—"These," says Christ to his disciples, "are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me. Then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures, and said unto them, thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day." Doth Christ then affirm that it was written in the law of Moses, that he was to suffer, and to arise from the dead? And shall there be a Christian priest suffered in a Christian country with equal impudence and blasphemy to contradict Christ, and to maintain that such doctrines are not written in the law of Moses? Hath Christ said that those persons "do greatly err, and do not know the scriptures," who affirm that Moses hath not mentioned a future state, and is it possible that man can believe Christ to be God, who positively declares, that he "neither doth err, nor is ignorant of the scriptures," whilst he directly writes against the true literal meaning of Christ's words? And how doth it alleviate his crime to tell us, that he intends to strengthen the evidence of revelation by his system. Doth it not require too much credulity and ignorance for any man in his senses to believe that those persons are supporting the superstructure, who are removing and taking away the foundation? Christianity hath no support if Christ should fall, and either he or Moses must fall, if he affirms, that Moses hath wrote about certain subjects, and it could not be made appear that he hath once mentioned them.

But there is a passage in St. John, (v. 39, &c.) where, if words have any meaning, it is asserted, not only that Moses wrote about a future state, but that the Jews also knew he had. "Search the scriptures," says Christ, "for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." All the scriptures testify of Christ, and Moses in a particular manner; for, as he adds, "had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me."* So the Jews had, or however thought they had, eternal life in Moses' writings.† Moses, then, did write about eternal life, if Christ knew what he wrote about, and if the Jews all along believed that he had. And this sense, and this only, the argument will bear.‡ There is evidence, says Christ, in Moses, that the Messiah was to entitle you to eternal life; you think that you have this evidence in Moses, and yet you act inconsistently with yourselves by not believing in me, the Messiah, and life eternal. I will not therefore accuse you hereafter, because you did not believe my words or miracles. Moses shall accuse you, because you have not made the right use of that evidence which he gave you, and which ought to have determined you to accept me as the Messiah; and thereby that life eternal, which you think you have, and which you cannot otherwise have, in his writings.

That the Jews had such a belief and hope founded upon Moses' writings, St. Paul will abundantly convince us: in his vindication of himself to the governor Felix, he makes this confession, "After the way which they (the Jews) call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and have hope towards God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." (Acts xxiv. 14, 15.) Then St. Paul was induced from his belief of what was written in the law of Moses and the prophets to have hope, which hope from the same belief the Jews also had, and allowed they had, that there was to be a resurrection of the dead both of the just and unjust. And therefore both St. Paul and the Jews must have thought that there was in Moses sufficient evidence to determine them to believe, that there was to be a future state of rewards and punishments. Some part of this evidence St. Paul himself hath explained to us, (Heb. ix. 7, 8, &c.) "But into the second (tabernacle) went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, the Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing; which was a figure for the time then present." Then it was signified to the Jews who had that tabernacle, and by Moses who constituted it, that there was to be a way made manifest into the holiest of all. The apostle is here talking of the Jewish times, and of the ceremonies appointed by Moses, and says that he made those ceremonies figures to them of something farther; that the high priest going into the holy of holies was a figure to them, and therefore of course understood by them, that there was to be "another high priest who should carry other blood, (ver. 24), not into the holy places made with hands, the figures of the true holy places, but into heaven itself." This chapter, and indeed this whole epistle, deserves to be seriously considered by every infidel Sadducee: for if Moses hath by expressive actions or figures described the Jews' hope in a future state, and in Christ who is life eternal, and if St. Paul asserts that he hath, and that the Jews knew he had, and if we still find those very figures in the law, can any thing be more plain than that a future state ought to have made a great part of the writings of Moses? For why doth the apostle assert, that the law was spiritual, was intended to keep up the Jews' faith and hopes in Christ? Why doth he recapitulate the chief part of the religious ceremonies of the Jews, and apply them to Christ and his actions? Call them figures for the time then present. Figures of the true things—The example and shadow of heavenly things—The shadow of the good things to come—and from hence prove, that a true notion of the law must of course lead men to the gospel, if either those ceremonies had not that meaning, or if the Jews did not allow that they had?

But those happy effects which flowed from not taking the ceremonies of the law in a literal sense, and the consequent hopes of future happiness, are so fully described in the 11th chapter of the Hebrews, that every Christian must believe the patriarchs and Jews did not rest upon the temporal promises, but were as well acquainted with a future state as we are at present. The connexion between the knowledge of Christ and a future state is so inseparable, that we need not lose time to prove it: and that the faith here so much insisted on is faith in Christ, the definition in the first verse fully proves; because no other can teach us the substance of what we are to hope for, or give us evidence of the things we have not seen; and because this faith was able to effect the salvation of the soul, which none but the Christian faith can do. (Heb. x. 38, 39, and Acts iv. 12.) And certainly when "Moses esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt," (ver. 26,) this could be nothing but faith in Christ, by whose merits he had learned "to have respect to the recompense of reward:" and so all the other instances of faith in the mercies of God, which only are to be obtained through faith in Christ. Let St. Peter convince us what this faith is. "Now, therefore," (says he to the apostles and elders, who were met to consider whether it was necessary for Christians to observe the law,) "why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they," (Acts xv. 10, 11.) Then the fathers were saved by a belief in Jesus Christ, and therefore had not only faith in him, but knew that salvation also which he was to purchase for them. And if it be faith in Christ, every instance expresses their belief of a future state.* Thus Abraham certainly believed a future state, when he accounted that God was able to raise him up Isaac even from the dead. Thus the women who received their dead raised to life again; and they who did not desire deliverance from their tortures here, hoping they might obtain a better resurrection hereafter, "they who confessed they were strangers on the earth and sought after a heavenly country; they of whom this world was not worthy;" and they who, notwithstanding all their present sufferings for the sake of religion, believed that God "was a rewarder of them who diligently seek him;" and such, St. Paul says, they all believed him to be: all these must have had a perfect knowledge and strong hopes of a happy immortality. For, as he observes, "these all died in faith," so had faith in their death, and therefore did not confine their views to this life: because he justly adds, though they had not received the promises, i. e. had not seen the completion of them, yet they saw them afar off, and were persuaded of them: Acts xiii. 32, 33, fully prove, that it was the demonstration of a resurrection given us in the actual raising of Christ's body which they had not received.† Not that they had not been told of, or had not received promises, that their own bodies were to be raised. "The promise" (says St. Paul) "which "Where among the things hoped for and not seen, are clearly meant the happiness and salvation we expect hereafter, the rewards of a better life, which faith doth as really discern in the promises, as if they were actually present to the sense. Hence it is that salvation is said to be the end of faith, 'receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.' 1 Pet. i. 9. So, then, if all religious actions be derived from faith, as the main root and principle of them, and if faith doth chiefly refer to the rewards hoped for and not seen, then it must follow that it is as necessary for a believer to have a principal aim at the rewards, as it is for him to live by faith; and that he may as well pretend to be above the life of faith, as to be above the help of those encouragements of the rewards and promises proposed in scripture; and so far as faith hath an influence upon our religious actions, so far must we respect the recompense of reward." was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he has raised up Jesus again." In Acts xxvi. 6, 7, and 8th verses, and in many other places, the same expression occurs. Then it appears that God had promised the fathers he would raise up Jesus from the dead, though the fathers did not live to see and receive the actual completion of that promise, but yet, as above cited, "saw it from afar, were persuaded of it," and, fully believing it would be performed in due time, embraced it. Thus in the resurrection of Jesus was a demonstration given of life and immortality, the promise made to the fathers fulfilled, and in this sense "Life and immortality were brought to light by the gospel." Though in any other sense it could not have been first discovered by the personal preaching of Christ and his apostles; because, if the gospel brought it to light, then the Jews must have been acquainted with it· "for unto them, as well as unto us, was the gospel preached," Heb. iv. 2.

But if the author of the Divine Legation should take up the arms with which the infidels have all along assaulted Moses, and it is certain he can have no other to defend his unchristian cause but the often foiled weapons of Sadducees, Infidels, and Atheists; and if he should object in their words, "That supposing a future state was typified under the law, yet it had no better effect than if it had not, because it was so hidden and obscure that the Jews did not see it." But if St. Paul hath showed us some of the types that were intended to point out a future state, and if he hath said that the Jews knew this, that they looked beyond the types, and if it be nowhere said that they did not see and believe a future state, then one may presume that the authority of Christ and his apostles, who affirm that the Jews did see it, will convince every Christian that they actually did.* The apostle of the Gentiles forbids us to doubt of this point. "The law," says he, "was our schoolmaster unto Christ;" was to teach us first the letters, the types of which the service of the law consisted, which is the first business of a schoolmaster; and afterwards the meaning of them, what they represented, and what ideas they were designed to convey, of what persons, what objects, what actions. This is the next business of a schoolmaster, and indeed the chief. And, therefore, if the Jewish service consisted of such types, the Jews must have seen the meaning of them, not only because they could not be types to them unless understood, but also because it was the business of the law to be their schoolmaster to teach them how to understand them. And, consequently, if St. Paul hath said that there were certain types in the law, which were designed to point out a future state, and that the law was a schoolmaster to teach what they did point out, it follows that it could not but teach the Jews a future state: unless St. Paul should not have known the design of the law, or the law itself should prove a bad schoolmaster. But hear the same apostle on this subject. After he had told us, (Heb. ix. 19, 20, &c.) "That almost all things by the law are purged with blood, and that without shedding of blood there is no remission," he adds, "It was, therefore, necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens," things that demonstrated, pointed out, viz. the ceremonies of the law, under which the heavenly things were demonstrated: so spoke a language very intelligible to every thinking Jew who had a soul to be saved, and which could not be saved but by knowing and believing that they were only the types and figures of the heavenly things, which types it was necessary should be purified with these things that were also types. It was necessary that the law should contain such external objects to describe the person, actions, and sufferings of Christ, and convey the benefits of them, to purify. Christ was at a distance: it was, therefore, necessary that the wrath he had engaged to undergo, and all the circumstances of his sufferings, should be, on many accounts, pointed out and demonstrated continually till he came. The external action, the type, was necessary, because the Jews had bodies: and faith, or an insight into the spiritual sense, was necessary, because they had souls which only can be purified through faith, hope, and charity.* And thus it was necessary there should be material objects to demonstrate the heavenly things, because the eye of the soul sees only through the eye of the body: but the heavenly things themselves (which these demonstrated) by better sacrifices than these; it was necessary to the nature of the soul, that there should be faith, that it should be purified by the originals themselves, by looking at the real blood of that person, which the blood of the beasts demonstrated. All the types and ceremonies were demonstrations of something they pointed at; material representations of something spiritual, which could communicate no virtue but when carried up from the literal to a higher meaning: because those things which the law demonstrated, as remission by blood, &c. were to be rightly apprehended before effectual. The beast, till Christ came, was to be slain, his blood to be poured out, some parts to be burnt, &c. But then the benefit the sacrificer was taught to expect was from a better sacrifice than this: he was, if St. Paul may be believed, to look upon it in no other view, than as it demonstrated the great sacrifice of Christ, who was in effect "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." And, therefore, if the law did really explain its types and ceremonies, and if St. Paul says it was necessary it should do this, should contain demonstrations of heavenly things, was it not also necessary the Jews should know it?† Else how could it demonstrate what was not seen, or why was it a pattern, unless they could observe some comparison?

But if it should be said, as it often hath been, that if the Jews were always capable of this spiritual sense, what occasion for a carnal one? The reason of instituting the types hath been hinted at above, and will be more fully considered under my second proposition. But let it suffice to observe at present, that though the Egyptian religion was hieroglyphical, yet it was not therefore unintelligible: did not the Greeks travel thither for knowledge, and set up for philosophers with the small stock they had got from the Egyptian priests? And if all our knowledge come in originally by our senses, is it not absolutely necessary that we should have some outward and visible signs of what is absent and invisible? Are not the Christian sacraments such, and are they not more useful, the more plain and expressive they are? And if they had not been intelligible and adapted to the meanest capacities, with what justice could God have so often reproved the Jews by his prophets for resting on the letter of the law? or where would be the crime of the apostate author of the Plain Account to degrade and sink one of the Christian sacraments into a common meal? The Jewish as well as the Christian religion was intended to make men wise unto salvation, and therefore whether or no they knew that salvation, yet certainly the means ought to have been plain and obvious, otherwise it could not have been criminal to have had a wrong notion of the means, when they were ignorant of the end. There was this occasion, then, for the carnal sense, that the spiritual could not have subsisted without it, and that we must have such helps, whilst we go through this state of trial to the regions of vision and happiness.

I have mentioned but a small part of the evidence which the New Testament affords to prove that a future state ought to have made part of the law by Moses. However, enough hath been said to convince every Christian that such a doctrine actually is there, because Christ and his apostles have asserted that it is—have produced texts from Moses to prove the certainty of it—have said that he wrote about Christ's resurrection and ours—that the ceremonies instituted by him were intended to describe the Jews' hope in a future state—that the whole law was spiritual—was a shadow of the good things to come—of the true things—an example and shadow of heavenly things—and a figure to the time then present. So it was in Moses' writings whether the Jews saw it or no; but numbers are mentioned who did see it, who saw the promises afar off; were persuaded of them, and in consequence thereof expected a happy resurrection.

But we need not rest the point here. If it hath appeared from plain arguments drawn from the reason of the thing, and from positive texts of scripture, that the doctrine of a future state ought to be found in the law, may we not fairly conclude that it is there, that it is actually to be found in and doth make a very great part of the writings of Moses. One might easily show the force of this conclusion, if we had no better proofs: but when we shall have proved our second proposition "that the doctrine of a future state actually is to be found in and doth make a very great part of the writings of Moses; the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony being enforced upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments," this will more fully clear up the point. The time will not permit me to prove and enlarge upon it at present. I will only trespass upon your patience whilst I mention one thing, which comes particularly recommended to the serious attention of every one in this place, viz. that the articles and homilies of the church of England expressly assert, that Moses hath treated of a future state. The 7th article begins thus:

* Rom. ii. 28, 29. Deut. x. 16; viii. 3. Rom. iii. 30, 31; x. 5, 6. 1 Cor. x. to ver. 13.

"The Old Testament is not contrary to the New: for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Whereof they are not to be heard, which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises."

The words of the second part of the homily on faith are these: "This is the Christian faith, which these holy men (of whom St. Paul speaks in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews) had, and we also ought to have. And although they were not named Christian men, yet was it a Christian faith that they had, for they looked for all benefits of God the Father, through the merits of his Son Jesus Christ, as we do now.* And in effect they and we be all one. We have the same faith that they had in God, and they the same that we have. And St. Paul so much extolleth their faith, because we should not less, but rather more, give ourselves wholly unto Christ, both in profession and living, now when Christ is come, as the old fathers did before his coming. And by all the declarations of St. Paul it is evident, that the true, lively, and Christian faith is no dead, vain, or unfruitful thing, but a thing of perfect virtue, of wonderful operation, of working and strength, bringing forth all good motions and good works."

If then the articles and homilies of the Church of England assert, that the fathers of the Jewish nation expected a future state of eternal happiness through the merits of Christ, we, who have subscribed to those articles and homilies, must believe this doctrine. And if men may disbelieve the articles and homilies, and yet subscribe to them—and after that subscription write directly against those very doctrines to which they have subscribed—and if they should be encouraged and countenanced by numbers who also have subscribed to them—and if that very church, which requires this subscription, should not censure such a manifest breach of her laws, which she maintains are founded upon the laws of God; this would be a most melancholy state of religion; and from such persons and such proceedings will all Christians pray,—"Good Lord deliver us."

* 1 John v. 11. "God hath given us eternal life, and that life is in his Son;" therefore if they knew the Son (Christ) they must know eternal life. Life and immortality were lost and forfeited in Adam, and restored to us again by Jesus Christ, and how then could there be faith in Christ, unless there was an assurance that he would give them the eternal life forfeited? Can that be faith in Christ, which hath no regard to what he was to do and suffer for us, or to what end he was to suffer? But if it was the same faith as we have, then the homily means, that they expected all the same advantages as we do here and hereafter, from our common Redeemer, and our common faith in him. Heb. vi. 1, 2. Acts iv. 2. Rom. vi. 23.

FUTURE REWARDS AND PUNISHMENTS PROVED TO BE THE SANCTIONS OF THE MOSAIC DISPENSATION.

IN

PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, AT ST. MARY'S, DECEMBER 6, 1741.

And Jesus answering, said unto them, Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures, neither the power of God? For when they shall arise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage; but are as the angels which are in heaven. And as touching the dead, that they rise, have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? He is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living: ye therefore do greatly err.—Mark xii. 24, 25, &c.

In a former discourse upon these words, I proposed to prove, "That future rewards and punishments were the sanctions of the Mosaic dispensation;" and it was shown in the first place, "from the reason of the thing," and from the scriptures of the New Testament, that the doctrine of a future state was taught by Moses, and known by the Jews. The second point then laid down, which is the matter of our present inquiry, is this—

"That the doctrine of a future state actually is to be found in, and doth make a very great part of, the writings of Moses; the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony, being enforced upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments."

I. And here two things are asserted, viz. "that the doctrine of a future state actually is to be found in, and doth make a very great part of, the writings of Moses." And this I shall prove by producing these texts from Moses wherein he expressly mentions it.

II. The other thing asserted is, "that the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony, is enforced by Moses upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments." And this I shall prove from these texts wherein he expressly declares, that these were the sanctions of all his laws.

And in order to clear up the truth of these two assertions, no other method can be taken but to mention the very words of Moses, and to show what they express intelligibly, and without a figure: for the view in which I shall consider the passages cited from him is this: "The rites and services of the Mosaic law, prefigured what Christ was to do and suffer for the salvation of mankind." This is a point which cannot be debated among Christians, but that the Jews understood them in this sense hath been denied. In what manner, then, a future state was contained under the types, will not be the subject of our present inquiry; not because arguments drawn from thence would be inconclusive, but because it would be more satisfactory and to the purpose to prove, "that there are such plain and express passages in Moses, which treat of a future state, and of future rewards and punishments, that no Jew, who understood Moses' writings, could possibly be ignorant of these doctrines." With this view, then, let us consult the living oracles of God. And,

I. The first text I shall produce is from * Gen. ii. 7, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Here the Holy Spirit hath purposely treated of the nature and union of soul and body—"He hath revealed that man was made up of two parts—he hath described the original of each—and the essential attributes in which they differed." The original of the body of Adam is said to be of the dust of the ground; the soul had a different original, and was created by the Father of spirits—the one was formed out of matter, and was a living animal—the other, which the Lord God breathed or infused into Adam, was produced by his immediate creative act, and was an immaterial and immortal soul. Now these two attributes distinguish the soul from the body, the distinction between them consisting chiefly in these two things—that the soul is not material, and is not mortal. And how could the Holy Spirit, when he purposely described the different nature of soul and body, make the distinction without mentioning the attributes of difference? As the reason of the thing proves this could not be done, so neither was it done. For

II. The immortality of the soul, is in this text expressly revealed. By immortality I mean, "that the soul doth not cease to exist with the body; but when the animal frame is dissolved, it continues still in the full enjoyment of all its faculties, and as susceptible of pleasure and pain in a future state, as it was in the present." And this immortality is here plainly expressed: for the word rendered life, is in the original * plural, חיים [Kiim], and used here by the Holy Spirit, not merely for the idiom of the language; because, whatever be the idiom of other languages, it is the undoubted idiom of the sacred language to represent things as they are, which it cannot do, if it were to express an attribute of unity by a word carrying in it the idea of plurality; and not used for want of a singular noun, because it frequently occurs in the † singular number: but it is here used to express an attribute which distinguished the soul from the body; for the text says, that the body had but life, or was living, in distinction to the soul which had lives. Now the soul which hath lives must of necessity have more than one—the present life can be but one—therefore the soul hath another life—and another life being not the present, must of necessity be a future—and a future life, or the soul's continuing to exist after the dissolution of the body, being what is meant by the immortality of the soul; in this text, therefore, it is, as expressly as words can speak, revealed, that the soul of man is immortal. And how could the Holy Spirit have laid this doctrine open to the Jews in a plainer manner than by revealing, that the soul which the Lord God breathed or infused into the body of Adam, was not made up of frail materials, and liable to be dissolved: but did continue to exist after its separation? And whilst the Jews understood their own language, how could they be ignorant of a doctrine laid open to them in so plain a manner? And

III. Besides this reasoning drawn from the meaning of the words, there is an infallible authority which hath fixed their meaning, and thereby unanswerably proved, that the reasoning drawn from them is just. St. Peter speaking by the same Spirit of God which spake in Moses hath proved, that David foretold the resurrection of Christ, when he said "Thou shalt not leave my soul in hell, neither shalt thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption." And then it immediately follows, "Thou shalt show me the path of lives." ‡ Now in consequence of Christ's not seeing corruption, he was to be shown the path of lives; and therefore the word "lives" here manifestly includes that life which Christ entered upon when he rose from the dead—and this was certainly an immortal life: "For they who are accounted worthy to obtain a future world and the resurrection of the dead, cannot die any more." And consequently this is an infallible proof, that the word Kiim is expressive of immortality.

IV. But further, the expression doth not only declare that there is another state besides this, in which the soul will exist; but it also justifies the latter part of the definition, "that the soul will be as susceptible of pleasure and pain in a future state as it was in the present:" for certainly to have life in the proper sense of the word, is to have what always attends life—sensation. Life and sensation are ideas inseparably united; so that whatever being the one is predicated of, the other is of necessity implied—and whatever hath sensation must also have either pleasure or pain; for pleasure and pain are only words which stand for our ideas of certain sensations. The Holy Spirit then asserts that the soul lives when separated from the body. Now it is absurd to suppose the soul living, and yet neither sensible of pleasure nor pain; and therefore, he hath by this assertion expressly revealed, that the soul exists in a future state of pleasure and pain, i. e. of rewards and punishments.

From these reasons, then, it is evident, that the Holy Spirit hath, in this text, expressly revealed the immortality of the soul and a future state: and this is abundantly confirmed from what is afterwards revealed concerning immortality. Among the other institutions in Eden, (Gen. ii. 9,) the Spirit of God hath mentioned the tree of lives, "which was a sacrament instituted to be the earnest and pledge of eternal life."—* It was a sacrament: because the virtue attributed to it could not be naturally inherent in it, but must have depended solely on the power of the institutor. And it was "instituted to be the earnest and pledge of eternal life;" because the words assert that it was a tree of lives, or immortality; and also because, when man had by his sin forfeited this sacrament of immortality, and was taught to expect salvation only through faith in Christ, that salvation through faith in him is still called by the same name as the first sacrament of immortality was, viz. the tree of lives—"To him that overcometh," saith the Spirit, "will I give to eat of the tree of life, that is in the midst of the Paradise of God;" (Rev. ii. 7;) and in another place, "Blessed are they that do the commandments of Christ, that they may have right to the tree of life." (Rev. xxii. 14.) Here the New Testament borrows an expression from the Old, to describe the life and immortality brought to light by Christ; and therefore the expression used in the New Testament to convey ideas of a happy immortality, must certainly have intelligibly described that immortality in the Old; for the words are the same in both Testaments, and consequently the ideas which they convey in both must be the same: so that Christ is now, to fallen man, what the tree of immortality was to innocent Adam—the virtue attributed to the one, being what is also attributed to the other—Christ is really to fallen man the fountain of everlasting life; therefore such sacramentally was the tree of immortality to innocent Adam: for it would be very absurd, if Christ should be made to stand instead of the tree of immortality, and yet that tree was not instituted to effect for the innocent what he hath now effected for sinners; because then the substitution would be destroyed, and the ideas conveyed by the one or the other would be false. The tree of lives therefore was, and was known to be, because the Holy Spirit expressly declares it to have been, a sacrament of immortality; so that he hath not only revealed that the soul is immortal, but hath also revealed what was instituted to be the pledge and earnest of eternal life. And in both these passages he hath, as plainly as words can speak, expressly revealed a future state.

And though these texts be not contained in (what is called) the body of the law, yet are they nevertheless conclusive; because every Jew who read the one of them, must know that he had an immortal soul; and because, though he read that the first sacrament of immortality was forfeited, yet he could not avoid reading in the law itself, that there was another instituted: for the law taught him, not only by expressive actions, but also by the plainest words, though he was a sinner, yet there was a way still open for him to future happiness; particularly, in the following passage he was taught this literally, and without a figure. God prohibits the eating of blood upon the penalty of death; and he gives a reason for the prohibition—"For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." (Lev. xvii. 11.) Now, if we take the word here rendered "soul" to denote the spiritual part of man, this would be a self-evident proof, that sacrifices were known to have a spiritual effect, and as such the atonement they made to regard a future life. But if we take the word to denote what is always used in scripture to signify the animal frame, in what sense could the blood make an atonement for it? The end of making an atonement is to protect and secure a criminal from justice; and when this atonement is accepted, justice is satisfied. Now the present life was known to have been forfeited by sin, and how then could the Jews be so slow of heart as to imagine that this blood was to atone for the temporal life of the body? Blood could not possibly have any such virtue of its own; and it was daily demonstrated that it had no such virtue imputed to it: "For as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; so death passed upon all men, because all have sinned." And surely two thousand years' experience had sufficiently convinced the Jews of this truth, and demonstrated to them, that they were all to go down to the grave, and that the pit was to shut its mouth upon them. Against this demonstration, then, they could never imagine that blood was to atone for the temporal life of the body; and therefore they had a demonstration that there was some other life forfeited, besides the present, for which blood was to atone.

Now Moses* had taught them, in this text and elsewhere, to look upon sacrifice in a spiritual sense—that spiritual sense was the relation it bore to a Redeemer—and the blessings derived to mankind by that Redeemer were not temporal. However, an exemption from temporal death was not one of these blessings; and yet the blood which was known to typify the blood of the Redeemer, did preserve the body from some kind of death; which, being not from temporal, must of necessity be from eternal death: for, if only the present life had been forfeited by sin, the debt was always paid; and why then was not justice satisfied, but when this punishment was sure to be inflicted, it still required a further atonement? And as this atonement reached further than the present life, of necessity there was another life, which was forfeited, and for which the atonement to divine justice was made.

And can there be a plainer description of a future state than this? when the offerer, who hath by sin forfeited all title to life, brings his sacrifice before the Lord with hopes that some more perfect sacrifice would restore him to life; and with these hopes sheds the blood of the creature. This blood God absolutely forbids him to eat; and the reason of the prohibition is thus expressed—"I have instituted sacrifice to be a type of the Redeemer—the blood in which is the life of the flesh to be a type of his precious blood; which he will shed to redeem the life of man; and upon that account I have set apart blood for this use—† it is to be put upon the altar to represent his blood who is to make the real atonement for your life: for all the creatures in the whole earth are mine, and their blood can have no merit with me—the blood of the Redeemer alone can make an atonement for the life of man; and that life for which his blood is to atone, cannot be present—You will all be gathered to your fathers and see corruption; and therefore his blood is to atone for your future life; and as the benefits promised you through him are spiritual, you will then feel the effects of his atonement, when your bodies shall be raised from the dead; and ye who have believed and obeyed me, shall by virtue of his atonement be entitled to eternal life."

And this construction, it was proved, the words admit of; and it could not be mistaken by the Jews, because they could never imagine that the blood was to atone for temporal life; and therefore they did know from this text, in which it is so expressly and intelligibly revealed, that man will exist in a future state.

I shall select but one passage more from the body of the law, the meaning of which is so remarkably clear and obvious, that whoever cannot here see the doctrine of a future state, must indeed put a veil over his face in reading the Old Testament. The Holy Spirit, in reciting what God had done for his people, thus explains the intent of some of the miracles: "The Lord thy God humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna (which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know) that he might make thee know, that man* doth not live by bread only, but by every [word] that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." Deut. viii. 3. And it is afterwards added—"who fed thee with manna, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end." Deut. viii. 16. In these words the Holy Spirit declares, "God had made the Jews know that they could not subsist upon temporal support"—that as they consisted of two parts, they could not live by bread only, but must have some support for the spiritual life of the soul as well as the body: for though he had delivered them from Egypt "by signs and wonders, and a stretched-out arm," and had miraculously fed them in the wilderness with the bread of heaven; yet this temporal deliverance and support were not what man chiefly wanted, or what was to be his sole subsistence. Whilst the Almighty "opened the doors of heaven, and rained down meat upon them to the full," at the same time he told them, this was not the support they were to live by; for they were not to rest on the outside, and feed on the husks of his manifestations. God had regard to the soul in all that he did for the Jews; but the natural effects of bread cannot reach the soul: which requires some other than temporal support. But what then is the support required? for if God made them know what they could not live by, certainly he also made them know by what man doth live. "Man shall not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord shall man live." Therefore, whatever be the meaning of "proceeding out of the mouth of the Lord," this doubtless was what man was to live by. Now, after sin had entered into the world, and mankind became subject to temporal and eternal death, Christ, by the all-sufficient satisfaction he paid to the divine justice, redeemed them from eternal death, and thereby became the sole fountain of spiritual and everlasting life. And the words directly relate to him, under the character of the giver of life; for "all that proceeds from the mouth of Jehovah," is an expression used for the perfect manifestation of God in the flesh. It is used in this sense in the Old Testament (Deut. i. 26. § vii. 9. Jos. ix. 14. 1 Sam. xii. 14, 15. Is. lxii. 2.) and is so explained by Christ in the New: for when he is treating of the same subject, (viz. manna,) he uses a parallel expression, and calls himself the true bread of life, which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world: and more directly he says of himself (John viii. 42.) "I proceeded forth, and came from God;" and besides, his application of the words to the tempter, in Mat. iv. 4, Luke iv. 4, demonstrates, that they are significative of the divinity that was in him, and of that spiritual life which flowed from thence.

In this passage, therefore, the Holy Spirit hath expressly revealed—that the Jews were taught not to rest upon the types—God, he says, intended that they should, nay, he wrought miracles in order that they might look beyond them: for he taught them, that man could not subsist upon bread only—his soul required some subsistence as well as his body—and that the types rested in could not give; there being no other fountain of spiritual life but what flowed from a person of the Deity, who in the fulness of time was made flesh, and gave everlasting life unto the world.

And this interpretation doth not rest solely on the direct meaning of the words, though this indeed would be sufficient for conviction; but there is also another authority, the meaning of the words settled by that very person of the Deity, whose coming they foretold; for, upon the Jews telling Christ, John vi. 31, &c. "their fathers did eat manna in the desert, as it is written, he gave them bread from heaven"—Jesus answers "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven, but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven; for the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. I am the bread of life."

* The future tense, "Man shall not live by bread only." But bread will support the present life; therefore there is a life which bread will not support, and that life must of necessity be either a spiritual or a future life, either of which proves the truth of what I am now contending for, viz. that this text is a demonstration that Moses hath expressly mentioned a future state.

Now, as Jesus' answer, and what the Jews questioned him about, must relate to the same subject; so the truths which they establish are these: 1. That manna was a type of Christ; because by it God taught the Jews, that they wanted some principle of spiritual life, and there is no other but Christ; because our Saviour proves, that he had in him all the real effects which were attributed to manna as a type; and also because he calls himself the true bread; which word is used to denote the real, the very thing or person typified, the antitype, in opposition to the type, or what was a sign of that person or thing. 2. And it was known to be a type of Christ, because God made the Jews know what was the principle of spiritual life; and as he did this by giving them manna, then they did know that it was a type of Christ. 3. And this also proves, that they knew what was meant by "proceeding from the mouth of Jehovah."—For if manna was typical of Christ the giver of life—and known by the Jews to be typical—and known from this expression: and when our Saviour, speaking of his being the true bread of life in opposition to manna, says, "that he came down from heaven, came from the Father to give life to the world;" then these words of the New Testament must be of the same import with those of the Old: for in both they are used upon the same subject, to describe the same person, considered in the same respect, as the giver of life, and therefore this is a proof from the reason of the thing, that the meaning of the words was before faithfully rendered; and the conclusion from them, as they stand now explained, is this:

Moses lays down a proposition, and positively asserts, that God had made the Jews understand it—Christ explains this proposition, and shows how it ought to be understood.—Now he could not explain it in a different sense from what the Jews understood it in, because God made the Jews understand it in a spiritual sense, and in that sense Christ explained it; and therefore it is evident, from the testimony of two infallible witnesses, that the Jews knew Christ was to come down from heaven, and give spiritual life unto the world. And this is an express and a literal proof, that the doctrine of a future state was contained in, and was known to be contained in, the writings of Moses.

From the authority of these few texts, which have been at present considered, there is sufficient reason to conclude, that the doctrine of a future state is expressly mentioned in the writings of Moses. I pass on therefore to the second thing asserted, which indeed hath been in part already proved: for when God revealed a future state to the Jews, and the conditions upon which they were to be entitled to happiness in that state, certainly every Jew who desired and aimed at happiness, was laid under an indispensable obligation to observe the conditions, as the sole means to attain it; and that happiness, which laid him under this obligation, was an enforcement to observe the conditions—and an enforcement to observance is what properly constitutes a sanction.

II. But not to insist upon this—I proceed more particularly to prove, "That the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony is enforced by Moses upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments."

Now, in reading the books of Moses, it cannot but be observed, that there is one sanction which runs throughout the body of the law; and there is no ceremony, not the most minute rite, but what is enforced upon that sanction: to a great part of the laws it is particularly added, and not to all of them in general, that the obligation to do this, or avoid that, was founded upon the Lord's being their God. The Jews are required in particular to keep the * ten commandments, the passover †, the jubilee, the feasts, and all the other weightier matters of the law, because the Lord was their God; and upon the same sanction they are required in general to keep ‡ ALL the commandments, and ALL the statutes, to do ALL the judgments, and walk therein. This is so frequently insisted upon, that there can be no doubt of its being the sanction of all the Mosaic laws. The only inquiry then is, what is the meaning of this sanction? under what character is God here to be considered? or what is the ground of obligation? Doth God's claiming obedience of the Jews, because he Jehovah was their God, relate to some temporal character which God supported among the Jews, and to the temporal rewards and punishments which he under that character distributed? or is this properly, and in its primary sense, the sanction of future? Future rewards and punishments will appear to be what God intended, and what the Jews understood, for the following reasons—

1. And the first is, That the word Jehovah is not supposed to carry in it any sense of relation; and yet some relation is certainly implied in this sanction. As it denotes that essence which hath existence and all perfections in and of itself, it hath no respect to mankind either as created or redeemed. The essence, indeed, and the persons in it, respect us in both these relations, but then there are other words to describe them; and Jehovah is never used in scripture and it cannot be used, because the idea of the word is absolute, with relative pronouns, as it might be if the word expressed either of these relations. It is a term of distinction, signifying the different manner in which the divine essence exists from all other essences. Now, a term used to distinguish God from other beings and things, cannot be descriptive of the relation he stood in to the Jews under the theocracy: for a term which doth not imply in it any relation, cannot be used in a relative sense; and therefore it is not expressive of God as head of the Jewish state, nor consequently of the temporal sanctions, which he as head of that state was engaged to execute.

2. And besides, the sanction now mentioned is not thus worded, "I demand your obedience, because I am Jehovah: but, because I Jehovah am your God:" so the obligation arises from, and is enforced upon, that relation, in which Jehovah was to be considered. He was to be considered under the character of their God, and upon that account obeyed; and therefore the sanction is expressed in that term of relation, and not in the word Jehovah.

3. And though the word God (or Elohim) be certainly a term of relation, as the * relative pronouns frequently joined with it demonstrate, and must therefore express some beneficent character which God supports, yet it cannot possibly be that relation which he stood in to the Jews under the theocracy: for if the word stands for this relation, how can he in that sense be said to be the God or Elohim of the whole earth? (Isa. liv. 5.) The God of the whole earth could not be a local tutelary Deity: for that would be a contradiction in terms—what is local being limited and confined, and what is limited and confined being not universal: so that as theocracy was a form of government peculiar to the Jews, if this term of relation respected God as head of that government, how could it be applied to him in a universal sense? None of the nations were under such a government, and yet all the nations stood in that relation to God (whatever relation it be) which this word expresses; and therefore the word cannot be solely applied to the character which God sustained under the theocracy, or any relation in which God was to be considered as head of that particular form of government: and by consequence we shall not come at the true idea of the word, unless we consider the God of the whole earth under some other relation than that of a local tutelary Deity.

4. And besides, how could a word, used from the foundation of the world, carrying in it the idea of a universal relation, denote a particular one, which did not exist till after two thousand years? From the beginning, the Deity was known and worshipped under this name; and after the theocracy ceased, it was still his appellation as well as before, (1 Sam. viii. 7, &c.) It cannot then carry in it any particular designation of God's being placed at the head of the Jewish commonwealth, because it is not appropriated to him in that respect; and therefore, whatever sanctions it includes, they certainly were not those temporal sanctions which were solely appropriated to the theocratic government, and which God was then engaged to execute.

5. And farther, it cannot be used to express that relation in which God stood to the Jews as their deliverer from Egypt, because the nations who had received no such deliverance, did yet worship God under this name; and because the heads of the Jewish people, though not related in this sense, did yet call Jehovah their God: nay, even before it was foretold that their seed should go down into Egypt, and should be brought into bondage; but should be delivered by signs and wonders, and a stretched-out arm: even before this was revealed, the patriarchs knew and worshipped God under this relation; and therefore it cannot be the particular designation of God considered as the deliverer of the Jews from Egypt, or as their Redeemer from the house of bondage.

6. And in the next place, as the word God or Elohim is certainly expressive of some beneficent relation in which God stands to all his creatures; so must it, therefore, denote either the universal relation he stands in to them as their Creator, or Redeemer: for, under these two, all the relations he stands in to mankind in general are included. As to the character of Governor of the world, that since the fall could not have been a beneficent relation to sinners without a Redeemer; and yet the relation expressed by the word Elohim is indisputably a beneficent one. And, besides, the same person is now both the Redeemer and Governor of the world: "all power in heaven and earth being committed to Christ;" and therefore that relation, which is but a consequence of redemption, ought not, and indeed cannot, be considered separately from it. And as to the universal character God sustains as Creator, the word cannot be descriptive of this relation: for as a verb or a noun, it is never used in any such sense; and there is but one word used throughout the scriptures to denote the single and omnipotent act of creation; and, also, because it is used as a name of God in the participle passive where it cannot be applied to him in the sense of creation; for it would be blasphemy to say of God, it undeifies him to say, "He who was created." It is manifest then, from the reason of the thing, that the word carries in it some idea of God considered as our Redeemer, and is expressive of that universal and * most beneficent relation.

7. Now, it is the belief of every Christian, that the Deity foresaw the fall of man; and, before it happened, had provided a suitable remedy. This remedy was the redemption purchased by Christ; and the scriptures have represented each person of the Deity as covenanting to perform a certain part in the economy of that redemption. God the Father is here represented as demanding satisfaction for sin, and covenanting, upon a full satisfaction made, to pardon sinners: God the Son, as covenanting to make that full satisfaction to the Father, and thereby redeem mankind: and God the Holy Ghost, as covenanting to make that satisfaction effectual to the ends proposed, as sanctifying believers. That the ever-blessed Trinity did make this covenant, and actually have performed it, is the foundation of our faith and hopes; and that fallen man might never want evidence for these truths, and might therefore always have powerful motives to make proper returns of love and obedience, the Divine Persons were mercifully pleased to represent themselves to sinners under the idea of persons who had made such a covenant to redeem them; which idea the word Elohim conveys. For,

8. The term † (Elah), in human affairs, is certainly used to express that conditional penalty which they who have entered into a covenant upon oath have laid themselves under. And why may not this be the idea in divine affairs? There is no other word in the language but this from whence it can be derived; and if this be its certain derivation, then it must have the same idea as the word from whence it is derived: for it is an invariable rule in the sacred language, that all words of the same letters, and consequently of the same root, must have the same idea. So that, if entering into such a covenant be an action which we can predicate of God, then the divine name may, without offence, allude to that covenant. Now the scriptures frequently predicate this action of God: he is said to "swear by himself," Gen. xxii. 16. "To have sworn to Abraham; and to have made an oath unto Isaac, that in their seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed," 1 Chron. xvi. 16. And if, without derogating from the divine perfections, he made this oath concerning Christ the universal blessing to these particular persons, why might not the same be made for the general good of all men? But it was made to particulars, to induce a full trust and reliance on what God had sworn to perform; and with the same view God made it unto all men: "For, being willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel (to redeem man) he confirmed it by an oath, that man might have two immutable things to trust to, in either of which it was impossible for God to lie," Heb. vi. 17, 18. This is a proof that the action implies no imperfection in it, and therefore the name implies none. "It is impossible God should lie." This is an imperfection he cannot be liable to: but why, then, have the scriptures so worded the manner of the Divine Persons entering into the Christian covenant? St. Paul says they so worded it to "give man the strongest assurance of the immutability of God's counsel to redeem him." This was the reason why they represented themselves as entering into such a covenant, and as assuming the name from thence of persons who had laid themselves under an obligation to perform it. And, therefore, as the word Elah is expressive of a certain action, and as the Elohim are represented in scripture to be the agents or doers of that action, certainly it can be no diminution of the divine perfections, for God to be called by a name expressive of that action, for the name only expresses, what all the scriptures bear witness of, that he had done. And as the action was an instance of the greatest mercy which God could show to his fallen creatures, surely that mercy was heightened by revealing himself to them under that merciful name.

It being, then, consistent with the divine perfections to enter into a covenant, and be under an obligation to the performance of it; and there being but one verb in the language from whence the word Elohim can be derived, and the certain meaning of that verb being, to lie under the obligation of an oath to the performance of some covenant; therefore it is evident, this is the idea of the word: and that the covenant which it expresses, was the gospel-covenant is manifest, from the reason of the thing, which proved the relation expressed by this word, could be no other but that of redemption;* and from the usage of the word in scripture, where it is frequently confined to this sense;† and from there being no mention in scripture, that any other but the gospel-covenant was revealed since the fall of man: and, therefore, when the word is applied to the persons of the divine essence, it represents them as under an obligation, which they voluntarily entered into, to perform the gospel-covenant, and save their fallen, depraved creatures; and, upon this sense of the word, the sanctions of temporal rewards and punishments could be established: for, when God promulges his laws, and requires obedience of the Jews upon this sanction, because I, Jehovah, am your God, the obligation expressed in these words is this:

"That system of laws which I have given you, ye are to remember to keep and obey; for your all depends upon your obedience: it is obedience which secures you of my protection here. But what the system of laws I have now given you chiefly aims at is, my protection hereafter; and, therefore, in order to gain your obedience, I have enforced my laws upon this stronger sanction—I have made your title to the benefits of redemption depend on your believing and obeying what I have required. You are convinced that the persons of the divine essence have covenanted to redeem you from sin and death: this they cannot do for you here. These spiritual benefits of redemption must be conferred in a future state; and you will not receive any of these benefits in that state, unless you believe, and do in this, what I have required."

9. And this interpretation, which is drawn from the reason of the thing and the express meaning of the words, is fully justified by Christ's argument in the text. Our Saviour there asserts, that the term Elohim (for this is the word in the text he quotes, Exod. iii. 6,) is a term of relation; and it is expressive of some beneficent relation, because he says it respects God, "not the God of the dead, but as the God of the living." Now the living, whom this word respects, cannot be the persons who live in the present world, because God still stood in that beneficent relation to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, when they were dead; from whence our Saviour infers, that the covenant expressed by this word, and the blessings flowing from it, must respect a future life; for if, in consequence of this covenant, the bodies of these patriarchs were to be raised from the dead, then the covenant must relate to a future life. But in consequence of this covenant, the bodies of these patriarchs were to be raised from the dead, because God is not the God (the Elohim) of the dead, but of the living; and, consequently, as the covenant relates to the resurrection of the dead, so must the sanction founded upon that covenant.

* Psalm lxxviii. 22. Isa. xlv. 21. Hos. xiii. 4. § vi. 6. Judges x. 14. Jer. ii. 28.

† To save, to redeem, deliver, being generally attributed to the Elohim, Psalm iii. 3, "many say of my soul, there is no salvation for it in the Elohim, Selah," mind this. Heb. xi. 16, "Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, because he hath prepared for them an (heavenly) city." Here the reason given why God called himself their God, demonstrates that the word Elohim relates to, and is expressive of, the gospel-covenant.

But since our Saviour hath produced an authority from Moses, to prove that he taught the resurrection of the dead, upon which very authority Moses hath enforced the sanctions of all his laws; this, therefore, being such an infallible proof, what these sanctions were, demands a more particular consideration; and the state of the case is this:

The Sadducees, which say there is no resurrection, come to Christ; they propose a difficulty to him from the law of Moses, which they could not solve upon the supposition of a resurrection, and they desire that Christ, who preached the doctrine of the resurrection, and said he came to fulfil the law of Moses, would reconcile this difficulty with that doctrine. Christ's answer consists of two parts: first, a solution of the difficulty; and then a proof, that the difficulty they proposed was founded on a great error, viz. that Moses had not treated of the resurrection of the dead; and this proof he introduces in a very remarkable manner. "Ye Sadducees deny that there is any resurrection; but concerning the resurrection of the dead, that they rise," I can give you a satisfactory proof out of your own prophet: "for have ye not read in the book of Moses, and hath not he showed you, that the dead are to be raised, when he calleth the Lord, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? For he is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living; ye, therefore, do greatly err." And the sacred historian remarks upon this answer, "that when the multitude heard it, they were astonished at his doctrine; and that the Sadducees, the deniers of the resurrection, were put to silence."

From this fair and impartial state of the case, then, it is evident, that Christ did intend to prove from the text he quotes, that Moses had treated of the resurrection of the dead. The difficulty which the Sadducees proposed, was an objection against the resurrection; and as Christ's answer cannot but be to the purpose, it must be an argument for the truth of this doctrine. Now the exordium to this proof sets forth, that the resurrection was taught in the book of Moses—the proof is a text from that book of Moses, wherein it was taught—and therefore the exordium must directly refer to this proof, and nothing else.* And what can be a direct introduction to a proof, if this be not? Have ye not read concerning the resurrection of the dead in the book of Moses? And then immediately follows the proof which they might have read concerning the resurrection. Can any words more plainly declare, that the resurrection of the dead was taught in the books of Moses, and that this particular text was a proof of it?

But if the design of Christ's argument was to prove, that Moses had showed the dead were to be raised, wherein lies the conclusiveness of it? To be the God or Elohim of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, it was before proved, was to stand related to them under the character of Redeemer, and particularly to be under a covenant to redeem them from sin and death; for redemption could not regard fallen man in any other respect than as a sinner, and as liable to the punishment of sin. Now it was impossible that God, who had represented himself to them, as under a covenant, should lie; and yet all these patriarchs suffered death, the punishment of sin: and whilst their bodies continued in the grave, they had not received the benefit of God's being under such a covenant, because by that covenant man was to be redeemed from sin and death; but whilst death reigned over the patriarchs, they had not received that redemption: and therefore, since that redemption was not effected and completed in this world, of necessity there must be another world, in which their bodies will be raised to life and immortality. *

And besides, even when these patriarchs were dead, God still stood in that beneficent relation to them which the word Elohim expresses. Now that beneficent relation doth not respect mankind as dead, but as living: God is not the God of the dead—He is not the Elohim of those who are to lie for ever under the power of death—He cannot be said to stand in any beneficent relation to them; for a beneficent relation regards them who are sensible of God; but they cannot be sensible of it over whom death reigneth for ever. The living, the living only, are sensible of good, and God is the God of the living; and yet, if the patriarchs be dead for ever, he cannot be the God of the living. Whilst their bodies continue in the grave, they are dead: but he hath covenanted not to be the God of the dead; their bodies therefore must rise from the dead before he can fulfil the gospel covenant—He must raise them up into a future life, before he can be what his name Elohim imports: for he cannot act up to, and complete, that beneficent relation which he stands in to them, until their bodies be raised from the dead. Then shall they be of the number of those happy living, who will praise him indeed, when feeling the blessed effects of that beneficent relation, they shall have a conviction from sense, which we now can have only from faith—that God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

Christ, then, who is an infallible interpreter of Moses, asserts, that Moses hath treated of the resurrection of the dead; he brings an argument from Moses to prove it. The argument is—God says unto Moses, that he was nevertheless the Elohim of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, though they were dead—being their Elohim even, then, Christ declares, is a proof that he still stood in some beneficent relation to them. But he could not stand in any beneficent relation to those who were dead for ever, because he is not the God of the dead; therefore that beneficent relation regards them as living, and they cannot be living till raised from the dead. Now all the laws of Moses are enforced upon this sanction, Ye shall obey me, because I Jehovah am your Elohim; and Christ hath purposely demonstrated, that the resurrection of the dead is a part of this sanction: consequently, I infer from the infallible interpretation of Jesus Christ—that the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony is enforced under the Mosaic dispensation, upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments.

And though this conclusion be drawn from the express meaning of Moses' words, and that meaning be confirmed by the unanswerable authority of Christ, either of which would be abundantly sufficient to evince what were the Mosaic sanctions; yet I shall add to them another passage, wherein it is expressly and literally asserted, not only that future rewards and punishments were the sanctions of the whole law; but also that God had taught the Jews, and they knew—that his laws were established upon these sanctions. And the passage is this—

"For this commandment, which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off." Deut. xxx. 11. So that whatever be the meaning of this commandment, the Jews did understand it: if it was not hidden from, of necessity it must be known unto, them; for not to hide is to discover, and to discover is to know. Now St. Paul, speaking by the same Spirit which spake in Moses, says, that this commandment, the meaning of which the Jews knew, treats of Justification by faith in Christ. The words themselves indeed do clearly and fully describe that justification; but since an infallible interpreter hath explained them, and Moses hath declared that the Jews understood them in the sense thus explained, the argument therefore will be equally conclusive, without particularly proving what is the sense of the words from the text itself; for the Jews did certainly understand them in the true sense, and St. Paul could not explain them in any other. And his interpretation is this; "When Moses speaketh on this wise, concerning the justification which is of faith, say not in thine heart, who shall ascend into heaven?" Deut. xxx. 12. St. Paul say, the Jews knew that this meant to bring Christ from above. Rom. x. 16. And when Moses says, "Who shall descend into the deep, and bring the word unto us, that we may hear it and do it?" the apostle declares the Jews knew that this meant to bring up Christ again from the dead. And when Moses tells the Jews, "the word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart;" the apostle asserts they hereby understood, that same word of faith which he preached. St. Paul then hath informed us what the Jews understood—they knew that Christ was to come down from heaven—was to die—and rise again from the dead—and they also knew that word of faith which the apostle preached, viz. "That if they should confess with their mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe that God would raise him from the dead, they should be saved."

And after Moses hath thus revealed that man is to be justified by faith in Christ, he proceeds to show what was the consequence of his revealing this doctrine; and it followed from thence, that he had thereby offered to, and set before, the believing Jews, the means to a happy immortality; and to the unbelieving, death. "See," says he, "I have set before thee this day, lives and good, and death and evil." Deut. xxx. 15. The word "lives," it was before proved, was, in its literal and primary sense, expressive of a future life and immortality; and the reason of the thing here demonstrates, that this is the sense of the word: for the life which Moses in this text set before them, could not be a temporal one—it was such a life as should flow from their being justified—but by being accounted just and righteous in the sight of God through the merits of Christ, they could not thereupon be entitled to temporal rewards. All the blessings derived to mankind from Christ are of a spiritual nature; and justification by him being spiritual, cannot regard the present life; for the present life was forfeited by sin; and if men were to be accounted just and righteous before God through the merits of Christ, with respect to the present life, then the present life ought not to be taken away from them who are so justified. But length of days is found to be no consequence of justification. We are all in a constant succession removed from off the stage of the world; and how then can our justification in any sense respect the present life, since the virtue flowing from it cannot be received till we have passed through the grave and gate of death? It is evident, then, from the reason of the thing, as well as from the meaning of the words, that the lives Moses here set before the Jews, included a future and immortal life: for that is the consequence of justification. And as the sense of the text was not hidden from them, it follows, they knew they were to be justified before God through faith in Christ, in order to their obtaining a happy immortality.

And that this immortality was the sanction upon which Moses enforced obedience to all his laws, is evident from the following verse—* "See," says he, "I have set before thee this day a future life of happiness and misery; in that I command thee to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments," Deut. xxx. 16. Now, under the expressions of walking in the ways of God and keeping his commandments, statutes, and judgments, are included all the rites and services of the law: and by commanding the Jews to keep these rites and services, Moses says he had set before them a future life of happiness and misery; and if he commanded them to keep the law, and to them who kept it he offered future happiness, then this future happiness was proposed to them as a motive to obedience, and whatever was proposed to them as a motive to obey the law was of necessity a sanction to enforce that obedience; because, so far as it was a motive, it obliged—and obligation is what constitutes a sanction. And, therefore, as Moses had taught the Jews (in the words before) that they were to be justified by faith in Christ, and that a happy immortality was the consequence of this justification: so he here makes obedience to the whole law an absolutely necessary condition to attain that immortality; and thereby he makes the immortality, which was consequent on justification, the sanction upon which he enforces obedience; and of course he gives us further reason to conclude, that the obligation to observe every law, rite, and ceremony, is enforced under the Mosaic dispensation, upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments.

These indeed are but a small number of those texts from whence this conclusion might be supported; but, however, these will be sufficient at present, because if a future state, and future rewards and punishments be taught in those now produced, then the two propositions at first laid down are fully justified; and nothing remains but to give a general view of the subject, and to show how it ought to have been treated, and how it came to be misunderstood. And the texts already and hereafter to be cited upon this subject, will have their due weight when it is observed, that the law by Moses, and the gospel by Christ, are but two parts of one and the same dispensation; the gospel-covenant runs through and constitutes the essence of both: for since the fall of Adam that covenant was the same to Christ, and from him it will be the same to the end of the world—"There was never any other name given among men, whereby sinners might be saved, but that of Jesus Christ." Now the promises annexed to the gospel-covenant, as such, were always the same; for that covenant regarded men as sinners. It promised them remission of sins. The benefit of having their sins remitted is not a temporal one—because sins are therefore remitted, that sinners may escape the punishment which was their due; but under the gospel-covenant, as such, the punishment due to sinners is not inflicted in this world; for remission of sins through a mediator, and the divine favour, and a title to happiness, are the privileges of the gospel-covenant; and all these privileges are of a spiritual nature, and regard sinners not merely as living in this world, but as candidates for another. And these privileges of the gospel-covenant are delivered by Moses in the Old Testament, as well as by Christ in the New: for both in the Old and New Testaments everlasting life is offered to sinners by Jesus Christ. Indeed, this gospel-covenant was administered in a different manner before our Saviour came, from what it hath been since; and it is for want of attending to what would of necessity follow from such different administration, that the end and meaning of the Mosaic law hath been so greatly mistaken: for if men had well understood the reasons of that different administration, they could never have fallen into these two dangerous errors, which laid the foundation of an opinion, that Moses had not treated of future rewards and punishments. And the

1. First error arose from mistaking the end and significancy of the types. Now a type is an outward and visible sign, instituted by God to represent some spiritual person or object. That the outward and visible sign was instituted to this end, is evident from hence, that the gospel-covenant was revealed upon the fall, and the types were instituted at the same time, to create and preserve faith and hopes in what was promised by that covenant. The time of their institution appears from Abel's offering sacrifice; and the end of their institution from his offering through faith in Christ. Now faith in Christ being a qualification for receiving the benefits of the gospel-covenant, and sacrifice being the typical rite by which Abel expressed that faith, this typical rite therefore must have been instituted to this end, because without such institution it was contrary to all principles of reason, that there should be any connexion between the ideas of faith in Christ and sacrifice. This typical rite, then, which is the sum and substance of the law, and which with the sacrificial rites makes up a great part of it, was instituted upon the fall along with the gospel-covenant. And it appears from this one instance (to omit others) for what end the types were instituted. Now, if the end of instituting them was to preserve faith and hopes in what the gospel-covenant promised, then they must have been significant of what was promised. To be able to preserve faith and hopes is not the attribute of an insignificant rite; before it could be able to do this, it must have spoken an intelligible language: for when God revealed to fallen man the promise of life and immortality, and instituted an outward action to keep in mind what he had promised, certainly that action was expressive of this promise; and what it expressed was as well understood by the Jews, who knew the gospel-covenant, as it is by us; for the whole of this covenant is spiritual; and wherever the covenant was known, there it was also certainly known that the types were spiritual, because the covenant was always a sure key to decypher the types. And why then might not a sacrifice speak the same thing as intelligibly to a Jew, as the holy communion doth to a Christian? Since, though the one looked forward to what should be done, and the other looks backward to what hath been done, yet they both regard the same part of the gospel-covenant—the death and satisfaction of Christ.

This, then, was the end and significancy of the types. The gospel-covenant was revealed upon the fall, and the types were then instituted, to the end that they might preserve faith and hopes in what was promised by that covenant: the immortality which fallen man had forfeited, was therein promised to be restored him through a Redeemer; and the infinite wisdom of God so contrived the types as they might in the most intelligible manner (that material objects can describe spiritual) signify the Redeemer, and immortality through him. And as this gospel-covenant was always known to some believers; from hence therefore it is certain, that at all times, from the first institution of the types till their completion by Christ, believers understood the types in a spiritual sense, and knew that they related to the Redeemer and immortality through him, which were promised by the gospel-covenant.

2. And from mistaking the end and significancy of the types, a second error took its rise, viz. "That because the types could not give, therefore they did not teach eternal life;" which error hath been already exploded: for the law was founded upon the gospel-covenant, and the types were instituted to teach men what was promised through him who was to fulfil that covenant; so that though the types of themselves could not save, yet the gospel-covenant certainly could, on which they were founded, and to which they referred. But then, before Christ came, the salvation to which men were entitled by that covenant, must of necessity have been differently worded from what it is since. Before he came, there could be no institution which could actually give or confer eternal life. It might indeed be offered and set before men; and it was; the types pointed at Christ, and through him to eternal life—but then Christ was the middle term, and without him there could be no possible connexion between the types and eternal life; therefore, before Christ came, eternal life could only be offered, set before, and promised to mankind. To give and to confer life is the attribute of our Redeemer; and when he came into the world, he assured his disciples and the Jews, "that he came down from heaven to give eternal life unto the world." Of necessity, then, the Old Testament must be worded different from the New in this respect. But nevertheless it will not follow, "that because eternal life is now given us by Christ, therefore it was not promised by Moses." It will rather follow, that the New Testament being the completion of the Old, whatever is fulfilled by the one, was promised under the other. And as eternal life was promised under the law by the gospel-covenant, then certainly that promise was a sufficient sanction to enforce obedience upon: for, before Christ had done and suffered what was foretold, the happiness promised through what he was to do and suffer, was then the strongest obligation to obedience; and so far as it was an obligation, it was also a sanction to enforce that obedience. Now the New Testament is very express, that eternal life was promised through Christ under the law—the articles and the homilies of our church assert the same—and texts have been now produced from Moses, wherein he secures obedience to his laws upon motives drawn from the gospel-covenant, and enforces it upon the sanctions of these rewards and punishments which that covenant offered; and therefore it can be no objection to these sanctions—that eternal life could not be had by the law, since it was promised under the law; and upon that promise of eternal life the sanctions of the Mosaic dispensation are established.

From the time of the fall, then, there hath been but one way open to heaven, and that was through Christ; and all believers, before and under the law, hoped for pardon of sin and salvation through him. In hopes of that pardon and salvation they observed the typical services. It was upon that account they believed and obeyed. And when God made faith and obedience absolutely necessary conditions to attain these ends, certainly he thereby made pardon of sin and salvation the sanctions upon which he enforced faith and obedience. By the gospel-covenant therefore from Adam to Christ, the divine laws were established upon the sanctions of future rewards and punishments, and they will be the same from him to the end of the world; for the benefits of the gospel-covenant are such, as will induce all considerate men to believe and obey in hopes of receiving them. Whilst they go through this vale of misery, they will endure the cross for the joy that is set before them. Whilst they run their course, they will keep their eyes fixed on the prize of their high calling. Heb. xii. 2. And they will follow the example of the great apostle, who, because there was to be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust, did for that reason exercise himself to keep a conscience void of offence, both towards God, and towards men. Acts xxiv. 15, 16.

NO JUSTIFICATION BY THE LAW OF NATURE,

PROVED FROM ROMANS ii. 14, 15;

IN

PREACHED BEFORE THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD MAYOR, THE ALDERMEN, AND CITIZENS OF LONDON, AT THE CATHEDRAL CHURCH OF ST. PAUL, ON THE SECOND DAY OF SEPTEMBER, 1741.

For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Which show the works of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing, or else excusing one another.—Romans ii. 14, 15.

THIS passage of scripture hath been generally misinterpreted. The apostle hath here been understood to favour certain opinions about the light and law of nature, as of themselves sufficient to discover and perform the terms of our justification: his words have been so represented as if he should say, that the Gentiles, who had no revealed law, could from the bare reasoning of their own minds, and from attending to the dictates of their own consciences, come at the knowledge of what state they were in, and what duties God required of persons in such a state; and that he should affirm in the words of the text, "That every one may find within himself the rule of right, and obligations to follow it." Now these opinions being destructive of the Christian faith, which acknowledges but one means of justification; being so much cried up and countenanced in the present times, wherein such religious paradoxes have but too many advocates; and being also so strongly espoused by the loose thinkers and actors (a numerous body in this metropolis) who maintain such opinions for the sake of their consequences. For those reasons the subject in the text will be every way proper for the present occasion; and, therefore, without further preface, I shall proceed to show the sense and meaning of the apostle's words. Now the state of the case was this. some of the Jews who had received the faith of Christ, were yet very zealous of the law, and the Mosaical rites; they had a strong opinion, that it was necessary still to observe them; and they maintained that the Gentile converts ought first to become proselytes of the Jewish covenant of circumcision, and submit to the whole law, before they could enjoy the benefits of the gospel.

To prevent the dangerous effects of this doctrine, is the chief end proposed in the epistle to the Romans, and in the words now read, the apostle particularly applies himself to the reasoning of those Jewish Christians, and proves that it was not necessary for the Gentile converts to submit to the whole law. "For," says he, "when the Gentiles," &c. And,

In order to show the force of the apostle's argument contained in these words, and to prove that they do not treat of the light or law of nature, it will be proper,

First, To define and settle the meaning of the terms here used. And then,

Secondly, To show that the meaning put upon them is founded on scripture, and matter of fact.

By Gentiles are here meant any persons who were not of the Jewish nation, and yet did the things contained in the law. And this Law, which the Gentiles observed, was that same by which St. Paul says,* "The Jews knew the will of God. In which they rested, and of which they made their boast, out of which they were instructed, from which they learned to approve what was excellent, and by which, if they transgressed it, they were to be judged. Circumcision was a part of it. And the Jews by breaking it dishonoured God." From those passages which occur in this chapter, to omit others, it is evident that by the law is here meant, as in most other places of scripture, the written law of Moses: and indeed the generality of commentators, though greatly mistaken in the apostle's argument, do yet agree, that this is the law of which he speaks in the first part of the verse, and that he means no more by the Gentiles not having it, than their not having it in writing among them.

The Gentiles, then, who had not the law of Moses in writing, are said to do by nature the things contained in it. Nature cannot here mean the light of nature: for how could the light of nature lead the Gentiles to do the things contained in the law of Moses? It cannot signify the religion of nature, both because the things contained in that law,—viz. the necessity of our redemption by Christ, and purification by blood, make no part of this religion; and also because our naturalists have attempted to show, that the Mosaical rites are directly contrary to the nature of things. To do what was contained in the law by nature, was not to do it by any innate or implanted principles; for such we have none.—It is not by intuitive knowledge, for that we cannot have; or by knowledge without means, for that is the attribute of God alone. In none of these free-thinking senses can St. Paul use the word in the text: for he is not treating of the method by which the Gentiles came to the knowledge of the law, but their reason for observing it · he doth not say, they learned, but they did, by nature, the things of the law; so that nature was not that which discovered the action, but it was the motive to act; it was the authority upon which the Gentiles did, and not the faculty or power by which they learned, the things of the law. And this distinction shows, that the apostle neither means the light, nor the law of nature; but he uses the word, as indeed its derivation (from φυω, nascor, &c.) imports, for that which grows up with us, our frame and constitution, and such habit or custom is, even to a proverb: and in this sense it is always used either for nature, as the frame and constitution of any thing; or what by habit becomes such. And in this last sense (if it be a different sense) the apostle uses the word in the text. The Jews had indeed another authority, viz. the institution of Moses; but the other nations had only custom for it; that was their authority, (as it will hereafter appear,) they received the things contained in the law by a traditional account from their parents, and for that reason observed them. This then being the sense of the word, it is used with great propriety in the text; as it is also demonstratively true in fact that the Gentiles did observe from custom or habit (which is the second nature) the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law.

The apostle then says, that custom was the motive or reason by which the Gentiles did the things contained in the law of Moses; but how then were they, by doing those things, what he next declares they were, "a law unto themselves?"† Could they find within themselves the rule of right, and obligations to follow it?

* Rom. ii. 17, 18, 23, 25.

† Bishop Butler's Sermons, First and Second, on Rom. ii. 14, 15, page 32. "Every one may find within himself the rule of right, and obligations to follow it. This St. Paul affirms in the words of the text." Pelagius on Rom. ii. 14, 15, speaks of some sort of justice, which man could obtain by his own power, without the help of grace, only by following the light of nature. So Calmet and Whitby talk of the light of nature and conscience as a rule, and moral works as terms of justification. Not so St. Paul.

If they could, then they might find within themselves the terms upon which they, though sinners, were to be saved; and they who can discover those terms by a proper exercise of their intellectual faculties stand in no need at all of a revelation; so that this position will make the Christian revelation needless: for its very being depends upon the certainty of this truth, "That fallen man could not from any conclusions of his own reason, either discover or perform the terms upon which he might be saved." And is it not erasing the foundations of this truth, for a man to pretend that he hath a director within him, by which he, though a sinner (and who is not?) can find out the rule of right, and obligations to follow it, and can discover the terms of salvation without the assistance of what is revealed? All such pretences to inward light and self-sufficiency are mere enthusiasm: for such inward light is needless, if revelation be our guide; and if that inward light be our guide, revelation is needless. God doubtless would not give us two sufficient guides, because one of them must be given in vain; and therefore if God hath given us directions, if those directions are recorded in the scriptures, and if the scriptures be an outward rule, to which it is our duty to conform our thoughts and actions; from hence it is evident, that a law unto themselves can never mean, that mankind hath an inward rule of right within himself, and obligations to follow it.

But of what law is St. Paul here speaking? He hath three times before in this very verse used the word for the law of Moses; and is it not absurd to suppose he means any other law, when continuing to speak of the same persons considered in the very same respect, he says, "That the Gentiles, by doing the things contained in the law of Moses, were the law unto themselves?" Doth he not here plainly affirm, that they were the law of Moses unto themselves? But in what sense, then? It must be remembered, that the persons here treated of, did the things contained in the law of Moses; now, though they had not that law in writing, yet by doing the things contained therein, though their motive for doing them was different from that of the Jews, it was the same thing to themselves, as if they had the written law: for their customary observance was that authority to them, which the law of Moses was to the Jews. The Gentiles having not the institution of Moses, are yet an institution to themselves, and do themselves supply the place or defect of that institution; they are their own authority, or they are an authority to themselves—evidence against themselves that they were sinners—wanted redemption—and that blood was necessary to purify them, and make them fit for admission into the presence of God. So that these Gentiles, who had not the law of Moses written in letters, were the law to themselves, not by having the rule in themselves, but as they, by the customary observance of the Mosaic rites, answered the end of the written law, and did the same religious actions as the believing Jews, and with the same view, only their motives were different.

These Gentiles, then, who did the things contained in the law of Moses, thereby showed that the work of the law, that which the law was to work, and those effects which it was given to produce among the Jews, were written in their hearts.

To write in the heart is certainly a figurative expression: for nothing can in any other sense be written there, than by its making an impression, and being recorded there. Now what was written was what the law was to work, viz. "Belief in the necessity of our redemption by Christ, and purification by blood." And St. Paul says, the Gentiles observed those religious ceremonies, which showed they were convinced of these doctrines by nature; and surely the religion of nature could not convince them of these doctrines; they make no part of that religion: which is a further proof, that by nature cannot be meant the religion of nature in the text. For St. Paul is not showing how the Gentiles came to the knowledge of the doctrines, but what disposition of mind such persons must be in, who performed the typical services contained in the law? which performance, he says, showed, that they were convinced of the truth of the doctrines which those services were to exhibit. How they came to be written in the heart, he is not inquiring; he only asserts, that the Gentiles showed by their actions, that they were written there; they did the things contained in the law of Moses; they showed by doing them, that what these things were intended to work and effect, was imprinted upon their minds. So that their showing that they had such an impression on their minds, is here mentioned as a consequence of certain actions. The impression did not lead them to do the actions, but the actions showed that there was such an impression. For as the heart is the spring of action, and as we act according to what is in our thoughts or in our hearts, so by doing the things contained in the law of Moses, the Gentiles showed, and that by the plainest proof which could be given, that what the law was to work, was to them a principle of action, and had made a deep impression upon their minds. Now this which was written in their hearts was the substance of what the law was to work, and not the religion of nature: it was not implanted or written there by innate ideas, because nothing was written but what had been revealed; and what occasion was there to reveal what was before innate? And how can any thing be inferred from hence in favour of any light or law of nature, which should contain truths written in the heart without a revelation, when the apostle is treating only of revealed truths, and the impression they had made upon the mind?

Of those Gentiles, then, who were doers of the law, St. Paul proceeds to declare, that their consciences bare them witness. "Now conscience is that act of the mind which compares the conformity or obliquity of our actions with some right rule." The rule in the present case is the law; for the Gentiles are here considered in no other light than as doers of it. And their thoughts or reasonings between this rule and their actions bare them witness, and led them to accuse those actions which erred from, and to excuse those which conformed to, this rule; and thereby, whilst this faculty was thus exercised on its proper rule, these ends which the law was to effect were answered among the Gentiles. They kept faith and a good conscience, and were to be justified before God in the day when he shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ. So that conscience in this place being exercised about the law as a rule, and the actions of the Gentiles as conforming to, or erring from it, natural conscience therefore cannot be here meant: because the apostle is speaking only of what was revealed. The conscience was exercised about what the law was to work, and that made no part of the religion of nature; it was exercised only about revelation, therefore it cannot be inferred from hence, that it is any law of our nature to follow the dictates of our conscience without attending to what is revealed:* And what authority then is there from this text to prove the natural supremacy, or prerogative of conscience?—A revelation is made—the Gentiles (so far as they know it) consider it as a rule of action—by looking upon it in this light, they see that it is their duty to conform to it—and when they do, their conscience reflecting on the rule and the action approves what is done, and of course disapproves what doth not conform. Here is nothing said in this case about the natural supremacy of conscience, or about our judgments of right and wrong, without the knowledge of some revealed rule; and therefore it is certain, that the conscience here treated of, was exercised only about the things contained in the law of Moses as a revealed rule of action.

The apostle's argument, then, in the words of the text as they have been now explained, stands thus. A dangerous error had prevailed among the Jewish Christians: they held it to be necessary, that the Gentile converts should be circumcised, and submit to the whole law before they could enjoy the benefits of the gospel. The apostle strenuously opposes this error, and among other arguments uses this in the text to overthrow it. For, says he, when the Gentiles who have not the written law of Moses, do the same actions as the Jews, do the things contained in the law, and with the same view, only upon a different motive, the one by custom or habit, the other by the institution of Moses; these Gentiles, though they have not the law in writing among them, yet by doing the things contained in it, they are the law to themselves; supplying, so far as they do those things, the place of the written law, or the want of the Mosaic institution: being doers therefore of the law, they are as properly qualified to be admitted into the privileges of the gospel, as the Jews themselves who were its hearers; for as they showed by their actions, that what the Mosaic law was to work and effect was written in their hearts, and that they had that same right disposition of mind, which it was to work and effect in the Jews,* and for which the Jews were to be justified; from hence the consequence is direct and logical, that such Gentiles were as forward in Christianity as the Jews themselves, and there could be no necessity for their submitting to the Mosaic law, when they had already attained the principal end which that law was given to attain; and therefore they need not now submit to the law, as the means. They had attained the end, so the means were needless, and of course they might, being equally qualified with the Jews, be admitted to the privileges of the gospel without being circumcised and submitting to the whole ceremonial law.

This argument, then, of St. Paul's not only doth not relate to, but entirely destroys that free-thinking notion, of man's being justified by the law of nature; and the force of it is not to be evaded if the chief thing supposed in it can be proved, viz., That there were Gentiles who did observe the things contained in the law of Moses; and this I am to consider under my second general head, which was to prove,

Secondly, That the meaning put upon the words of the text is founded on scripture and matter of fact. And this will appear,

1st, From scripture, by proving what it was the law pointed out. And 2ndly, From matter of fact, by showing that the Gentiles did observe that which it pointed out.

Now what the law pointed out was the necessity of our redemption by Christ, and purification by blood. At first view it presents to us a system of religious services, made up of types and emblems; and that these typical services had a meaning well understood,† Moses himself assures us. And had he not, the reason of the thing would speak aloud for itself; for if the bodily action had been all that was required, then the action of the mind, which is the essence of every religious service, would have been wanting; there would be no opportunity to give God, what he chiefly requires, the heart and the affections;‡ and the Jews could not have acted as persons who had souls to be saved. But it is certain, that each part of man is to do its duty in this state of trial, and where God requires the performance of certain outward actions, as the types before, and the sacraments since, Christ came, he thereby treats man according to his constitution and his state, by instituting certain sensible objects to give him the nearest ideas of those objects which are spiritual: for if such be the constitution and state of man, that, as a creature he cannot have, and as a free agent he ought not to have, any ideas inherent or innate, then the reason is evident why God should take such a method; and when he teaches men spiritual objects by the types and the sacraments, that being the only method we can now be taught them, is therefore agreeable to the nature of things, and the state of man. And not only Moses, and the reason of the thing, but later parts of scripture explain the principal types; they show that Christ was the person whom they pointed at, and that in him they were all fulfilled.

He is said to be "the end of the law," (Rom. x. 4.) "Of him Moses wrote—of him the scriptures testified," (John v. 39, 46.) "The fathers were saved, even as we by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," (Acts xv. 11.) The Gospel of God "concerning his Son Jesus was preached by the prophets in the holy scriptures," (Rom. i. 1, 2.) "And to him gave all the prophets witness, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins," (Acts x. 43.) The scriptures then plainly declare, that Christ was pointed out by the typical rites and services of the law. But

* Rom. ii. 26. "The uncircumcised (Gentiles) could keep those points of the law which were to justify." And ver. 27. "They could fulfil (answer the end of) the law;" these two passages demonstrate that I have fairly stated the apostle's argument.

† In these passages, § 1. Of sacrifices, Exod. xxx. 15, 16; Lev. ix. 15; xvii. 11; Num. xxviii. 22; Deut. xxxiii. 19. § 2. Of circumcision, Lev. xxvi. 41; Deut. x. 12, 16; xxx. 6. § 3. Of ablution, Lev. xiv. 6, 7, &c.; xvii. 15, 16; Num. viii. 6, 7, &c.; xix. 19, 20. § Of meditating on the law, Deut. vi. 6, &c. viii. 5, 15, 16; xii. 28, &c., he mentions the spiritual sense, and that expressly, literally, and without a figure.

‡ Rom. vii. 14; viii. 6. "To be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." 2 Cor. iii. 6. "The letter (of the law) killeth, but the spirit giveth life"

That which was the highest act of religion among the Jews, and among the Gentiles also, whereby he was prefigured and pointed out, was sacrifice: "for he was the lamb virtually slain from the foundation of the world," (Rev. xiii. 8.) "By faith in him Abel offered a more excellent sacrifice than Cain," (Heb. xi. 4.) "And by the same faith Moses kept the passover and the sprinkling of blood," (Heb. xi. 28.) "Christ being our passover who was sacrificed for us," (1 Cor. v. 7.) And "who hath now put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," (Heb. ix. 26.) Christ therefore was pointed out by sacrifices; they were types instituted to keep up and preserve the knowledge of what he has to do and suffer; and means to lay hold of, by the hand of faith, the merits of his future death and sufferings: for they not only pointed him out in a general view, but they also showed the principal end of his coming into the world, to effect our redemption by the offering of the body of Jesus once for all.

It is one of the first in order of revealed truths, that without shedding the blood of Christ there is no remission:—for if God required sacrifices as absolutely necessary for the remission of sin, this proved that the sacrifice of Christ was absolutely necessary to attain that remission. The necessity of the types proved the necessity of the antitype: for if it be the essence of a type, that it be an outward and visible sign instituted by God to represent some spiritual person or object; and if sacrifice was instituted to be the outward and visible sign of Christ, then God's requiring sacrifice as absolutely necessary to atone for sin, was requiring, and that in the strongest manner, the necessity of Christ's making the atonement. The type was only an outward sign to keep in mind what was signified thereby, so that if God required the outward sign, he must of necessity require the thing signified: because he instituted the one in order to attain the other: and by such institution, he made the relation between them as certain as between the means and the end. Sacrifice therefore being a type, could not be instituted for its own sake—the merit of the action lay in considering what it signified; for it was not the bare offering, but the intention, the faith of the offerer, which made the sacrifice a sweet-smelling savour unto God. It was the duty of every offerer to look upon it as what it was—it was a type: he was not then merely to offer—to rest in the offering would be denying things to be what they are; but it was his duty also to consider what was typified, and was intended to be kept up by the outward act of offering; Christ, and what he was to do and suffer for us, were the things intended to be kept up by the outward act; and therefore these were the things, which it was the duty of every person to look at when he offered.

This it was, then, to sacrifice worthily; not to rest in the outward act, but to look by the eye of faith beyond it: for when the sinner brought a clean perfect creature to be sacrificed, laid his hand on its head, and shed the blood, the life, of the creature—this indeed was doing what he was commanded, but not all. The service of the mind was also required, and that was to regard the intent of the action—to confess, that the death the creature suffered was what he deserved, that he had forfeited his life, that it was not in his own power to restore it, and that it could not be restored, but by the merits of that great sacrifice, which he hoped in, and believed would, in the fulness of time, be offered up for his sins. This was making a truly Christian confession of his faith; and this confession all worthy offerers did make; and therefore did conclude from the necessity of the type to make an atonement for sin, that the antitype must be much more necessary.

The law, therefore, by requiring sacrifices as absolutely necessary for the remission of sins, did plainly point out and prove, that there could be no redemption without the sacrifice of Christ: for remission of sins must be previous to redemption; and if there could be no remission without shedding of blood, then certainly without it there could be no redemption. St. Paul applies the typical services to Christ, and the redemption under the first Testament, to the completion of our redemption by him, when he says, "That Christ being become an high priest of good things to come, not by the blood of the sacrifices, but by his own blood, entered once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." This was perfecting and fulfilling what was typified under the law: for when the apostle represents Christ as our great high priest—as shedding his blood for us, and offering himself without spot to God—as entering into the holy of holies, and appearing before the mercy seat, in the presence of God—there presenting to the Father the sweet-smelling sacrifice of his Son; doth he not, by representing in this manner what Christ really completed, prove, that what the high priest did, prefigured what he was to do? All the ideas in this description are borrowed from the typical services, and Christ is said to have fulfilled what they signified. What he fulfilled was our redemption by his death and sufferings; and therefore it is evident, that the typical services did signify our redemption by Christ. For when the apostles speak of Christ "putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself—of his redeeming us by his blood—of his being the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world—and of the offering himself, and thereby perfecting for ever them that are sanctified." by using these expressions to describe the completion of our redemption by Christ, do they not prove, that the sacrifices were types of that redemption? For, if they had not pointed out and foretold something, how could they describe what was fulfilled? The relation then between the ideas of sacrifice and Christ must have been well understood before the same terms could have been descriptive of them both; and, indeed, without that relation, our redemption by Christ, being a spiritual effect, would not easily have been understood; for the sufferings of Christ, his shedding his blood, and his death, were but the visible parts of his atonement. The chief of this great action lay between God and himself, invisible to all others. And this part a man can no more conceive or express, than he could have sustained it. The weight Christ sustained was infinite, and the action was spiritual; and we have no words, for we converse with no objects from whence we take them, which can give us adequate ideas of what is infinite, or of those actions which are purely spiritual. In all such cases, the best teacher is God; and the scripture ideas are the perfectest we can have; and if our redemption by Christ be there described by ideas taken from the sacrifices, it will follow not only that the sacrifices did point out our redemption by Christ, but also that they (when rightly understood) will give us the best ideas, and, of course, the clearest evidence of that redemption.

The law of Moses, then, it appears, did point out something by its types and emblems. It pointed out by them the person of Christ. Particularly it pointed him out by sacrifices, which typified what he was to do and suffer for us. The necessity of these sacrifices proved the necessity of Christ's sacrifice. And God's requiring them as necessary for redemption, proved also the necessity of our redemption by Christ; and therefore it is evident, that the law pointed out and proved the necessity of our redemption by Christ, and purification by blood.

The only thing, then, remaining to be proved is,

Secondly, To show from matter of fact, that the Gentiles did observe what the law pointed out. And

This the apostle declares in the words of the text; he says, "They did the things contained in the law of Moses, and showed by so doing, that what the law was to work and effect was written in their hearts;" and thereby they gave proof that they believed those doctrines which the law was principally intended to point out. The text, then, is a full and clear argument for the truth of this proposition, and upon that footing I might rest the matter, were there not other parts of scripture which incontestably prove this matter of fact, by showing in what manner the Gentiles became acquainted with the things contained in the law of Moses.

Now upon the fall, Moses informs us that a revelation was made of the new terms of salvation, and that all the typical services which were to give and preserve the knowledge of this revelation were instituted; sacrifice in particular took its rise from hence: for at the end of the days, i. e. at some stated time, Abel is said to have offered through faith. Now, it being impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sin by any virtue of its own, it was not likely that any means, which had no apparent connexion with the end proposed, should be of human invention to atone for sin. And there being so soon after the fall, a stated time of sacrificing, it is not probable that the time of the action should have any more of human invention in it than the action itself. And there being also faith joined to the offering, it is certain the offering had a relation to some spiritual object, and as such could have nothing of human invention in it at all: for faith being the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, if the things hoped for and not seen cannot be attained without faith in Christ, and faith in Christ cannot be attained without a revelation, then it is certain Abel's offering was of divine institution; because there could be no faith in Christ where there was no revelation. The doctrine of remission of sins, through faith in his blood, could not have been discovered by unassisted reason; and yet Abel had that faith, and through it he offered. Therefore, in direct consequence from each other, there were revelation—faith—offering; revelation, without which there could be no faith—faith, without which there could be no acceptable offering—and an offering founded on faith, which is founded on revelation; and, therefore, offering sacrifice was revealed upon the fall, and as such, was of divine institution.

And as in all other chief points of the law, so especially in this, it is no more than a renewal, and committing to writing, the same terms of salvation, which had been revealed upon the fall: for the chief things contained in it are mentioned long before the written law was given from Sinai. Offering sacrifice, which was the highest act of religion among mankind, was in use from the fall downwards. The patriarchs all sacrificed. Thus did Job continually. And besides the sacrifice, all its appendages and the sacrificial rites were instituted together: for later scriptures lay nearly as much stress upon them as upon the sacrifice itself; so that by parity of reason, what was a necessary part of every sacrifice had an institution coeval with the sacrifices: because if God would not accept sacrifices without some particular rites, then these rites were a part of them which he did accept. And he accepted the sacrifices of Abel, of Noah, and Abraham, before they offered there; for these rites were instituted, and, of course, before the written law; for it is mentioned before the written law that there was a priest who had a right to offer. His habits were appointed. A distinction of clean and unclean creatures was made. An altar was raised. And there was a stated time, at which sacrifice, with all its rites, was to be performed. These points, then, being previous to God's accepting the sacrifice, and thereupon pardoning the sinner, must have had an institution prior to the offering the sacrifice, and that institution was the revelation made upon the fall.

Here, then, the scripture gives us a rational account, by what means the Gentiles became acquainted with and did the things contained in the law of Moses: for the law being but a renewal of what had been before revealed, and was now committed to writing, must be known to all those who were descended from them who had revelation. Adam had that revelation. Noah and his sons had it, and consequently their children could not but learn from them those rites and ceremonies which they saw their parents practise, and in the performance of which they themselves were assistants: and if the Gentiles knew this revelation, they might do the things contained in the law of Moses, without having that law in writing; they need not surely be referred to the written law to learn the typical services, when there had been an institution of them prior to that, and a period before when they were observed by all mankind.

In process of time, indeed, after the era of the law, men began to lose sight of the reason and end of these institutions, and by degrees strangely corrupted what had been revealed. But yet what strongly confirms the apostle's argument is, that they still observed the outward part; the religious ceremonies were (as far as we know) for some ages after the law, universal; for the higher we go in antiquity, they are found to be more uniform, and consistent with the history of Moses. Even so low down as the heathen writings now remaining, we find the primitive emblems made use of, and there is but little variation in the minute rites relating to sacrifice. The historians and the poets abound with descriptions of sacrifices—of the great efficacy of blood—of the hopes they had that God would be placated and appeased by it—and of the holocausts whose smell they represent as grateful to the Deity. And from those descriptions a parallel might be drawn between them and the Jewish ceremonies; but it would be here a needless work, several learned men have already done it, and every one's reading will supply him with instances enough. It is sufficient for my purpose at present to allege, what is a known and uncontested matter of fact, that all nations of the world offered sacrifices, and for some ages after the law, with the same rites as are there instituted, and whoever offered sacrifice out of a right principle, as St. Paul declares the Gentiles in the text did, he certainly observed what the law pointed out.

As, then, there was a revelation of the Christian religion made upon the fall, the predictive part of the evidence of which is in the Old Testament, and the completion in the New; and as this revelation was once known unto all mankind, and was corrupted by their own wanton imaginations; so from hence we have satisfactory answers to those boasted objections of modern infidels,—why was the Jewish religion confined to, and hidden in, types and mysteries? Why was the Christian revelation made so late? How shall they be saved who perhaps never heard of it? And why is it not now the religion of all mankind? These objections, it hath appeared, are all founded (as I apprehend all infidelity is) in ignorance; in ignorance of the evidence for, of the design, and of the meaning of scripture; for the text, as now explained, is a clear answer to these and many more such like objections, and fully proves that they are made in direct opposition to matter of fact. But

These I cannot now enlarge upon; I shall only observe, that it is evident from the plain literal sense of the words, from scripture, and from matter of fact, that St. Paul doth not treat in this passage of, nay, therein overthrows all pretences to, man's being justified by the law of nature. The persons he mentions, were such only as did the things contained in the law of Moses, and surely the religion of nature was not delineated in the law of Moses! This exhibits to us one great truth, "That without shedding the blood of Christ there is no remission," and doth the religion of nature treat of any such doctrine? Are not remission of sins in general, and remission of sins by blood, points which make no part of that religion? And yet the Gentiles in the text were convinced of such remission; they showed by their actions that they wanted it, and they performed all these typical services, which kept up their faith and hopes in the Redeemer of the world; and, therefore, they neither learnt from their own reason, from the light of nature, or from the fitness of things; but from revelation only did they learn to do the things contained in the law of Moses—that was their rule—to that they conformed—and by their customary observance of it were justified. And can we be justified by any other means? Have we discovered that the light of nature is safer than the light of heaven; or that it is a duty to follow the fitness of things, rather than the laws of the Creator of all things? Will metaphysics guide us better than scripture, or reason than God? If such pretences to direct and save ourselves will not bear to be heard among Christians, why then have such methods of justification been supported from this text? They have, in fact, no foundation here, or anywhere else in scripture, and they are as opposite to our excellent church as to scripture itself: for the first reformers have protested against such doctrines, and I shall prove the truth of what hath been now said, and shall choose to pass my censure upon all pretences to man's being justified by the law of nature, by morality alone, and such like, in their words rather than my own, which are, that "They also are to be had accursed that presume to say, that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature; for holy scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved."

THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS:

CONSIDERED IN TWO DISCOURSES, PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, MARCH 20, 1757; IN THE MORNING AT ST. MARY'S, AND IN THE AFTERNOON AT ST. PETER'S.

Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.—Isaiah liv. 17.

TO THE

REV. DR. RANDOLPH,

Vice-chancellor of the University of Oxford, and President of Corpus Christi College.

When I delivered these discourses, I had no design to make them public; but I have been since compelled to it. I understand they gave great offence, especially to you, and I was in consequence thereof refused the university pulpit. In justice, not to myself, for I desire to be out of the question, but to the great doctrine here treated of, namely, the righteousness of the Lord Jesus, as the only ground of our acceptance and justification before God the Father, I have sent to the press what was delivered from the pulpit. I leave the friends of our church to judge whether there be anything herein advanced contrary to scripture, and to the doctrines of the reformation. If not, I am safe. If there be, you are bound to make it appear. You have a good pen, and you have great leisure. Make use of them; and I hope and pray you may use them for your good and mine.

I am, with my constant and hearty prayers for the university's prosperity, Mr. Vice-Chancellor, your humble servant in Christ,

William Romaine.

SERMON I

Drop down ye heavens from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness; let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together. I the Lord have created it.—Isaiah xlv. 8.

While man is in the body he must receive his instruction from the bodily senses. He cannot of himself form an idea of any thing spiritual, but as it is compared to, and illustrated by, some material object. And this method of instruction God has followed in the scripture, both in the language, and in the composition. The language is entirely suited to man in his present state, every Hebrew word signifying first some material object, and thereby conveying the idea of some correspondent spiritual object. And the scripture composition abounds with images and illustrations of divine things taken from nature. The evangelical prophet is a remarkable instance of this kind of writing. He represents the various parts of the kingdom of grace under their expressive and familiar pictures in nature. He sets spiritual things as it were before our eyes, under the images which God had established in his created works, in order to bring them down to our understandings. And every illustration of this kind, being God's own application of natural things, must be considered as infallible truth. The spiritual application is as certain as the outward fact from which it is taken. God would not use the book of nature to illustrate the book of grace, unless the illustration was just and instructive: for it is not consistent with his perfections to propose to his creatures for truth what would deceive, or to reveal what did not tend to edify them.

In this light, let us consider the beautiful image in the text. God is here recommending to us the fundamental doctrine of the gospel. He proposes it in clear and plain terms; and to convince our understandings, and to win our affections, he sets it before our eyes under a very affecting picture. He represents the doctrine under one of the most common and familiar occurrences in nature. Thither he sends us for instruction in righteousness—and may the Spirit of the Lord enable every one of you to apply the instruction for the good of your souls, while I am

First, Opening the true sense and meaning of the words. And then,

Secondly, Making some practical remarks upon them.

And first, The words are a scripture image and application of a well-known fact in nature. The earth is supposed to be deprived of the rain of heaven. It has no refreshing showers, no enlivening dew to saturate the thirsty soil; and for want of their fruitful influence the earth is entirely barren. It produces nothing either for use or ornament. While it was lying in this state, God gave the word, and the clouds descended, and the earth opened to receive the fruitful drops of rain, which they poured down, and by their prolific virtue such effects followed, as the Psalmist has beautifully described in these words, "He watereth the hills from above, whereby the earth is filled with the fruit of thy works. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth, and wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart. The high trees are satisfied, even the cedars of Libanus, which he hath planted." These are the certain consequences of warm and gentle showers. When they are animated with the light of the sun in the spring season of the year, they never fail to bring forth rich products of the earth, from the lowest herb to the highest cedar on Libanus. Under this plain and familiar image God intends to teach us the most important truth of Christianity. Because it is the most necessary to be believed, he has therefore made it the most easy to be understood. The principal point of view in which he would have us to consider the image in the text is this: The earth without rain lies barren and desolate, the rain descends from heaven, and is dropped down from the clouds, and when it comes in plentiful showers, and there is clear shining after it, then it always produces fruitfulness. Hither the Holy Spirit sends us for instruction in righteousness. Righteousness is to the soul, what the rain and dew are to the thirsty ground. The heavens were to drop this righteousness from above, and the skies were to pour it down, while man's heart being opened thankfully receives the heavenly gift. He has no hand, no merit in procuring the gift, but has only to accept it, as the dry parched ground does the enlivening drops of rain, which change its withered barren face into pleasing verdure and rich fruitfulness. In order to understand clearly what the all-wise Spirit would teach us under this sweet image, we should have a perfect idea of the word righteousness, upon which the whole stress of the passage turns. In the Old Testament it is a mercantile term, taken from the method of trading in the early ages of the world, when business was carried on, and money paid and received by weight. The fair trader kept an even balance in paying and receiving, therefore he was a just or righteous man. And hence justice, which is the emblem of this fair trading, is always painted with an even balance in her hand. When the scripture speaks of human affairs, this is always the sense of the word righteousness; for thus it is used Lev. xix. 36. "Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin shall ye have." The same word is here four times rendered just, which in the text is rendered righteousness. And in like manner in Deut. xxv. 14, 15, the command runs, "Thou shalt not have in thine house diverse measures, a great and a small, but thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have." So again Ezek. xlv. 9, 10. "Take away your exactions from my people saith the Lord God. Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath" In these passages, not to mention any more, the same word which is translated righteousness in the text, is undoubtedly applied to the evenness of the balance, and to strict justice in weights and measures. When the scripture speaks of dealings between man and man, this is the established sense of the word; and if we spiritualize this sense we shall understand the usage of the word in religious affairs. All that we are, and all that we hope for, is God's free gift; and therefore as the Lord and giver of all, he has an unalienable right to our continual service. And he demanded it. He gave us a holy, just, and good law, to which he required the perfect, uninterrupted obedience of every faculty of soul and body. If man had paid it him in thought, word, and deed, then he would have been just—he would have dealt uprightly with God, and the divine law and justice would have had no demands upon him. But if we pay it not, then we are unjust: and the law for the first offence pronounces its curses upon us: for it is written, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law." If we continue not in all things, if we fail but in one point, then we rob God of his due. We become his debtors, and law and justice may seize upon us, and cast us into prison, until the uttermost farthing be paid; which it is impossible we should ever pay, because the obedience of millions of years could make no satisfaction for one single transgression against the infinitely perfect law of God. One transgression having infinite demerit in it, would weigh down the scale infinitely, and therefore eternally: unless some infinitely perfect obedience, which no finite creature can pay, be put into the opposite scale.

Upon this state of the case it appears, that righteousness signifies the most strict and unerring justice in our dealings with God. The law of God, which is his revealed will, and the rule of our obedience, is holy as God is holy, yea, perfectly, infinitely holy. It cannot behold the least iniquity, any more than God can behold it, and therefore it cuts the sinner off from all right and title to legal righteousness for the very first offence, puts him under the curse, and subjects him to all its pains and penalties: and upon whom the law pronounces its curses, God the righteous Judge will pour down the vials of his wrath. Upon the unrighteous he will rain snares, fire, and brimstone, storm, and tempest: this shall be their portion to drink for ever and ever.

Are you then, my brethren, in the number of the righteous, or of the unrighteous? Is it not of infinite consequence to know what state you are in? For certainly if it should appear that you are unrighteous, you would not act so contrary to your own interest, as to choose to be subject to the curses of God's holy law, and to suffer the threatened punishment, if there be a way left to escape. Do you see then, how necessary it is we should inquire, whether we have acted righteously with God or not. To the infallible word therefore, and to the testimony, let us repair. The oracles of truth inform us, that, after God had finished his six days' work, he looked down from heaven, and behold all things were good. There was no disorder in the natural world, and no evil in the spiritual world. But he is soon after represented looking down from heaven upon the children of men, and behold all things were evil. "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." (Gen. vi. 5.) Whence was the origin of this universal evil? Mankind had gone out of the way of righteousness, they had broken the law, and had made themselves altogether corrupt, and were become abominable, there was none of them righteous, no, not one. What! Not one righteous man left upon earth? No. God declares by the mouth of his holy prophet, that there was not one. They had all sinned, and come short of the glory of God. They were by nature children of his wrath through one man's disobedience, and they were ten times more the children of wrath by actual guilt; and being sinners against God's law, both by nature and by life, he hath shut them all up under sin, in a state of condemnation, reserving them to the judgment of the great day.

This is our condition, We are all unrighteous: and we are without strength to attain any righteousness of our own: because we are poor, broken debtors, who have nothing to pay. One offence attaints our blood, and renders us incapable of doing any act that will be deemed good and valid in the court of heaven, for this irreversible decree stands against us in the divine records: "The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

From hence arises a question, the most important and interesting that can engage a sinner's attention, upon which every person concerned about his eternal welfare, would reason in this manner. "I acknowledge the law of God to be holy and good, but I have broken it, and have robbed God of his glory, and the law of its honour. I am unrighteous. As such, heaven is shut against me, and will be shut for ever, unless I can be made righteous. But how or by what means can this be done? God's law is immutable. His truth that threatened to punish transgression is inflexible. His justice is infinite, and must have satisfaction for the broken law; yea, full and perfect satisfaction, suitable to the infinite purity and holiness of the divine nature. But alas! what satisfaction can I make it? Nay, what satisfaction could all the holy angels and the highest order of beings, if they would lay down their lives for me, make to that justice, which is infinite, and to which I am an infinite debtor. Nothing can save me, but some divine and infinite righteousness wrought out for me, and in my stead, and God alone can work out such a righteousness; but how can I hope that he will, since he is the very person whom I have offended by my sin?"

In this manner, every person concerned about eternity would reason. When he is convinced of his own unrighteousness, he will look out for some means to be made righteous, and he will soon find that there are no human means. Righteousness grows not upon this earth. It fled to heaven, when all the world was brought in guilty before God; and it cannot return to earth until all the offended attributes of God be satisfied. But what created being can make a satisfaction equal to the offence? All hope, humanly speaking, is cut off: for no finite creature can do an infinite action. Oh! what glad tidings then does the prophet here bring to a guilty world. He sees the heavens from above dropping down righteousness, and the earth opening and receiving it. The blessing is so unmerited, so inestimable, that one would be tempted to ask,—How God could be so gracious? How can he exercise such mercy consistent with his other perfections? How can he suffer the guilty to be accounted righteous, until the demands of law and justice be fully satisfied? But where is the satisfaction equal to their infinite demands? And until such a satisfaction be made, how can his all-pure holiness look upon the impure sinner, or how can his inflexible truth, which threatened punishment, remit it? Glory be to his free grace, which hath found out a righteousness for us, against which law and justice cannot make the least exception, and which hath preserved the glory of all his attributes inviolate; and that is the righteousness of the God-man Christ Jesus.

We are taught by the Christian verity, that in the divine essence there are three persons of equal glory and majesty; none is before or after other, none is greater or less than another. Between these divine Persons the covenant of grace was ordered in all things and sure; and from this covenant the co-equal and co-eternal Three took the names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Son is a name of office, descriptive of the wonderful humiliation of the Messiah, who took our nature, and was made a Son for our salvation—God and man being united in one Christ, as much as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man. The God-man undertakes in our nature to pay perfect satisfaction to his Father's justice. Accordingly he paid the law an infinitely perfect obedience. And he thereby magnified it, and made it more honourable than the obedience of all created beings could have done. Then he suffered what was due to our breach of the law, and paid the death which we deserved. And justice demonstrated, that it had no more demands upon him, when it released him from the prison of the grave. And by this obedience and these sufferings he wrought out an infinitely perfect righteousness, which being imputed to the unrighteous, and laid hold of by the hand of faith, renders them perfectly righteous at the bar of justice.

This is the righteousness of God to which every sinner must submit, if he be ever discharged from condemnation. He must receive it from God as his free gift, without the least merit or deserving. And he must trust wholly to it, never presuming to add anything of his own to it, as a condition of justification. These are hard lessons to the pride of our corrupt hearts. Indeed it is the hardest lesson of grace to humble us so far, that we can give up the merit of all our fancied good works, and take the righteousness of God as a free gift. As if God's righteousness was not perfect enough, we are always thinking to add something of our own to it. Our fallen nature is ever tempting us to this absurdity, and the Holy Spirit has not offered us a more forcible argument throughout the scripture, than the striking image in the text. Our guilty souls are compared to the dry withered ground, which has been long deprived of the fruitful rain and dew of heaven. When they were lying parched and burnt up with drought, it pleased God to command the heavens to distil the refreshing drops of dew, and the clouds to pour down their genial and enlivening showers, which the earth opening its mouth thankfully received. Now the righteousness of Christ is bestowed, as these sweet influences of heaven are, freely—the earth has no hand, no merit in bringing down the dew or the rain, nor have we any in bringing down the righteousness of Christ. And the fruits, which the rain and dew enable the earth to bring forth, are produced by their prolific virtue, animated with the genial warmth of the sun: for the earth is entirely passive and inactive, and only acts as it is acted upon. In like manner every good gift and grace is from above; they are the fruits of righteousness, which could never have grown in our barren hearts, unless Christ had sent his Spirit from on high to plant and to water them with the continual dew of his blessing. When he withholds his influence, they immediately wither and die. When he rains and shines upon them, then they flourish. This is the beautiful illustration in the text. Let the heavens drop down the righteousness of Christ from above, like the dew, and let the skies pour it down, like fruitful showers upon a thirsty ground—"Let the earth open, let man open his heart, and then they shall bring forth salvation;" they, i. e. the righteousness which is from above, poured down upon and received into man's heart, shall therein take root, and shall enable it to bring forth fruit abundantly, even present and eternal salvation. Salvation is not of man. It belongeth unto the Lord. It is one of the infinitely perfect works of God: for there is no Saviour besides him—none that can deliver man from the enemies of his peace, but the same Almighty Being who created the heavens and the earth, and who still supports them by the word of his power. And when he, by whom all things were made, for us men and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man, then his name was called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins. Salvation on his part was finished, when, having fully satisfied the demands of law and justice by his obedience and sufferings, and thereby wrought out an all-perfect righteousness for us, he ascended with great glory to his kingdom in heaven. But he did not leave us comfortless. The Holy Ghost the Comforter has now the conducting of the work of salvation. And when he humbles the sinner under a sense of his unrighteousness by nature and life, and enables him to wait at the throne of grace for a free pardon, when God the Father accepts him through the merits of his Son, and justifies him, then it is the office of the Holy Spirit to bear his testimony with the sinner's spirit that he is a child of God. With the act of justification thus evidenced and applied, he receives justifying faith, and is brought into a state of salvation; for the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord. There is no salvation without righteousness, and it is of the Lord's free grace that he is received as righteous, through the righteousness of Christ imputed to him by faith. Christ's righteousness can be made ours only by imputation. As our sins were actually imputed to him, so his righteousness is actually imputed to us. The Lord laid upon him the iniquity of us all, and therefore he was wounded for our transgressions, and was bruised for our iniquities. As he thus took our sins upon himself, so we by faith take his righteousness upon us, and by it are saved.

And when the heavens have dropped down righteousness, and the barren heart of sinful man has opened and received it, and with it salvation, then together with salvation, the prophet says, "righteousness shall spring up together." Until righteousness and salvation be in the soul, nothing good springs up: it produces no good works, any more than the earth brings forth fruit without the rain and dew of heaven; but when righteousness comes from above, it manifests itself by its effects, as rain does. It does not remain in the man, as an inactive barren principle; but it is mighty in operation, to enable him to bring forth fruit. As soon as it is poured down from on high, and received into the heart, it takes root and springs up with every fair blossom, and produces all the ripe fruits of holiness. He that before was dead to God, and to the things of God, having received justification to life, hereby glorifies his heavenly Father, that he bears much fruit. Righteousness changes him, as much as rain does the dry barren ground. As it makes the wilderness and the solitary place to rejoice, and to blossom like the rose, to blossom abundantly, and to rejoice even with joy and singing, so does righteousness act in the barren wilderness of the sinner's heart, bringing with it the reviving streams of grace, and causing every sweet and holy temper to spring up. The grace, which flows from righteousness, renews and sanctifies the heart, makes it dead to sin, and alive unto God. This grace enables us to put off the old man of sin with his corrupt deeds, and to put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. This new man is created in Christ Jesus unto good works, and he produces them daily more in number, and of a richer kind—watered with the fruitful dew of heaven, they are continually springing up, and growing to the glory of God, and to the good of men, and they are continually administering that comfort to the justified soul, which the prophet has described in these sweet expressions—"The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever," (Isaiah xxxii. 17.) If any man has peace with God it must arise from righteousness, from being justified by faith; and if any man has quietness and assurance for ever, it must be the effect of that righteousness which God has created. It must not arise from going about to establish our own righteousness, but from submitting ourselves to the righteousness of God, of which he says in the last words of the text, "I the Lord have created it." I Jehovah, who created all things, have created this righteousness for the unrighteous and the ungodly. It is a new creation. And to create is my incommunicable attribute. You may as soon create a world out of nothing, as create that righteousness, with which sinners must be clothed, if ever they stand before me without spot of sin unto salvation. No righteousness but what is of my creation can present you unblameable and unreproveable in my sight. This is the immutable decree of Jehovah. He that cannot change in himself, nor alter the thing that is gone out of his mouth, has determined, that the righteousness by which we are accounted just before him, is not our own righteousness, but the righteousness of God. It is a righteousness which comes from heaven, and does not grow out of this earth. It is the free gift of God, and not attained by the work of man. It is a righteousness of God's own creation, an infinitely perfect and unspotted righteousness. When a man is able to create a planetary system, then he may create such a righteousness for himself. If the one would be the height of presumption and blasphemy, so is the other. That man never saw the corruption and plague of his own heart, who dreams of working out for himself a righteousness, in which he may appear faultless at the bar of justice. Sin and pride have so blinded his eyes, that he knows not himself. He sees not how corrupt his nature nor how corrupt his life is, nor yet how corrupt his very best duties are. He is also ignorant of the perfect nature of God's law, which is as holy as God is holy, and which will not receive sincere for uninterrupted obedience, but cuts off all claim to legal righteousness for one single offence, even in thought; and he is not acquainted with the gospel method of salvation, which discovers to us, how sinners, corrupt in nature and life, and under condemnation, may be pardoned and justified by the righteousness of the God-man Jesus Christ, imputed unto them by faith. If scripture authority could convince, and scripture images could explain this important doctrine, one might hope the text would leave no doubt in any serious mind.

I shall endeavour to remove the common difficulties concerning the doctrine under my second general head, wherein I proposed to make some practical remarks upon the words of the text: but the time will not permit me to enlarge upon them at present. And therefore leaving them for the subject of another discourse, I would only observe how beautifully these great truths of the gospel are illustrated in the text.

First, we read that the righteousness of Christ is an heavenly gift. "Drop down ye heavens from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness." And then the sinner has only to receive it as a free gift, he has no merit in bringing it down. "Let the earth open" and receive the heavenly gift. And when this righteousness is received by faith, then it brings the sinner into a state of salvation—"and let them bring forth salvation." And when he is placed in this state, then he will bring forth the fruits of the Spirit in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth—"And let righteousness spring up together. I the Lord have created it" to justify the unrighteous, that being made free from sin, and become servants to God, they might have their fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life.

SERMON II.

Drop down ye heavens from above, and let the skies pour down righteousness; let the earth open, and let them bring forth salvation, and let righteousness spring up together. I the Lord have created it.—Isaiah xlv. 8.

In a former discourse upon these words it was proposed to consider, First, Their true sense and meaning; and Secondly, To make some practical remarks upon them. Having gone through the first particular, and established the doctrine, I come now to reduce it to practice, and this I shall do, by making some remarks upon the words in the order they lie in the text.

The first remark that would occur to an attentive reader, is the state of man before righteousness is poured down upon him from on high. He is like the dry ground, which for want of rain is desolate and barren. So is man in a state of nature; destitute of the heavenly influence of Christ's righteousness, he has no good thing springing up in him. Before he is made righteous, he is altogether unrighteous. Being unjust, he is an object of divine justice. The law of God looks upon him as a transgressor, and considers him in a state of condemnation. The sovereign judge regards him as a child of his wrath, and has passed the just decree, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

This is the condition of all men by nature, they are unrighteous, and condemned for their unrighteousness: and they are also helpless and without strength to attain any righteousness for themselves. And yet there is in their fallen nature a cursed pride, which never brake out with greater violence than at present, and which will not submit to the righteousness of God. That we have no righteousness in ourselves, and can attain none by any power or working of our own, is the plain doctrine of God's word, is the very fundamental article of our established church, and it is evident from daily and melancholy experience, and it is the first practical truth in Christianity; for until we be deeply convinced of our sinfulness and helpessness, we shall see no reason to apply to Christ for his righteousness. Men must find themselves sick before they will send for the physician. Our want of righteousness is the cause of all our spiritual sickness and maladies, and the scripture speaks plainly of our want of righteousness. "We have before proved," says the apostle, "both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin, as it is written, There is none righteous, no not one." So says our ninth article: "By original sin, man is very far gone from original righteousness, and by it every person born into the world deserveth God's wrath and damnation." And concerning our helplessness in this state, our reformers in the second part of the homily, "On the misery of man," speak the sense of scripture in these words:

"Thus we have heard, how evil we be of ourselves, how of ourselves, and by ourselves, we have no goodness, help, or salvation, but contrariwise, sin, damnation, and death everlasting: which if we deeply weigh and consider, we shall the better understand the great mercy of God, and how our salvation cometh only by Christ: for in ourselves (as of ourselves) we find nothing whereby we may be delivered from this miserable captivity, into the which we are cast, through the envy of the devil by breaking of God's commandment, in our first parent Adam. We are all become unclean, but we all are not able to cleanse ourselves, nor make one another of us clean. We are by nature the children of God's wrath, but we are not able to make ourselves the children and inheritors of God's glory. We are sheep that run astray, but we cannot of our own power come again to the sheep-fold: so great is our imperfection and weakness. In ourselves therefore may we not glory, which of ourselves are nothing but sinful; neither may we rejoice in any works that we do, all which be so imperfect and impure, that they are not able to stand before the righteous judgment-seat of God, as the holy prophet David saith, 'Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord, for no man that liveth shall be found righteous in thy sight.' To God therefore must we flee, or else shall we never find peace, rest, and quietness of conscience in our hearts."

Thus far our reformers. To the truth of their words we have all set our hands, and may God set our hearts to act agreeably to our subscriptions. Though they were our own act and deed, yet it is a matter of fact, which cannot be concealed, nor too much lamented, that many persons act directly contrary to their most solemn engagements: for how seldom do we hear any thing from the pulpit about original sin, or about there being none righteous, no not one. Instead of this antiquated doctrine, what is more common than to hear declamations upon the sufficiency of human reason in matters of religion, upon the dignity of human nature, and upon moral rectitude? And is it not the general scope of young preaching to recommend practical duties, as necessary terms and conditions of our justification before God? Is this the case, my brethren, or is it not? Certainly you know it is. Have you not heard reason extolled as a sufficient guide in matters of religion, contrary to the express word of God, which declares that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, nor while he continues a natural man can he know them, let him pretend to reason ever so much about them? Have you not heard men lavish in the praises of the dignity of human nature, which, if God's account of human nature be true, is an unrighteous dignity? What is a more common topic, than to cry up moral rectitude, which, if scripture be true, is an unrighteous rectitude, and to recommend practical duties as terms of justification, which is setting them up in the place of Christ's righteousness, and teaching men an unrighteous obedience? Upon whatever footing this be done, it is an unrighteous attempt; whether it be upon the principles of natural religion, or morality, or any other fashionable system, it is equally unrighteous, because it is going about to establish a righteousness of man's own, and not submitting to the righteousness of God; and whoever does this, neither knows his own want of righteousness, nor his inability to attain any by human means; nor does he know that there is no righteousness to be had, but what must come down from heaven, but what the heavens must drop down from above, and the skies must pour out: the application of which truth is my second remark.

The text clearly teaches us, that righteousness comes from above, as the rain does. It does not spring or grow out of the earth, for there is none upon earth righteous, no, not one; but God sends it down from heaven. In like manner as the dry parched ground has not the rain in itself, but receives it from the fruitful influence of the heavens, so the barren wilderness of man's heart has no righteousness until the Holy Spirit bring it from above: for it is his office to convince the sinner of his unrighteousness, and then to convince him of righteousness, by giving him faith to apply to himself that divine righteousness which Christ wrought out for his justification and salvation.

If any member of our church thinks this doctrine wanting in point of evidence, let him consult the articles and homilies; words cannot be plainer than those are in the beginning of the sermon, "On the salvation of mankind by only Christ our Saviour, from Sin and Death everlasting." "Because all men be sinners, and offenders against God, and breakers of his law and commandments, therefore can no man by his own acts, works, and deeds (seem they never so good) be justified, and made righteous before God: but every man of necessity is constrained to seek for another righteousness of justification, to be received at God's own hands, that is to say, the forgiveness of his sins and trespasses, in such things as he hath offended. And this justification or righteousness, which we so receive of God's mercy and Christ's merits, embraced by faith, is taken, accepted, and allowed of God for our perfect and full justification: for" as it follows in the latter part of the same homily "all the good works that we can do be imperfect, and therefore not able to deserve our justification; but our justification doth come freely by the mere mercy of God; and of so great and free mercy, that whereas all the world was not able of themselves to pay any part towards their ransom, it pleased our heavenly Father of his infinite mercy, without any our desert or deserving, to prepare for us the most precious jewels of Christ's body and blood, whereby our ransom might be fully paid, the law fulfilled, and his justice fully satisfied. So that Christ is now the righteousness of all them that truly do believe in him."

This is the doctrine of our reformers, and if any person refuse to abide by their authority, let him consult the oracles of truth, where he may read that the righteousness by which we are justified, is not man's, but God's: and that Christ the God-man is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth; and if he still refuse to make mention of his righteousness, even his only, the Holy Spirit refers him to the fair volume of nature for further evidence. He teaches us that fallen man without the righteousness of Christ, is like the earth without rain. Look, then, upon the face of the earth after there has been no rain for two or three summer months, and see with your own eyes the necessity of having righteousness rained down from heaven. You see the earth hath lost its verdure. The more tender vegetables are quite dead. The more robust hang their heads and droop. This is the true picture of the natural man destitute of Christ's righteousness. No grace can grow, no virtue can flourish in him. His heart is a parched up wilderness, in which nothing good can spring, until Christ's righteousness be rained upon it. If the fact be true in nature, this doctrine must be equally true in grace. If nothing can grow without the rain and dew of heaven, then nothing can grow without the righteousness of Christ. for he who cannot deceive uses this illustration, to teach us the necessity of Christ's righteousness. "Ye heavens drop down the dew," says he, "and let the skies pour out righteousness." Its original is from heaven, and it comes to us from thence to overthrow the pride of natural religion, and morality, and whatever ascribes to fallen man the will and the power of making himself righteous before God. That which makes us righteous is not in any faculty of nature, but is entirely the free gift of grace. And it is owing to men's vain glory and pride, which, of all vices, is most universally grafted in all mankind, that men know not themselves, and will not look up to heaven for that righteousness which they want. Hence it is that we hear so much about natural and moral religion, which pay their court to the pride of our fallen nature, and hence comes that execrable position upon which they are built, viz. "That man has in himself the rule of right and obligations to follow it." Is not this insulting God to his face? He says, that all men are gone out of the right way; the moralist gives him the lie, and says, "No, I have still in myself the rule of right." What rule of right has he in himself, whom God has pronounced unrighteous and abominable altogether? Has the unrighteous man the rule of righteousness in himself? What sort of a rule is it by which an unrighteous man walks? And what obligations has he in himself to follow the rule of right, of whom, God says, there is none that doeth good, no, not one? Can he have at the same time in himself, obligations to follow the rule of right, the thoughts of the imaginations of whose heart are only evil continually? It is impossible. Until Christ's righteousness be poured down upon him from heaven, he is blind and dark in the things of God, he has no rule of right, and he has obligations, and strong ones, to follow the rule of wrong, but none to follow what is right. This is God's account of fallen man How different is it from the flattering view in which our moral teachers love to paint and dress the fancied dignity of their nature. Pride, ignorant of itself, makes them believe that they are still great and noble beings; and they cannot bear the just character which our church has drawn of them in the conclusion of the homily on the misery of man. "Hitherto we have heard what we are of ourselves, very sinful, wretched, and damnable. Again, we have heard, how that of ourselves, and by ourselves, we are not able either to think a good thought, or work a good deed, so that we can find in ourselves no hope of salvation, but rather whatsoever maketh unto our destruction." We must have this humbling view of ourselves, if ever we see reason to seek righteousness from heaven. May God humble us all, and convince us deeply of our want of righteousness, that we may apply to him for it. Knowing where it may be had, we shall apply for it properly, which leads me to consider,

Thirdly, How it is to be attained.

The place of its growth may point out unto us the true method of attaining it. It is of heavenly extraction. You cannot ascend to heaven to bring it down But may not your prayers and good works ascend to merit it? No, they cannot. Until Christ's righteousness be imputed to you by faith, your prayers are an abomination, and your fancied good works are nothing but sin. So says the scripture, "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin." So says our church in her articles, "Works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are not pleasant to God, neither do they make men meet to receive grace; yea, rather, for that they are not done, as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." We doubt not but the best of them are only so many splendid sins. They may adorn a man's outward conversation, may gain him the honour of men, but in the eyes of God they are of no price; because they flow from an unregenerate heart. So that works done before we receive Christ's righteousness can do nothing towards meriting it, and works done after receiving it can add nothing to it. It is a free gift, therefore works done before cannot merit it. It waits for no qualification, no condition in the receiver, because it is given to the most unworthy, and is given to supply the want of all qualifications and conditions; it is given to the unrighteous and to the ungodly. And it wants no works done after receiving to add to it, because it is infinitely perfect. It is the righteousness of God, and will prove itself to be from God by its fruits, which fruits evidence us to be righteous, but do not make us so; for if they were to make us righteous, but in part, that would be going about to establish our own righteousness, and not submitting to the righteousness of God.

This is the doctrine of scripture. After the apostle had established it by various proofs, he thus sums them all up; "therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law." Our church has made the same conclusion in her 11th article, where she teaches, "That we are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore that we are justified by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the homily of justification." In which homily we have these words: "Justification is not the office of man, but of God: for man cannot make himself righteous by his own works, neither in part nor in the whole, for that were the greatest arrogancy and presumption of man, that antichrist could set up against God, to affirm, that a man might, by his own works, take away and purge his own sins, and so justify himself. But justification is the office of God only, and is not a thing which we render unto him, but which we receive of him; not which we give to him, but which we take of him by his free mercy, and by the only merits of his most dearly beloved Son, our only redeemer, saviour, and justifier, Jesus Christ."

In the following part of the same homily are these words:

"The very true meaning of this proposition or saying, 'We be justified by faith in Christ only,' is this, we put our faith in Christ, that we be justified by him only, that we be justified by God's free mercy, and the merits of our Saviour Christ only, and by no virtue or good works of our own, that is in us, or that we can be able, to have or to do, for to deserve the same: Christ himself only being the cause meritorious thereof."

If then all working and boasting be thus excluded, both by scripture and by the authority of our own church, how is this righteousness to be attained? The prophet teaches us in the text. We receive it as the thirsty ground does the rain. Can we do any thing towards bringing down the gentle dew, or the fruitful rain of heaven? When the earth is parched and burnt up, can we command the clouds above to descend and saturate the thirsty soil? No. We are not equal to these things: any more than we can bring down the righteousness of Christ when we please. It is God's to give, ours to receive, as the dry ground does the rain. When God pours down from on high abundance of righteousness, what can we do but receive it as a free gift, and be thankful? This is the main point, and much stress should be laid upon it. We all want righteousness alike, being all alike sinners. Christ has infinite and perfect righteousness to give, and when we desire it, we should be sure to seek it in the way wherein God has appointed to bestow it. Now he always bestows it freely—not upon those who merit it, for then it would not be free—merit and free grace are opposites; but he bestows it upon the unrighteous and ungodly. He bestows it upon them who want it most, and who are sensible they can do the least to attain it. If then you desire righteousness, go as unrighteous and ungodly to the Lord Jesus, and he will clothe you with his all-perfect righteousness. He requires no qualification but to acknowledge that you have none. If you are sensible of your wants, that is a prevailing motive enough with him to supply them. To find that you want righteousness, is the proper way and means to attain it. Hear what your God promises you: "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled"—ye shall be filled with it, because ye hunger and thirst after it, not because ye deserve it, and have merited it by your good works, but because you are made sensible that you cannot deserve or merit it. This is the established method of God's acting—"for he filleth the hungry with good things," but the rich Pharisees he sendeth empty away: he filleth them who hunger and thirst after righteousness with the good things of grace, and with the best things of glory; but he sendeth him, who says, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing—such a proud Pharisee he sendeth empty away.

It is exceedingly difficult to convince men that this is the gospel method of salvation. Their pride will not submit to it—no, not to be saved—by the righteousness of God: they will try, even after they are convinced of the necessity of God's righteousness, to add something of their own to it. Their fond conceit of themselves will not let them see how entirely their nature is corrupted, and how corrupt their best works are. Vicious self-love raises a thousand objections against free justification through Christ's righteousness: but there has been one made by men of corrupt minds in every age, and which they are still making, though God himself has vouchsafed to give it an answer. They object to this scripture doctrine, That it makes void the law, and renders an holy life needless. To which calumny God answers in the text. When he sends down a shower of righteousness from above, he says, let the earth open, and receive the heavenly blessing. But to what end? That it may continue as barren and unfruitful as before? No, but that such effects may follow in the spiritual world, as always do in the natural, when reviving showers descend upon the dry thirsty ground. Do not they always make the earth fruitful? So does the righteousness of Christ, as I proposed to show under my fourth and last remark, which was to prove what are the constant fruits of it.

"I Jehovah have created it," says God in the text. The righteousness of God is a new creation. And why are we created anew in Christ Jesus? That we may live still to the flesh and its corrupt appetites? No: for then we should be created anew in the devil, and not in Christ Jesus: but we are created anew unto good works. The righteousness of Christ is to deliver us from our sinful nature, and not to encourage us to live in it: for this is the will of God, even our sanctification. He gives us righteousness from heaven, that it may raise us up to heaven: for as it comes from God, it will carry us up to God. It will not remain in us as a dead and barren principle, but will make us fruitful in good works, even that we may be filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God the Father. This is the scripture account of the doctrine, and it is also the doctrine of our church. We read in the first part of the homily upon faith, "That as the light cannot be hid, but will show forth itself at one place or another: so a true faith cannot be kept secret, but when occasion is offered, it will break out, and show itself by good works. And as the living body of a man ever exerciseth such things as belong to a natural and living body, for nourishment and preservation of the same, as it hath need, opportunity, and occasion, even so the soul, that hath a lively faith in it, will be doing always some good work, which shall declare that it is living, and will not be unoccupied. Therefore when men hear in the scripture so high commendations of faith, that it maketh us to please God, to live with God, and to be the children of God: if then they fancy, that they be set at liberty from doing all good works, and may live as they list, they trifle with God and deceive themselves. And it is a manifest token, that they be far from having the true and lively faith, and also far from knowing what true faith meaneth."

These are the words of our reformers—they speak of the true justifying faith agreeably to the sense of scripture, describing it to be an active operative grace, producing all the fair and ripe fruits of an holy life—these flow as constantly from it, as light does from the sun. If any man says he hath this faith, and does not make it manifest by these fruits, he deceiveth himself, and the truth is not in him. His faith is dead. It is no better than what the devils have, and unless it please God to open his eyes and to undeceive him, he will soon have his portion amongst them, who believe and tremble.

I have now finished the practical remarks which the text offered to our consideration, and I hope, my brethren, they have appeared to you with convincing evidence. The present and the eternal welfare of your own souls, as well as of theirs which are committed to your care, require you to meditate seriously upon this fundamental doctrine of Christianity. Our whole religion stands upon this great truth, that the righteousness for which we sinners are accepted as righteous at the bar of justice is not our own, but Christ's—wholly wrought out for us by his obedience and sufferings, and received of us by faith without any of our works or deservings. St. Paul has written two epistles in defence of this doctrine. If any man can read them without being convinced of the truth of it, he is out of the reach of argument. When the church of Rome denied the truth of it, and was fallen into the damnable doctrine of works being meritorious towards our justification, which is the ground-work of all their gross heresies and superstitions, it pleased God to raise up the reformers, who laboured chiefly to overthrow this fundamental error, and he blessed their labours with success. By their means, the knowledge of the pure gospel of Jesus Christ was spread abroad, and reached unto this land. Our church was happily reformed, as from all the errors of popery, so from the doctrine of the merit of works in particular. Long it stood upon the principles of the reformation, and these principles, glory be to God's good providence, are still in our articles, and homilies, and liturgy. But where else shall we find them? Who maintains them? Who writes, who preaches in their defence? Alas! they who should be their friends, betray them: for is there a more generally received opinion than that good works are the terms of our acceptance with God? Is not natural religion founded upon this opinion? And so far as men build upon it, they depart from the great doctrine of the reformation, and return back to popery. Is this our religious situation, or is it not? Let matter of fact speak. Are the celebrated books, in which youth are now lectured, written in the protestant spirit against the merit of works, and tending to establish the righteousness of Christ? Is this also the general scope of our preaching? Is it our righteousness, or God's that we seek to establish? Let experience answer. And it answers loud enough—We hear man's righteousness echoed from the pulpit and from the press; and in this protestant church, in this sound and best constituted church upon earth, too many of her sons have learned to reject the fundamental doctrine upon which she was established. When we are thus departing and falling away from our first principles, it seemed to me necessary to call upon you, as christian men to embrace, and as members of our church to defend, them. Whoever amongst us seeks justification through Christ's righteousness cannot be offended at what I have said—and I would offend those who seek for justification without Christ's righteousness. I would gladly stir them up and provoke them to examine their principles, and to try whether they can trust their eternity upon them. If they trust to their own righteousness, they are lost for ever. If there be truth in God—if there be any reliance upon his word, there is no righteousness but Christ's, wherein sinners can appear without spot of sin at the bar of justice. This is the only clothing which can hide all their original and actual pollution. Trust to it, and God the Father will see you perfect in beauty, through the comeliness which Christ will put upon you. Reject it, and think of appearing before him with the least stain of sin, he is of purer eyes than to behold you. The least stain makes you unrighteous; and it is decreed, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Oh that his good Spirit may practically convince every one who hears me this day, of his want of some better righteousness than his own; and may he enable us to wait upon the Lord our righteousness, until the text be fulfilled in us—may he command the heavens from above to drop down, and the skies to pour forth righteousness—and may he command the earth, even our earthly sensual hearts, to open and to receive it, that salvation and righteousness may spring up together, with all their fair and ripe fruits. Grant this, blessed God and Father, to this whole congregation, through the all-perfect righteousness of thy Son Jesus Christ, and by the influence of the Holy Spirit upon our hearts, turning us from sin to righteousness, that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit may be glorified in us, and by us, in time and in eternity. Amen and Amen.

THE DUTY OF PRAYING FOR OTHERS:

ENFORCED BY SOME ARGUMENTS TAKEN FROM THE SUCCESS OF THOSE PRAYERS WHICH THE CHURCH MADE FOR ST. PETER'S DELIVERANCE FROM PRISON.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.—James v. 16.

Peter therefore was kept in prison, but prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him.—Acts xii. 5.

Herod, a persecutor of the church, stretched forth his hand to vex some of its members, and he killed James, the brother of John, with the sword; and because he saw that it pleased the Jews, he proceeded farther to take Peter also. He committed him to prison, chained him to two other persons, and gave him in charge to sixteen soldiers, who were, four at a time, night and day, to be keeping watch over him. And after Easter he intended to have put him to death; but on the very night before his execution, Peter is wonderfully delivered, contrary to Herod's purpose, the prisoner's hopes, and the keeper's intentions. By what means was this brought about? By the church's prayers. From the time Peter was apprehended, prayers were made without ceasing for him; and when the faithful knew his execution was fixed for the next day, they were resolved to wrestle all night with God in prayer for him. Accordingly they besiege the throne of grace with their earnest and hearty requests for Peter's deliverance, and they are heard. While they are praying, God gives in the prisoner among them, as an answer to their prayers.

Upon this fact I will make some practical remarks for the use of God's people at this time. What I shall offer at present relates only to true believers, and I hope God will put it unto their hearts to hear me with profit and improvement to their souls. My brethren, you see the distressed state of our affairs. All Europe is in confusion, our affairs are unsettled at home, and we are at war abroad, and with enemies who boast themselves in their victories and conquests. But the dearest thing to us is in the most danger. The protestant religion is ready to be destroyed, and the Lord seems to have given us up to our bloody persecutors. Look around you, you see no prospect of deliverance by any human means: what course then shall we take? Whither shall we go for help? God must be our only refuge. If we can trust in him for deliverance, he will deliver us: and if we have any trust in him, we shall certainly express it in prayer. And for our encouragement to pray, and to expect a blessing upon our prayers, let us meditate upon the history before us: and may God so direct me to speak, and you to hear, that we may pray without ceasing, as they did in the text, until our success be like theirs. Oh that God would pour down upon us the spirit of prayer and supplication, and make us a praying people, until he deliver us from all our enemies, and make us an happy people. To this end, let us consider some of the chief practical uses to be made of the text. And

First, we may remark, That whenever the faithful are in any great danger or trouble, if God intends to deliver them, he puts it into their hearts to pray for deliverance. We have many examples of this in scripture, and many express passages, whereon to ground this doctrine. We are never able to pray aright without God's assistance. It is the office of the "Holy Spirit to help our infirmities; for we know not," says the apostle, "what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us." (Rom. viii. 26.) He helpeth our infirmities before we pray, by letting us see our wants; and he helpeth us in praying, by enabling us to pray with faith, and to ask what he knows our heavenly Father will grant us. Thus he puts it into their hearts to pray without ceasing for Peter's deliverance. If he had not helped their infirmities, every circumstance made so much against them, that they could have had no hopes from their prayers. But he strengthened their faith, and they looked beyond all difficulties. They saw a way open for Peter to escape, notwithstanding Herod's cruelty, the strictness and number of the guard, the closeness of the prison, and the nearness of Peter's death. They knew God was able, and they believed it would be for his glory, to deliver him, and therefore they prayed without ceasing.

My brethren, do you find yourselves stirred up much to prayer in the present troublesome times? Are your hearts greatly disposed to pray, that God would put an end to these troubles, and to preserve to us the blessings of the protestant religion? Do you spend much time with God, do you wrestle with him in prayer, resolved "not to let him go," until he hear and answer? If this be the case, we shall certainly be preserved. If the Lord's people be led out into fervent and earnest prayer, if they pray often alone, and often with one another, for the peace of our Jerusalem, then we need not despair. Though all things make against us, as they did in Peter's case, yet if God put it into our hearts to pray for deliverance, as he did into the hearts of the faithful, then we may promise ourselves the like blessed answer to our prayers, which they met with.

And this is my second practical remark. The prayer of faith never returns without a blessing. Peter is kept chained in prison, his enemies many, his friends few—his enemies have all earthly power in their hands to destroy him—his friends have only God to apply to for his deliverance, and to him they go. His enemies plot—his friends pray. Their plot against Peter's life, humanly speaking, could not be defeated—to-morrow he must die; but prayer brought down God to his assistance. The prison doors were safely shut, but prayer opened the doors of heaven: and God, to let us see the power of prayer, sent him to his friends while they were praying: as if God had said—There (since you will take no denial) there he is; thus plainly pointing out the means of his deliverance. The prayer of Elijah had the same success. He could open and shut heaven. And if the prayer of one righteous man could avail so much, what could not the joint prayer of many righteous men do? It will bear down all before it, and prevail in heaven and earth. It would reach up to God, and lie before the throne of his grace, and never depart without its answer; and when answered, it would come down with authority, and force all human power to submit. The scripture every where speaks of the efficacy of prayer. The promise of God to it is very encouraging. "Call upon me in the time of trouble, so will I hear thee, and thou shalt praise me." I will give thee reason to praise me, by delivering thee from thy trouble. And God has ever fulfilled this promise. There is not an instance in scripture of the church's joining in a common petition to God, but he always heard and answered it. And indeed how should it fail of success, being indited by the Holy Spirit, and presented by Jesus Christ, and perfumed with the sweet incense of his merits? It then becomes the prayer of Jesus Christ himself. He presents it as his own, and how can God the Father reject the prayer of his beloved Son? So far from rejecting it, he represents it to be as delightful to him as the most fragrant odours are to us. For thus St. John, speaking of our Lord under the character of the angel of the covenant, says, Rev. viii. "There was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of the saints upon the golden altar, which was before the throne, and the smoke of the incense which came with the prayers of the saints ascended up (with acceptance) before God out of the angel's hand." Let your prayers ascend up with the sweet-smelling savour of his merits, and you have his word of promise, that whatever you shall ask the Father in his name, you shall receive.

Now, my Christian friends and brethren (for to such only I am now speaking), since you are convinced of these truths, are you careful to practise them? Let us look back, and each of us examine our own consciences. How much time have we spent of this day in prayer for the distresses of our fellow-creatures? Many are in prison, have we prayed for them? Several Christians are in distress, our reformed brethren persecuted in France, our brethren, in blood as well as in faith, suffering in America, the Christian world in war and confusion, and the Protestant interest nearly destroyed; have we been earnest with God this day in prayer, that he would put an end to all these calamities? How justly may God leave us destitute of his help, if we have not been pleading with him for help for others? And if there be any one of us whose conscience now informs him that he has not sympathized and suffered this day with all the suffering members of Christ, let such a man now humble himself and say, Oh Lord, do not excommunicate me out of the hearts of thine, for my coldness towards them: how shall I expect help from others' prayers, who have been wanting in my prayers for them? Where was my fervent brotherly love, that I would not do that for a brother, which I owe to an enemy, viz. to pray for him. Oh Lord forgive the offence of thy servant, and pour down upon me the spirit of prayer and supplication. This done, resolve not to close your eyes this night, until you have improved your interest in God. You have a key that will open any lock, let no Christians lie in chains by you, either in bodily or spiritual chains. If he be sick, pray him into health. If poor, pray him rich. If troubled in mind, pray him into comfort. It is for want of our prayers that men lie so long under their burdens. If we would jointly commend them unto God, he would either deliver them, or, what is the same, he would sanctify and sweeten the affliction, and make it as great a blessing as a deliverance. If you can do nothing else, pray for your brethren. You may not have other means of helping them, but the poorest Christian has an interest with God, and if he use it in prayer, it will do them and him a real service: for prayer in this case for others, is a clearer evidence of grace, than prayer for ourselves.

Since the times then so loudly call upon us, let us join in prayer for all those that are troubled in mind, body, or estate; and that we may appear as the members of one body, actuated by the same spirit under one head, let us all agree, at whatever distance we may happen to be, at one and the same hour to meet together at the throne of grace. And what hour can we pitch upon more proper for this sacred employment, and more free from worldly avocations, than from eight o'clock to nine on the Lord's Day evening? The attendance upon the public offices of the day is then over. The mind is collected and serious. By what more likely means can we hope to keep it in the same sweet frame, than to close the day with an act of devotion? If God's people would enter into an holy league, and oblige themselves to spend this part of the day in their several closets during these troublesome times, they would infallibly succeed in their petitions. Tell me, whenever the church's joint prayers did miscarry, in what place, in what case, or for what people? There is not an instance wherein they failed. Prayers have been made for men in the church (good men and bad) and for men out of the church—and they have succeeded. Prayers have been made by land and upon the sea, and with success—they have prevailed above-ground, under-ground, in dens, and caves, and dungeons. Prayers have relieved dying men, poor men, prisoners, and captives; they have been made for men against temptations and sorrows, against the rage of persecutors and devils, and they have prevailed; and why should not prayer be as omnipotent now, as it has been formerly? Suppose our national sins cry aloud for vengeance, let our prayers cry louder for mercy. When one Elijah stood up for stiff-necked Israel, and one Amos for rebellious Judah, God showed mercy; and Elijah and Amos were men of like passions with us: encouraged by their success, let us be importunate at the throne of grace, while God allows us an hour for prayer. And let none of us be discouraged as if it was too late; our danger indeed is great, but while God calls in his word, it is not too late to call to him in prayer. He often sees men sinking, before he comes to their help. Our extremity is his opportunity. When Peter is within a few hours of death, then is God's time to deliver him.

But perhaps some of you may say, I have been praying and waiting long, and yet see no success. So did the church. They pray for Peter week after week, without ceasing night or day, and still the prison is shut and his chains are on. And now they have but one night more to wait, and they wait and pray, until Peter comes in among them. If then we have but one day, or one hour more to spend, let us spend it in prayer, not doubting but the God that heareth prayer will answer. Deliverance will come, be it at the last hour, if the prayer of faith wait for it. Experience, and the word of God, prove it ever was so, and it ever shall. Dispute not then, only believe. Go and open thy wants to God as thy reconciled Father, ask a supply of Christ God-man, thy Saviour and Mediator, through God the Holy Ghost as the inditer of thy prayers. Set thy faith to work. Before thou begin, say with the prophet, I will call, and the Lord will answer; and when thou hast finished, believe that in due time and manner thou shalt be answered. Thus pray, let faith enter into thy suit, and end, and subscribe it, and God will as soon deny himself, as deny thee thy heart's desire.

But this point deserves farther consideration. Many serious, well-meaning persons are very apt to be discouraged at God's delay in granting their requests. Let us go to the history before us for light into this particular, and let this be the third practical use to be made of the text. The church had been long at prayers, but God did not answer till the last hour. That was his time, which is always the best. If he does not answer immediately, he delays for wise and good reasons. He would remind us of our former behaviour to him. How often did he call by mercies, by judgments, and by his word, but we would not hear. He prayed us again and again to leave our sins, and come to him, but we would not answer, therefore it is a just reproof, that we should call, and not be heard. God seems not to hear, to spur us on to pray the more earnestly. He seems deaf, that we might speak out, and slow, that we might be earnest. Thus Daniel interprets it in the ninth chapter. God defers and delays, says he, but it is only to try me: therefore he prays with more warmth and fervour, "Oh Lord, hear; oh Lord, forgive; oh Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, oh my God." And he goes on praying with so much vehemence, that while he was yet speaking the angel Gabriel is sent unto him with an answer. Though God delay, yet he will answer. And if his delays begin to discourage us, let us study the course of his providence, and be comforted to wait on. Behold how the husbandman waits. He does not think of sowing and reaping the same day But his corn lies buried for some time, and dies, yea it grows downward, before it shoots upward; and when it is up, it receives many a check: yet still he waits, because he hath experience. So must we. When we have sown our seed, and our prayers seem to be buried and dead, and all things appear worse with us after prayer than they were before, yet we should wait, and learn experience from our own and other men's success. Never was the seed of prayer sown, but there was a crop, although it was a late harvest.

I wish the harvest was come, says one, I have been praying long, and without success. How long have you prayed? Abraham prayed thirty years for a child; Isaac prayed twenty: but their prayers were heard at last. How long did the faithful pray for the incarnation of the Lord of life?—four thousand years before he came. And yet he did come; therefore pray on.

But you have used all means, prayed yourself, got others to pray for you, and yet you have no answer. And might not Peter have said the same? There was not a Christian in Jerusalem but had been praying for him, and yet still he is in prison.

But you think matters go worse with you, the more you pray: the more you pray for faith, the less you have; the more you pray against temptations, the more they beset you. Is not this as we said, the corn must go backward before it comes forward? Was it not so with Abraham and Sarah? The longer they prayed the older they grew.

But you think your sins grow stronger by prayer. No! this cannot be. Only you feel sin more than you did before. It is not because sin is stronger, but because you are sounder: for these motions of sin are not motions of life, but symptoms of death. Take comfort: the pangs of death are now upon your lusts; they are struggling for life. Keep on your prayers, and soon you will have a happy deliverance.

But you say, your comforts come too late, I am quite wearied out. Never say it is too late, so long as God bids you pray, and you can pray, and God's people have hearts to pray for you. If Peter be delivered by midnight or by daybreak, it is as well as if he had been out a month before. God does not delay, because he will not grant, but because he would quicken you, and stir you up to ask with greater earnestness. If your petition be not according to his will, never make it; but if it be, never leave it. Keep on praying, as they did in the text, until Peter came in among them. Remember the poor widow, and learn from her not to be faint or weary in your prayers—she had to deal with a judge, and not a father—a hard rigorous judge, and she was alone, a simple orator, and yet she carried her suit by her importunity. If a judge, that neither feared God nor regarded man, could thus be won, shall not God avenge his own elect, who cry day and night unto him, although he bear long with them? What an encouragement is this to continuance in prayer, though God should delay long! We here see that his delays are not denials. Oh Lord! help our faith, that having precept, promise, God's servants, God's own blessed Son, on our side, we may never be put off with any delay; but may have strength to keep on our suit, so long as an hour or a minute is left. Let us pray with faith and patience, not doubting but God will bring about our deliverance, not only after delays, but after all human means fail: which is the fourth circumstance in the history before us worthy of our attention.

Many persons are apt to be stumbled when they see no outward means of deliverance. Although they have the word of promise in their hands, yet they are tempted to think their case desperate, when they see no way open to escape. And when this comes after many and long delays, it is often discouraging. But we should consider that the Lord never wants means. St. Peter had good reason to say from his own experience, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver his people."—He is never at a loss. If they know how to pray, he always knows how to deliver. His wisdom is infinite to find out means, his power is almighty to carry them into execution, nay, if need be, to create them. He is the Lord of hosts: all creatures and all elements obey him. If we want his help at land or sea, he is Lord of all. If we be in prison, he can open any jail. He can make strangers and enemies, yea all things, work together for our good. Look not then at the want of means, but at his promise, who can work without means and against means. Cast thy care upon God, and he will care for thee. Is thy burden poverty? Cast it upon him, and he will help thee. Is it sin or sorrow? Whatever it be, he can bear it, and discharge thee.

But still thou art afraid, thou seest no means. Suppose they had reasoned, in Peter's case, as thou dost? If we had a friend at court to use his interest with Herod, or if we had a friend in the watch whom we could bribe, or if the jailor would suffer us to come at Peter, then we might have some hopes; but now all human means fail us, why need we pray any longer? They had more faith than to reason in this manner. They knew that God had means out of our reach. If men could not deliver Peter, an angel should. If thou believest, he will find or create means to deliver thee. All things are possible to him that believeth.

But thou seest so many difficulties in the way, that thy case seems desperate, and it is not possible to help thee. What are difficulties to him, who speaks the word, and all nature obeys? His power is shut out of no place, and is every where almighty, Does thy case require more power than Peter's did? Go to the prison, there is a strong guard. Pass the guard, there is a door. Pass it, there is a chain. Get through it, there is an iron gate—and come at last to Peter, he is chained fast to two men. What do all these avail against God? If Peter's friends can break through all these discouragements to prayer, God will break through these and a thousand more to their comfort.

"Oh, but," says weak faith, "God works no wonders at present." No? What, is not his name still the wonderful God? Is not his power and his wisdom as great as ever? Are not his promises as good? Is not his love, and our want of it, as much as ever? Have we not still the same loving Saviour, and the same interest in him? All things stand as they did before. And if we use the former means, we shall infallibly find the former success, and God will do exceeding abundantly above all that we can either ask or think. We have the Lord's promise for this, and our own experience. What man is there any way acquainted with God and this holy duty, who ever found his prayers unsuccessful? When didst thou ever speak to thy heavenly Father, but he answered thee with some ease or some comfort? When didst thou ever pray, but thy heart was somewhat refreshed? Fear not then but the Lord will still do wonders. Is any thing too hard for God? Has he made any promise that he cannot perform? No, certainly. Faith finds no variableness in him nor shadow of turning, but experiences him to be the God that heareth prayer, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

The history would afford many more practical remarks, but here I stop. Let these four suffice. First, when God intends to deliver his people out of any trouble, he puts it into their hearts to pray for deliverance. Secondly, their prayers are always successful—although, thirdly, God delays to give them an answer for some time. And fourthly, when he does answer, he wants no means to bring about his gracious purposes. My Christian brethren, consider these particulars with attention, and see whether there be not great reason for you to beg of God that he would give you at this time the spirit of prayer and supplication. If he does not make us a praying people, it may be feared that he will give us over to destruction; for look around you. See the troubles of Europe. Does not your heart bleed for the shedding of so much Christian blood? Examine the state of the Christian churches. What coldness and deadness is there in some? And how greatly are they, who have a little life, opposed and persecuted? Consider the danger that threatens the Protestant interest. Are not these so many loud calls upon you to use your interest with God, that he would put a stop to these general calamities. And then look around this kingdom, and see whether it does not stand in need of your prayers; is there any corner of the island, wherein vice does not abound? And does not the number of swearers and cursers far exceed the number of those who mourn and pray; yea, so far, that I fear for one prayer, there are a thousand oaths and profane curses? And though God has been punishing us, yet we are neither reformed nor humbled. We neither deny ourselves our diversions nor our sins. Long have we been declining, and now our friends abroad and at home are encompassed with sins so provoking, with enemies so numerous and mighty, that we are brought to this extremity, we must either make our way through all by prayer, or else we perish. The imagination of man cannot devise how we should long subsist under our pressing evils, unless we call in mercy and help from heaven. Let us then make God our refuge and strength, and we shall find him a very present help in trouble. Let so many of us as know what our interest is in God, and what the power of prayer is, now in earnest address ourselves to this duty. And we need not fear, but since God allows us a time for prayer, he will also find a time for our deliverance from all our troubles.

But here is our greatest danger—the Lord's people are not stirred up to be hearty and earnest in praying to see an end of these troubles. There seems to be among them a great coolness and backwardness to the duty. This is the worst sign of the times. We have but one remedy, and that we do not take. My Christian friends and brethren, if this be your case, beg of God to give you the spirit of prayer and supplication. I have been urging you by several motives to do your duty in these troublesome times; you see and know what it is, now go and practise it. Your weapon is prayer, may God give you grace to use it. If you use it with faith, it will prevail, yea, it will be almighty, in heaven and earth. Whatever you want, prayer can supply you. Do you want your corruptions abated? Pray against them. Would you have your graces increased? Pray for them. Would you have the afflicted churches comforted, and our own church and kingdom restored to peace and tranquillity? You may relieve them by prayer. If God intends to try us with greater troubles and persecutions, prayer is necessary, that you may be fitted for them. On all these accounts you cannot but see that there is great need of prayer, and if you do pray, that there are great hopes of success. Oh, then, let us lay aside all trifling matters, and attend strictly to this. Let us leave off so much talking about what belongs to statesmen, let our subject be what belongs to private Christians. Let us pray more, and talk less. Let us speak more to God, and less of men. Speak as much as you will for men, but say nothing against them out of an ordinance. Whatever you have to say against them, let it be in prayer to God for them. This is the Christian's duty, and God grant it may be the Christian's practice.

Let me leave this one consideration upon your minds. When the public exercises of the Lord's Day are ended, take up the bible, and read the history we have been meditating upon. See whether it does not contain more encouragements to pray for the peace of our Jerusalem than I have now used—and while your heart is warm with the subject, put it in practice. Go to the throne of grace at the appointed hour, and use your interest with him that sitteth upon the throne. Do not spend your evening in talking of other men's matters, but mind your own duty. The less they mind theirs, the more should you pray for them. And instead of prating, as I hear many professors of religion prate, "Oh that we might have more public fasts, more public meetings for prayer, more general reformations, &c.;" get thee into thy closet, and set about thy own reformation as soon as thou wilt. Pray and fast, as long as thou wilt, and the more thou growest in grace, the more wilt thou pray for others, as well as thyself. Let us all, then, with one heart and one voice now begin, and God grant we may pray without ceasing, as they did in the text, until we obtain the like deliverance. And what sweeter, what more suitable, what more devout words can we find wherewith to conclude, than the collect of our church for this day?

"Almighty and everlasting God, who dost govern all things in heaven and earth, mercifully hear the supplications of thy people, and grant us thy peace all the days of our life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

THE KNOWLEDGE OF SALVATION PRECIOUS IN THE HOUR OF DEATH:

PROVED IN

A SERMON

PREACHED JANUARY 4, 1759, UPON THE DEATH OF THE REV. JAMES HERVEY, RECTOR OF WESTON FAVEL IN NORTHAMPTONSHIRE

Righteousness delivereth from death.—Prov. x. 2.

Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.—Luke ii. 29, 30.

According to the ancient prophecies, in the fulness of time God sent forth his Son. He came to his own when there was a general expectation of his birth. Many just and devout persons in Jerusalem were then looking out for the Redeemer's coming in the flesh, and among them good old Simeon, and Anna, a prophetess, are particularly mentioned. St. Luke says, "There was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon, and the same man was just, a justified person, and devout, fearing to offend God," as the Greek word signifies, waiting for the consolation of Israel; he was waiting for the incarnation of the divine Comforter, by whose birth all the promises of comfort were to be ratified and fulfilled, and the Israel of God was to receive everlasting consolation. The Lord was pleased to vouchsafe a particular revelation of his will in this matter to Simeon: "for the Holy Spirit was upon him, and it was revealed unto him by the Holy Spirit, that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ incarnate." And he came by direction of the Spirit into the temple, and when the parents brought in the holy child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God that he had lived to this happy hour, when he could take up the prophet's words, and say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord, we have waited for him, we will be glad, and rejoice in his salvation." Simeon waited to see God incarnate, and having seen him, he waited to live no longer. He desired his dismission. All the ends of living were answered, and therefore he put up this sweet prayer—"Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

With these same words one of our dear brethen, now with the Lord, finished his course. They were the dying words of the Reverend Mr. James Hervey. He had long desired to depart, and to be with Christ, which he knew was far better than to abide in the flesh, but he waited patiently for the Lord's time; and when it was come, he thus expressed the thankfulness of his heart, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy most holy and comfortable word: for mine eyes have seen thy precious salvation." The Lord heard him, and gave him a gentle dismission. He died as he had lived, in a perfectly even and calm composure of mind. Death showed that he came to him as a friendly messenger to call him to glory, for he cheerfully obeyed the summons. There was no fear, no struggle, not a sigh or groan; but he departed in peace, and in full assurance of faith. Oh that you and I, my brethren, may so live by the faith of the Son of God, that when we come to die, we may be able to use this same prayer, and may receive of the Lord a like gracious answer.

These sweet dying words of our dear brother have made a great impression upon several of his acquaintance: for they have been led to consider them more closely than perhaps they ever did before, and several have meditated upon them with great comfort. In order that others might do the same, and that his happy death might be the means of stirring up many to seek to die the death of the righteous, and that their latter end might be like his, I have determined to speak upon the words this day. May the same Spirit by which Simeon spake them be in all your hearts. May he teach you their true and full meaning, and in God's due time may he give you the comfortable experience of them. Under his guidance let us consider,

First, That when Simeon had seen the salvation of God, he was prepared to depart;

Secondly, He therefore desired it, and prayed for it; and

Thirdly, He expected he should depart in peace according to God's word, which was fulfilled to him; and under each of these particulars I shall speak of the experience of our deceased brother.

First, Simeon had it revealed to him by the Holy Spirit, that he should not die until he had seen the Lord's Christ, and when Jesus was brought into the temple he was directed to go and receive him for the promised Messiah, and taking him up in his arms, he blessed God, and said, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." It is evident he spoke these words in their primary sense of his seeing Jesus with the eyes of his body; but this could have been no great cause of joy to him, unless he had before seen Christ some other way; for multitudes saw him with their bodily eyes, while he was upon earth, who were no better for the sight; and multitudes will hereafter see him in his glorified body, but it will be to their everlasting confusion. There is another kind of sight, to which our church referred you this afternoon, when each of you took up these words and said, "for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." If you knew what you said, and spoke the truth as you had experienced it, you meant that you had seen the salvation of God with the eye of faith; according to what is said of Moses, "That by faith he saw him who is invisible," (Heb. xi. 27.) He saw him by the eyes of his soul, who was invisible to the eyes of his body: for the soul has its eyes as well as the body, but sin darkened them: it put them into the state in which the eyes of the body are, when they have no light; then they can see nothing. So the soul is said in scripture to be in darkness and blindness, until the eyes of the understanding be enlightened. They cannot see any spiritual objects until the Sun of Righteousness shine upon them; nor when he does shine, can they see any loveliness in those objects, until they be able to act faith upon them; for the eye of faith not only beholds the object, but also distinguishes its own interest in it. Faith keeps all the senses of the soul in act and exercise upon the proper object which each apprehends; here the eye of faith is fixed upon salvation, not only viewing it as a blessing belonging to others, but also appropriating it to itself, "Mine eyes have seen thy salvation;" here Simeon speaking of our Saviour calls him Salvation, because all salvation is in and from him. He is the author, and he is the finisher of it. The great plan of it was laid by the co-equal and co-eternal persons of the ever-blessed Trinity before the foundation of the world; it was carried into execution by our divine Saviour in the fulness of time, and his is an eternal salvation, an eternal deliverance from all evil, and an eternal possession of all good. Upon the entrance of sin into the world this great salvation of our God was revealed, and, by faith, believers under the Old Testament dispensation, enjoyed the benefits of it. At the appointed time Jehovah took a body of flesh, and our divine Immanuel stood up to save his people from their sins. He undertook to satisfy all the demands of law and justice. The law he satisfied by paying it a perfect unsinning obedience, which being a divine as well as a human obedience, did therefore magnify the law, and make it more honourable, than if all the creatures in heaven and earth had never offended against it. Justice he satisfied by enduring the threatened punishment, and after his sufferings and death, justice had no more demands upon him; for he came out of the prison of the grave with a full discharge. This satisfaction made to law and justice, by the obedience and sufferings of the Lord Jesus, is what the scripture calls the Righteousness of God, because it is a divine and infinitely perfect righteousness, a divine righteousness wrought out by Jehovah himself, and as infinitely perfect a righteousness as Jehovah could make it. In this all-glorious righteousness of the God-man Christ Jesus consists the sinner's salvation; for he is accepted and justified by it: the fruits of this righteousness are his sanctification, and the robe of this righteousness is his glorification. So that salvation in time and in eternity depends upon the righteousness of the incarnate God. This is the fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion, for which our dear brother was a noble champion. He saw, he experienced the importance of it, and therefore in his conversation and in his preaching it was his favourite topic. How sweetly, how profitably have I heard him dwell upon it, and how excellently has he defended it in his writings? Read his Theron and Aspasio, and when you are thoroughly convinced that Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one who believeth, and can say with faith, "in the Lord have I righteousness and salvation," then your mind will be settled in peace and comfort, and you will be delivered from those dangerous errors which are now propagated concerning the righteousness of the Lord Jesus. Thank God for the masterly defence of it in these dialogues.* In them Mr. Hervey, being dead, yet speaketh the praises of his adorable Redeemer, and clearly proves that we have our salvation through his righteousness. Immanuel the Saviour is the justifier, as he says himself, (Isa. xlv. 21, 22.) "There s no God else beside me; a God that gives righteousness and a Saviour; there is none beside me. Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else." How could they be saved by looking unto Christ? Certainly not by a look of their bodily eyes. Simeon's joy did not arise from having Christ in his arms, and looking upon him; but from being able to look upon him by an act of faith. He knew him to be his Saviour. Thence arose his joy, and from thence must yours arise. It is the look of faith which saves; the eye of faith kept in exercise upon its proper object, even upon Jesus, the author and finisher of the faith. It is this act of faith which our Lord requires—"Look unto me," with this promise annexed, "and be ye saved." There is salvation in the look of faith: for it sees and receives Jesus, as he is offered in scripture, for a free, full, and complete Saviour. And whoever keeps the eye of faith in constant exercise, is prepared with good old Simeon to depart in peace; because, by having an interest and property in the salvation of our God, he is thereby delivered from every thing that can make death dreadful, and is in possession of every that can make death desirable.

What is it that makes death dreadful? Is it not guilt in the conscience accusing the sinner for the breach of the holy law, and alarming him with fear and threatened punishment, which the justice, and holiness, and truth of God are concerned to see inflicted, in time and in eternity? Thus we read, "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." Death has power to sting, so long as the broken law gives sin a right to accuse and condemn: all unpardoned sinners therefore are afraid of death. From this state of fear and bondage our Lord came to save his people: "he came to deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage;" and he does deliver them when their sins are forgiven, and his righteousness is imputed to them: for then the broken law cannot condemn, nor justice punish, there being no condemnation

* About a week before Mr. Hervey was taken ill, I mentioned to him a report that was spread about, concerning Mr. Sandeman's Letters upon Theron and Aspasio, to this effect; that he (Mr. Hervey) had written a letter to Mrs. Cooke, and therein had said, That Mr. Sandeman was in the right, and had convinced him of his error; or words to that purpose. To which he answered, That he had written a letter to Mrs. Cooke, and therein he had acknowledged that many of Mr. Sandeman's remarks were judicious, and that he had corrected some of his expressions and inaccuracies. But he said, That he was very far from having changed his opinion as to the substance and matter of the argument: for therein he thought Mr. Sandeman was entirely wrong. Whereupon I desired he would insert an advertisement in some of the London papers, signed by himself, to set this mistake right, lest it might hinder the sale and reading of his books, and thereby prevent much good. To which he agreed; and added, that he would let that paragraph stand in his Answer to Mr. Wesley, relating to Mr. Sandeman, only softening the expression a little; but all this was prevented by his illness and death. The truth of this I am ready to attest.—Abraham Maddock, curate of Weston Favel.

to them that are in Christ Jesus. Upon which death loses its sting; and when the pardoned sinner looks upon it, he sees nothing terrible in its appearance, but can boldly and without presumption, say, "Yea, when I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou, my God, art with me."

And he is not only prepared to die because he is delivered from every thing that could make death dreadful, but also because he is in the possession of every thing that can make death desirable. He knows he has an interest in Christ, and Christ is the possessor of heaven and earth. He has all things in his hands, and has promised to make them all work together for the good of his redeemed people: so that whoever has Christ, has all things. "All things," says the apostle, "are yours, whether life or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours." And the reason follows, "and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." As all that Christ has is yours, and all that God has is Christ's; consequently all is yours. And death by name is yours: no longer a curse and a punishment, but turned into a real blessing: for it is the gate and entrance, through which you pass into endless life and never-fading glory.

Thus he is prepared to depart, who has seen with the eye of faith the salvation of God. The doctrine is clear from scripture; but how is it, my brethren, in your experience? Are you prepared to depart? And on what do you build your preparation? On the Lord Jesus, or on what? Search and see, for nothing can comfort you in the hour of death, but having received him into your hearts by faith and love. You must see his salvation, and be able to keep the eye of faith intent upon it, before you can be prepared to depart; but when this is your happy case, then, in whatever shape death comes, you will be able to say with our dear brother, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." He might well say, Mine eyes have seen thy salvation: for all that came near him were convinced that he had seen it. The effects showed it. He had put off the old man, and had put on the new, and was under the influence of divine love to his adorable Saviour. The love of Jesus ruled in his heart, and was therefore constantly uppermost in his mouth. He loved to be telling of his salvation all the day long. And he did not talk like a professor full of mere head knowledge; but what he spake had a warmth, and life, and power in it, which showed that it came from his heart. He was perfectly inflamed with the love of his divine Lord and Master; and if you sat any time in his company, you could not help catching some of the holy flame. So that if strangers to his person may doubt of his experience of a Saviour's love, we who have conversed with him cannot. We are sure from what we saw and heard, that he had seen the salvation of God, and therefore was prepared to depart. He knew in whom he had believed, and was certain the power and the love of the dear Immanuel were in his interest; so that neither death, nor he that had the power of death, could hurt him.

A friend of mine was much with him on the 15th of December, and the discourse turned upon what Christ had done for his soul. Mr. Hervey spake strongly and earnestly of the assurance of his faith, and of the great love of God in Christ to him. He declared that the fear of death was taken from him; and it afterwards appeared, that death had no sting to hurt, nor the grave any power to get victory over him: for when death came, it found his mind in perfect peace. He had no uneasy apprehensions of dying, but had hopes full of glory and immortality. Doubtless, then, he had seen the salvation of God. The knowledge of salvation had been precious to him in life, and therefore he experienced the preciousness of it in death: for then he could give thanks to God for giving him the victory through Jesus Christ his Lord. Happy are they to whom God has given the knowledge of their salvation; they believe, on good grounds, that their Saviour has brought them into a state of salvation; and therefore they are prepared to meet death, yea they can desire and pray for it, as Simeon did: which is the second particular I was to consider.

Simeon knowing that he was prepared, therefore desired to depart. And this is the believer's case. He longs for death, not out of an impatient, discontented temper, but out of a real holy affection. When worldly men are oppressed with troubles on all sides, and see no way to escape, they are apt to desire death, that it may bring their misery to an end, and put them out of their pain. And there are some most miserable and abject cowards, who murder themselves to get rid of the troubles of life. These men court death as a less evil, but the believer desires it as a real blessing. He knows that his death will be to the glory of his Saviour, for it grieves him to the heart, that he should ever do any thing displeasing to such a kind benefactor After receiving so many tokens of Christ's love, oh it is indeed afflicting to give him the least offence. I appeal to yourselves. You that have the love of Jesus in your hearts, are not you sorry that you love him so little? Have not you reason daily to mourn for your ingratitude to him? And what will such thoughts suggest, but a desire to be, where the very occasion of offence will be removed? It was on this account that Mr. Hervey desired death; for the last morning of his life, when his brother came in to inquire after his welfare, he said, I have been thinking of my great ingratitude to my God. And these thoughts made him wish to be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

And he desired it as Simeon did, and all believers do, upon another motive, namely, because the Lord will get himself honour, by the honour which he will give to his people in his kingdom. He will be glorified, says the apostle, in his saints; he will get himself glory by the great glory which he will bestow upon them. And as the believer has in all things an eye to God's glory, so has he especially in his desires to be dissolved and to be with Christ. He knows that God is glorified in him, and by him at present; but then it is imperfectly, and that grieves him. Self, or the creature, will be trying to share the heart with God, and thereby to rob him of his glory. A bare thought of this, when only rising in the mind, hurts the believer. He would have every thought brought into subjection to Christ, and that makes him desire to be, where temptation and sin shall be no more, and where he shall glorify God, and God shall be glorified in him for ever and ever. With this view Mr. Hervey desired to depart. His great love to his Saviour's glory made him wish for death. He longed to be dissolved, that he might be freed from the frailties and infirmities of this mortal life, under which he laboured, and could not always, nor in a perfect degree, promote the glory of his redeeming God: therefore he desired to be with them who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and are ever receiving glory from him, and ever giving glory to him. And the Lord granted his desire. He literally answered his prayer, for he departed in peace, according to the word of God; as I purposed to show under my third head.

What it is to be at peace with God, and to depart with a sense of this peace upon our minds, I cannot better express than in the excellent words of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, in his nine sermons, p. 132. "The peace of God is that sense of being in friendship with him, that feeling of comfort and joy flowing from him, which passeth all understanding, exceeds the conceptions of those who have not experienced it, and will exceed hereafter the present conceptions of those who have." And the believer, even when he is departing this life, has a sense of his being in friendship with God, and has a feeling of comfort and joy flowing from him. This is promised in scripture, and this is fulfilled to them who being justified by faith have peace with God. Being reconciled to the Father through the Son of his love, they live and they die in peace.

I suppose some weak in the faith are thinking thus within themselves: "Well, is it so, that true believers die in peace and joy? I am sure I could not at present; for I am dreadfully afraid of death: and what would not I give to be delivered from these fears! for they make my life miserable." My brethren, why are you in bondage to them? God offers you deliverance. There are many general promises in his word, tha , let what will happen to believers, the peace of God shall rule in their hearts. Thus Isaiah xxvi. 3. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed upon thee." And as it is a perfect, so it is a continual peace. "The Lord of peace himself," says the apostle, (2 Thess. iii. 16,) "give you peace always by all means:" for after he has once given this peace, he makes all means, even the most unlikely, tend to the promoting of it; therefore death can by no means weaken, and much less destroy, this peace of God. These general promises he fulfilled to the patriarchs; for St. Paul says, Heb. xi. 13, "That they all died in faith." They acted faith in their death, and consequently had a sweet sense of the peace of God in their hearts, when they died. David shows us the reason of their dying in faith, Psalm xlviii. 14, "This God is our God for ever and ever, he shall be our guide even unto death." They knew that their God would be with them to guide and keep them, when the body returned to dust, and the spirit returned to God who gave it: and therefore David spoke for himself, what each of them also could say—"When I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, because thou, my God, art then with me; thy rod and thy staff comfort me even then." (Psalm xxiii. 3.) With this faith they looked upon death as disarmed of its sting and power to hurt, and therefore they laid down their heads, and fell asleep in the arms of death with as much composure as any weary traveller ever longed for rest. They fell asleep. The scripture speaks of their death under this beautiful image, to teach us that death was as sweet to them as ever sleep was to a hard-labouring man. The faithful fell asleep quietly and composedly. And how should it be otherwise? They had no evil to fear: for they were at peace with God. And what could death do to hurt that peace? It does indeed dissolve all other bonds, but it strengthens this. It is the happy instrument of fastening the bond of peace with a tie, which never, never can be dissolved. And when the faithful look upon death in this light, what is there in it but joy and peace, even a joy unspeakable, and a peace that surpasseth all understanding?

Perhaps some of you think, this is not always the case, because there are very good men who have had strong conflicts and struggles before death. Nay, my brethren, think not so wickedly of God. Is it according to his word that the faithful shall depart in peace, and do they not? What! can the word of God be broken? No. It shall stand fast for ever and ever; and in the case which you state, it does not follow that this peace is weakened or destroyed, because it is tempted. By no means. The sense of this peace may remain, when it is most furiously attacked: for it is the peace of God. God gave it, and God keeps it, and he may suffer the devil to tempt, but not to destroy it. The more it is tempted, the more honour redounds to God for preserving it in the fiery trial. It was more to God's glory to preserve his children in the fiery furnace, than to have kept them out of it. Doubtless he that has the power of death will make his last efforts, and try to shake the faith of the dying believer. The devil will then set upon him with all his fury. But though he be a roaring lion, yet he is chained, and the Almighty Saviour so over-rules his malice and rage, that he makes them work together for his glory and his people's good: as he did remarkably in the last efforts which the enemy made against our dear brother. He saw him in great weakness of body, and then made a furious onset against his faith; but the dear Immanuel was with him, and would not give him over into the enemy's hands. His faith was tried, and it came like gold out of the fire. He knew that it would be tried, and had therefore prepared himself for the fiery trial. Speaking of it to a faithful minister of Christ, who was often with him in his last sickness, he said—"How many precious texts are there, big with the rich truths of Christ, which we do not comprehend, which we know nothing of; and of those which we do know, how few do we remember? Bonus textuarius est bonus theologus, and that is the armour. The word of God is the sword, these texts are the weapons which I must use when that subtile spirit, that arch-adversary of mankind, comes to tempt and sift me in my last conflict. Surely I had need be well provided with these weapons, I need have my quiver full of them, to answer Satan with texts out of the word of God, when he assaults me." Satan did assault him, but found him prepared and armed. Mr. Hervey said to his friends the day that he died, "Oh you know not how great a conflict I have." And after he had sat for some time with his eyes constantly lift up towards heaven, and his hands clasped together in a praying form, he said—"Now this great conflict is over." Jesus made him conqueror over all the powers of darkness; having endeavoured to rob him of his peace, but in vain, they left him in the Saviour's arms, never more to be tempted; and he watched over him with the tenderest love, until he took him home. And when he went, he indeed departed in peace. His body seemed to be ready as well as his soul. When death came, he had not one struggle with it. There was not a single groan or sigh, or any thing that could show the least unwillingness to depart. He had such a gentle dismission as he had prayed for in Simeon's words. He departed in peace, and fell asleep.

I have now finished what I had to offer upon the three particulars mentioned in my text, and it appears, that when a sinner is convinced of his want of a Saviour, and is convinced that Jesus is such a Saviour as he wants, able and willing to save to the uttermost, and when he is made to see his interest in the perfect complete righteousness of this adorable Saviour, and is assured of it from the word and Spirit of God, and from the fruits of righteousness produced in his life and conversation, then he is prepared to die; then he may desire it with submission to God's will, and whenever death comes, he may expect to depart in peace, according to the word of God. These great truths I have illustrated from scripture and from experience, more especially from the experience of our dear brother, now with the Lord, of whom I have spoken nothing more, than what the words of my text naturally led me to say. If I were to attempt to draw the character of this excellent man, I would consider him in the several relations in which he stood to God and man, and would exhort you to follow him, so far as he followed Christ. But the compass of this discourse will not suffer me to enlarge. I can only just observe some particular instances, from whence it will evidently appear that he had seen the salvation of God. He had a clear view of it by the eye of faith, and was able to act faith upon it, for his was a faith working by love. "We love God," says the beloved apostle, "because he first loved us;" because we know by faith that he first loved us: so that our love is the reflex act of his love to us. And Mr. Hervey had great experience of God's love to him, and therefore his heart was full of love to God; and out of the abundance of his heart his mouth spake. There was such a sweetness of heart-love upon his tongue, that he used to speak of the love of the adorable Redeemer like one who had seen him face to face in the fulness of his glory. He would, with all the power of language and dignity of sentiment, speak for a long time together in praise of the ever blessed Saviour; but you might plainly see, though every body else was pleased, yet he was not satisfied with what he had said. He thought he had not said enough, and what he had said fell far below his Lord's merit. But still he would try again, and indeed was never weary. You could not hear him speak for any time upon this his favourite subject, without being convinced that he felt what he said; and if you had any love of God when you went into his company, his conversation would inflame it. He had an excellency, which I never saw to so great a degree in any other person. He never let an opportunity slip of speaking of the love of Christ. He would take occasion from the most common incidents, and yet it would not appear forced: for he had a wonderful talent at spiritualizing and improving whatever happened about him. By which means he hindered the conversation from turning upon trifling matters, and at the same time kept it up with spirit and usefulness. Having set the Lord always before him, he saw the love of God in every thing, and therefore it is not to be wondered that all objects and events should give him occasion to speak of it. In his last sickness it continued still to be his favourite theme: for whenever my friend, who was much with him, came into the room, he would begin to talk of the love of Christ, and of the great things which Christ had done for him, until his breath failed him; and as soon as he had recovered himself a little, he would proceed upon the same sweet subject: so that he might have truly applied to himself the words of the prophet—"My mouth shall be telling of thy righteousness and of thy salvation all th day long: for I know no end thereof."

This heart-love to God appeared evidently in every part of his character. As a minister, his faith wrought by love to the souls of men in all the offices of his function. While his health permitted him, he watched like a faithful shepherd over his flock. He used to visit them from house to house, and to speak freely to them of the state of their souls; and when the weakness of his body obliged him to drop these religious visits, he would often grieve that he could not be more useful, and would speak with great concern and uneasiness of his not being able to preach oftener, and to do more for Christ. In the pulpit he was fervent and earnest with his people, and would often exert himself beyond his strength: for he preached the great doctrines of salvation as one who had experienced the power of them. It was manifest to all who heard him, that he felt what he spake. And when we speak what we know, and testify what we have seen, then God blesses this experimental preaching. He puts a divine power and energy into it, and renders it effectual to awaken sinners, to comfort them that mourn for sin, and to edify and build up the faithful. Mr. Hervey had many happy proofs of the usefulness of his preaching for each of these purposes; and therefore he did not think it enough to preach one a week on the Lord's day, but he set up a weekly lecture at Weston Favel, which was very well attended, and was blessed to many of his neighbours, who will be his glory and crown of rejoicing in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming.

He did not forget that he was a minister in his own house: for he called his family together twice a day to serve God. It was his custom in the evening, after the servants had read the psalms and the second lesson, to explain some part of what had been read. In this exercise he would sometimes dwell for half an hour; and when he met with a sweet passage upon the love of Christ, I have heard him speak for three quarters of an hour, and then he concluded with a prayer.

In the morning, when the family were met together, he used to ask the servants —"Well! where was our text last night?" And after they had repeated it, he made them give an account of what had been said upon it, and then he would repeat and enforce his last night's discourse, concluding with prayer.

In the afternoon when he was called down to tea, he used to bring his Hebrew Bible or Greek Testament with him, and would either speak upon one verse, or upon several verses, as occasion offered. This was generally an improving season. The glory of God is very seldom promoted at the tea-table, but it was at Mr. Hervey's. Drinking tea with him was like being at an ordinance: for it was sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

As a member of society, his faith wrought abundantly by love to his neighbour: for he was full of good works. His charities to the poor were very large; and that he might be liberal to them, he was very frugal in his own expenses. He chose rather to clothe the poor, than to give them money. He used to get some judicious person to buy linen, coarse cloth, stockings, shoes, &c. for them at the best hand, alleging that the poor could not buy so good a commodity at the little shops, and with driblets of money. "I am God's steward," says he, "for his poor, and I must husband the little pittance I have to bestow upon them, and make it go as far as possible." But where money would be particularly serviceable to a family long afflicted with sickness, or to a prudent housekeeper who had met with great losses in trade, he would give five, ten, or fifteen guineas at a time, taking care it should not be known from whence the money came.

He gave away a great number of good books, with suitable instructions for their use, and especially bibles. In the blank leaf he frequently wrote something striking, or else stuck in a printed paper, relating to the promises of God in and through Jesus Christ.

Mr. Hervey's income was but small, and it may be wondered how he managed it so well as to have such sums to spare for charitable uses. He could not have done it entirely out of his church-preferment, and he had no fortune of his own; but what money was left after the family expenses were paid, and all the profits arising from the sale of his books, which was a very considerable sum, he gave away in charity. He made of it a bank for the poor. "And this," says he, "I have devoted to God. I will on no account apply it to any worldly uses. I write not for profit or for fame, but to serve the cause of God; and as he has blessed my attempt, I think myself bound to relieve the distresses of my fellow-creatures with the profit that comes from this quarter." And he is still relieving them. He was not willing that his charities should die with him: for he ordered all the profit arising from the future sale of his books to be constantly applied to charitable uses. Thus having believed in God, he was careful to maintain good works, knowing that these things are good and profitable unto men.

In his private life he was under the influence of the same faith, working by love to the will and commandments of God. His holy walking was very exemplary. What he said in words, concerning his interest in the Redeemer's righteousness, he proved by his actions: for he was very sensible of the importance of this scripture, "He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked." (1 John ii. 6.) Mr. Hervey walked very close after Christ, and found that the belief of Christ's righteousness being imputed to him for his justification, was so far from being a licentious doctrine, that it inspired him with the noblest motives to a grateful obedience. His holy life was an excellent recommendation of his principles; for I never saw one who came up so near to the scripture character of a Christian. God had enriched him with great gifts, and with great graces, and had made him humble; for he was humbled by the power of grace. He had been a very vain proud young man, but the grace of God emptied him of pride and self, and clothed him with humility. Having put on Christ, he had put on with him the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; which appeared in his great patience and resignation to the will of God. He had some very sharp trials of his faith and patience, both from God and from men, and he learned obedience by the things which he suffered. It was very remarkable, that, in his long illness, he was never known to fret or be uneasy, nor did the persons about him ever hear one angry or one hasty word come out of his mouth.

The same principle of faith working by love was manifest in his studies, which he directed to the glory of God. He was once a great reader of the Greek and Roman authors, and his writings show that he had a good taste for classical learning; but for some years past he chiefly applied himself to the sacred scriptures. God had blessed him with a fine understanding, and a great memory, which he exercised in reading the Bible in the original languages. He was very well skilled in the Hebrew, and was an excellent critic in the Greek, and was a scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven, who, like unto a man that is an householder, bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old. He had a great veneration for this treasure of the Old and New Testaments. He used to talk of them in the highest terms, next to that adorable person of whom they treat. They were sweeter to him than honey and the honeycomb, and so they will be to every one who reads them, as he did, with faith. Whoever can act faith upon the exceeding great and precious promises contained in the sacred volume, will find so much sweetness in it. that he will have but little relish left for other books.

As to his writings, I leave them to speak for themselves.* They stand in no need of my praises. They are in the hands of the public, and every reader will form his own judgment. Oh that the Spirit of the living God may direct it, that whoever reads his writings may learn to have no confidence in the flesh, but to make mention of Jehovah's righteousness, even of his only.

The time would fail me, if I was to enlarge upon all the particulars of his life and death. That was not my design. I only intended briefly to relate some things, from whence a tolerable judgment might be formed of Mr. Hervey's character. But I cannot finish without taking notice of the last scene of his life, which was very triumphant and glorious. The last and great trial of his faith was more precious than that of gold which perisheth. Its preciousness never appeared more than in the hour of death: for then he evidently saw by faith, and apprehended the salvation of God, and could rejoice in a clear view of his own interest in it. When Dr. Stonhouse saw him for the last time, namely, on Christmas-day, about two hours before he expired, Mr. Hervey pressed home upon him his everlasting concerns in the most affectionate manner, telling him that there is no abiding place, and begging of him to attend, amidst the multiplicity of his business, to the one thing needful.

The doctor, seeing the great difficulty and pain with which he spoke, (for he was almost suffocated with phlegm and frequent vomitings,) and finding by his pulse that the pangs of death were then coming on, desired that he would spare himself. "No," says he, "doctor, no. You tell me I have but few moments to live, oh let me spend them in adoring our great Redeemer. Though my flesh and my heart fail me, yet God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." He then expatiated, in the most striking manner, upon these words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23, "All things are yours, life and death: for ye are Christ's." "Here," says he, "is the treasure of a Christian. Death is reckoned amongst this inventory, and a noble treasure it is. How thankful am I for death; as it is the passage through which I pass to the Lord and Giver of eternal life; and as it frees me from all this misery you now see me endure, and which I am willing to endure, as long as God thinks fit: for I know he will, by and by, in his own good time, dismiss me from the body. These light afflictions are but for a moment, and then comes an eternal weight of glory. Oh, welcome, welcome death: thou mayest well be reckoned among the treasures of a Christian. To live is Christ, but to die is gain."

After which, as the doctor was taking his final leave of him, Mr. Hervey expressed great gratitude for his visits, though it had been long out of the power of medicine to cure him. He then paused a little, and with great serenity and sweetness in his countenance, though the pangs of death were then on him, repeated these triumphant words:—

"Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy most holy and comfortable word: for mine eyes have seen thy precious salvation. Here, doctor, is my cordial. What are all cordials to the dying compared to the salvation of Christ? This, this supports me." He found this supporting him in his last moments, and declared it by saying, twice or thrice, "precious salvation," and then leaning his head against the side of the easy chair, in which he sat, he shut his eyes, and fell asleep. Oh precious salvation! How precious must it be to the dying man, who, interested in it, can thank God for death, and reckon it among his riches; who, supported by faith in the salvation of God, can account it his gain to die; and can gladly say, "Oh, welcome, welcome death!" May this faith support you, my brethren, when all other supports fail, and make salvation as precious to you as it was to Mr. Hervey! And of this you may be assured, that what the Lord did for him, he is able also to do for you. He was indeed a glorious instance of the power of grace: for by the grace of God he was what he was. And grace is free. As free for you as it was for him. Able also to make you live and die as much to the glory of God as he did. He was truly a burning and a shining light; but the Lord's hand is not shortened. It can make your light shine also before men, and enable you to adorn the doctrine of God your Saviour, as much as Mr. Hervey did. And the great use to be made of his example, is to stir you up to glorify God for the gifts and graces bestowed upon him, and to desire the same may be bestowed upon you. With this view I shall apply it,

First, To those persons who have never seen the salvation of God, and, consequently, are not prepared to depart in peace: and these are all careless sinners, who live secure in the wilful commission of sin. Mr. Hervey knew, that whenever the Lord should call him out of this life, he should be found in Christ, not having his own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith; and clothed in this righteousness, he was certain that he should appear at the bar of justice without spot of sin unto eternal salvation. But this is not your experience. Nay, you have never been awakened to desire it. You have never been humbled under a sense of your lost condition, nor broken down under a conviction of your helplessness: so that you have never seen your want of a Saviour, and, consequently, have never seen the salvation of our God. If you entertain any hopes of departing in peace, while you are in this state, you are, of all men, the most deceived: for when death comes, it will find you in your sins, unpardoned, without any faith in the Redeemer's righteousness to make death desirable, but with every thing that can make it terrible. The holy, just, and good law of the most high God will accuse, conscience will plead guilty, justice will condemn and punish, and the wrath of God will abide upon you for ever and ever. How is it possible you should depart in peace, unless you die insensible? and that would be dreadful indeed. If sin should so far infatuate you, that you never awake out of its delusive slumbers until you are called to receive the wages of sin, oh think what sort of a peace you speak to yourselves! since it leaves you in the greatest danger, and at the same time insensible of it. To depart in such a false peace would be your everlasting destruction. Oh, sirs, consider then what a delusion you are under! The wrath of an offended God abideth on you, the curses of his broken law hang over your guilty heads, and you are liable to the vengeance of his almighty justice, and yet you think yourselves safe. You are saying, peace, peace, while all the powers in heaven and earth are at war with you, and in a moment you may be cut off, and delivered over to the tormentors; and then you will have a sad and eternal experience of that awful threatening, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

Men and brethren, what do you say to these things? Are they true, or are they not? If they be true, why are you not influenced by them? And if you think them not true, why do you make any profession of the Christian religion? Why do you come to the house of God to attend upon his ordinances? Your appearance here ranks you among professors; and, if you keep up the form without the power of godliness, I have for you, in the second place, a word of reproof.

There have arisen in the latter days, mockers, who pretend to ridicule the seeing of the salvation of God, and the being thereby prepared to depart in peace. Possibly there may be some such amongst us to-day, who laugh at all vital and experimental religion. If there be, I would ask them, whether the scripture has not promised deliverance from the fear of death? Is it not written, (Heb. ii. 15,) "that Christ came to deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Observe, they were in bondage to the fear of death; but Christ came to deliver them. And did not he attain the end for which he came? Most certainly he did. "I have finished," says he to his Father, "the work which thou gavest me to do." Now it was part of the work to deliver his people from the fear of death; and as the work was finished, consequently they were delivered. And they say they are. They attest it; and they have given the most convincing proofs of their having conquered all fear of death: they have been afflicted, tormented, stoned, sawn asunder, put on the rack, and yet they would not accept deliverance, because they were sure of obtaining a better resurrection. And of these there have not been two or three only, but a noble and numerous army; yea, a great multitude whom no man could number; and, glory be to God, it is an increasing multitude. There are some who daily depart in peace; and there are hundreds, thousands now alive, who are waiting for their departure, with hopes full of immortality; and why should you think they will be disappointed of their hope? Will Christ break his word? Can his promise fail? No. His word and his promise shall be established, when heaven and earth shall be no more; and until the place of them shall not be found, the Lord will always have such witnesses of the truth of the doctrine in my text, as Mr. Hervey, who will depart this life in the triumph of faith.

Against these plain facts what can you object? They are founded upon the clear promises of scripture, which are literally fulfilled at this very day; and you can have no pretence to reject their authority, unless you run into downright scepticism, and deny the authority of the holy scriptures. If any of you have arrived at this pitch of ridicule, I shall not reason with you at present. Let the day decide the point. If death does not, judgment will. You will be forced to be tried by that book which you reject, and by that Judge whom you have insulted and vilified. Oh that you may be convinced of your error before it be too late. May God open your eyes to see your guilt and your danger, that you may sue for his mercy along with them, who are seeking the experience of the doctrine in my text; to whom I have, in the third place, a word of comfort.

I suppose there are many persons here, who find the sting of death in their guilty consciences, and who therefore desire to be delivered from the fear and from the power of death. My brethren, there is a glorious Deliverer, who has in his own person conquered death and him that had the power of death, and he is able to make you conquerors. His power is almighty: for he is the Lord God omnipotent. And he is an all-loving Saviour, who is more ready to give, than you are to ask, his promised help. Since he has shown you your want of it, ask, and you shall receive, seek, and you shall find.

You do seek, you say, but it is with many doubts and fears. Of what do you doubt? Of Christ's power, or of Christ's love? He can deliver you. All things are possible to him, because all power in heaven and earth is in his hands. And he is a God of love; he has showed mercy to the greatest of sinners, and has shed his love abroad in their hearts. He has given them faith to see their interest in him, and then they were happy, living or dying; for whether they lived, they lived unto the Lord, or whether they died, they died unto the Lord: so that living or dying they were the Lord's.

True, say you, I believe this was the happy case of Mr. Hervey, and of many others; but I am full of doubts and fears, because I am such an unworthy creature that I do not deserve any mercy. Nor did they. God did not treat them upon the footing of desert; what he gave them was mere bounty, flowing from the riches of his unmerited love. That is the way in which he bestows his great salvation. All the blessings of it are free, as free for one sinner as for another. None are excluded, because they are great sinners: Paul found mercy. And none are rejected, because of their unworthiness: Mary Magdalene was pardoned; and why may not you? For all the gifts of God flow from his free grace, and are bestowed upon unworthy sinners; and if you are one of them, you are a proper object to receive the blessings of free grace; and the sense of your unworthiness should make you more earnest in asking, but it is no bar to your receiving all the blessings of salvation: for Jesus Christ assures us in his word "that he came to seek and to save that which was lost," such lost sinners as you are.

Thus you see what encouragement you have to believe in God. You have his word and his promise to rely upon: you have the testimony of God's people, declaring that they were once as you are, afraid of death, but now Christ has taken away the fear of it. They have seen the salvation of God, and know by faith that all the blessings of it are freely given them in Christ Jesus: therefore they are ready, they desire to depart. May the tender mercies of our God bring every one of you into this happy state; and to those who are already in it, I make my fourth remark.

My Christian friends and brrthren, you have seen the salvation of God, and are delivered from the fear of death; what return will you make unto the Lord for all the benefits which he hath done unto you? Certainly you will not forget the great things which he has already given you, and the greater things for which you are waiting; and let these considerations constrain you to love this divine benefactor, and to serve him without fear in an holy obedience all the days of your life. Give evidence of the sincerity of your love as your Lord requires, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." Keep near to me in my ways, and walk close with me in mine ordinances, and you will not only thereby give proof of your love, but it will also grow exceedingly; and as it grows, your desire to depart will grow with it; for when the love of Christ rules in the heart, you will be ready, yea, you will desire to depart and to be with him. This was the happy experience of our deceased brother; and let his example stir you up to great care and watchfulness in your holy walking heavenwards, that your faith may be always working by love as his did. Consider the graces of his life, and seek the same. Stop not short, but try to get beyond him. Consider his death. Remember with what perfect assurance he spake of his interest in Christ, and what strong proofs he gave of it, and then pray that your faith may stand as unshaken as his was in that great time of trial. And above all, forget not what supported him in his last moments; it was the clear view he had of his interest in the great salvation of God: "This, this," says he, "supports me"—now at the approach of death. Oh how precious did salvation then appear to him, when he found death coming disarmed, and without a sting; and it grew still more precious, when, with his last breath he declared, that death had no power to hurt the peace of God which ruled in his heart; for even then he found salvation precious. You need not fear, my brethren, but this will be your happy experience. God has given you the knowledge of salvation by the remission of your sins; and as your faith grows exceedingly, salvation will grow exceedingly precious. The greater experience you hereby get of the love of Christ, the more will you be supported under the trials of life, and the better prepared for the trials of death. You will find that the sweet sense of Christ's love in the heart will enable you to rejoice in suffering, and then you need not fear but it will enable you to rejoice in the sufferings of death; for who or what shall separate believers from the love of Christ? Shall the troubles of life or the pains of death? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? No. In all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. More than conquerors! Oh glorious warfare, in which believers not only conquer their enemies, but also reap innumerable and endless blessings to themselves. Even death is to them a real blessing; they expect it, they find it so, and they are more than conquerors over it through him that loved them.

In the last place I must put you all in remembrance, that neither the words of my text, nor what has been said upon them, will be of any benefit without a blessing from God. We cannot see his salvation with the eye of faith, nor experience the power of it, without the help of his grace. It is from him who has done all for us, that all must be done in us; and if some good impressions have been made this day upon any of your hearts, they will soon wear away, unless he preserve and strengthen them. If you desire at present to live Mr. Hervey's life, and to die his death, this desire will be ineffectual unless it be carried into act by the mighty working of God's Spirit. He is all in all: for which reason we always begin and always end the hearing of the word with prayer, being assured that if Paul should plant, and Apollos should water, yet it would be to no purpose, unless God should give the increase. Oh that it may be abundant this day to his glory, and to the good of your souls. To that end let us pray—

Oh almighty and most merciful God, we humbly beseech thee to look down with mercy upon this congregation, and to bless the words which we have heard this day with our outward ears. Make them the means of opening the blind eyes, which have never seen their want of thy salvation. Lord, enlighten them, and help them to seek, until they find, pardon and peace in thee. Be gracious to those who are now waiting upon thee, believing that after they have seen thy salvation they shall be able to depart in peace. O Lord God, manifest it unto them, and add this day to the number of those who have seen and experienced it. We desire to glorify thee for every living Christian, who knows in whom he has believed, and is ready and prepared to depart in peace. We give all the praise to the riches of thy free grace. And we also bless thy holy name for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and love, beseeching thee to give us grace so to follow their good examples, as they followed Christ, that with them we may be partakers of thy heavenly kingdom. Grant this, O Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our only mediator and advocate, to whom with thee, and the Holy Spirit, three co-equal persons in one Jehovah, be honour and glory, and blessing, and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF LIVING AND DYING IN THE LORD:

PROVED IN

A SERMON

PREACHED UPON THE DEATH OF THE REV. THOMAS JONES, CHAPLAIN OF ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK, WHO DEPARTED THIS LIFE JUNE 6, 1762.

This God is our God for ever and ever, he will be our guide even unto death.—Psalm xlviii. 14.

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.—Psal. cxvi. 15.

It is appointed unto all men once to die. They all die, because all have sinned: for the wages of sin is death. When sin entered into the world, death came in by sin, and death hath reigned so far as sin hath spread itself. The word is gone out of the Lord's mouth against all flesh, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This is the immutable decree of heaven, and when it come to be executed upon the natural man in his fallen unregenerate state, death is to him the king of terrors, because it finds sin upon him unpardoned. The sting of death being sin, and the strength of sin being the law, if the law charge sin upon the conscience, and stir up in it a sense of guilt, then will it arm death with a most dreadful sting. The soul will be terrified with the thoughts of meeting an offended God, and of standing at his awful bar to be tried for the breach of his holy and just law: for already conscience has ratified the sentence which is to deliver the soul over to the tormentors to dwell with them in everlasting burnings. O death! how inexpressibly terrible is thine approach to such an unpardoned sinner! But to them who are in a regenerate state, and have lived by faith in the Lord Christ, and are now dying in him, death has no sting. As their life was precious, so is their death precious in the eyes of the Lord. With the tenderest love he appoints the time, the place, and all the circumstances of their dying. When he lays them on the bed of languishing, he gives them the consolations of the gospel, and lets them know how dear and precious they are to him. This produces a sweet resignation to his will, and calls forth the delightful exercise of patience to his sovereign appointment. And while the outward man decays, he continues his grace to the inward man. His strength is then indeed perfected in their weakness, when the divine life in the soul flourishes amidst the ruins of the animal frame: so that faith by his mighty operation is still working joy and peace in the dying breast; and ceases not till it has done its last kind office, and rendered the concluding act of life an act of faith, according to what is written of the saints of old, "These all died in faith."

This was the happy case of our dear departed brother. He had sweet experience of the truth of the text, and found that his soul was bound in the bundle of life with the Lord his God. His last sickness was altogether sweetened with divine love. His faith, his resignation, his comforts failed him not. A gracious God showed how dear and precious he was to him by removing every thing far from him which could render death in the least dreadful. He was not even suffered to have one doubt concerning his interest in Christ, but lived happy throughout his illness, and died rejoicing. To the glory of that rich grace which was so exceeding abundant towards him, I have been led to speak upon the occasion; not to exalt man, but God. Not for the honour of the deceased, but for the profit of the living; that when you hear what God has promised to do, and what he is daily doing for his people in their dying hours, you may be stirred up to desire, that you may also die the death of the righteous, and that your latter end may be like his. For which purpose I shall, through God's help, speak to these particulars mentioned in the text, and show,

First, Who the persons are that are here spoken of under the name of Saints;

Secondly, How precious they are in the eyes of the Lord, and

Thirdly, How precious they are to him, not only in life, but also in death. These points I will endeavour to illustrate from scripture, and from the Lord's dealings with our deceased brother. May that good God, who did so much for him, favour us also with his gracious presence, and accompany us with his blessing, while we are considering,

First, Who the persons are that are here spoken of under the name of Saints. This name conveys a strange idea to some persons. They think that a saint denotes some vastly high and uncommon degree of holiness, to which very few have attained since the apostles' time, and therefore they give the title to none but the red-lettered saints in the calendar, and some few of the primitive fathers. They would strongly suspect a man of being a rank fanatic, who was to apply it to those that are now living in the true faith and fear of God, or to those that are lately dead. Such power has custom over the best of words, as to give them a turn quite foreign to their true meaning. The scripture speaks of saints in the Old Testament, men of like passions with us; and the New Testament applies the word to all the believers in the churches of Rome, and Corinth, and Ephesus, and Philippi, &c.; so that it is a general name for all the Lord's people: not for some by way of eminence, but for the whole household and family of faith. The Old Testament has two Hebrew words which our translators render saints, although the meaning of them be a good deal different. The one is Kedish, holy, separate from impurity; the other is Chesed, the word in the text, which signifies mercy, and in the form it is here used, denotes those who have received mercy, and who are partakers of the covenant mercies of God in Christ Jesus. These are all given to them freely without money, and without price; for misery being the proper object of mercy, and God being the sovereign disposer of his own mercy, he bestows it on the miserable, as it pleaseth him, to the glory of his grace. None have any claim. None deserve it; but all men are through sin, in justice and equity, cut off from it. Whoever, therefore, among the children of wrath meet with mercy from God, they must receive it as a free gift coming from his mere love and unmerited bounty through Jesus Christ: and on that account they should be ever acknowledging it with praise and gratitude. The state of guilt and misery from which they were raised, the abundant, exceeding abundant mercy already received in a state of pardon and acceptance, and the eternal mercy to be experienced in a state of glory, these should stir them up to show forth the praises of him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light, which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God, which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

These are the saints here spoken of, such as have obtained mercy freely by the grace that is in Jesus Christ. If you ask in what way, or by what means, they were brought into this happy state; it was by the word and Spirit of God. He convinced them of sin by the word. He made use of the law as a ministration of condemnation to bring them in guilty, and as the ministration of death to show them what their guilt deserved. They saw these things, but did not find themselves quite helpless. Their pride and unbelief still laboured to do some work that might recommend them to God, but the Holy Spirit clearly convinced them that they could not be saved by any works of righteousness which they could do, but that God saveth sinners freely through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. This is the hardest lesson in the school of grace. They learned it by degrees, and very slowly; but the Holy Spirit made them masters of it, and they were glad to submit to be saved by grace freely. Upon which God showed them great mercy: for he enabled them to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. They had power to trust the word of promise, and to rest upon God's faithfulness to fulfil it to their souls. And in thus believing, they found peace with God through the righteousness of Christ, and joy springing from the sense of their safety and happiness in him, and love to God for his great love to them, which peace, and joy, and love increased in their hearts, as they lived more by faith upon Christ, and walked more closely with Christ. In this way the Lord made them saints, or showed them mercy. It was by some such experience that they became partakers of the tender mercies of our God. And, having received them freely, should not this be continually upon their minds, "what hast thou that thou hast not received?" They would forget their very name and character, namely, those that had received mercy, if by thinking of themselves more highly than they ought to think, they should rob the Lord Christ of the praise of the glory of his grace. The more he gives, the more are they in debt. The greater are their gifts, the higher are their graces, still all is from God, freely given, freely continued. And when they happily finish their course, and receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, it will be mercy still, mercy magnified as the blessings are which it bestows, a glorified body—and soul,—admitted to the vision and enjoyment of God in heaven—and to eternity. All this is mercy, free mercy, as one sweetly sings, Psalm cxxxvi. and seems never tired of repeating the delightful words, "This is mercy that endureth for ever."

In what I have been saying under this head, I had a particular view all along to the experience of our deceased brother. He was certainly one of the saints in the text—one who had found mercy. He was always ready to ascribe all that he was and had (except what were entirely his own, sin and misery,) to free mercy and sovereign grace. Before the Lord was pleased to call him, he was walking in the error of his ways, like others who know not God. Such is the condition of mankind since the fall, that there is none righteous, no, not one, there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way, they are altogether become unprofitable, there is none that doeth good, no, not one; not one of them can do any good till grace come; and when it comes, it first discovers this their guilty, helpless state, and convinces them of it, in order that they may be willing to receive their deliverance freely from the mercy of God, and to give him all the glory of it in time and in eternity. No wonder then that the time was when our brother walked as other men also walk, in the vanity of his mind, having his understanding darkened, and being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in him, because of the blindness of his heart. Of this God made him deeply sensible, and he was never ashamed to own it. His first awakening was by the gradual working of the law upon his conscience. It was not by outward means, such as hearing the word preached, or by some afflicting providence, sickness, trouble, or the like, but by the inward conviction of sin, that the Spirit of God wrought upon his conscience. He had his strongest convictions where he could have no means. The views which he had hereby of his state and danger were very deep and very distressing. While he was under this soul-concern my acquaintance first began with him. And since that time, which is about eight years ago, our great intimacy and friendship has given me a constant opportunity of being a witness of God's gracious dealings with his soul. He went mourning for a long time, bowed down under the sense of guilt and the power of unbelief. In this school of humiliation he learned self-knowledge. Here he was taught the sad effect of a ruined, spoiled nature; of a soul depraved in all its faculties, and estranged from the mind and will of God, and governed by its own corrupt and stubborn will, commanding the body to give up its members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin. Here he was taught what sin is, namely, the transgression of the law, which is exceeding sinful, because the law is holy, just, and good, a perfect copy of the divine perfections. Here he was taught the damnable nature of heart sin, which is the fountain from which all sin flows, and which in the heart of the natural man is ever flowing over. He learned these lessons with such a deep experience, that the impression lasted all his days. For when God showed him great mercy, and he was enabled to believe in the Lord Jesus, yet still he found nothing of himself wherein to glory. Humble and low in his own eyes, he was ready to give the honour to whom alone honour was due. Yea, after he was greatly strengthened and established, so as to live by faith on the Son of God, still he knew that all was mercy. Mercy, free mercy had from him all the praise. And this was so much the frame and abiding temper of his mind, that it appeared on all occasions. His spiritual friends and acquaintance can bear me witness that he was clothed with humility, and that he walked humbly with his God. A demonstration this, that he had found mercy, because he had made it the end and aim of his life to show forth the praises of that free mercy which he had so freely received; and as he lived, so he died, acknowledging himself an object of mercy. One of his last sayings was, "I am of the church of the first-born, who shall stand on Mount Zion. One chosen from among my brethren—a sinner saved, a sinner saved." Here was great faith, and great humility.

Having thus exemplified the character of the persons mentioned in my text, from the experience of our deceased brother, I go on to consider,

Secondly, An inestimable blessing belonging to all the persons of this character; namely, they are precious in the eyes of the Lord. Not precious in themselves, but made precious by the grace of God in Christ Jesus: for the motives to all the acts of God are within himself. He does not look into the sinner expecting to see something precious in him to recommend him to mercy, but he sets his love upon him, and that love brings every thing precious with it. Love disposes God to show mercy, convinces the sinner he wants it, inclines him to take it freely, and when he receives it by precious faith, then he becomes vitally united to a precious Christ. Such the Lord counts among his jewels. He sees them accepted in the beloved, and members of his mystical body. As he loves the head, so he loves the members: for my Father himself loveth you, saith Christ, because ye have loved me; and what cannot, what will not, the Father's love bestow? Nay, what has he not engaged to bestow? For what tongue can relate the exceeding great and precious promises which he has made to them who are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ? Grace, faith, righteousness, adoption, strength to overcome temptations, to conquer spiritual enemies, to bear afflictions, whatever is needful for life and godliness; in short, all things are theirs, for they all work together under God for their good. These, and many more, are the promises which the mercy of God has made, and his faithfulness is daily fulfilling to his adopted children in Christ Jesus; from whence it appears how precious they are in his sight. The greatness of the gifts shows the love of the giver. He gives them, oh most adorable, and most delightful truth! he gives himself. God himself is their God, their covenant God, and with himself how shall he not also freely give them all things? He becomes a father unto them, a loving reconciled father, to watch over them with a parent's tender affection, and to see that they want no manner of thing that is good. "I the Lord do keep my vineyard, I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day. He that toucheth it, toucheth the apple of mine eye." His children's enemies are his. So safe and happy are they in his precious love, that none shall pluck them out of his hands. He will keep them by his mighty power through faith unto salvation. Never, never will he leave them or forsake them; but having loved them freely, he will love them unto the end.

But let us bring this matter to a point: What saith the scripture? "Yea, he loved the people. All thy saints are in thy hands, and they are humbled at thy feet to receive thy words." (Deut. xxxiii. 3.) His love makes his people saints, and then keeps them in his hands, in a humble frame of mind to hear the word of God, and to obey it. Such honour have all his saints! So precious and dear are they to him, that he has expressly promised to keep them from all evil, and to bless them with all good. "There shall no evil befall thee," (Psal. xci. 10.) no outward evil, but what I will make the means of promoting my glory and thy good, therefore, "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by name, thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." (Isa. xliii. 1, 2.) Whence this tender care and watchful providence? God would have his people know and believe, that when he keeps them, nothing can hurt them. For they are so precious and honourable in his sight, that his almighty arm will either defend them from, or else keep them patient and happy under, outward troubles, according to these sweet words which follow in the fourth verse, "Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable, and I have loved thee," and showed my love not in keeping thee from the water and the fire, but in bringing thee safe through both; and I will do greater things than these. "O taste and see that the Lord is good! they that seek him shall not want any good thing." (Psal. xxxiv. 10.) What promises are these! No good belonging to life, no good belonging to godliness, shall be withheld; but all good shall be freely given them out of the fulness of Christ Jesus. How precious then must these persons be in the Lord's sight, with whom he deals in this wonderful manner? What mercy, how free, how rich; what blessings, how great, how numerous, has he for them! Even in this life, he has more mercy to show, more blessings to give, than we can either ask or think. And what then will he give in another life? The mercies of glory, the blessings of heaven none can adequately know, till they experience them. May the grace of God make you and me meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.

Thus precious are the Lord's people. Dear and honourable are they in his sight. The testimonies of his word to this purpose are very numerous, and daily experience confirms them. Every child of God is a witness of his heavenly Father's abundant mercy. But few had more reason to magnify and exalt it than our dear deceased brother. He was indeed precious in the Lord's sight, as appeared from the inestimably rich graces bestowed upon him, and the great works wrought by him. God had given him faith, and he enabled him to live the life of faith. By faith the Christian is engrafted as a branch into the true vine. And as the branch receives sap and juices from the stock into which it is engrafted, to bring forth leaves, and fair blossoms, and ripe fruit, so does the Christian receive from the Lord Christ, by virtue of union with him, proper influence and nourishment to bring forth the fruits of righteousness. Our brother was a fruitful branch. He did not seek to bear fruit to make himself alive, (the fruit does not make the tree alive) but to testify his love and gratitude to do good to men, and above all to fulfil what is written—"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit;" (John xv. 8;) that ye keep faith so constantly in act and exercise upon me, as to be always receiving out of my fulness grace for grace: for life and the acts of life in every grace are in and from me, and the more you live by faith upon me, the more will my Father be glorified. This was what Mr. Jones happily experienced in his heart and in his life. Whosoever believeth aright with his heart, will be kept in a humble dependance upon God, and in calling upon him to fulfil the promises of grace and strength in every hour of need: so that the promises freely made in Christ, may be freely made good through Christ. While he is in this right frame the soul lives out of itself, it sees nothing of its own to trust to or to rest in, but puts forth the empty hand to be constantly filled out of Christ's fulness. A person who lives thus by faith will be humble in heart. Every act of this faith declares his emptiness and want of all spiritual good, while it leads to Christ for his promised supply. Need I mention how much this was our brother's case? Certainly you know it. He was humble indeed. The witnesses are as many as knew him, and when there could be no view in deceiving any body, when he was waiting for his dissolution, he demonstrated how greatly the Lord had humbled him. He told me in his last sickness, when I discoursed with him about the state of his soul, that as a dying man he had nothing to trust to but the righteousness of Jesus Christ; and that his faith in it had been so strengthened in his illness that he had not one doubt or fear. But how much he was emptied of self and enabled to live in a humble dependance upon the grace and strength of Christ, will best appear from his life, in which, through faith, many precious fruits were produced.

The principal work of a believer throughout his Christian walk is the mortifying of the old man of sin, and the quickening and strengthening of the new man. So long as we are in this mortal body, every day must this work be repeated. The flesh will be lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and he that is spiritual not only believes in the merit of Christ's death to save him from the guilt, but is also enabled to apply the power and efficacy of his death to subdue and crucify the dominion of those lustings. Subdued they must be. They must not reign. The promise is, sin, inward as well as outward, shall not have dominion over you. The believer, relying upon this promise, proclaims war against all inward lusts and risings of sin, and sets upon them in the power and strength of the Lord; and so long as he looks up to Christ for fresh succours, he will be kept safe. As the old man is thus subdued, the new man is enabled more powerfully to put forth the proper acts of his spiritual life: for the deadening of the one is the quickening of the other. Of this spiritual conflict I have often read, especially in an excellent treatise of Dr. Owen's upon indwelling sin; but I learnt most of it by experience, by many sore and daily conflicts in my own soul, and by frequent conversation with our dear brother. He was much exercised this way, and the Lord did wonders for him in giving him grace to crucify the old man of sin. God's great love appeared in his great chastenings, for whom he loveth he chasteneth. He refines all his people in the furnace of afflictions. There our brother had been refining for some years, and much dross had been done away. Because he was precious in the sight of the Lord, he was tried, like gold, and purified seven times in the fire. For some years past he was afflicted with a disorder which kept him low, and often brought him to death's door. During these years his growth in grace was very evident to all his spiritual friends. We could see a manifest victory gained over the old man, whose power was weakened in his members which are upon the earth. He grew also dead to the world, and experienced what the apostle means, when he says, "The world is crucified to me, and I unto the world." Its pleasures, its riches, its honours were nothing to him. He did not despise them because he could not get them, but he parted with them freely, when he had them in his own power. God had provided for him a comfortable maintenance, but he laid up nothing, except for the poor, to whom he gave liberally of what he had, and with a willing mind. As to honour, he wanted not that which was from men. He was led to choose a better. He has it now. And this deadness to the world was of great use to him when he came to die. Then he had the comfort of it, as appeared from that sweet expression of his on his death-bed, "It is not dying out of the world, but dying in the world, and parting with all its toys and trifles, and that not with sickness or pain." And being thus by faith dead to the world while in it, what should make him afraid to die out of it? He had been so long kept under the cross, that it had been the means of crucifying the world unto him, of subduing his own will and his own tempers, of trying his faith, and of exercising his patience. In this school of affliction he was enabled to profit greatly. Therein he learnt resignation to the will of God, which made him under his long and great weakness of body kiss the rod and be thankful, and which delivered him from impatience, fretfulness, murmuring, and those selfish tempers that want to have our will, and not God's, to be done. There he learnt to live by faith upon Christ in all his offices, as a prophet to teach him wisdom to lead him to God, as a priest to bring him near to God by his atoning blood and righteousness, and as a king to keep him near to God, ruling in him and over him. This faith was tried, and it grew by trials. The more it was exercised the more did he find of the safety and happiness of living by faith upon the Son of God. And hereby he learnt what the patience of the saints is. Patience is an act of faith under outward afflictions, looking up to God for grace to hold out, as long as the afflictions last. Thus did our brother's patience. Under a long illness he was never heard to murmur; and upon his death-bed he was afraid of nothing but impatience, and God out of the tenderest love kept him, until patience had done its perfect work. And

As the cross was thus made profitable to the mortification of the old man, so was it to the quickening and strengthening of the new man. He had many precious graces; but do not mistake me. Whatever Mr. Jones had, except sin, he had it from Christ; whose love to him I would magnify from the greatness of the blessings bestowed. You could not converse with him without being put in mind of the meekness and gentleness of Christ. In his behaviour, in his conversation, he showed, that he had put on, as one of the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, long suffering, ready to bear with others, and ready to forgive, as Christ had also freely forgiven him.

These amiable tempers of the new man appeared in all his conduct; and particularly when he stood up to minister in holy things, one might discover throughout, great kindness and tender love to precious souls. His own flock, to whom the Lord had made him an overseer, was much upon his heart. How earnest have I often heard him in prayer for them? And to the last he did not forget them. In his sickness he would be often crying out, "Lord, feed thy sheep, Lord, feed thy sheep." He was always studying and contriving something, that might be useful to their best interest. There is an alms-house in the parish called the College, and some small stipend for doing duty in it. Mr. Jones thought it was not right to take the money, unless he did the duty. Accordingly he began to read prayers, and to expound the scriptures in the college chapel, and went on for some time. The congregation used to be very large, and the success was very great. Many souls were in this place first awakened who are now walking in the faith and fear of God, adorning the gospel of our Saviour. But here he was stopped, and refused the use of the chapel. After this he set up a weekly lecture in his church, but he had not preached it long, before he was denied the use of the pulpit. However, he was not discouraged, he went on giving away good books, some of which he carried in person to every house in the parish; catechising the children, who came weekly to his house for that purpose; and paying religious visits among his parishioners, when they used to talk freely of the state of their souls. By these methods he tried to win his people to Christ, beside the stated duties of his office; in performing of which he seemed to set God always before him, and to be greatly drawn out in love to his hearers, of whom a very great number, I trust, did frequent his ministry, not led thither by the ease of his delivery, the sweetness of his voice, or the smoothness of his periods, but because they felt the weight and importance of the doctrines preached. Several I am myself acquainted with, who will, I hope, be his joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus, who hearing him preach upon the entire ruin of man by the fall, were convinced that they were in this state, and upon the entire recovery of man through Jesus Christ were enabled by his word and Spirit to believe in him for righteousness, and to live upon him for grace to walk, as he also walked. I mention not these things to set him above any of the Lord's ministers. He had no such thoughts when living. No one could think more meanly of himself than he did. And God forbid that I should intend to lessen others by exalting him. No. Grace, free grace, is all I want to exalt. As he was adorned with so many graces in his private life, and with so many public gifts, who should have the praise, but the giver of them all, even that good God who showed him mercy, and in whose sight he was so precious, as to have his marvellous loving-kindness continued even unto death; which leads me to that part of my subject, where we must still continue our adoration and thanks under the Third and last head, which was to show how precious the saints are in the sight of the Lord, not only in life, but also in death. Whom the Lord loveth, he loveth unto the end. His love is like himself, without variableness or shadow of turning, and then often manifested in the clearest manner, when it is most wanted. The Lord looks with an especial love on his poor afflicted and distressed people. Indeed their troubles are tokens of his love; they come from his love to them, and are the means of drawing forth their love to him. One who had been long trained up in this way declared upon his own experience, that it was good for him he had been in trouble. As troubles increase, so do the proofs of his love, in strengthening faith to trust still, and to enable patience to hold out. And when the last great trial comes, love orders it all. The death of the saints, however superficially some may judge of it, is appointed by the infinite tenderness of God, as to all its circumstances. They may fancy he loves those most whom he takes out of the world without much pain or long sickness, but this is judging after the flesh. God can get himself most glory by them who suffer most, and can make them the happiest who suffer the longest. He can preserve their faith in the hottest trials. He can keep them for years in the fire, and the smell of it not pass upon them. He can arm them with grace to endure not with patience only, but also with joy; so that they shall taste much of the love of God, and count it all joy when he tries them with his fiery trials. And when he is finishing their course, he shows then how exceedingly precious they are to him. Then he brings the graces of the new man into strong act and exercise, as the body droops. He keeps faith lively and vigorous, hope rejoices, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life, and love shed abroad in the heart gives sweet earnests and foretastes of the speedy enjoyment of that glory. These graces make the approach of death welcome, as our deceased brother found it in his last moments, when he said—"An eternal life of glory for a life of misery—who would not change misery for happiness? Hasten, hasten, dear Lord." That the Lord's people are thus precious to him in death, is evident from the promises in his word, and from the daily accomplishment of them; these promises are left upon record for the support of faith in a dying hour, and they are rich cordials for fainting spirits. This is for the sick bed, (Psal. xli. 3,) "The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing, thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness," strengthen him inwardly as the outward man decays, and he shall lay easy upon his bed, refreshed with the Lord's inward comforts, while the body is languishing. And when the body grows very weak, and death is approaching, here is a cordial—"This God is our God for ever and ever, he will be our guide even unto death," (Psal. xlviii. 14.) This is our covenant God, whose mercies fail not; he will guide us safe by his love and power, even until the body draws its last breath, and expires. Who would not wish to have such a blessed guide unto the verge of life? Lord, guide us all thither; and when the life of nature is ending, then fulfil thy faithful promise, (Prov. xiv. 32,) "The righteous hath hope in his death," not only in his sickness, but also in the very moment of death he hath hope, and the next moment he enjoys the thing hoped for. These are sure words of promise, which cannot be broken, and God be thanked for the accomplishment of them. He has been fulfilling them in every age, and speaking peace through Jesus Christ to his saints in their death. It is written of them in the Old Testament, who through faith and patience inherited the promises, "These all died in faith," (Heb. xi 13,) they had faith while they were dying, and believed that the time was now come, when God would fulfil his exceeding great and precious promises to them in a life of eternal glory; and therefore it is said, "they fell asleep," they fell into the arms of death as composedly as a weary traveller falls asleep, expecting to awake in the morning of the resurrection with glorified bodies, like the body of the Lord Jesus Christ. And as these all died in faith, so do believers to this very day. The Lord is faithful to his word, and his promises are still made good. His people are at present as safe in his hands, as happy in his love, as they were in any former age. Still they say with their last breath, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through Jesus Christ our Lord." The present times afford many instances of this triumphant faith, and there is a very striking one before us. Whose death was ever more precious than our brother's, in the sight of the Lord? How could God show his love to him upon his dying bed more than he did? Although his fever was violent for seven days, yet his soul was still and calm. He was not troubled with any fear of death; that was kindly taken away. He had no doubt concerning his eternal state. He was made patient to God's will, bore pain without murmuring, and waited the Lord's time for his release. Were not these undoubted proofs of God's special love to him? He suffered his faith to be tried in the fire, that it might come out, like gold, purer and brighter; and it stood the fire, rejoiced in it, and was refined by it. In one of his weakest hours he said, "Blessed be the Lord for that degree of faith which he hath given me: though it has operated in so weak a manner, yet I have many blessed and comfortable marks in my own soul of his love to me." Here was faith, and much humility. He could find nothing in himself to put the least trust in as to his acceptance with God, and therefore his trust was stronger in Christ. This showed itself in what he said on his death-bed, "What an unfelt, what an unthought-of corruption, is here both in body and soul:" he felt more of it, and in a greater degree than he had ever thought of before; and yet this deep sense of his corruption did not drive him from Christ, but made his faith cleave the closer to him: "My flesh and my heart faileth," saith he, "but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." His ground for this he delared was, "a covenant of mercy, free grace in the Lord Jesus."

In which, knowing that he had his share, he could say, "Now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation—Now, Lord, I can lay me down in peace, and safely take my rest." In this happy frame he was praying, "Lord, secure a soul thou hast died to save." Then, after a pause, he cried, "He will, he will. I have part here, I shall have all soon." Oh what precious, precious faith was this! What great love did the Lord manifest to him in thus strengthening his faith on the bed of languishing, and visiting him with the sight of his salvation. As he said on Friday, "I have had a glorious view of the love of Christ to my soul this morning." This love shed abroad in his heart brought many sweet words out of his dying mouth, such as, "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain." He knew that Christ would be his gain in death, as well as in life, and therefore he prayed, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly, and give me an easy dismission—Lord give me an easy dismission to a blessed eternity." And this triumph of faith held out to the last. He looked forward with joy, when he said, "Before this time to-morrow, it may be, I shall be where all sorrow shall be done away;" and at another time he said, "I shall have a sabbath of Trinity before I thought of it, to worship a triune God," which was granted him. He kept his Trinity Sunday in heaven, adoring the Three Persons in one Jehovah.

I am so particular in relating the dying words of our dear brother, because each of them is a confirmation of the text. The Lord says, the death of the saints is precious in his sight, and our brother's experience demonstrates the truth of the Lord's word. He was enabled to say great things for God, and in every sentence he spake, the love as well as the faithfulness of God was manifest. Was there not great faith, and great conjugal affection in what he said to Mrs. Jones? "Do not be surprised at any alteration you may see in me: for death always makes strange alterations. When the Lord is pleased to give me my dismission, rejoice over my corpse, and praise God for what we have suffered together here, and for what we shall enjoy together hereafter." May the Lord make up her loss, and give her to rejoice in the comforts of his salvation here, and to enjoy the blessings of it hereafter. Towards his latter end he was much in prayer. These were some of his expressions: "The silver cords of life are breaking, and man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets—Lord, guide me home in safety, and lead me through the shadow of death.—This mortal shall soon put on immortality.—Though worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God, whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another.—I go hence like a shadow that declineth, I wither away like grass, but the Lord is the portion of my soul and my strong hope." His hope did not fail him. God was with him when he died, so that he had no evil to fear, when he went down into the valley and shadow of death. His body was left to rest in peace and his soul is with that innumerable company, who are standing round the throne, and praising God and the Lamb for ever and ever.

Is this, my brethren, the faith of God's elect? Cannot death untie the bond of union between Christ and them? But are they so precious to him in their dying hours, that his love either keeps their faith firmly trusting on him, or else happily rejoicing in him? Oh, sirs, if this be the case, and a most certain matter of fact it is, give God the glory of our brother's death, and praise him for the abundant mercy which he then experienced. And although he was so soon taken from us, being but in his thirty-third year, yet remember what great things God did in him and by him, and be thankful; and remember what great things God did for him in his dying hours, and again repeat your thanks to him whose mercy endureth for ever. May he vouchsafe this same mercy to you and me in the same circumstances.

Having given all the glory to whom it is alone due, let us see what improvement this scripture will afford us. Have you been able, my brethren, to follow me in what I have been speaking, and is it your experience? Has God shown you mercy? Have you any good evidence of his love to your souls, and are you living in the comfort of it? If this be your happy case, know ye not, that there is a great man fallen in Israel? One whom God made use of as a blessed instrument to bring sinners into the happy state which you are in. Perhaps he was an instrument to some of you. And now the Lord has no more of this work for him, he takes him away. Is not this an awful providence? Should it not put you upon praying for the prosperity of our Sion, and teach you what manner of persons you ought to be? Should not your lips, your lives, your time, and all your talents, be showing forth the praises of your good God? Should not you be seeking to live by faith upon Christ, and to receive out of his fulness grace to mortify sin, to deaden you to the world and its riches, and honours, and pleasures; to conquer Satan, and to keep you alive to God, that you may have communion with him in life and death? For is not the time short? How short you know not. Perhaps in a day, perhaps in an hour, you may be in eternity. Keep this in your eyes, and remember, what an eternity will be in heaven. Take heed therefore that ye be found in your work when death comes. If it find you living in faith, then you may hope to die comfortably in faith. If the world be crucified to you, you will find it easy to part with it. If you have been long fighting against your spiritual enemies, and against all filthiness of flesh and spirit, will it not be matter of joy to have the battle ended, and yourselves more than conquerors for ever? Oh, sirs, is it not of eternal moment, that you live thus till the night of death come, that then your work being done, you may be ready to enter into the joy of your Lord?

If any of you say, I am a poor weak believer, and I am afraid I shall have nothing to speak for God when I come to die. Leave that to him. He does all things well. If he has any glory to get by your speaking, he will open your mouth. But all the Lord's people leave not such noble testimonies behind them as our brother did. He was a minister, and a young minister, cut off in the midst of life and usefulness. What if God had no more work for him to do among his own people, was he not precious in the Lord's eyes that he should take him to himself, when he had borne so little of the burden and heat of the day? What if God intended these dying sayings should preach for him to others, cannot God bless what means he pleases? Take heed that ye be also ready, and then leave God to do with you as seemeth him good in life and death.

Perhaps you may be a true believer, but you are apprehensive you shall not be comforted, nor rejoice upon your death-bed, as our brother did. Why do you distrust God? Is it not your business to live by faith to-day, and to take no thought for to-morrow? When to-morrow comes, then it is time enough to think about it. And the work of to-day is to be the work of to-morrow, and so on from day to day, the life you live in the flesh you must be living it by the faith of the Son of God. You cease to live thus, when times that may never come, and cases that may never be, interrupt the present actings of faith. Perhaps you may die suddenly, you may never lie upon a sick bed, or if you do, perhaps a quiet resignation to the will of God may be the grace you are then to exercise. For wise reasons God may not then fill you with great comforts. Is there not something very selfish in seeking these comforts? And is it not an unbelieving spirit to fear how you shall behave without them? What! cannot you trust your comforts with God, the God of all comfort? Will you not have time enough to be comforted when you get to heaven? If you are in the way thither, and would get quietly on, leave yourself in God's hand, and let him do what he will. Trust him, even if it be in the dark, this direct act of faith is what God loves. It brings most honour to his word, and glory to his faithfulness. It shows what an high opinion you have of his perfections, that you can believe him without sight. Our deceased brother had this faith, and made a noble confession of it to a precious servant of Christ's, who went to see him in his illness, and asked him, "how he did:" he answered, "I am so full of pain, and so ill, that I can think but little, but I know that Jesus is carrying on the interests of my poor soul notwithstanding." These are to me the choicest of his dying words. I see in them a well grounded trust and confidence in God, far more deep and solid than all the rejoicing of triumphant faith. For when he had not this to comfort him, he had what was much better. When he had no sight, he could walk by faith. If God teach you, my brethren, to walk thus, you will not be troubled about what you are to have, or not to have, when you come to die. If you can say this, Father, thy will be done, and can say it from your hearts, then let him appoint your death, and the time and manner of it, and your frame and temper of mind upon its approach; and, depend upon it, he will order all things for the best.

Perhaps there may be some persons here very indifferent about the matter, whether God loves them, and whether they be precious in his sight or not. This comes from the love of present things. Their hearts are set upon the world. The objects about them have all their affections. Their eager pursuit after pleasures, honours, riches, and ease, sets death at a distance, and makes heaven not desirable. Tell such persons how uncertain life is; they do not care, they will run the risk. Tell them, if they die in their sins, what their eternal state will be; they would not choose to be in everlasting torments, but they will venture it, rather than not enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. What a delusion are these persons under! They believe that sin will bring eternal misery upon them, if not pardoned; and yet they live to-day in sin, as if they were sure they should not be in hell before to-morrow. And they have no sort of evidence that they shall be alive the next moment. Our time is in the hand of God, and he cuts it off when and how he pleases. Oh, sirs, if you have ears to hear, hearken. Where will the course of life you are in end? Stop a moment, and consider. Have you any sin in your hearts, any sin in your lives, which you cherish, and will not part with? What! will you say, I will keep it, it is a blessed morsel, it is a very heaven to me: I do not care if I go to hell for it? And dare you defy the vengeance of the Almighty, and with this thought return to the commission of it? Suppose in the very act God should require your soul, and death carry you that moment from sinning to judgment. This has been. This may be again. And why not your case? If it should—Oh what thought is that!—If it should, what would you have to do throughout eternal ages, but wail, and weep, and gnash your teeth for having been so hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, as never to prepare to meet God in judgment. May the Lord awaken you to a serious consideration of these things, that you may flee from the wrath to come, and may be delivered by the tender mercies of our God from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of his dear Son.

The sum of what hath been now delivered is this. God is gracious to those whom he calls to the knowledge of himself in showing them mercy; and in keeping them throughout their lives as his precious jewels, and throughout their dying hours, his love is with them, and never leaves them nor forsakes them. The testimonies of scripture and of the people of God are undoubted evidence of these truths, particularly the experience of our deceased brother. I have laid before you an account of God's dealings with his soul from the time God was pleased to reveal his Son in him. Glory be to that rich sovereign grace, which did so much for him and by him. Glory be to the conqueror of death who showed him such abundant mercy on his dying bed. And Jesus is still the same: his promises, his grace, his power, are the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Whosoever believeth in him shall never be confounded, never, never confounded, but in life shall be kept by his power through faith unto salvation, in death safe, in eternity blessed. Trusting, then, and believing in him, while we live, may we live unto the Lord; and when we die, may we die unto the Lord: so that whether we live or die, we may be the Lord's. Oh that this may be the happy case of all who hear me to-day, and may the Lord incline our hearts to ask it of him in prayer, saying,

O thou God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, hear us for his sake, and give a blessing to the word now spoken. Make it the means of turning sinners from the error of their ways. Convince them, by thy word and Spirit, of the danger of their being by nature children of wrath, and of their continuing in that state. Teach them, gracious God, the number of their days, that they may apply their hearts unto wisdom. And convince them of righteousness, that they may see a perfect righteousness in thy dear Son, and by faith trust in it, and live upon it, bringing forth abundantly the fruits of it in their hearts and lives. Be merciful, we beseech thee, O holy Father, to those among us, who are seeking thy face, and desiring to know thee as a reconciled God. Oh, give them that faith which worketh by love, and visit them with thy salvation. Let them see the felicity of thy chosen, and rejoice in the gladness of thy people, and give thanks with thine inheritance. And make thine inheritance more thankful. May the partakers of thy precious love in all things be giving of thanks. May all that is within them bless thy holy name for thy free mercy, and may all that they have, and all that they are, be showing forth the praise of the glory of thy grace. Keep them, O Lord our God, in an humble dependance upon thee. Carry them safe through the trials and difficulties of life, and give them power to hold on and persevere unto the end, that they may die in faith, and having happily finished their course, may receive from thy free grace a never-fading crown of glory. Grant this, holy Father, for the sake of thy beloved Son and our Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom with thee and the eternal Spirit, three coequal persons in one Jehovah, be endless praise. Amen

A DISCOURSE UPON THE SELF-EXISTENCE OF JESUS CHRIST.

Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you.—Exod. iii. 14.

PREFACE.

SEVERAL persons have earnestly requested me to make the following discourse public. When they heard it preached at St. George's, Hanover-square, and at St. Dunstan's in the West, they said they found great benefit from it, and they have made me hope it may be as useful to others as it was to them. I have therefore offered it to the public, such as it is. The adorable person of whom it treats will overlook its imperfections: he knows that it is the produce of a grateful heart, willing to make some return, how poor and small soever, for the numerous, great, and inestimable blessings received from his hands. And if it shall please him to make this discourse the means of strengthening one believer, or of converting one unbeliever, may the glory be his. I desire no greater honour than to be an humble instrument in his hands of magnifying and exalting Jesus Christ, who is above all blessing and praise: for he is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

Before the first edition of this discourse was published, two anonymous authors were greatly offended at the bare title in the advertisement, and they were exceedingly bitter in their invectives against it. Writers of no name deserve no notice. I shall not think myself concerned to fight I know not who in the dark. But if any of the opposers of the self-existence of Jesus Christ, will write against the proper preface in the communion service for Trinity Sunday, and set his name to it, I hope there will be persons found to defend it.

"It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, almighty, everlasting God, who art one God, one Lord; not one only person, but three persons in one substance. For that which we believe of the glory of the Father, the same we believe of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, without any DIFFERENCE or INEQUALITY." This is my belief, and upon this authority I build the following discourse. If the church of England be mistaken, then I am; but if she be right in asserting that there is no difference or inequality between the persons, then I am right in asserting that Jesus Christ has, on good scripture grounds, the same self-existence with the Father without any difference or inequality.

Several editions of this discourse have been printed since the year 1755. At present they are all sold. And there being still a demand for them, I have consented to republish it, as my testimony for the essential glory of God the Saviour. When infidelity is not afraid openly to attack this fundamental truth, it becomes the worshippers of our Lord to bring forth their strong arguments.

And there have not been wanting able champions in our day, and successful, who, upon the footing of scripture, have completely answered all the infidel objections; so that the doctrine of the Trinity has been better established by the late opposition, and the truth has greatly prevailed. The candid believer has been hereby confirmed in the practical knowledge of the doctrine, and in the experience by the Holy Ghost, what it is to enjoy fellowship with the Father and the Son. Upon these two grounds the truth stands perfectly established, viz., scripture truth, and scripture experience: against which he that sitteth upon the throne has said, and he has made his word good, "the gates of hell shall not prevail."

While the scriptures are allowed to be of divine authority, and while they are found to be the power of God unto salvation, the church of England will be orthodox in her creeds and articles. So long will the doctrine of the Trinity be established upon infallible evidence, and will be confirmed by sure experience. They will be rooted and grounded in the truth, who know the Father's love as it is revealed in the Son, and shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost.

Reader, may it be thy happy case to believe the truth, and to feel the power of what is written; "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen." 2 Cor. xiii. 14.

I said therefore unto you that ye shall die in your sins: for if ye believe not that I AM, ye shall die in your sins.—John viii. 24.

This is a very awakening scripture, and ought to rouse up your particular attention. The doctrine here maintained is the self-existence of Jesus Christ; which is not a mere speculative point, it is not an indifferent thing, whether you believe it or not; but your eternal salvation is so much concerned in it, that if you do not believe it, you will die in your sins, and will have every one of them to answer for at the tribunal of God. Is not this an interesting subject? Is not every one of us nearly concerned in what is to befal us after death? And has not our Lord here forewarned us of what is to befal them who deny his divinity? "They shall die in their sins." And this he repeats twice in the text, the more strongly to impress it upon their memories. And what is it then to die in their sins? Is it a light trifling matter not worth your care and consideration? to die in the midst of the pollution of a sinful life, to be taken away with all the guilt of it upon your heads, and to find after death no atonement, no Mediator, to protect you from the just indignation of the most holy God, who has declared that he is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity—is all this of no consequence to you? Does not the danger come near enough to alarm even the most stupid and insensible sinner? But yet this is not the worst of dying in their sins. It is the most striking circumstance to consider to what a depth of misery your pollution and guilt must sink you. Sin and misery are inseparably connected, and none can deliver you from sin, but he who came to take away the sins of the world; and he cannot deliver you as man, he must be God who can have merit sufficient to take away sin; therefore, if you deny him to be God, your sins remain, and misery must be your portion—misery, the greatest you can suffer in soul and body, among the condemned spirits in hell for ever and ever.

This is the meaning of dying in your sins; and can there be any truth more affecting, or any subject more interesting? Does not the very proposing it awaken your hopes and fears? Every one of you is concerned at the peril of his eternal happiness to come to a point in this case, and to be determined; and therefore, men and brethren, let me intreat you to examine the matter strictly and solemnly. The divinity of Jesus Christ is the very foundation of the Christian religion. It is the first and principal article. The whole rests upon it; even what is called the morality of the gospel receives its obligation from his being the true God. If he was in any respect inferior to the Father, Christianity would be altogether the most stupid and absurd system of religion, and the most gross piece of idolatry that was ever invented in the world; for the Christian church has always acknowledged Jesus Christ to be God co-equal and co-eternal with the Father, and has offered prayers and praises unto him, and served him with every act of religious worship: and the church of England has given him divine honour in the same full and ample manner as he claimed it, John v. 23. "That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father." Certainly it is necessary on all these accounts to examine this fundamental point: and let us then consult the sacred books upon it, and hear their judgment, and abide by their determination. And they speak as full to the point as any unprejudiced person could desire, and they have set the doctrine in so clear a light, and it appears to me with such strong evidence, that I have no more doubt of Christ's self-existence, than I have of the plainest truth. And this perfect conviction (which I thank God I find in multitudes of other persons) makes me wish, out of love to your souls, that every one of you was as perfectly convinced, lest you should die in your sins; and if you can but desire conviction, you shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God. And may the adorable Jesus, whose honour I am going to defend, now plead his own cause with you. May he send his Spirit into all your hearts, and convince you that he is God indeed, while I am speaking upon the two propositions contained in the text.

First, Jesus Christ is the self-existent God.

Secondly, If ye believe it not, ye shall die in your sins: "therefore I said unto you, that ye shall die in your sins: for if ye believe not that I AM, ye shall die in your sins."

First, the self-existence of Jesus Christ is declared in these words, believe that I AM, that I have existence in myself, and exist by a necessity of nature: for I made all things, and without me was not any thing made that is made. I am the Creator, they are my creatures. And the Creator must exist in a different manner from the creatures. All things are dependent upon me, and have only a derived existence—they are what I made them, and they continue as long as I support them. No creature ever came into life without my power, and when I take away their breath, they die, and turn again to their dust; so that they have only a dependent being, whereas my existence is necessary and underived. I AM is my incommunicable name, and what it means is my incommunicable attribute.

Thus our blessed Saviour is the great and eternal I AM. He is Jehovah: for he exists in a different manner from all other beings and things, as the word Jehovah denotes. The Christian writers, as far as I know, are unanimous in their interpretation of this divine name; they all agree that it relates to the existence of the divine essence, and is descriptive of that independent property by which Jehovah has existence in himself, whereas all other beings and things derive their existence from him. And to this the very Jews assent, acknowledging that Jehovah signifies the essence which necessarily exists. This therefore is a settled point. Now our Saviour is frequently called Jehovah in the Old Testament, and thereby the self-existence of the divine nature is ascribed to him. Thus the prophet, Isa. xliii. 11, "I, even I, am Jehovah, and besides me there is no Saviour." There was no Jesus, no Saviour but Jehovah: therefore Jehovah and Jesus are one. And again we read, chap. xlix. 26, "All flesh shall know that I Jehovah am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty one of Jacob." And the prophet Jer. l. 34, says, "Their Redeemer is strong, Jehovah of hosts is his name;" the name Jehovah belongs to the Redeemer; it is his incommunicable title. And since it is agreed on all hands, that Jehovah signifies the self-existent essence, consequently Jesus Christ is self-existent, for he is Jehovah. This argument is, I think, very clear and full, and the force of it may be thus summed up: Jehovah is self-existent, but Jesus Christ is Jehovah, therefore he is self-existent.

In this sense our Lord says in the text, If ye believe not that I AM, that Jehovah is in me of a truth, ye shall die in your sins. I AM cannot relate to his created being: all the sophistry of Arianism and Socinianism cannot wrest the words to such a sense, because the Jews could not but believe that he existed, when they heard him say, I AM; or if it was possible to disbelieve it, yet it would not have been a capital crime, unless he had been something more than a created being: therefore the very reason of the thing proves that he claimed some manner of existence different from human, and which it is absolutely necessary for every man to believe, unless he would die in his sins, and suffer the punishment due to them for ever. The translators have done great injury to this scripture by inserting the word he, I AM he, which is not in the original, and by putting it in, they have destroyed both the sense of the passage, and also the force of the argument: for, I am he, ought to refer to something said; but it has no reference, no sort of connexion, either with what goes before or follows after. And therefore it is as absurd to insert the word here, as it would be in Exodus, where, upon Moses' inquiring for some descriptive name, by which the Israelites might know that the God of their fathers had sent him to deliver them, "God said unto him, I AM THAT I AM, and thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." Would it not be abominable nonsense to read the words, I am he that I am he, and I am he hath sent me unto you? The learned world, Christians and Jews, would not allow of this glaring absurdity; for they have allowed that this passage in Exodus is expressive of the self-existence of the Deity. I AM denotes the necessary manner in which he exists, and since this is the meaning of it in one part of scripture, certainly it must mean the same thing in every part of scripture, especially when it is used by that person who claimed to himself all the attributes of divinity: and therefore the meaning of the expression if there was any obscurity in the usage of it in the New Testament may be clearly ascertained from its usage in the Old. When God sent Moses to the Israelites, with this divine name I AM, and when Christ, who never scrupled to call himself God, assumed the same name I AM, certainly the same words spoken on the same subject must convey the same idea of self-existence, and whoever is self-existent is the true God, but Christ is self-existent, therefore he is the true God.

When the Arians and Socinians are pressed hard with scripture arguments, they will allow Christ to be God in some limited and restrained sense of the word; but they cannot bear to hear of his self-existence, because this makes him equal with the Father, which they deny: for it seems an insuperable difficulty to them, that he whom the scripture calls a Son, should have the same self-existence with the Father. This is a standing objection with them, and with every other species of infidels, but this objection upon the true state of the case vanishes at once: for it is founded upon a very gross mistake, both of the nature of the doctrine, and also of the scripture explanation of it.

The nature of the doctrine is this. In the unity of the divine essence there are Three persons equal in all perfections and attributes, so that none is before or after other, none is greater or less than another, but the glory is equal, the majesty co-eternal. The trinity in unity is thus expressed in scripture, 1 John v. 7. "There are Three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these Three are One." "One," says the unbeliever, "how can that be? How can Three be one? That's a contradiction." If it be, it is a contradiction of his own making: for unless they be Three in the same respect as they are One, which opinion could never be maintained by any man in his senses, then he must take the contradiction upon himself; and there may be, for any thing he knows to the contrary, Three persons in one essence, unless he can prove that the unity of the essence absolutely excludes personality. But before we can allow him this, he must first give us a plain account of the manner of the existence of the divine essence, and must demonstrate that it cannot admit of any persons in it; which he cannot possibly demonstrate by the light of nature. The most acute and enlightened genius is not equal to the subject. It is as far above his capacity, as the heavens are above the earth. Let him soar aloft upon the strongest pinions of moral reasoning, and try to measure infinity with the longest chain of metaphysical argument; yet when he came down from his towering flight, he could give us no fresh intelligence concerning the divine existence. The mode and manner of it would be still unknown. We know that there is an immortal spirit united to the body; but does any philosopher pretend to determine the mode of the existence of this created spirit? What idea can he form of it? Whence does he borrow this idea? Or in what kind of language will he communicate it unto another? If he be not clear in this more easy point, how can he form an idea of the mode of the existence of Jehovah?

Can he determine how an infinite spiritual essence exists? What idea has he of the manner of the existence of an essence which was from eternity, and which was the first cause of all other beings? When unbelievers will write upon this subject, and settle the mode of existence of an uncreated essence, then they may speak with some certainty upon it. But while they are forced to confess that they know not the mode of the divine existence, and yet maintain that Jehovah cannot exist but in one Person, is it not evident that their conduct is inconsistent? For the personality is founded on the manner in which the essence exists; this they do not pretend to determine, and yet they deny the personality of the essence, and venture their eternity upon it. Is not this conduct absurd and irrational? And will you then ever listen to what unbelievers may assert concerning the manner of the divine existence? for they are indeed absolutely ignorant of it, and you may be assured of their ignorance, if you only ask them to account for the manner of the existence of a created spirit. And when they give up this point, which they must, then urge this question to them, How can you pretend to account for the manner of the existence of an infinite uncreated Spirit, after you have owned that you cannot account for the manner of the existence of a finite created spirit? Even to pretend to it is a most glaring absurdity; and therefore we may conclude, upon the footing of sound reasoning, that there may be three Persons in the unity of the divine essence; and the scripture positively maintains there are Three, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and these Three are One. And

If nothing remain for the infidel to object to the state of the doctrine, what can he offer against the scripture explanation of it? There can be no difficulty but what arises from the names of the divine Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and these have been a great handle of objection, and are still with unbelievers who are so blinded with their vices, that they know nothing of the true sense and meaning of scripture, but only look into it for matter of cavil: they suppose, with ignorance common to infidelity, that these names were to give us ideas of the manner in which the Persons exist in the essence, but the scripture had a quite different view in using them. The ever-blessed Trinity took the names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, not to describe in what manner they exist as divine Persons, but in what manner the divine Persons have acted for us men and for our salvation. These names were to give us ideas of the distinct offices, which the Trinity had agreed to sustain in the economy of our redemption. The scripture informs us, St. Paul frequently, Eph. i. 4; ch. iii. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2, &c. and 1 Pet. i. 20, that the covenant of grace was made before the world, and the gracious plan of man's salvation was settled before he had his being. According to the plan of this covenant, one of the divine Persons agreed to demand infinite satisfaction for sin, when mankind should offend, and to be the Father of the human nature of Jesus Christ, and our Father through him; and therefore he is called God the Father, not to describe his nature, but his office. Another of the divine Persons covenanted to become a Son, to take our nature upon him, and in it to pay the infinite satisfaction for sin, and therefore he is called Son, Son of God, and such like names, not to describe his divine nature, but his divine office. Another of the divine Persons covenanted to make the infinite satisfaction of the Son of God effectual, by inspiring the spirits of men, and disposing them to receive it, and therefore he is called the Holy Inspirer, or Holy Spirit, and the Spirit of God, not to describe his divine nature, but his divine office. The terms Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are terms of economy, and are accordingly used in scripture, to describe the distinct parts which the ever-blessed and adorable Trinity sustained in our redemption.

I wish it was in my power to explain the scripture doctrine in such words, as you may all easily understand. The doctrine of the Trinity is the most necessary article of the Christian religion, and we cannot take one safe step in the way to heaven without being clear in it. And since it is the very foundation of your faith, I therefore intreat your more particular attention, while I am considering it. The scripture makes no difference between the divine Persons, except what is made by the distinct offices, which they sustain in the covenant of grace. The Persons are each equal in every perfection and attribute; none is before or after other, none is greater or less than another; but the whole Three Persons are co-eternal together and co-equal. And consequently Christ, who was from eternity co-equal with the Father, did not make himself inferior because he covenanted to become a Son, nor did the Holy Spirit, who was from eternity co-equal with the Father and the Son, make himself inferior because he covenanted to make the spirits of men holy by his grace and influence. Son and Holy Spirit are names of office, and the names of their offices certainly cannot lessen the dignity of their nature, but should rather exalt them in our eyes, for whose salvation they condescended to sustain these offices. Our blessed Lord was Jehovah, when he covenanted to be made flesh, and to become a Son: and the very nature and terms of the covenant prove, that at the making of it he must have been a Person of the self-existent essence, because he had thereby such offices committed to him, as none but the true God was able to sustain. The whole economy and government of the world, from the time of its creation to the final dissolution, was put into his hands; and therefore the scripture expressly assures us, that he created it, that he governs it by his providence, that he redeemed his people by his blood, and that he is to come again at the last day, in all his glory, to judge it. And he, who was almighty to create all things, who was all-wise to govern all things, who had infinite merit to redeem his body the church, and who is to be God the Judge of all at the last great day, certainly this almighty, this all-wise, this all-meritorious, and divine Judge must be self-existent. And being possessed of these offices, he might truly say, I AM; because he could not but have necessary existence in himself, who was the first cause, and who gave existence to every other being and thing.

What has been said in defence of the first proposition in the text may be summed up with this argument. The divine essence is self-existent; therefore the persons in the essence are also self-existent; but Jesus Christ is one of the persons in the essence, for he is frequently called Jehovah in the Old Testament, and the New declares, that he and the Father are one, consequently he is self-existent; from whence I raise this syllogism. Whoever is self-existent is the true God, but Jesus Christ is self-existent, therefore he is the true God. This is a plain argument, and is so evident upon scripture principles, that I defy all the Arians and Socinians in the world to answer it; for it seems as certain that Jesus Christ is a person of the self-existent essence, as that there is a self-existent essence. Christ is the great and eternal I AM, true and very God, equal in all things with the Father and the Holy Spirit as touching his Godhead; and therefore to the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, we ascribe equal dominion, and honour, and worship, now and for ever, according to the doctrine of the scripture and the constant practice of the Christian church. And,

Let no person think that this is a speculative point. It is not an indifferent thing whether you receive it or not; but your eternal state depends upon it, you must receive it, or perish for ever; for whosoever disbelieves it shall be damned. This may sound very harsh in the ears of free and candid disquisitors, but I really cannot soften it. I am not fond of thundering out damnation any more than men in these moderate times may be of hearing it, and you know that I very seldom have the word in my mouth; but there is certainly such a thing as damnation, and the Almighty has threatened to inflict it upon the deniers of Christ's divinity, and let men make ever so light of it, he will infallibly inflict it; and, therefore, I must again admonish you, that whoever does not believe Jesus Christ to be self-existent, and thereby equal to the Father, shall be damned. And does not the text declare the same thing? "They shall die in their sins," and this is so far from being anything short of damnation, that dying in sin is the very lowest state of infernal misery, as I am to prove under the Second proposition. "If ye believe not that I AM," says Christ, "ye shall die in your sins." Dying in sin is a clear expression, whose meaning cannot easily be mistaken. It denotes the most dreadful state of departing sinners, who have no mediator or atonement in the world of spirits to which they are going, but they leave this world with all the pollution and guilt of their crimes upon the soul; and when they appear before the tribunal of infinite justice, the horrid deformity and wickedness of them will then be manifest; they will then have no robe to cover the offensive and nauseous leprosy of their impurities; their abominable filthiness will then break out, and how can the most holy and pure God look with delight upon those loathsome lepers? He declares he cannot. He is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity. He cannot behold them; and, therefore, they must be shut out of his presence, as the lepers were shut out of the camp; and since they never can be made clean, they must be shut out for ever. Nothing can purge the conscience from sin but that offering which perfecteth for ever. This alone cleanseth us from all sin; but this unbelievers reject, therefore their sin remaineth. They must answer for it at the bar of justice, and whatever punishment it deserves they must suffer it in soul and body, and, if there be truth in God, their punishment be eternal. These are his own words, at which one might reasonably think the heart of the most obdurate infidel would tremble. Isa. xxxiii. 13, 14. "Hear ye that are far off, what I have done, and ye that are near acknowledge my might. The sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites; who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" Who shall? Certainly they who die in their sins. Sin first kindled these flames of hell, and sinners must endure them. And the chief of sinners, the Arians and Socinians, must dwell with the devouring fire, and with everlasting burnings.

I have seen the deniers of Christ's divinity very warm and angry at this state of the case, and have heard them complain loudly of our want of charity. They do not love to be told of hell torments, and they think it very hard, that they should be sent to hell for a speculative point, (as they softly term rejecting Christ's self-existence,) quite an harmless opinion with them, a mere subject of debate and free inquiry. It may seem very light to them, but it is in fact of the same consequence as denying the being of God: and if they will make their free inquiries and debates about it, and after inquiring and debating, reject it, they should remember that they do this at the peril of their lives. Denying Christ to be self-existent is not a small crime, it is the greatest that a man can commit; for what is it to deny the king's title to the crown? Is it not high treason? And what is it then to deny the Godhead of the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords? Is not this high treason against the supreme Majesty of heaven? And when unbelievers deny the Godhead of Jesus Christ, try to rob him of his self-existence, erect societies on purpose to stab him with their insolent blasphemies, and would pull him out of his eternal throne, and then endeavour what in them lies to strip him of his divine glory, degrading and sinking him down into a mere creature, and trampling under foot, as if he were but dross and dung, the most adorable God of heaven and earth; what will you call these offences? Are they not overt acts of open rebellion and of high treason? And if the least of these against an earthly king would render the offenders unnatural rebels and worthy of death, must not the crimes increase in proportion to the infinite dignity of the king against whom they are committed? High treason against the Godhead of Jesus Christ, how much soever unbelievers may try to palliate it, is certainly an infinite crime, and if God be true, it will meet with an infinite punishment; for if ye believe not that I AM, says the self-existent God himself, ye shall die in your sins, and these unatoned for, shall not only exclude you from the glories of heaven, but shall also justly sentence you to the endless torments of hell.

As this method of proceeding against the deniers of Christ's self-existence is not, as they would insinuate, harsh and rigorous, but is founded in truth and equity; because every man is a sinner, and guilty in the sight of God, not only by actual, but also by original transgression, "by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation," and therefore all men being under sentence of condemnation, want an atonement for their sins. This atonement is required by, and is to be made to, infinite justice, and whoever makes it must be an infinite Person, capable of doing an infinitely meritorious act; so that he cannot be any thing less than a Person of the self-existent essence. If he were a creature of ever so great dignity, the very highest in the rank of beings, yet as he is but a creature, he could do no action which could merit for another, much less which could have infinite merit; consequently he could make no atonement to infinite justice, and therefore unless Christ be self-existent, we must all die in our sins, and answer for them before the tribunal of God: and the just wages of sin is death, death of the body to this world, and death both of body and soul from God and his glory in the next world, for ever and ever. And this is indeed the melancholy case of every infidel. He denies the virtue of Christ's merits to atone as God, and, of course, he can have no atonement; for nothing less than an infinite Being can make an infinite atonement; and the infidel, without such an atonement, must be under the guilt both of original and actual transgression. He has no sacrifice, no atonement, to propitiate the justice of God the Father, by whom a firm and sure decree has been in this case made and provided, that, "without shedding of blood there is no remission." But he rejects the merits of the blood of the Lamb of God, which has been shed for sin, and which alone can take away the sins of the world; for which reason there is no remission for him, but he dies in his sins, with all the pollution and the guilt of them upon his conscience, and when he appears at the bar of justice, he will find his Judge a jealous God, and a consuming fire. And how will he then be able to protect himself from the wrath of the Almighty? Offended Omnipotence he cannot escape, he cannot resist; and who can say what a degree of misery offended Omnipotence will inflict? Oh, it a dreadful thing, beyond imagination dreadful, to fall into the hands of the living God! and whoever rejects the divine merits of Christ's atonement, will feel his everlasting displeasure: for after rejecting them, "there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. And if he who despised Moses's law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses; of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God?" hath trodden under foot his divinity (as all infidels do), hath trampled, and even stamped upon the glory of the self-existent God, as if he was something baser than a worm, "and hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace." Doing despite unto the Spirit of grace is the last stage of infidelity, and may the almighty God keep every one of you from it, lest you should die in your sins and perish for ever.

I chose to finish the second proposition in the text with these striking words of St. Paul, (Heb. x. 26, 27, &c.) because they are clear and full to the point, and expressly declare the judgment and fiery indignation, which every one will meet with who treads under foot the Son of God. Let the infidel consider, whether he does not tread him under his feet, when he ridicules the almighty Creator of the world, and with treason blacker than ever was hatched in hell, tries to rob the eternal God of his divinity. Does not he account the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, who sets no value upon the most precious blood of the Lamb of God? And must not he die in his sins, and rise from the dead in his sins, and appear in his sins at the last great day, and go with his sins to the place of eternal punishment, who, contrary to God's decree, has resolved to put his trial upon this issue; that without shedding of blood there may be remission? Before any remission can be obtained, there must not only be blood shed, but also blood of an infinite value; and there cannot be infinite value in any sacrifice, except in the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish, and without spot. The merits of this unblemished and spotless Lamb the infidels deny, whereby they reject the only method which God has appointed for the remission of sins. This crime approaches so very near to doing despite to the Spirit of grace, and to grieving and quenching him, that my heart mourns for these deluded men, and I cannot but wish they were as much concerned for their own salvation as I am for them. I see their guilt, to which they are blind. I see their danger, against which they shut their own eyes. I behold them ready to die in their sins, and the pit of destruction open to receive them, they are on the very precipice, and in a moment may fall into hell. My dear fellow-creatures, would to God I could call you fellow-christians, if you have any love left for your immortal souls, stop and consider. Pray God to open your eyes, that you may see your danger. Oh! see how near you are to the pit! If you take one step more, you may perish for ever. And why will you choose eternal misery?

I call upon and entreat you, while there is yet a possibility of escaping it, to awaken your hopes and fears: if it be given you to throw down your arms and submit, still you may find mercy. For he is gracious and full of compassion. He has gifts for men, even for the rebellious. He can give the spirit of wisdom in the knowledge of himself. Ask, seek, and you shall find faith and repentance from his sovereign grace. With him is plenteous redemption. Oh that you may, from your own experience, acknowledge him to be a God almighty to pardon. And if none of these motives prevail with you to open your eyes, may he, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shine into your hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

And now having gone through the argument, I intreat you, my brethren, to give me your favourable attention, while I am endeavouring to make some improvement of what has been said, and to bring it home with power and conviction to your hearts. The scripture which we have been considering is most awful and solemn, and holds out to us a doctrine of eternal importance, viz. that we must die in our sins, unless we believe the self-existence of Jesus Christ. This doctrine I divided into two propositions; under the first it was proposed to prove that Jesus Christ is a person of the self-existent essence, from whence it followed secondly, that every one must die in his sins, unless he believes Christ's self-existence. And if scripture and fair argument could prevail against men's prejudices and sins, these two propositions would appear as evident as the sun at noon day. Indeed they do appear with complete evidence to every true Christian; and I openly declare, that I am as fully convinced of the self-existence of Jesus Christ, as I am of any matter of fact, and therefore with this full conviction upon my mind, it was incumbent upon me to speak with great openness and freedom to those persons, if there be any of them among you, who deny the self-existence of Jesus Christ. And I hope he will second my intreaties with his grace, and accompany them with his divine blessing, while I am calling upon you once more to consider and to weigh impartially the arguments which have been now laid before you. They contain a very small part of the evidence of our Lord's divinity. The scripture has offered us several proofs, which have not been at present touched upon; but I hope enough has been said to convince you, if your minds lay open to conviction. The great infidel objection against Christ's self-existence is taken from the unity of the divine essence; this unity we allow, for it is written, Deut. vi. 4, "The Lord our God is one Lord, Jehovah our Elohim is one Jehovah;" but then we maintain that the unity of the essence cannot exclude personality, unless it could be demonstrated, that the manner in which the essence exists will not admit of any persons in it. But this you cannot demonstrate. It is impossible to demonstrate it; because you do not know the manner of the existence of any spiritual being, and consequently it is impossible for you to demonstrate, that the scripture account of personality is false, and yet at the peril of your eternal salvation you will venture to deny what it is impossible you should disprove. Do you not see what an inconsistent and absurd part you herein act? Do you not openly fight against reason, as well as against scripture and your own happiness? You have not the shadow of an argument against Christ's divinity, and yet you are not afraid to commit high treason against his supreme Majesty who is almighty to punish. Why, my brethren, will you fight against the Almighty? Rebel no longer, throw down your arms, submit to Jesus, prostrate yourselves before him, and acknowledge him to be the self-existent God. And

Let it be no hindrance to your owning his divinity, that the scripture calls him a Son, Son of God, Son of man, &c. for Son is a name of office, and not of nature; it is not to give you an idea of the manner of his divine existence, but of the nature of his divine actions. He was the true self-existent God; he was Jehovah from eternity, but he took the name of Son, when he covenanted to become a Son, and to be made flesh for us and for our salvation; so that it is a name of economy, descriptive not of his nature, but of his office. This is the scripture doctrine. And there is not one infidel objection against the self-existence of Jesus Christ, but what may be easily solved upon this state of the case. I intreat you, therefore, to examine it carefully, and if you will give it a fair hearing, laying all prejudice aside, you will not be able to resist the force and evidence of it.

But if you will shut your hearts against conviction, rooted and grounded so deeply and strongly in infidelity that no arguments can move you; yet if scripture has lost its influence, will not self-love make some impression upon you? When the danger draws near, and your own souls are ready to perish, certainly you ought then to begin to be concerned for your own welfare. And does not the danger come near enough to strike your fears, when you are dying in your sins? When you are guilty of a crime, the certain consequence of which (unrepented of) is everlasting misery? And if Jesus Christ be not your God, you will have no atonement, no Mediator after death, but must answer for every sin, which you have committed, at the bar of infinite justice, and you may read your sentence among the records of infallible truth—"The unbelieving shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death," (Rev. xxi. 8.) This scripture will as surely be fufilled, as God is true; and he will be almighty to fulfil it in your destruction: for are you not unbelieving? Do you not disbelieve the first article of the Christian faith? And why then should you hope to escape the punishment here threatened to unbelief? You have no reasonable hope. God, who cannot lie, must execute his threatenings. And do you think it prudent and safe to make the trial, whether he be a God of truth? if you believe not, yet he abideth faithful. If you deny him, he also will deny you. And when he disowns you for his, justice must seize you and deliver you over to the tormentors, that this scripture may be fulfilled in your punishment. Oh! my brethren, if your souls be dear and precious in your own eyes, do not choose hell torments? Why will you die in your sins, and go deliberately into the lake, that burneth with fire and brimstone for ever? Might not one infer from your conduct, that you were in love with hell? For you cannot prove that Jesus Christ is not God. It is impossible to prove it; and why then will ye deny his divinity, and with overt acts of high treason attempt to rob him of his essential glory? Why will you act such an absurd, such a wicked part, and destroy yourselves?

If I have not been able to offer any thing sufficient to awaken and convince you, I have therefore more reason, in the last place, to pray for you. And I am sure all believers will join heartil with me in prayer to God for your conversion. We cannot but mourn over your present guilt, and your approaching ruin, and pour out our requests before the throne of grace for you, because we are assured that you have departed from the living God. And let us now, my Christian brethren, conclude, as we always begin, with looking up to God for his blessing, that our labours may not be not in vain in the Lord.

O most adorable Jesus, our Almighty God and Saviour, who hast declared, that unless ye believe that I AM, ye shall die in your sins, we bless and praise thee for giving us grace to believe in thy self-existence. Keep us, we beseech thee, steadfast in this faith, and grant that it may not dwell in our heads, and rest there as a speculative point of science, but enable it to operate upon our hearts, and rest there to produce in us all thy sweet and heavenly tempers, making us holy as thou art holy. And, O Lord, be pleased to awaken and convert all the deniers of thy divinity, and convince them that thou art a God indeed, by the happy work of thy good Spirit upon their hearts, turning them from the error of their ways, and bringing every one of them into thy flock, that we may become one fold under one Shepherd; and may with one heart and voice give thanks and praise to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the holy, blessed and glorious Trinity; to whom be equal honour, and worship, and dominion, now and for ever. Amen.

SERMONS.

SERMON I.

All my springs are in thee.—Psalm lxxxvii. 7.

We are called upon, at this time, to celebrate the birthday of Jehovah-Jesus —God manifest in the flesh—a day which the Lord hath made famous for ever. Big with miracles—big with blessings. It was the great purpose of the covenant of the eternal Three, that one of the divine persons should be made man, and that thereby every perfection of the Godhead should shine forth in its full glory for evermore. When it was proclaimed in heaven, "Let all the angels of God worship him," the elect angels bowed with thankful hearts to the infinite condescension of Immanuel. They blessed and worshipped him for humbling himself to be made man: and when in the fulness of time he was born of a woman, then the whole multitude of the heavenly host came down to keep his birthday, praising God, and saying, "Glory be to God in the highest, peace upon earth, and good will towards men." Such was the angels' hymn. So sweetly did they sing their God and ours. Oh that we may find some of the same sweetness and melody in our souls! May we so meditate upon the birth of our dearest Lord, that our faith may be exercised upon it, and we may enjoy its rich blessings in our hearts and in our lives.

And to this end I have chosen a hymn composed upon this joyful occasion. The Psalmist is led in spirit to see the future birth of Jehovah, and he is ravished with the happy prospect. We read of many kings who desired to see God incarnate. David was one of the many. He saw it by faith, and was glad. His soul was in raptures within him, and he speaks of the coming of God in the flesh, just as Simeon did when he had him in his arms. They both had him dwelling in their hearts, and that made them speak with their mouths with so much affection. Simeon had lived to a blessed time. He saw the Lord Christ, and took him up in his arms. He wanted to see nothing more upon earth—"Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." David saw the same with the eyes of his faith, and experienced that all his springs of grace and glory were in the incarnate God. In him, as the fountain head, the infinite ocean of life and comfort, and from him, flow the streams—all of them—whatever can do any good to a poor sinner in time or in eternity, it is all in and from God manifest in the flesh. All my fresh springs are in thee. Blessings on his dear love, that he has enabled one to believe this, and in a measure to enjoy it. Oh may your souls bless him, together with mine, and may a fresh spring of his grace flow into your hearts, to increase your faith and your enjoyment of his precious salvation, while I am,

First, Endeavouring to open the meaning of the Psalmist's words, and then,

Secondly, To bring the doctrine which they contain into practice and experience.

1. A short view of the psalm will be the best way to come at the meaning of our text. The subject is the birth of Jesus, from which blessings are derived to his people—great—numberless—everlasting blessings. The title prefixed is,

"A psalm to be sung by the sons of Korah," i. e. of fallen man. Korah signifies the state in which trees are during winter, when stripped of their verdure and fruit. In the same sense it is used for the bald head, when age or sickness have deprived it of its glory, and left it without hair. This is a lively description of fallen man. He has lost his pristine beauty and fruitfulness. When he left God, and turned to his own ways, he became like the trees of the field in winter, from which the genial warmth of the sun is withdrawn, or like the head, which, by the abating of the natural heat and vigour, is left naked and bald. But being brought to a right sense of this, and finding himself stripped of all the glory which the first Adam had in paradise, he has been led to seek the restoration of his nature, and has obtained of the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, a much better state than he had lost. Every such person is entitled to sing this sacred hymn, and he is called upon to do it. The name of the person, whom he is to celebrate, is not mentioned at first, but is soon discovered by the character given of him.

V. 1. "He shall have his foundation upon the holy mountains."—He shall be built up, and his feet shall stand upon Mount Sion. The temple which was founded there, was the type of his humanity. An infallible expositor has so explained it. "Destroy this temple," says Christ, "and in three days I will build it up." "But this," St. John declares, "he spake of the temple of his body." It was as certain he would have a body prepared for him, as the temple had a foundation upon Mount Sion; and he would infallibly appear to fulfil every thing there typified of him, by which means his Father would become the Father of all his people, as it follows:

V. 2. "Jehovah loveth the gates of Sion more than all the dwellings of Jacob."—He loveth Sion for the sake of Sion's king, the Son of his love, who was there to appear. The Redeemer shall come to Sion. And of his coming, of what he was to be, and to do, and to suffer, the temple and its services were instituted signs and types. On his holy hill he had placed his sanctuary: there was his visible presence in the holy of holies; and there God had determined, in very deed, to dwell with men on the earth. For these reasons he had marked out Sion with his special love, and had styled her the city of God.

V. 3. "Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. Selah."—The church is called the city of God long before, and long since, the congregation of faithful people worshipped upon Mount Sion. We read of Abraham, and the other heirs of promise, that they looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker was God. And St. Paul speaks of the church of Christ in the very same terms used in this psalm. "Ye are come," says he to believers, "to Mount Sion, to the city of the living God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven." The city of God then is this one true church; part of the congregation is triumphant; part militant here on earth; part not yet brought into being; but all the parts make up the whole. They were all given by the Father to the Son. The Son accepted them, and wrote all their names in his book, and for them he lived and died. The Holy Spirit in due time calls them effectually, and brings them by believing the Son's salvation, to enjoy the Father's love in time, and to show forth the praises of Father, Son, and Spirit in the city of our God for evermore, Selah: exalt him, take notice that ye exalt him for this; and remember, whatever glorious things are spoken of the church, all the glory must be ascribed to its Head and King—God over all, blessed for ever. Blessings on him that he has a church. Eternal blessings will be his for gathering his church out of all nations: for so it follows in his own words.

V. 4. "I will cause it to be remembered by them who shall know me in Rahab and Babylon; behold Philistia and Tyre, the people of Ethiopia: this name was born."—The name is the same as the Word who was made flesh, God incarnate, and who will have a people in all these lands. They shall know him, and he will make them remember, that Jehovah was manifest in the flesh for them. He was born indeed in Judea. There they saw his glory: but he was also a light to lighten the Gentiles. His church, before he was born, his church since he was born, has an equal right to his nativity. Rahab and Babylon, Philistia and Tyre, the people of Ethiopia and the people of England, can say, "The name born in Judea is our Saviour, and our God," and we rejoice, with all the friends of Sion, that he was born there.

V. 5. "And of Sion it shall be said, a person and a person," God and man, "shall be born in her, and he himself, the Most High, shall perfectly establish her."—O what a glorious subject of praise is here! The name born is Wonderful. He has two natures in him. Perfect God, and perfect man, in one Christ. He was born in Sion, in the Jewish church, and therefore born, that being man, he might live and die for man, and being also the most High God, he might give infinite value and dignity to his life and death. What mercies are these! Who can tell the number or the greatness of them? God incarnate—born to save, to save sinners—the worst and vilest—to work out salvation perfectly, and then perfectly to apply it: and that nothing might be wanting for their establishment in the faith, he himself, the Most High, has undertaken to keep them by his mighty power, till he bring them to eternal salvation. Oh bless the Lord with me, my dear hearers, and let us magnify his name together, both for the mercies themselves, and also for the provision made for them in the everlasting covenant, which is the next point in the hymn.

V. 6. "Jehovah did record it, when he was registering the people, That this name was to be born."—It was the great counsel and purpose of the eternal Three; it was entered in the records of heaven; and it was revealed in the great charter of grace, that this wonderful Person should be born—Immanuel—God with us. To his birth Jehovah had respect, and considered his undertakings for his people, when he registered them in the court of heaven, and enrolled their names in the book of life. God incarnate is the head of his body the church; he is the first-born among his many brethren: he was first chosen, they were chosen in him; he the head of all election, they the members under him; he born for them, therefore they have a new birth; he lived for them on earth, therefore they live with him in heaven; he died for them on the cross, therefore they cannot die under the curse of sin; he is in the fulness of glory, therefore they shall be glorified together with him. In all things he must have the pre-eminence, and he richly deserves it. What a debt! who can count the sum you owe him, whom he has ennobled, made the brethren of Immanuel, and in him sons of God, registered as such with the Father's own hand, and declared to be his act and deed? the register given to the Son, and called the Lamb's book; every name in it as dear to him as the apple of his own eye, and will be kept with equal care and love. His almighty power guards the register; he will not suffer any blot in it; not a name altered: not a name lost. Oh what mercies are these! Who, who can count the sum of them? My friends, has the grace of God bestowed them upon you? Do you believe Jesus was born for you? He was, if your dependence be on his holy life for your righteousness, and on his precious blood-shedding for your pardon. And think then what Christmas is to you! What a festival of joy and thankfulness! See that you make much melody in your hearts unto the Lord. Oh sing unto him, and praise him; join all your brethren in earth and heaven, who are now giving honour and glory to God and the Lamb; for with this strain our hymn concludes:

V. 7. "And the singers, as well as the performers on instruments shall say, All my springs are in thee."—All good flows from God incarnate; he is the fountain head of grace and glory: and whoever upon earth is receiving out of his fulness, he is ready with the melody of his heart, and with the concert of his lips and life, to ascribe every good to the birth of Jesus. All my springs, says he, are in thee; every stream of comfort flows from thee. Thou art the fruitful source of my every blessing. Oh give me, Jehovah Jesus, give me deeper humility, that I may with better praise be exalting the God of my salvation. And whoever is receiving out of the same fulness in heaven, he is perfectly convinced that all his springs are in God Jesus. It is the one employment, the very highest blessedness of the redeemed of the Lord, as they are receiving fresh mercies, to be ever returning them back in thankfulness. This is their very heaven. All the harpers, playing round the throne with their golden harps, strike their highest notes to this heart-felt truth, "All our springs are in thee. Whatever brought us here, whatever we are here, is entirely from thee: our royal crowns, our salvation robes, our palms of everlasting victory, our perfect conformity to God, and our perfect enjoyment of God—all, all is from thee, our dearest Immanuel This satisfying joy of heaven, great and endless as it is, yet is but a stream out of thy fulness; all springs from thee; to thee be the glory for ever and ever. Hallelujah. Angels, and the church of the first born say Amen."

Such is our Christmas hymn; and what do you think of it, my dearly beloved? You have heard that it is a song of praise for a birth which brought with it every blessing of earth and heaven. Your title to, and your enjoyment of, all good come to you by the nativity of Jesus. Do you then read your title clear, and is your enjoyment happy? Are you now drawing your comforts fresh from this spring head? Oh that you may consider it, and be pleased with it, as the blessed Trinity were. Heaven beheld it, and smiled again on man, sinful man.—Justice said, There I am satisfied, yea I am well pleased.—Truth looked down, when this heavenly plant sprung out of the earth, and said, He will vindicate mine honour; the sinner may be saved, and yet I shall be true in all my sayings. Mercy and Truth met together; Righteousness and Peace kissed each other. Every offended attribute looked with delight on his birth, and saw that they should be infinitely and everlastingly glorified in saving sinners. Oh blessed Christmas day! what a festival was it in heaven; and when the sinner looks upon this birth by faith, it is a heavenly festival to him upon earth: he sees a Child born, and a Son given for him, who is also the almighty God; and he is satisfied with the obedience and with the sacrifice of his divine Saviour. His conscience is at peace; his heart is happy, he rests in his love; enjoys his Jesus, and walks in sweet friendship and holy fellowship with him, seeking to cultivate a nearer and closer intimacy by faith, till Jesus bring him to full enjoyment in glory.

But the improvement of these truths deserves a more particular consideration. I proceed therefore to the Second head of discourse, which was to bring the doctrine, contained in our text, into practice and experience.

The doctrine is this—The birth of Jesus Christ is the spring of all blessings in time and in eternity; it is the fountain from which flow all the streams of grace and glory. From which doctrine I would draw these two inferences:

First, If God had not been incarnate, sinners could have had no good; and Secondly, All good comes from his birth—"All my springs are in thee."

1. When sin entered into the world, there was nothing good left in it, and from that day forward no good was to be found, but from the birth of Jehovah Jesus. A sinner may seek it elsewhere. Every sinner does: for indeed all sin consists in turning from God our Saviour to something else, and in seeking that happiness in it, which is only to be found in him. The one good thing for the sons of men is Jesus. And nothing can do them the least good, till they be pardoned sinners in him, and partakers of the Father's love through him. Now look round the creation, my beloved hearers, survey every subject which flatters you with promised good. Examine it narrowly, and before you believe its flatteries ask it—"Thou seeming delightful creature canst thou pardon my sins, and save me from hell?" If it speak the truth, it will reply, Not I; who can forgive sin but God only? Well, then, if you have sinned, and being under the wrath and curse of God, a pardon must be had, or else you are ruined for ever, what should you be seeking first, what should you be happy in obtaining, but a pardon? Away with all fond hopes of sensual pleasures, or earthly possessions, or the esteem of men; what good can these, what good can all the world do you, if you should die unpardoned. and the wrath and curse of God should justly fall and abide upon you for ever? Oh think on this, and when Pleasure puts on its sweet smiles, and with a bewitching face says—"Come take me to your bosom—Oh what a paradise of delight will I give you, only try me and you will find a very heaven in mine embrace." Keep off, thou fair tempter; answer me—Dost thou come with a pardon for my sinful soul, and art thou the heavenly messenger of this good news? Oh no—every delight, amusement, diversion, whatever mistaken man have stamped the name of pleasure upon, they did it for this very reason; because it keeps them from feeling their sins, and from seeking the pardon of them. So was Dives deluded: he was gay and jolly—every day was a feast, and every hour brought some fresh entertainment. He did not feel his sins, till he felt their punishment: but now the remembrance of his pleasures makes his torments more tormenting. Young people, take warning from him. If pleasure was on God's side, it would say to you—Do not you look at me for happiness—do not expect it from your senses. It is in Jesus—all the springs of true pleasure are in him. Old people, do not let the world deceive you; all is emptiness, and will prove vexation, which leaves you unpardoned; go where you will in quest of happiness, you will be disappointed, till you come to Jesus. Your appetite will increase by running after the creature, and your thirst will grow more painful. You will contract fresh guilt, and lay up fuel for greater misery. The Lord God convince you all of these truths. Oh that you may feel the importance of them, and may be satisfied, that nothing can do you any good, unless you are pardoned sinners in Jesus, and made happy believers in him.

What does Christmas return for every year, but to preach those lessons: and if you have never spent one Christmas in learning them, oh may the Lord God now open your ears to hear the voice of truth. Pray mind, sin is your misery, Jesus is the only Saviour. He was born to save. He took this dearest of all his names, and was called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins. This salvation you want; every one of you want it alike—you are lost for ever without it. Sirs, what then do you intend to do? Will you come and honour his birth-day, by putting in for your share of his salvation? Are you really sensible that you want it, and are you indeed seeking it? Thanks be to him, if he has put this into your hearts. May he spread the glories of his nativity, and endear himself to your souls by giving you this day to believe in him. Oh that his Spirit may make this such a Christmas as you never knew before—May he enable you by faith to keep the feast with gladness, and to experience your own interest in the blessings of the birth of Jesus.

Is there any one here thinking thus—"Let them draw their comforts from Christ who will, I know of another spring, and to it will I go—I am quite easy, and enjoy myself in my present way of life, and I have no desire to change it: I will keep my Christmas just as I used to do, and I will be as merry and as happy as I can." Poor deluded mortal! What, art thou easy in thy sins, and happy in the enjoyment of them—easy and happy without a Saviour, without a pardon? Canst thou sport and play on the very brink of endless ruin? Oh desperate delusion! Why, man, is not thy case bad? Thou art in danger, but insensible of it. Indeed there is but one case worse. Thou art living as they did who are now in hell. They went on thoughtless in sin, till vengeance overtook them: and thou art treading fast in their steps. May God stop thee by his grace; may he save thee from destruction, and bestow freely upon thee the blessings which believers receive from the birth of Jesus; which is the next practical remark.

God incarnate is the fountain head, and all the springs are in and from him. This is the testimony of the Father concerning his Son—all scripture confirms it—believers in all ages have experienced it—and it comes to-day with a seasonable address to your hearts, and to mine. Do we experience it? Can each of you say of the incarnate God, as David does, "All my fresh springs are in thee?" Come, sirs, to a free inquiry; and let the word of God be our guide. To what springs do you go for your comforts and blessings? Do you fetch all from the finished work of the God-man? Are you trusting to his blood for pardon, to his righteousness for acceptance, to his power to keep you, and to his love to bless you? And would you, God helping you, draw every good from Jesus, and have it fresh, grace for grace, out of his fulness? Does your conscience say—"This is my faith, here I rest my soul: on the atonement and obedience of Immanuel I place my dependence, and I renounce every other hope?" Then upon the warrant of God's word you may conclude, that Jesus is yours. He is your Saviour. Your faith in him is the operation of his own Spirit, and your title to him and to his fulness is certain. Oh praise him for this unspeakable gift; and wait on him for grace to keep your evidences clear, that you may see, without doubt or wavering, your right and title to Jesus, and may therefore be making free use of what God has freely given you in him.

This was the prophet's experience. He not only knew the springs of grace, which are in Jesus, but he also enjoyed them. It pleased the Father to lay up all fulness of covenant blessings in his Son, as God-man. It pleased the eternal Spirit to witness this in the scripture, and to seal his witness upon the hearts of believers, enabling them to come to this fulness, to live upon it, and to be satisfied with it. Thus the blessed Trinity by a free grant have made over this fulness to every one that believeth. They have laid it all up in King Mediator for use. Believers, you may draw as much water as you please out of this well of salvation. The greatest honour you can do it, is to take the water of life freely, and abundantly. It is given to you as your property; and a man may certainly make free with what is his own. The spring head is yours, the streams are yours —ye are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ—you are put into possession of this vast estate, and it is expected of you, that you live (like a king's son) upon the income.

This is the good old Christmas keeping. It is enjoying the blessings of Christ's birth. It does not consist in feasting and dancing, in diversion and pleasure, in cards and plays, but in living by faith upon the springs of grace, which are in Christ Jesus. A true believer is now partaking of them. He tastes their sweetness. He is fed and nourished with their consolations. He has as real communion with Christ in his heart, as he has with the things of this world in his body. He actually receives out of Christ's fulness streams of grace, and being refreshed with them, he feels himself happy in the well-spring of his salvation.

My friends, would you put singular honour upon this day, then follow the prophet's example. Whatever blessing comes to sinners from the Saviour's birth, see that you enjoy it: make use of the springs which are in him: you want them all. And you know, a thirsty man does not want water to look at, but to drink. Go to the spring-head, and drink freely. Apply its healing streams for all the purposes of salvation, and continue so to do from day to day, never give over receiving out of the fulness of Christ grace for grace, till you receive out of it glory for glory.

Are you made alive? He is the fountain of life: he was born, that you might be born again. When you look back, and survey what you was once, and now see, how he has quickened you from a death in trespasses and sins, oh remember what you owe him for the exceeding riches of his grace. The water of life, the quickening influence came from his fulness. The water which followed the Jewish camp, flowed through the rock, and that rock was Christ—through Christ came that sovereign stream, which made you alive—through Christ it flows on: the distinguishing grace that keeps you alive, still flows through the rock Christ. Keep this fresh upon your mind: you are indebted for the free gift of life, with every comfort of it in earth and heaven, to the birth of Immanuel. Let the experience of this encourage you to trust in him; he has made you alive, and because he lives, you shall live also. It is his mind and will, that the stream should never be dried up; from whence it flows, thither it shall return; view it thus, never look at the stream but as inseparably connected with the fountain: use it as such, as a well of water springing up into everlasting life, make free with it. It is a fountain opened to wash your spotted soul, and to make it clean for ever: when the soldier pierced our Saviour's side upon the cross, forthwith there came out blood and water, not water only to cleanse from the filth, but blood also to justify from the guilt of sin. This was the day prophesied of, when there should be a royal fountain opened in Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness: all the springs come from it, and it is open, it stands open, free for use. Believers, see ye live under the experience of its sovereign virtue. Have nothing to do in the matter of cleansing or justifying your soul, but with it alone. The water out of the side of the crucified Jesus can wash you, and you shall be whiter than snow: the blood out of the side of the crucified Jesus can justify you from all things; through faith in it, you shall be cleansed from all sin, and shall have eternal redemption. These are the springs of God's own appointment; and he makes them effectual to this very day. See then that you put honour upon them this Christmas. Make use of nothing to wash your soul, or to justify it, but this water and blood—whose virtue is sovereign, whose efficacy is everlasting. And look well, my brethren, to the effects which should follow from their daily use. Do you partake of them? Is your conscience satisfied—is the charge of guilt silenced—are your fears kept under—knowing that the Father is reconciled unto you, and accounts you clean and righteous in the Son of his love? Oh may you bring him much praise and glory: give him his honour, and say from your heart "All my springs, God Jesus, are in thee."

And being saved from the filth and from the guilt of sin, proceed in your experience. There are comforts out of number, to be drawn from this same fountain. The incarnate God is the God of all comfort: the angels said to the shepherds—Behold, I bring you glad things of great joy, great indeed, tidings of the greatest joy the heart can feel on this side of heaven: for the love of the Father to you, your sense of it, your growing sense of it, with all its comforts, are streams which flow from the birth of Immanuel. If he had never been born, you never could have known peace with God, nor love to God. A sensible sinner cannot draw true comfort from any thing, until being justified by faith he have peace with God. And a believer cannot be happy in the love of God, but as he sees God is reconciled and loving to him; so that peace and love, with their sweet fruits, cannot be preserved with comfort, but by faith in Christ Jesus. Seek your comforts, then, my brethren, in the fulness of God Jesus. Expect to find them nowhere else; whatever promises you comfort, if it does not flow from him, away with it; it is unholy joy; throw it to the moles and to the bats. Have to do with nothing, either to make or to keep your heart happy, but the finished salvation of the incarnate God; and while you live by faith upon him, comfort will refresh your soul, pure, holy, heavenly comforts, administered to you as you want them, by the Holy Ghost the Comforter.

Go then, my beloved, and make trial of our Saviour's fulness; see whether it does not fully answer the scripture character of it: experience will soon convince you, that it is a spring of never-failing consolation. If you make up all your comforts in Jesus, you live at the fountain head; you can lack nothing but more faith, that with more joy you may draw water out of this spring of salvation: for here is joy to comfort you, even in sorrow; light in darkness; yea, life in death.

If you be in outward distress, here is inward consolation. When the conscience is at peace, and the heart is happy in Jesus, troubles cannot take away, but generally increase communion with him. If you be in inward distress, arising from spiritual trials and conflicts, still Jesus has abundant consolation. The believing soul will not faint, which rests secure on the work of Jesus: it will certainly overcome, which makes Jesus its refuge and strength; yea, those very trials and conflicts, rightly managed, will work together for present as well as for future good, as you may read, 2 Cor. i. to v. 11. If your distress be sickness, it is grievous to the flesh, but profitable to the spirit. This is generally a growing time; the believer becomes better acquainted with his physician; is forced to call him often in for his advice; cannot avoid submitting to his care and management, and is led, in the absence of creature comforts, to a more intimate enjoyment of the grace and love of Jesus.

If the distress be sickness unto death, Jesus is the prince of life, and he has comforts for the dying. The body may fall asleep, but the soul is then alive, and connected with the spring of consolation. Death does not cut it off from, but unites it for ever to, the fountain of life: from Jesus it enjoyed life by faith in grace: from Jesus it enjoys life by sense in glory. The manner and the place of enjoying it are changed; but it is the same life flowing from the same Jesus. Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory over the fear and over the power of death, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

These are Christmas comforts—pure and holy joys, to be had in cases of distress, outward and inward, in the time of sickness, and in the hour of death: believers may be happy under all: they may find comforts in Jesus provided and laid up for them in him; and therefore they will never want comforts, no, not in the worst of times, but when they are misled and seek it from other things. To whom, then, my brethren, should you go but to him in whom all fulness dwells?

He has every thing to give, that can keep your conscience at peace, that can make your heart happy, and that can give you victory over your sins and miseries through life and death. These blessings are to be had only in Jesus, and he has them in his fulness for you. May you receive out of it much grace, and daily find, that all your fresh springs of comfort are in the incarnate God.

These are some of the triumphs of Christmas, but the greatest, the crown and glory of the rest, is still behind. The comforts of heaven, as well as of earth, are the fruits of his birth. There is a river that maketh glad the city of God—a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb. All the streams of grace and salvation run out of this river, and run into it again; they take their rise from covenant love, and lead back to the enjoyment of covenant love: they proceed from the throne of God and the Lamb—of God, not absolute, but as united to the Lamb; as incarnate in man's nature to live and die a sacrifice for man. This Lamb of God is the spring-head from which all grace flows, and keeps flowing on, never stops, till it run into glory; and there the saints keep Christmas for ever. The blessed company of them round the throne, made glad in the city of God with the water of life, are deriving all their springs from Jehovah manifest in the flesh; they are singing in harmony with us the same song of praise: all the melody of heaven, every voice, and every harp, sounding in sweetest concert, give honour, and blessing, and praise, and thanks to him that was slain, and hath redeemed them unto God by his blood. To him be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

The good Lord help us to join them: oh that we may now have our share in their joys. And why not? Is not their God our God?—their Saviour our Saviour also? Why then should not we praise him together with them, and rejoice with them in his salvation? Our debt is as great, our relation to him as inseparable as theirs; our blessings from him as certain: our springs are all from him as well as theirs. May our Christmas kept by faith, be to his honour and glory, as like to their heavenly festival as may be. May all of you, who have heard to-day of the birth of the incarnate God, receive the glad tidings with great joy: may you go away, and keep the feast to the Lord with humble thankful hearts, and experience the blessings of Christ's birth in your lives. Living and dying, in earth and heaven, may you find all your fresh springs of grace and glory in the incarnate Jesus. To him, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, three co-equal Persons in one Godhead, be equal honour and praise ascribed for ever and ever. Amen.

SERMON II.

Elihu spake moreover unto Job, and said, Thinkest thou this to be right that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God's?—Job xxxv. 1, 2.

The book of Job is full of Christian knowledge. It was given us by the Holy Spirit, and recorded by Moses, the man of God, and inserted in the volume of sacred scripture, that it might be a standing lesson to the church of Christ: for there is one plain truth pursued from the beginning to the end of it, without any digression. The point debated between Job and his three friends is this, "Whether man can make himself so righteous as to merit happiness from God." This is the single proposition which they discuss. The three friends take the negative side of the question; Job holds it in the affirmative: he maintains, against all their arguments, not only that man could make himself so righteous, but also that he himself was that very righteous man; and he declares, that if he were called before the throne of God, he would even there plead his own righteousness. "My righteousness," says he, "I hold fast, and will not let it go;" and in the 29th, 30th, and 31st chapters, he makes a long catalogue and boasting of his good works, and wishes he might be weighed with an even balance, that God might know his integrity. In this proud, vain opinion of self-righteousness he obstinately persisted until Elihu appeared. Job had often desired to have his cause heard before the Almighty; and Elihu, in the entrance of his speech, tells him, "Behold I am, according to thy wish, in God's stead, and am come to hear the cause, and to put an end to it, that it may never be again debated while the world endures." Accordingly Elihu lays the indictment against Job in these words, "that he justified himself more than God:" he proves the indictment from Job's own words in the text, "Moreover Elihu answered and said, Thinkest thou this to be right that thou saidst, my righteousness is more than God's?" Elihu brings such arguments against self-righteousness as thoroughly convinced Job of his error; and, ashamed of his former pretences to justify himself, and abashed and confounded at his past conduct, he cries out in the anguish of his soul, "Lord, I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

This humble, penitent temper becomes us all; and our vain, corrupt nature has so many little risings of pride, and so many temptations to self-sufficiency, that we cannot be too often showing men, that, in the sight of God, we are all sinners, and the best of us must plead guilty. This useful lesson let us now learn. I hope our present meditations on the book of Job will bring it to your hearts, and if any of you are come here with self-righteous notions, imagining you can justify yourselves by your own good works, I hope the grace of God will convince you, as he did Job, and enable you to declare with him, "Lord, I abhor myself," &c. Let us consider, then, the scope and design of the book of Job, and meditate seriously upon those arguments which the Holy Spirit has there treasured up for our instruction in righteousness. The whole book turns upon this one point, Whether it be in man's power to make himself so righteous that he should merit happiness from God? This is the single question debated; and, because the determination was to be final, and it was to be a leading case against self-righteousness unto the end of the world, therefore no circumstance was omitted that could make the evidence full and complete. The first striking circumstance is in the moral character of Job, which rendered him a proper person in every respect to be brought to the bar of strict justice, and to urge what he had to say, in support of his plea of self-righteousness. He was a man of an exemplary life, so strict in all the outward duties, and he adorned all his virtues by doing so much good in the world, that Providence chose to put him upon the trial of self-righteousness. For, if a person of his great moral attainments should be brought in guilty, then all pretences would be cut off for ever, of bringing this plea again before the tribunal of God; because we have here the decree made; it is here left upon record, and all objections against it will certainly be over-ruled. Job's character was very extraordinary; when he was put upon his trial, nothing appeared against him but the charge of self-righteousness, in other respects he was quite a saint; he was not accused of the breach of any outward duty, either to God, to his neighbour, or to himself. His three friends often charge him with the commission of some secret hidden sin; but Job always defends himself, and insists upon his innocence: and since God, when he examined him, brought nothing of this kind to light, we may therefore conclude he was not guilty. His own account of his moral character, in the chapters before referred to, is very particular; he insists upon his exact, careful practice of almost all the social virtues, and appeals diligently for the truth of what he says of himself to his three friends, who were not guilty of flattering him: and they make no reply. His moral character stands clear, and free from objection. And the testimony which the Holy Spirit gives of him, ascribes to him higher attainments than morality. "There was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job, and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God and eschewed evil." These are very great encomiums in themselves, and greater as coming from God, to be perfect, to walk uprightly, to fear God, and to flee from evil: these seem to be the very highest attainments of this mortal life, for they include every branch of duty: whatever is praiseworthy in the righteous, moral, or private virtues, comes under this description, therefore we must place Job far above the common level. None of you will pretend to take to yourselves the illustrious character which God gives him. Can any of you appeal to your own conscience, and declare with truth and sincerity, "I am perfect and upright, I fear God, and fly from evil," as Job did? I cannot believe there is any man living upon earth who has a legal claim to this perfection and uprightness: let every one speak for himself; I declare that I have no claim. The religious and moral attainments of Job were far beyond what we commonly acquire. And as his virtues were singular, he was therefore put upon a trial which required a man of the most singular virtues. He was called upon to justify himself, which he had the best claim to do, because he could plead a perfect and upright life, in the discharge of all the outward duties: and this he did plead; but was cast and found guilty. I doubt not but it may seem very extraordinary to some persons, that so great and good a man could fall into this dangerous error: but his greatness and his goodness exposed him to it, and were his strong temptations to ascribe righteousness to himself rather than to God: these were indeed the only temptations which he had not overcome, and he was more liable to these because he had overcome all the rest. The tempter therefore laid this snare for him, and Job unhappily fell into it. He began to see too much of himself. His eyes were too much intent on his regular sober life, and upon comparing himself with his neighbours, he found he so far out-stripped them, that now and then a vain thought of superiority crept into his heart; and, finding a welcome reception, it invited the other attendants of pride to enter. Pride, at first, only made him more strict and regular in his outward walking; but some took occasion to flatter him with many pleasing compliments, and missed no opportunity of suggesting, that so great and good a man would certainly be highly favoured of God, a reward equal to his virtues he could not fail of meriting. This flattery easily got admission into the heart; and, by degrees, Job entertained still more and more exalted notions of his own attainments, until he, at last, verily believed that he could justify himself. He was fully persuaded his good works were, in number and degree, so very eminent, that he might claim his reward as a matter of debt. Accordingly, he entered his plea upon this footing, and the debate between him and his three friends turns upon this single point, and after they were not able to settle it, Elihu appears, and soon convinces Job of his dangerous error, and his conviction led him to a thorough repentance, upon which he was pardoned, and received into mercy.

The subtle spirit does not show his wisdom and cunning in any thing so much as in suiting his temptation to our tempers. He raises his strongest battery against our weakest side. If we live in sin, then he tempts us to go on in sin, promising us a season of repentance at some distant time. If we have left sin, and are walking in the ways of righteousness, then he tempts us to think that we are more righteous than we are. And how carefully should we watch over our hearts, and how earnestly implore the Divine Spirit to assist us, since Job, so great and good a man, fell into this temptation. A perfect upright man, one who feared God, and fled from evil, was yet tempted to think himself so righteous that he wanted not the righteousness of Christ. That this was really Job's crime, will appear with undeniable evidence, to them who will read the book upon this plan. Every word, from beginning to end, proves Job guilty of self-righteousness. At the very beginning of his trial, his wife charges him with it. "What," says she, "dost thou still retain thy integrity? Dost thou still maintain thine own righteousness even after God has punished thee so remarkably for maintaining it?" His three friends bring the same charge against him, and Job owns it. "Though God should slay me," says he, "yet will I maintain mine own ways before him. Though I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go. My heart shall not reproach me so long as I live. My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death; but not for any injustice in my hands, also my prayer is pure: for, God, thou knowest that I am not wicked." These are Job's own words, and higher claims to self-righteousness cannot be made. When his three friends could not convince him of his error, he was in danger of dying in his obstinacy, unless Elihu had appeared, who stated the case in so clear a light, that Job saw his crime, and abhorred himself for it, and repented in dust and ashes. Throughout the book of Job, then, this one plain lesson is inculcated, that no man by his own works can be justified. God was pleased to humble Job, in order to convince him, and all mankind through him, that the best man upon earth stands in need of the Redeemer's merits to justify him. For this purpose Job was tried. His three friends charge him with maintaining that he was just and righteous in his own eyes, and endeavoured to convince him of sin, that they might thereby bring him to confession and to absolution. But as Job was not conscious to himself of having wilfully failed in any point of duty, he insisted upon his innocence, and with great confidence pleaded not guilty. His friends, supposing from what they found in their own lives, that no man could be so free from stains of this kind as Job really was, gave him quite over as a hypocrite, for pretending to such unexampled righteousness. But they never pressed the proper arguments, or urged the gospel terms of acceptance with God. In this point his friends failed; and thereupon the anger of Elihu was excited, who comes and varies the charge, and mends the indictment. He first blames the friends for putting the cause upon a wrong issue, and then, addressing himself to Job, he informs him, that supposing his plea of righteousness should be granted, and he had not committed any notorious sins, and had performed, as far as he was able, the several duties required of him, yet he could not be justified upon any thing he had done or could do. Because there was but one who could justify, and therefore the best man upon earth could not, without him, be justified. Elihu brings several arguments to prove his point, from the 32d to the 38th chapter, in which self-righteousness is fully confuted. It never had so complete an answer. I would recommend to you the careful perusal of these chapters, as the best preservative against the deistical opinions of the present age, and to help you to read them with more spiritual improvement, I will give you a short view of Elihu's reasoning.

He lays his charge against Job in these words, that he justified himself rather than God, that his righteousness was more than God's; it is in many translations "in the presence of God;" and all the English bibles, till king James's version was established, read "before God;" Job had presumption to justify himself before God. He had such an high opinion of his own excellency, that he thought himself perfect enough to bear the severest scrutiny, even by him who chargeth his angels with folly. He imagined he needed no repentance or atonement; and how much soever they who have been guilty of notorious breaches of the law may want imputed righteousness, yet he had enough of his own and he would undertake to justify the general conduct of his life, even before God himself. Elihu shows him the presumption of this undertaking from the universal depravity and corruption of the human nature, which comes into the world in a state of sin and guilt, from which no righteousness of ours can redeem us. We are all, by nature, children of wrath, subject to the justice and wrath of God, for by one man's rebellion, judgment came upon all to condemnation. Now it is not possible that any future good behaviour of ours can free us from this state; because, after sentence is passed upon us to condemnation, we are rebels convicted, and our attainder must be taken off, and we must be restored in blood before any action of ours will be allowed good and right in court: and no other power but his who put us under the attainder can reverse it. For to think that we can take off the sentence which God has past upon us, by our own merit, is more absurd than if an attainted rebel should think of taking off his sentence by an act of grace which he should pass himself, and proclaim in his own name. Elihu urges this truth against Job, and presses it with great vehemence. It was to be the foundation of all his following arguments, and therefore he takes pains to lay it secure; and when it was once laid and secured, what could Job or any self-righteous man object to it? For if it be granted that God hath shut up all under sin, which the scripture positively asserts, then we must remain shut up until the same almighty hand which shut us up, shall also set us at liberty; and if we attempt to set ourselves at liberty, without or against his will, we only make our confinement more close and wretched. God indeed offers us pardon and liberty, but then we must apply for them in the way he has appointed, and if we think of attaining them without the merits of Jesus Christ, which is his appointed way, we take the direct method of disowning ourselves of the offered pardon and liberty, and shut ourselves up the more closely under sin and condemnation.

That we who are by nature born in sin, and children of wrath, cannot do any thing to make ourselves be born again to righteousness and children of God, is the express doctrine of holy scripture, and our church maintains it in very clear terms in her 11th article; "we are accounted just and righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and not for our own works and deservings, therefore whatever our works and deservings be, we must remain unjust and unrighteous, until we go with humility to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and be made just and righteous by his imputed merits." To bring us to this humble frame of mind is the chief design of all God's visitations: when we are like to be led astray by a fond opinion of our own sufficiency, then he suffers us to fall into afflictions, that we may find our own weakness, and be better disposed to accept of his offered grace. This is Elihu's second argument to Job, which he introduces in these words; "Surely thou hast spoken in my hearing, and I have heard the voice of thy words, saying, I am clean without transgression, I am innocent, neither is there iniquity in me Behold God findeth occasion against me, he counteth me for his enemy;" and then reproving Job very sharply for these presumptuous expressions, he tells him the reason for God's sending men such visitations as he might withhold. It was, that he might withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man: when we begin to entertain too high an opinion of our own goodness, then God visits us with afflictions, in order to withdraw us from such self-righteous purposes. He sends outward evils to cure our inward evils, and he makes us sensible of our weakness and misery, that finding no help in the creature, he may force us to fly to him for help, and thereby he may hide pride from man. To hide pride from man is the hardest work of his grace: pride, it is so interwoven and incorporated with our corrupt hearts, that nothing less than an Almighty hand can take it out; after God has opened our eyes, and we see our sin and guilt by nature, and are convinced that Jesus Christ alone can deliver us from it, yet still some proud opinions of self will be often rising. This grand idol self, will be trying to get some adoration; and the best man, if he be not much upon his guard, is most exposed to, and will soonest fall into, self-idolatry. Therefore, God out of his infinite mercy to us, when he sees us likely to fall into this temptation, tries to hide pride from man by such visitations as he sent Job: he pulls down our inward lofty thoughts by outward humiliations, and sends us pains and diseases to humble the body, that the mind may thereby receive proper lessons of humility: with this gracious intent, he had visited Job in a very severe manner, but to no purpose: his bodily substance was reduced to skin and bone, but without success; still his proud spirit refused correction, he would not give up his self-righteousness; he was upon the brink of destruction, without being sensible of his sin and danger, and he would soon have fallen, if he had continued obstinate, into the pit of the grave, and into the pit of misery: in this dreadful extremity, Elihu directs him and all men in his circumstances, to the only person who is able to help in such a time of need, he directs him to the Lord our righteousness, who is almighty to save, and this is Elihu's third argument, which he brings to illustrate and confirm the two former. For so soon as man is brought by means of affliction, to see his sin and misery, and, disclaiming all righteousness of his own, comes to Christ for righteousness and salvation, then is he made righteous and saved. Elihu has stated the manner of applying Christ's righteousness to the sinner, in as clear and express terms as the scripture has anywhere used; he says, chap. xxxiii. 22, 23, &c., that when God visits man with sickness, so that his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers, yet if there be a mediator with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness, then God is gracious unto him, and saith, "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom;" here is the whole method of salvation from first to last.

Elihu says, that when we are in extreme danger, and within the very jaws of death, and everlasting destruction, yet in this desperate case, if we apply to the great Mediator, styled here, "one among a thousand," and he appear and intercede in our behalf, satisfying for our offences, out of the inexhaustible fund of his own uprightness; then God withdraws the uplifted hand of his vengeance, and says to the executioners of his wrath, Save the man from perishing, for my justice is satisfied, and the sinner's soul is ransomed by the all-meritorious righteousness of Jesus Christ. To this person Elihu persuades Job to seek for righteousness; he exhorts him to depend no longer upon his own good works, but to seek the righteousness which is by faith; and if Job could make any objection to this doctrine, or had any thing to urge in his own defence, Elihu calls upon him to speak, and he would give him a patient hearing. Job was forward enough to reply to his three friends, but here he has no answer; he saw that Elihu had hit upon the very point wherein he was defective, and therefore convinced, in some measure, of his pride and obstinacy against God, he remains silent; upon which Elihu proceeds to a fourth argument in the 36th chapter, that is built upon the former: for if affliction brings us to an humble dependence upon God our Saviour, and his righteousness, then God, for the sake of Christ's righteousness, will take away the affliction, and will give us outward peace and prosperity. Elihu presses this point very earnestly until he enters upon the magnificent display of the divine power and wisdom in the works of the creation, which the Lord himself goes upon, from the 38th to the 42nd chapter.

Elihu had considered the arguments against self-righteousness from grace, the almighty Jehovah proceeds to consider the arguments from nature: it is the design of both to humble us, and to make us depend upon Christ for his righteousness. The comparison, drawn in the last chapters, between almighty power and human weakness, between the goodness of Divine Providence, and the little imitations of it in some few limited acts of human benevolence, between infinite wisdom so magnificently displayed in the natural world, and the poor effects of those abilities which the human understanding, in its greatest strength and glory, can boast of: is not this sufficient to level the most aspiring genius, and to lay man prostrate upon the dust from which he was formed, and to clothe him all over with humility? In this lowly posture and condition, he will naturally look up to God the Saviour for help, and will implore him who is almighty, to save him by his righteousness, to lift him up and exalt him. And in this lowly condition we find Job at the end of the history; all his lofty ideas brought down, stripped of all his self-righteousness, humbly suing to Jesus for mercy, he cries out, "Lord, I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." And I hope the grace of God has now brought you into this temper of mind, so that you will hear me patiently, while I bring the doctrine hence to you, and apply it to your spiritual improvement and benefit. I can scarce persuade myself, after what has been said, that any of you will seek to save yourselves by your own righteousness; if you read the book of Job, you will not. It must, by the grace of God, cure you of all thoughts of justifying yourselves. But lest there should be some one person crept in among us, who holds righteousness upon the deistical plan, I would ask him this plain question, "Are you as perfect and upright as Job was? fearing God and fleeing from evil?" If he says he is not so perfect, then he condemns himself; but if he says he is as perfect, then the book of Job condemns him: for Job was put upon his trial, and was found guilty. I believe no man living is so upright as Job was in the outward duties, and yet at the bar of strict justice, he could not justify himself; and who art thou then, O vain man, who will venture to plead thy merits before God after that he who had a much stronger, better plea, has been tried and convicted of self-idolatry; with such a precedent before thine eyes, reading his condemnation upon record, how canst thou hope to escape? There is no way left to escape, thy ruin is inevitable, unless the God of love, whose righteousness thou opposest, open thine eyes to see thy sin and danger, and give thee grace to forsake them.

But there is a kind of self-righteousness which is maintained by persons called Christians, and which is as destructive of Christ's righteousness as the deistical opinion; many nominal Christians have a plan of good works, which they are to act by, and if they should happen now and then to fail, then they apply to Christ to make up this deficiency, and after the merit of their alms, and church-going, and praying, and attendance on sermons and sacraments, after their merit is all summed up, then they hope Christ will supply the defect. But this is popery; to place any merit in works, is downright popery. Not one protestant Christian is of this opinion. Our own church, in her articles and homilies, declares expressly against the merit of works, and ascribes our justification to the free grace and merits of Jesus Christ received by faith, and not by works. But, methinks I hear the disputer of this world object, that by this doctrine we weaken the obligation to good works. When the same objection was made to St. Paul, he gave the same answer; "Do we make void the law by faith? God forbid." We establish the law; no man can keep the law as he ought but he who has faith; and whoever has faith must keep the law, because faith implants the living principle of love and obedience in the heart, and gives both the will and the power to keep the law of God, so that we do not make void the law by faith, but lay the proper foundation upon which it is to be established. All that the scripture says upon this point is not to overthrow good works, but to secure the observance of them. For although they cannot justify me in the sight of God, yet they are acceptable to him, when they come from a faithful heart, and are presented before him along with the sweet-smelling savour of the Redeemer's merits. Lest my meaning should be mistaken, I thought it proper to enter this caution, and I have only to remark that, upon the Christian's plan, self-righteousness is not defensible; Jesus Christ is the Lord our righteousness; we have none but what comes from him, and we rob him of so much as we ascribe to ourselves. Nothing is more injurious to him than pride, because it takes men off from that humble dependence upon God's righteousness, and tempts them into the scheme of self-righteousness, which is spiritual pride in the highest degree. It is even idolizing self, whoever thinks himself so righteous that he can claim his reward as a matter of debt, without the Redeemer's righteousness. He is a self-idolater, and the image-worshippers of ancient and modern Rome never fell into such gross idolatry; they always chose to fall down before something great and venerable, but the self-idolater pays his adoration to what was indeed the image of God, but is now made ugly by sin, and quite defaced by pride. And since this is so high an offence, and which the best men are most liable to fall into, we cannot, therefore, be too watchful over our hearts, to check and keep down every little rising of pride and self-sufficiency. Neither can we be too often or too earnestly imploring the assistance of divine grace to preserve us in a constant humble dependence upon Christ and his righteousness. We lie so open to the flattering temptations of pride and vanity, that we should leave no means untried which are likely to keep us humble in the ways of God's holy ordinances; we should be always seeking his help, and thereby humbling ourselves; and every act of humiliation, that tends to pull down our lofty ideas of ourselves, should be encouraged. Every Christian man ought to have his fixed times for private humiliation before God; all would find his interest in it. For God giveth grace to the humble, and every Christian man ought, as for himself, so also for the community in which he lives, to keep these fixed seasons of humiliation; and more especially at present, for the times are sore distempered. Our land mourns for the many creeping sins of it, and more for these election sins. There was not more vice and corruption at the election for magistrates in heathen Rome, than there is in this Christian country. What a deluge of drunkenness and debauchery has there been for many months past through the kingdom! and what a number of false oaths have been taken! How has the Lord's holy name been blasphemed by known perjuries! And what a trifling value do men begin to set upon their eternal salvation, when they will swear it away for the wages of iniquity! Certainly these men have never read what the Almighty says to them in Mal. iii. 5. "And I will come near to you to judgment, and I will be a swift witness against the false swearers." God will fulfil what he here threatens. He cannot lie; he will be a swift witness against perjurers, and he will bear his testimony against them by some great judgment, which is now hanging over their heads, and they may expect it daily. "For false swearing," says the prophet Jeremiah, "the land mourneth;" and our land has been long mourning and quaking for fear of the Almighty's vengeance. The earth seems to be more sensible of our danger than we are; for, besides all his other judgments wherewith he has visited us for many years, I find that he is again trying to awaken us by earthquakes. In the northern parts of England there have been lately several very severe shocks, and the people there are in the same dread and consternation, as the guilty wretches were in when this city was visited with earthquakes.

Now God does not send these earthquakes in vain, he intends them for so many awakening calls to a national repentance; he shows by them that we are really ripe for destruction, and that he is preparing to destroy us in some very exemplary manner. Lord Jesus, have mercy upon this sinful land! We do deserve all the fury of thy almighty vengeance, but spare us, most gracious God and Saviour; let thy visitations humble us, and bring every one of us to such a due sense of his guilt and misery, that he may be able now to declare from his heart, "Lord God, I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." Endue us, blessed Jesus, with this humble and penitent spirit, that our iniquities may not be the ruin of this church and kingdom, but that we may be pardoned and saved through thine infinite righteousness; Oh! most mighty God and Saviour, who livest and reignest with the Father and the holy Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

Almighty God, who showest to them that be in error the light of thy truth, to the intent that they may return into the way of righteousness; grant unto all them that are admitted into the fellowship of Christ's religion, that they may avoid those things that are contrary to their profession, and follow all such things as are agreeable to the same, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

SERMON III.

And Jesus said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.—Mark xvi. 15.

THIS charge was given by our Lord to his apostles; it contains his royal commission, in which he appoints them their work, and promises to be with them in the performance of it—"Lo, I am with you always," says he, "even to the end of the world."

He did not confine this charge to them or to the apostolic age; but he includes all his ministers, who have the same commission, the same work, and the promise of the same assistance, which the apostles had. It is their bounden duty, wherever they are sent, to preach the gospel to every creature. This is enjoined them by their Lord and Master, and he will not dispense with their neglect of it. This is their principal business, on which the salvation of the people committed to their care entirely depends; and it is the chief instrument in the hand of God of making their business successful. He owns his preached gospel, and sets his seal to it. To this day he makes it effectual for all saving purposes. It is still, and will be to the end of the world, the power of God unto salvation.

Since this is the nature of the gospel, men, brethren, and fathers, it behoves you to consider whether you believe its doctrines, and whether you enjoy its blessings. It is your duty to examine yourselves how you receive the good news. If the gospel be not to you the wisdom of God, and the power of God, on whom will you lay the blame? Will you arraign the Judge of all the earth? Weigh this matter well. The time draws near; it is but a very little while before we must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ. What plea will avail you there? The law cannot acquit you, you have broken it; and therefore upon the footing of the law you will be found guilty before God. No flesh shall be justified by the law, but every mouth shall be stopped.

Will you plead the mercy and grace of the gospel? You must plead it now, or it will not profit you then. He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned. A matter of infinite consequence to us all.

What stops the free course of the gospel? The world oppose it because it opposes them; it testifies of it that its pursuits are evil; it testifies against unawakened careless sinners, who know not their state; against infidels, an evil heart of unbelief; against legalists, who mix law and gospel. It comes with comfort to distressed minds. Let their distress be what it will, the gospel has good news for them—a remedy for every disease.

But God hath not left himself without a witness. Many believe the gospel, embrace its doctrines, enjoy its blessings; it saves them from every misery for eternity; brings all good in time; all wants supplied; brings everlasting good, an everlasting gospel, true in eternity. Such will it be in all its promises that be enjoyed in their full accomplishment.

The word gospel signifies good news: this is its settled meaning. It brings good news from heaven, a message of good from the justly offended God, declaring his purposes of grace and mercy to his sinful creatures. The gospel is for them; it is not revealed for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners. To them is the word of this salvation sent; it comes after they have broken the holy law, and are liable to its threatened penalties; discovering how the law may be magnified and made infinitely honourable, and God may be eternally glorified in saving them from the punishment due to their sins. This is good news indeed, because they could not undo the sin committed—that is impossible; neither could they make any satisfaction for it: sorrow, tears, good resolutions, future amendment, are no reasons why the law should not take its course, and the convicts of the law suffer for their crimes. The law of God insists upon perfect and continual obedience; it has made no provision for mercy, nay it knows nothing of showing any mercy to transgressors, but in case of the least failure, its sanctions immediately take place, and under them the sinner is left without help and without hope. When he is thoroughly sensible of this, he would sink into black despair, and would go in the bitterness of his soul, mourning all the way to the grave, if the gospel did not discover to him the gracious method of saving sinners, consistent with the honour of the divine law and justice, and conducive to the fullest display of the divine perfections in their everlasting glory.

This is the true character of the gospel; it is a message of good news from God himself, revealing his grace and mercy to sinners. And since all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, why is not the gospel alike welcome to all sinners? The reason is plain: the whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. The gospel is a sovereign remedy, but none take it till they are sensible they want it. It relates the same good news to all, but convinced sinners only are willing to receive it. As soon as they see the exceeding holiness of the law, and the exceeding sinfulness of breaking it, and feel their guilt, and have some foretaste of their punishment; then they begin to relish the gospel. And as they are enabled to mix faith with it, it becomes as suitable to their case as pardon to a condemned malefactor, and as delightful as ease is after long and racking pain, because it brings relief to their guilty consciences, and comfort to their afflicted hearts; and so far as it gains credit, it affords a present deliverance from every malady and misery of sin.

But from whence has the gospel this sovereign efficacy? What truth does it make manifest, by the belief of which sin, with all its sad consequences, may be done away? It reveals the great council of heaven concerning the incarnate Jehovah, and is from thence called the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ—good news of a Saviour, whose name was to be called Wonderful—a Child born, and a Son given; and yet this Child, this Son, the everlasting Father, Jehovah manifest in the flesh, God and man in one Christ, Immanuel, which being interpreted, is God with us. This great design was formed in the councils of the Godhead from eternity; and all the divine works in nature and grace were to bring about this wonderful event, with its happy consequences, in earth and heaven. God manifest in the flesh affords the richest display of the glories of the ever-blessed Trinity. Herein is love—the love of the Father shines out in none of his gifts, as it does in the unspeakable gift of his co-equal Son. Behold, what manner of love the Son hath bestowed upon us—angels will admire, and the redeemed will adore for ever him, who humbled himself to be made man, and to become obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, for the salvation of his people. Here is grace, as infinitely divine as its author, that the Lord, the Spirit, would act upon and influence the minds of sinners to believe in the Son of God, and through him to enjoy the love of the Father. These are the covenant offices of the eternal Three, and they altogether lead to, and centre in, the incarnation of Jehovah; for in the Godhead there are three Persons of co-equal and co-eternal majesty, Father, Son, and Spirit. These Three, as we are taught by the Christian verity, entered into covenant for the manifestation of their divine perfections, and contrive to get an everlasting revenue of honour and praise to themselves in the way of saving sinners. The Son of God covenanted to become their surety to the Father, to take their flesh, and in their nature, and in their stead, to keep the law in his life, to suffer the penalties of it in his cross and passion, and thereby to work out for them a perfect righteousness, and to make a full atonement. And being God over all, blessed for ever, Jehovah himself, there was in his life and death all the virtue and sufficiency to save, which the Godhead could possibly communicate. His work of salvation far exceeds his work of creation. It is so absolutely and infinitely complete, that nothing can be added to it; yea, when all his other works, worthy as they are of their divine author, shall come to an end, then this greatest and best work of God shall receive fresh honour, and an innumerable company of his redeemed creatures shall enjoy its increasing glories for evermore.

The gospel then is the welcome message of good news to convinced sinners—the best news that ever came from heaven. It brings good tidings of great joy, that there is born a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord Jehovah, and that he has made full reconciliation for iniquity, and has brought in everlasting righteousness. The gospel invites them to come and to partake of its blessings freely; and when they are made to believe the report, the arm of the Lord being revealed unto them, then these happy fruits of the Holy Spirit are found and enjoyed, sweet peace enters into the conscience, and holy love is shed abroad in the heart—peace and love, which surpass all understanding: for blessed is the people, so saith a voice from heaven, "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound of the gospel: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance: in thy name shall they rejoice all the day; and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted." Psalm lxxxix. 15, 16.

This is the lovely character of the gospel of God. And is this your idea of it? Consider, sirs, and examine closely. A mistake herein is of infinite consequence. If your sentiments be different from the standard of truth, you can neither know nor enjoy true happiness: for there is none to be found in earth or in heaven, but what the gospel brings. It is the only message of good news to sinners—a message from the Lord God—glad tidings of good to convinced sinners. The gospel reveals to them every thing that can bring relief to their guilty consciences, and joy to their afflicted hearts; it discovers to them a perfect deliverance from all sin and misery, by the sacrifice of the Lamb of God, and a clear title to all grace and to all glory, through the righteousness of the incarnate Jehovah. And when this is believed by the power of the Holy Ghost, then the gospel proves to be a reality—the message of good news is found to be true, and the good things heard of by report are received and enjoyed. The believer enters upon present possession of gospel blessings, as the sure earnest and happy foretaste of its eternal blessings.

Be it known unto you, therefore, men and brethren, that the gospel of the grace of God is not only a truth to be believed, but also a good to be enjoyed; and this is what our Lord charged his apostles to preach. Whether men will hear, or whether they will forbear, his doctrine must be declared, and his gospel proclaimed. This is the indispensable duty of all the Lord's ministers. Woe be unto you, if you preach not the gospel. Whatever reception they meet with, still they must persist. Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel. To preach is to proclaim it, after the manner of heralds, with authority, openly and plainly. However unlikely the means may seem to accomplish the greatest end, yet the means must be used. The gospel must be preached; because it is the instrument in the hand of God for carrying on the whole work of salvation. He has appointed it, and he works in it, and by it. The more weak and unfit it is of itself, the more does the excellency of the power of God therein appear. His glory is displayed by the wonderful effects which he brings about by the preached gospel: for it is said to be the ministration of the Spirit, by which the Holy Spirit is administered and acts. It is also the ministration of righteousness, by which the righteousness of God-Jesus is made known and believed in. By the word of God, his children are said to be born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible: and this is the word, which by the gospel is preached unto you. The gospel is made the means of their new life, and also of their growth in it, and therefore they are exhorted, as new-born babes, to desire the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby. These great things are spoken of it, and they are true. It is a matter of fact, that the gospel is effectual for all saving purposes. God makes his promise good to this very day—"Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,"—with ministers to assist them in preaching the gospel, and with their people to bless them in hearing it. He is with them both, that it may prosper in the thing whereto he sends it. He is with them, and always. He never leaves nor forsakes his servants, in any part of their work. He is with us at this time. His all-seeing eye is upon us. His wisdom is managing for the best. Oh that his saving power may be here manifest: for his presence gives life, and puts spirit into the gospel. What men speak to the outward ears, he sends with his divine efficacy to the heart; there producing what moral persuasion, and fine oratory, and close reasoning attempt in vain. The word spoken, when clothed with his power, becomes mighty to turn sinners from darkness to light. When the great Commander spake—"Let there be light," there was light: so is his word almighty in his spiritual kingdom. Whenever he commands the light to shine out of darkness, he speaks, and it is done; his power is always present to make his word effectual, and will be present with it to the end of the world. For these reasons the gospel must be preached, and why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should bring about the greatest effects by such an instrument? What! is any thing too hard for God? Or any means unfit which he pleases to make use of? He has appointed the gospel to be his great instrument in bringing sinners to himself—to this he has promised his blessing, and to nothing else. The means may appear unlikely to answer the end, but his presence in the means can do all things, and when he pleases to work by a single word, who can let him? Consider, sirs, this is no new thing with God! The creation was produced by a word: he spake, and it was made. View the beautiful order in which he carries on the works of nature; this is also the effect of a word. He commanded, and they stand fast. He upholdeth them by the word of his power; and by his word will he dissolve them. The great day is at hand, when the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, i. e. with a commanding voice, at which the whole creation shall pass away, and the place of it shall be found no more. You see God does all things with a word. And as man fell by not believing the word of God, is there not a manifest reason why he should be restored in the way of believing? By not believing the word of God, he sinned, by believing the word of God, he is saved. Who does not see a consistency and harmony in this way of our recovery—a perfect sameness in the divine manner of working? And who cannot discover how the glory of God, which is the end of all his works, is hereby entirely secured to himself? For what have ministers, or people, left to glory in? Whatever riches of gospel-grace God gives to his ministers, or communicates by their means, yet they have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of them. And whatever blessings the people receive by the preached gospel, they are all the free gifts of God, through Jesus Christ. That according as it is written, "He that glorieth, let him glory only in the Lord."

But it may be asked, has the gospel the same efficacy? Are the same means accompanied with the same success? They are. The command in the text is still in force: the promise to it is the same: the gospel is still mighty through God, and therefore ministers are required in the text to preach the gospel in all countries, and to all sorts of people—Go ye into

All the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. Go into all lands, whether you find the natives Jews or Gentiles, civilized or savage, all having sinned, and come short of the glory of God, being in the same state of guilt and misery; proclaim to them the good news of gospel grace, and inform them of the divine remedy provided for their distress: fear neither for yourselves, nor for the success of your message—I will be present with you—I will make the gospel welcome to as many as I have ordained unto eternal life—they shall believe it, and by believing, shall find it the power of God unto their salvation.

The apostles obeyed the command of their Lord, and went in person into all the world, into every country then inhabited, and there they preached the gospel. St. Paul asks, Have they not heard? Have not all people heard the preachers? He answers, yes, verily, they have; their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world. They went, like the sun, to communicate everywhere light and life, and comfort and fruitfulness; and the Lord was with them of a truth. Sinners did hear in all lands. Multitudes received repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. Still the Lord's hand is not shortened. Whenever he calls and sends his ministers, he gives them the same charge as he did to the apostles, and the same promise. They are to preach the gospel to every creature, without distinction—to rich and poor—to magistrates and people—to men of letters—to the unlearned—to sinners of every age and sex;—they all stand in the same need of the gospel, and to every one of them is it to be made known. It matters not, what prejudices or what enmity they may have against it; the truth as it is in Jesus must be preached unto them; because it is God's ordinance to correct their errors, it is God's great instrument to save them from their guilt and misery, there being no other name under heaven given among men, whereby any one can be saved, but the name of Jesus Christ.

The gospel then is to be preached everywhere, and to every creature, which makes it really good news; for the more extensive it is, certainly the more to be valued. It calls in general to sinners, and excepts none. It invites them to partake of a free salvation, and, what is better, of a full salvation.

Free for sinners as sinners—a free gift of free grace from first to last: it is not for any working or merit of theirs, but entirely through the obedience of the life, and through the atonement of the death of the Son of God, that any sinners are saved. The gospel calls them to come and trust in the finished work of God-Jesus, and to come just as they are, without any previous qualification or condition. Salvation being freely by grace through what the Saviour did and suffered, none are excluded, who come to him. It is an act of grace, without limitation and without exception. Any one who is made willing may take the benefit of it. A debtor for a thousand talents, has as free forgiveness as he who owed but one hundred pence: being made to confess they have nothing to pay, God as frankly forgives the one as the other. And

This renders the good news of the gospel still better. It proclaims a full, as well as a free salvation—a perfect deliverance from sin and misery—a perfect title to all good—for it is written, "whosoever believeth shall never perish, but shall have eternal life." All his debts shall be fully discharged—all his crimes so forgiven, that God will remember them no more—a good title shall be made out to the heavenly inheritance, and he shall enter upon present possession by faith, as the sure earnest of his eternal possession. Blessed, for ever blessed, is every creature who heareth and believeth the words of this gospel—he shall be blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ Jesus.

But it may be said, why should the gospel be preached to every creature, since all do not receive it? It must be preached for that very reason. All who heard the apostles were not converted. God acts herein as a sovereign. He follows the unerring counsel of his own will. He publishes his laws, which are infinitely just and holy, and if his creatures will break them, he leaves them to the consequences of their transgression. So does the Parliament of this land. It would be a strange reason for not passing a good law, because it was foreseen some would break it and forfeit their lives. It becomes more necessary on that very account. In the same manner the great lawgiver acts. To some his gospel is a savour of death unto death; to others a savour of life unto life. The fault is not in the gospel, but in the hearers. It was exactly suitable to their case, and a perfect remedy for their distress, but they would not take it. Ye will not come unto me, says Christ, that ye may have life—ye reject your own mercies through an evil heart of unbelief, and therefore God will be glorified in letting the law take its course. Where his mercy is despised his justice will be honoured—and they shall perish from the presence of the Lord who knew not God, and obeyed not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

SERMON IV.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, verily my sabbaths ye shall keep, for it is a sign between me and you, throughout your generations, that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore, for it is holy unto you; every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death; for whosoever doth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from amongst his people.—Exodus xxxi. 12—14.

Ever since the fall, Christ was the way to the Father, and he was set forth even in the Old Testament, with equal clearness as in the New. Our church says, Article 7, "the Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for, both in the Old and New Testament, everlasting life is offered to mankind through Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man, wherefore they are not to be heard, which feign, that the old fathers did look only for transitory purposes;" and yet we hear of a strange notion prevailing in the Christian world, that believers, under the Old Testament dispensation, did not understand the person and work of Christ as well as we do. Whereas they had the same revelation, and the same Spirit to explain and to apply it; they had the same faith that we have, in the same Lord; the same hope in Jesus; the same love to him, and the same obedience to his will on the same motive; and there is no difference between us and them, but in this one single circumstance; they believed in Christ, who was to come, as we believe in Christ, who is come. Moses and all the prophets, with one mouth, testified of Christ: they foretold his sufferings, and the glory that should follow. They gave their witness in plain words, and in significant rites, instituted of God, to describe what Christ was to be, and to do. The Levitical priesthood was appointed to explain those rites, and to make them familiar by constant preaching. As many as were ordained unto eternal life heard and believed in the Lord Jesus. They were ready to give an answer to every one who asked them a reason of the hope that was in them. If any inquiring heathen had desired a believing Jew to open to him the meaning of the ceremonial law, he would have explained it as St. Paul has in his Epistle to the Hebrews, Christ being the substance of all the shadows. And if farther inquiry had been made, Why is it you are so strict about the sabbath day? Upon what authority do you keep it? And what advantages do you expect from it? He would have given as direct and plain an answer, as any man now living can. He would have said, that God created the world, and in six days formed it, and on the seventh he rested, and God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that on it he had rested from all his works, which God created and made: and that rest was to show, that as God ceased from his works, so there was a time coming when we should cease from ours; so on this day we cease from bodily labour, that we might have happy rest, and converse with God by faith, as we hope to rest with him for evermore. If you ask, How does it appear that the believing Jews in the Old Testament should have as clear views of this matter as we have in the New, I would refer you only to two or three scriptures, and then open this matter, that we may see the obligation of keeping and sanctifying the Lord's day.

The first is the original institution; many people think it is part of the ceremonial law: Adam had nothing to do with the ceremonial law, but he had to do with this rest; for, if he had kept the sabbath, and rested in God as his supreme good, he would have entered into that rest by his perfect obedience, which (blessed be God) we enter into by faith in Jesus. It was a moral obligation; so when the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them, the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made; rested, that is, he ceased from creating and forming any thing more, and he blessed the seventh day; he made it the means of blessing to us, and God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: he sanctified it for man's sake, that there might be a token that there was a real sanctification in Adam, when he was first formed, and if he kept that image perfect, he should rest with a holy God for ever and ever: he blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it, because that he had rested from all his works which God created; that day is the institution of the first sabbath, which did not last long, but the continuance of the sabbath was after the fall; for before the giving of the law, we find that Moses said of the manna, 'it must not be gathered this day, because it is the holy rest of the sabbath,' which they had kept from the time of the fall, till the time of their coming out of Egypt. Upon the coming out of Egypt, the day was changed; they had kept the day which we now keep for Sunday from the beginning; but upon their coming out of Egypt, it was changed for the day in which they came out, and there is not any truth can be made plainer from the scriptures, than this truth, that the original sabbath was changed at the children of Israel's deliverance out of Egypt, and that it continued so. Our Lord lay in the grave the Jewish, the original sabbath; and he rose on the original creation sabbath. The day that was kept from the beginning, has been the day of the Christian sabbath. It has been asked, Where is there any sufficient proof and authority that this is a command of the most high God, and an obligation upon all his creatures? I chose to speak upon this passage before me, because of two or three words in it, which are not in the fourth commandment. This is an obligation, because the Lord spake to Moses, saying, "Speak thou also to the children of Israel, and say, Verily, my sabbath shall ye keep." Verily—the Lord sets his asseveration before it; in one place it is "remember," and here it is "verily," this is the truth of God, that ye shall keep my sabbath holy. Why? Because it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations, that ye may know that I am the Lord that sanctifieth you. It is a sign—that is the word I would fix upon it. They did not keep the sabbath for its own sake; it was but a sign, it was a memorial, they were to remember something by it, and so you know we do not keep the day now merely to cease from work, but we keep it for a particular purpose. It is a sign of the rest which believers have now in Jesus by faith; and it is a sign of that rest which remaineth to the people of God, when we believe. If you had asked any Jew, or any Rabbi, What is your sabbath a sign of? Why, says he, it is a sign of God's resting chiefly; but, now he has altered the day since our coming out of Egypt, it is a sign that we rested from the Egyptian bondage. It is a sign that God has brought us out, and taken us to be his peculiar people. He will, upon our setting apart this day to celebrate his service, to sing his praises, and join in hearing his word; he will sanctify us by his Spirit through the means that he has appointed for the improvement of his day. Ye shall therefore keep the sabbath, for it is holy unto you. Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death; and to gather sticks on the sabbath-day, once was punished with death. Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death—What is defiling the sabbath? It is not entering into rest by believing, that is the greatest profanation of the sabbath; and then those who have not entered into the spiritual rest and found it in Jesus Christ, they exercise their trades, they can get on horseback and ride out of town; they can get out, if they cannot afford to ride on horseback or in a carriage; and those that spend their time here in the city, you may find them in alehouses drinking till they are drunk, and then sallying out to do mischief. It is leaving the true rest that is in Jesus Christ, and it is no matter how men spend their time; if they have not entered into this rest, they are profaning the sabbath if they are in a church; six days may work be done, but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest holy to the Lord: whosoever doth any work on the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death: wherefore the children of Israel shall keep, shall observe the sabbath throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant. Not only is the sabbath a sign of our resting in God's love to us in Jesus Christ, but it is a perpetual covenant. The sabbath cannot be repealed, and therefore the observance of it is a perpetual obligation, because it is part of a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever. When you and I enter into rest, and cease from our labours here, we shall have a long eternal sabbath with God in glory, through Jesus Christ. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever; for in six days the Lord made the heavens and the earth: and on the seventh day he rested; he rested and was refreshed. Now I would affix this meaning to the sign, that it is a memorial of God's resting from his works; and that, when we are enabled to rest in Jesus Christ by faith, then we enter upon the spiritual sabbath in time, and shall enter upon the sabbath glory in eternity. How does it appear that this was the thing signified? There can be nothing to complete the subject but this single inquiry; and, therefore, that I may avoid all reasoning upon the subject, I will read to you the most beautiful comment of an infallible expositor, the apostle Paul, upon the fourth commandment, which is in the fourth of the Hebrews; I will just read over that part which belongs to my present subject, because it is impossible to say anything that will make it plainer than he does, namely, that the sabbath signifies ceasing from outward labour, that we may rest by faith in the love of God in Jesus Christ; and all that have entered into this rest, will want no arguments to stir them up to be frequent and constant in reading, hearing, praying, meditating, and every thing that belongs to spiritual comfort on the Lord's day. "Let us, therefore, fear," says the apostle Paul, "lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it; for unto us was the gospel preached as well as unto them." There you see they had the gospel under the Old Testament dispensation, as well as we, (and I do not doubt but every believer understood it as well as any man upon earth) unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them; but the word preached did not profit. Why? because they did not mix faith with it. Now it is faith that lays hold of the word; faith fastens upon the truth of it; faith fixes so upon it, and so incorporates itself with it, as to make it a real substance; and rests upon God's faithfulness to make it good. Now that is the way that we should mix faith with the word. Well, but if they failed for want of faith, and did not enter into rest, how came you to enter? We who have believed do enter into rest,—we who have believed. There is all that I have to say in that one sentence. There is a rest. How do we enter into it? By believing—by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ simply, without looking into any thing else. You never enter into rest without looking into Jesus Christ, as all in all; they that would have their own works to stand in some service as to their justification, and their final acceptance; they that look to any thing but Christ, they will be cast upon a turbulent sea all their days: but a person that is enabled to look to Jesus as the one rest of his soul, and looks at his works, and sees that he has finished the work of the new creation, as perfectly as he has finished the works of the six days' creation, then that man enters into that sabbath which will never end. Well, but say you, when did the believers in the Old Testament enter into this? We, who have believed, do enter into rest, as he said; but I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest, that is, proving one thing by another, they did not enter in because of unbelief; therefore, says the apostle, we enter in by faith, although the works were finished from before the foundation of the world; every thing was finished and complete, and yet there is a rest they did not attain then; for he speaketh in a certain place on this wise, God rested the seventh day from all his works; and he says, if they shall enter into my rest. So they did not attain it by any outward act, but only by faith, seeing, therefore, it remaineth that some must enter therein, and they, to whom it was first preached, entered not in because of unbelief; that is the Jews, that perished in the wilderness. Then he limiteth a certain day, saying, in David to-day (after so long a time) to-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts; but, by believing, enter into the Lord's rest. Now this proves that this spiritual rest, which the scripture speaks of in the Psalms, that it was not entering into Canaan, it was not done by any outward thing for three thousand years; for it was that time from the creation to David; but it says, in the eighth verse, if Joshua had given them rest, then would he not afterwards have spoken of another day; but David, though a hundred years after, entered into the promised land, speaks of a rest which the Jews had not then found. Oh, how clear is the scripture, when a man has got the plain meaning of it, and can take it up in his hand, and can say, this book, from the beginning to the end, is written of Christ, and all the shadows and figures in the Old Testament have Christ for their substance; when he can compare scripture with scripture, he sees as plain as any truth can be made, that Jesus Christ is the one sun that shines upon and enlightens all the whole volume of revelation. There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God, which they had not in the promised land; which they had not even found in David's time. Well, where is this rest to be found? Why, here it is: "There is a sabbath, therefore," says he, (Sabbatismos,) "the keeping of the sabbath remaining still for the people of God, for he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as did God from his." How plain and full is this against all Arminianism, against all mixing with works and grace. How plain is it, that when a man comes to Christ, and enters into his spiritual rest, he has done with all his own working. He will work, but it will be not that he may be pardoned; not that he may be saved; not that he may be justified; not that he may be sanctified; not that he may obtain life; but he works to this purpose, in the way of duty; my faith is to be exercised, and then I am to rest in Jesus, and find sweet fellowship with the Father and the Son through it, all the days of my life: and I must cease from my own work as God did from his. "Well," says the apostle, "now, therefore, let us labour to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief." It seems to be amazing, but if ever you was an awakened sinner, and seeking rest, you will find that it is the hardest thing in the world to believe in Christ: to find peace of conscience, without any remaining guilt; to find your heart happy, satisfied in Christ, and that with lips, and life, and time, and talents, you wish all your life to show forth his praises. You will find it is great labour, and none can help you to do this work but the Almighty God. You will ask, perhaps, now, what is remaining of the sign that the sabbath was? It is a sign of that spiritual rest into which believers enter, by receiving Christ through faith; and they enter into it in their consciences, and in their heart, and, as far as they believe, they are partakers now of that sabbath which remaineth for the people of God. Oh that the Lord would help me to enter into this rest. If you will read the Bible upon the plan I have been recommending to you, take it, and say, This book treats of Christ from the beginning to the end, and it points out a rest in him which we enter upon now in believing, which is an earnest and foretaste of everlasting rest. How shall I enter into this? The apostle meets with that objection. There is no way but by the word, and there is no way but to look up to the Spirit to accompany the word? The Spirit and the word together are the body and the soul of this book; for the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. There is the conclusion of the whole matter: the word is what the Holy Spirit makes use of to bring us into rest, and when this rest is preached freely, and set before a poor sinner with all its rich fulness, then the Spirit comes and satisfieth him that he is as free to take this rest as any sinner that ever entered upon it; it is as full for you as ever it was for any one; enter upon it by faith. You only keep yourself from rest by unbelief; enter upon it by faith, and you will find peace in your conscience; believing in the bleeding Lamb you will find holiness and happiness in your heart; looking to Jesus, and believing in him, you will go on your way rejoicing; looking unto Jesus, who is bound to keep you, and you will rest satisfied in the love of God, that he loves you from everlasting to everlasting. This is the sabbath. It is resting in Christ: and when you think of the profanation of it, how scandalously it has been abused in this Christian land, oh, how does this preach to you and me, that there are very few that enter into this spiritual rest. A man that has been brought into it by the word and by the Spirit of the living God, he cannot follow his trade of a Sunday if the laws would let him; he has better work to do, and his heart is deeply engaged in it; yea, he will take opportunities in week days; he sees people can take time for their pleasures and diversion; his pleasure and diversion is to meet his God. Oh, the sabbath is his delight: there, says he, I meet my Jesus, and have fellowship with him; there I have found the Father's love, and rested in it in my soul and heart; there the Holy Spirit has preached to my conscience and heart. There is a sabbath, infinitely beyond what you now have, remaining to the people of God. By and by you shall cease from your works, as God did from his, and then you shall rest with him. Oh this is sabbath-day work; and, therefore, as one of the fathers said of it, we abstain from bodily labour on that day, not that we may be spiritually idle, but that we may be spiritually busy. To those who do six days' hard work, really speaking, after the manner of men, it is a sort of blessing to have a day of rest; but when we see how our business gets hold of our hearts, and how some people, not even on the sabbath day, can get rid of this; when we see how the things about us distract us, and hinder us from enjoying this rest; surely, sirs, you that have entered into it, you must look upon it as an infinite privilege that God has commanded and enjoined you to meet him on this day, and has promised, that he that blessed it will bless it to you; he that sanctified it will sanctify it to you; and you can say with me, the best day of your lives has been the time when you have met God in his ordinances on his own day.

I now come to what I have to offer on the subject concerning the Christian sabbath. It is the day that our blessed Saviour finished his work and entered into this rest. They that believe in a risen Saviour, they will enter into his rest, and when they have entered into it, they will maintain it too, unless (which may be the case with some of the children of God) they may sit under legal preaching: we have all exceeding strong legal inclinations, and if a man sits under legal preaching, he will be kept in bondage; he seeks for rest in himself instead of rest in Christ. Many of the children of God are kept down by their remaining corruptions, and cannot enter into this heavenly sabbath, and others, that want to get into it, will not go the Lord's way; they get in by a forbidden way, over the wall into the sheepfold, and want to come into this rest by being perfect in the flesh; which being as contrary to all revelation as light is to darkness, it is no wonder that that which is only another name for Antinomianism, (for perfection in the flesh is no other than Antinomianism;) it is no wonder they should not enter into rest, when they get into a fool's paradise, and say, they have no more sin in them than Christ; that they have nothing but the love of God burning in their hearts; and have had it so long—forty years. Oh what dreadful delusion is that. Men and brethren, have you ever entered into this Christian sabbath? Have you, by believing in Jesus Christ, found peace in your conscience? Have you found your hearts happy? And, as God rests in his love to his people, do you rest in God's love to you in Christ? And I am as certain as I am standing up in this place, that there is not a man or woman upon the face of this earth that exercises their trade (supposing it to be a lawful trade at other times) on a Sunday—they cannot exercise their trade on a Sunday, if they are partakers of this spiritual rest; they find so much disturbance, so many things to be continually damping their enjoyments of this spiritual rest in Jesus, that it is the joy of their souls when the Lord's day returns, that they have again an opportunity of kindling their hopes afresh, and drawing out the affections of their hearts in holy love to that holy Jesus, who finished the work of the new creation, when he rose from the dead, and who finished the work of the first creation on the six days. If you have really entered into this rest, and are now happy partakers of it; you know what I am speaking, perhaps, better than I can tell you, and you know that you have an ugly thing to fight against, and there are enemies enough; you need not go to forbidden things, you need not go to profane the sabbath, you know it is your duty, privilege, and happiness, to be found in those ways, where God will subdue your unbelief, and keep under your corruptions, and by that means, help you to enter into, and enjoy more of this spiritual sabbath.

You remember, perhaps, that there is a society met together here to-day, who have joined in agreeing to support the observance of the Lord's day outwardly, (it is God's Spirit only that can help us to keep it inwardly,) and the Lord has been pleased to prosper them hitherto. I remember, about twenty-five years ago, I began such a thing, and there was something done for a year or two; but then people grew tired and fell off, and it came to nothing. If you really have entered into rest, and you would enjoy it; if you would enjoy the blessing which you now have, I would call upon you for gratitude to that God, who by believing has brought you into that Christian sabbath of rest, to lend them some of your assistance. If you have time, lend them that; if it does not suit you to lend them your time, lend them something out of your pocket, for they are at great expense; they often have very expensive prosecutions; and the design of our collection to-day is to help them in this: that, if you cannot help them with your advice, cannot give up your time to them, every one who would wish to see the Lord's day in this land restored to its primitive glory, and primitive use, all that you and I have to do with our money, is to lay a little out for this purpose. I am certain this is God's cause, and as such, recommend it to God's people: the Lord enable you to give what you can, and the Lord grant that it may be a tribute of a free-will offering.

When we look around, and see the very great profanation of this day, and how it began to spread as all infection does, one trade thought it lawful, and then another man thought it lawful, and so from one business it got to others, it was a very hard matter to know where to begin; but since I promised to recommend this charity to day, many people have come to me, and said, I hope you will recommend such a thing; what signifies putting down bakers and butchers, and such sort of people, when the greatest wickedness in this city is committed in alehouses? then another says, why don't you put down such and such things? This is but an infant society, and I am certain of this, that much good has been done. I used to go commonly twice or thrice a year through Fleet-market, and it was exactly the same on Sunday as on Saturday, perhaps not a single shop shut in the market, and every thing exposed publicly to sale. I went through yesterday se'nnight, and there was not a single shop open, nor did I see a single person anywhere loitering about the market. Surely, sirs, this is the beginning of a reformation, and certainly there is a spirit of reformation gone abroad; and when we see the outpouring of the Spirit of God upon the preached gospel; when we see multitudes come to hear, and hear of the spread that is over the kingdom, of numbers of awakened ministers, who have great work in their several parishes, all over the land, I cannot help thinking, that God has not yet done with his people, but that he has still mercy in store for us; and all people that have received the blessing in their own heart wish success to the ministry to others; and because magistrates and others regard only outward things, that we may be outwardly reformed, that then God will bless us as a nation, and that the judgments that are hanging over us may be averted. I think the stopping of the profanation of the fourth commandment may have a great blessing backwards and forwards; backwards, for I suppose it stands in the decalogue that its influence may go to the commandments before, namely, believing in God, trusting in him, and serving him according to his mind and will, and keeping holy his blessed day. Now the keeping the sabbath, is the outward means of sanctifying this day, coming to join the congregation; who knows, but when God is passing by, he may meet with you? He will not meet with you at the alehouse, he will not meet with you riding out, he will not meet with you profaning the Lord's day; but if you come to hear when Christ is passing by, who can tell but God may meet with you? If the Lord's day is kept, there will be a face of decency in outward things, and if the Lord's day be profaned, away with the substance when the shadow is gone. I believe that the profanation of the Lord's day has been one great means of outward profaneness: people complain exceedingly of their children, how very undutiful they become; why how can it be otherwise, when the father and mother go out in a one horse chaise, or a post-chaise, if they are a little higher in life, and leave their children with their servants, to do what they will on the Lord's day? And so there are complaints everywhere how bad servants are; you cannot get a servant that will last with you, but as soon as they can better themselves, (as they call it) away they go to another service, and while they are with you, they are guilty of loitering, and every thing that is detestable among servants. How can it be otherwise, when masters and mistresses set bad examples: when they go into the country, perhaps they leave their servants to themselves and to their own wicked hearts, and every thing the devil can tempt them to. If your servants were on the Lord's day bringing your children to hear, and you made your servants hear; if you made them as outwardly decent as you could, bringing them to the foot of the cross to hear of Jesus Christ, this is the way in which they would be civilized; this is the way in which their hearts would be in some measure changed. It depends upon God's Spirit to convert them in reality. I look upon all complaints of the decay of morality as taking their rise from hence, that the Lord's day is scandalously profaned, and they that ought to set the example to do good, are the first that set the example to profanation. When there is a society formed like this, the shops are shut up, the masters, mistresses, and servants who have been kept at home to attend to the business have opportunity to wait upon the worship of God, so that it is now their own fault if they do not go to church. But I have heard it very often said, oh, if they would put down all shops, I should like it, but the people tell me that if I do not serve them on Sundays, they will not deal with me in the week, therefore if it was made general, I should rejoice in it, for I want an opportunity to meet God in his service on a Sunday. Here then I look upon the observance of the Lord's day to look both backwards to the commandments before, and forwards to the precepts of the second table, and believers know, and unbelievers should hear it, that by believing we enter into the spiritual sabbath, and by unbelieving you shut yourselves out of it now, and by unbelieving you shut yourselves out of the eternal sabbath hereafter.

It is not necessary for me to say any thing more in recommending the subject; therefore I must leave it now to God, and to his almighty grace: only let me beg one thing—There may be some here, perhaps, that can help us very little either with money or with time, but there is nobody here but can help us with prayer; pray for a blessing upon this society, and beg that God may restore his sabbaths to their former use. Let me beg of you all that have the spirit of prayer to make this petition, That God will check the profaneness and outward profanation of the Lord's day, both for his own glory and the benefit of society; that the growing generation, servants and children, and all that belong to us, may be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord.

I have only a word or two of advice to give to the society, and I give it as from the same fountain from which I have been speaking all along. My brethren, I entreat you, who are entered into this work, to examine your motives: there is but one true motive, and that is, are you really set out reformed yourself; an unreformed reformer is a contradiction. Have you entered into this spiritual rest? If you have, I will tell you some of the fruits that will attend your being a member. You see a man profane the Lord's day—try all you can to stop him by scripture and argument; do not you go to convict him first, that is not scriptural, nor will a blessing follow it; tell him his fault between you and him; tell him what laws are in force, and if he does not reform, you must certainly try what the laws will do—that is your way. And when you are going about thus, and stopping any thing on the Lord's day, I would ask you seriously, have you never gone to convict a man in your own spirit? But before you begin, look up to God for his grace, that what you are going to do you might do it with meekness and gentleness, with a zeal for the glory of God; and I pray you, if you have entered into this rest, and if you are living in it, take care that you walk very humbly, and the more good you do, you will not be puffed up with pride, and say, Here is a society that has done what all others have failed in; the Society for the Reformation of Manners was nothing like ours: oh, no, if you have entered into rest, the more you do, the more humble and the more thankful you will be: you will bless God that he should make use of such poor creatures as you for the noble purpose of magnifying his name. Pray do, sirs, examine with what spirit you go to convict people, how you set about it, and if you succeed, whether God gets the glory or no. Oh that the Lord may make you eminent yourselves for every good word and work; and, as you are set about this hard work, you must expect that people will say hard things of you. There is no reformation begun but what is against the grain, against the sense of the people, and especially when against their interest; therefore arm yourselves with the grace and power of God, whatever you go about, whatever you suffer (for you will suffer) the Lord grant that you may do all you do with humility. I have only to beg of God, that as there is but a very little time left for some of you who are in this society, and very, very little time left for some of us to keep our sabbath below—oh that God may increase our faith! The Lord grant that we may every day live in keeping the sabbath, and only rest unto the Lord in our hearts; so that when death comes, we may fall asleep in the Lord, and enter upon that sabbath which remaineth for the people of God. You will live happy, you will die happy. You will be happy for ever and ever, who by believing this day, have entered into rest. Oh that God may bless it to your hearts, bless it to the society, bless it to all that are here present, that we may really and truly know what that spiritual rest is, which believers find in the bosom of God's love to his children!

AN EARNEST INVITATION TO THE FRIENDS OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH,

TO JOIN

WITH SEVERAL OF THEIR BRETHREN, CLERGY AND LAITY, IN LONDON, IN SETTING APART ONE HOUR OF EVERY WEEK FOR PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION, DURING THE PRESENT TROUBLESOME TIMES.

Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me — Psalm l. 15.

PREFACE.

1. In the beginning of the last war, Providence seemed to take part with our enemies. We wanted unanimity in our public councils, and success in our public measures. One miscarriage followed another. Our national courage ceased to exert itself; and a general dejection of spirits ensued. At this time several clergymen of the established church agreed to meet at the throne of grace on the Lord's day. The subject of their joint prayers was to ask the blessing of God upon our public councils, our fleets, and our armies. They were soon joined by a great number of the laity in most parts of the kingdom. Afterwards, several praying societies were formed for the very same purpose in Germany, and especially in Hanover. In the spirit of prayer and supplication they humbled themselves before the Lord; they sought success at his hands; and he was gracious to their requests: he sent victory after victory, until our enemies were willing to be at peace, and then they gave him unfeigned thanks, and ascribed all the glory to his goodness and power.

2. The principles upon which they then acted were these:—They believed in the being of God, the Lord and Maker of all worlds. They acknowledged his providence over his works; for he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth. His kingdom ruleth over all—every person and every thing; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What dost thou?

3. They believed also, that in the course of his providence he acts by an infinitely wise rule, which he has made known to us in the holy scriptures. He is the Almighty Creator and sovereign Lord of mankind; and he has given them a law, which is holy, just, and good. Every tittle of it is not only for his glory, but also for their profit. He has secured obedience to it by promises and threatenings; neither of which can fail. His word cannot be broken, either to the obedient or disobedient. According to his revealed will, his love infallibly follows the one, and his justice the other.

4. This is true of societies, as well as of private persons. Sin is alike the transgression of the law, and deserves, in many or in few, the threatened punishment; but, according to the number, it becomes more poisonous; because it spreads its infection by example. When the multitude agree to do evil, the restraint of shame is taken off. If the times should favour them through much luxury and great licentiousness, they harden one another in sin. Then general dissipation and false pleasure take possession of the heart. These hinder the mind from being cultivated with any profitable knowledge. The sound principles of religion become neglected, and as these grow out of fashion, immoral practices must prevail; the authority of God is cast off; his word, his sabbaths, his ordinances, are first disused; and then, by degrees, despised. Thus infidelity gets deeper root, and immorality, which is its natural fruit, becomes luxuriant. The restraint of the divine law being taken away, human laws lose their force upon the conscience; for when the fear of God is gone, there is no motive left sufficient to influence the heart or conduct: men will then venture to sin without any sense of danger, even of death itself. And when national sin is come to this height, God has declared in his word, and by the constant course of his providence has made it manifest, that he will interpose to maintain the honour of his law and government. When men have thus deeply corrupted themselves, he will remember their iniquity; he will visit their sins: "Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord: shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?"

5. When God arises to vindicate his authority, he is never at a loss for means. All creatures are ready to execute his judgments, which are the more fearful, because, in his hands, irresistible. Among them war is one of the most severe and desolating: it is one of the sore visitations of God, as Ezek. xiv. 21, which does not come by chance, but by his command; and he sends it, Amos ix. 4, to plead his controversy. It is the just appointment of his providence to vindicate his broken law, and his despised government. It is his wise interposition, either to correct for those things, or to destroy. When it is the loving rod of correction, it humbles; it brings the sinner upon his knees; he repents, he turns from the error of his ways, and is reformed by the visitation. When it comes to punish, he gives warning before the blow; but the people sin on; they fear not the sword, nor him who sent it: then it vindicates the righteous quarrel of the Lord upon impenitent sinners. It strikes at every thing truly valuable—liberty, property, yea, life itself. This scourge is now sent, and felt; sent by the Divine Providence, and felt, yea sorely complained of, but not as it should be; not with submission to the justice of the visitation, but with murmuring; not with turning from sin, but with returning to it with more hardiness and greater greediness.

6. This was our situation when we entered upon the war in 1756. Considering ourselves as Christian ministers, we saw our duty, and what part it became us to act, as good citizens. We had read the promises of God made to those who at such times seek his help and implore his blessing. We had seen those promises fulfilled; we in earnest pursued the means of his own appointing; and we met with the desired end: he humbled us at his footstool; we asked pardon for our national departure from the living God; we implored his mercy through Christ; and he heard prayer, he answered prayer, and we glorified him.

7. The use of the same means is now again recommended (Dec. 1778); the same occasion calls for it; and we have the same encouragement. The promises and the examples in scripture warrant us to expect the same success. May the spirit of grace and supplication be poured out abundantly upon ministers and people, that multitudes may use the means, until God send us a blessed issue! yea, may he turn to us in mercy, and turn us as a people unto himself, with repentance and faith! The cloud may be dark which hangs over our heads; it may threaten a destroying storm; it may spread blacker, and look more dreadful; yet prayer can pierce through the cloud; the prayer of faith can gain admittance into his presence who has his way in the whirlwind, and who presides over the storm. The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous was heard; the cloud was dispersed; and the face of the heavens again serene and peaceful. Oh for another army of such supplicants! What cannot they do, calling for, and trusting to, the help of the Almighty? This is our spiritual armour, and more useful than the arm of flesh; nay, as many use the one as use the other. And, now the hosts are gone forth against the enemy, may we at home follow them and aid them with our prayers, never ceasing, until God restore peace to the earth, and good will between us and all our public enemies!

The following little tract was made very useful in all the former wars, from the year 1756, and has gone through a great number of editions. I have been called upon by some persons, on whose judgment I depend, to reprint it, in hopes the same blessing may attend it. How greatly is it to be wished that it may stir up thousands to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and to seek his help in this time of need. If we do it in earnest, we need not despair. The same means will bring about the same end. May we use the means, and pray on, till God shall hear and answer!

W. Romaine.

My Christian Brother.—God has declared that when a land sins against him by trespassing grievously, then he will stretch out his hand upon it, and visit it with his four sore judgments—the sword, the famine, the noisome beast, and the pestilence. These he sends to punish the land for its grievous trespasses. He has visited us with some of his sore judgments; and therefore our land has trespassed grievously. And if we continue to provoke him, and refuse to receive correction, he will continue these punishments; and it is to be feared, if we remain hardened and impenitent under them, he will at last give us over to the destroyer.

The present circumstances of our public affairs are exceedingly awful and alarming. Our danger is confessedly great. Our enemies are many and mighty, and our numerous sins are in their interest. Every sin helps them to destroy us; and God has been thus far on our enemies' side. He has been by them punishing our sins; and yet, with a strange infatuation, we sin on securely, as if we did not apprehend that continuance in sin would certainly cause the continuance of our calamities. And dreadful it is to see how ineffectual all the former judgments have been to reform us. Still our people refuse to deny themselves their diversions and their vices. And the season of the year is come when, without any reformation at home, we are going to send out our fleets and armies against our enemies abroad, vainly flattering ourselves with hopes of success, while our sins set God at defiance and make him continue to fight against us with his almighty power.

If, then, our people have not been reclaimed by past judgments, and consequently greater must be expected, what is to be done? What can true believers do, but use their interest with God in prayer? We have no other expedient left.

If our people will not plead with God for themselves, let us plead for them. Our encouragement is great; we have many sweet promises in scripture to rely upon. There is one in Solomon's prayer, which suits our case exactly, 2 Chron. vi. 24, 25: "And if thy people Israel be put to the worse before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee, and shall return and confess thy name, and pray, and make supplication before thee in this house, then hear thou from the heavens, and forgive the sins of thy people." There never was an instance wherein God acted contrary to the method here mentioned. Whenever a people turned to him, and confessed their sins, he turned away from his fierce anger. If they called upon him in the day of trouble, he heard and answered. If they put their trust in him, he maintained their cause.

Several ministers of the established church, from the consideration of our danger, and seeing no remedy more effectual than prayer and supplication, have resolved to spend part of every Lord's day in this holy exercise. They have chosen this day, partly for the sake of the day itself, being a day sacred to religion, and because they wanted to have the joint prayers of those persons, who might be hindered on other days, but who were now entirely free from worldly avocations: and they have chosen to spend from eight to nine o'clock in the evening, because it is the time that could be best spared from the duties of the day, and because, after attending upon public worship, the mind would be better disposed for private worship; prayer, and the word, and the sacraments, having put the soul into a proper frame to humble itself before God; first for its own sins, and then for the sins of the nation. We earnestly request our brethren of the established church, and all our fellow-christians, to join with us in this religious design. It is a seasonable and a pious request that we make: and we hope no person, who has the spirit of prayer, and who is a lover of the protestant religion, and of our establishment, will be prevented by any slothful or needless excuse from offering up his petitions along with ours at the appointed hour; but that all the faithful servants of God, in every part of the land, will be, at the same time, as one congregation, presenting their prayers before the throne of grace. Oh how much to be desired, how good and joyful a thing would it be, to see brethren thus praying together in unity! May God put it into the hearts both of ministers and people thus to pray in sweet agreement, at one time, and with one heart, until God hear and answer, and deliver this church and kingdom out of their dangers and troubles.

The first part of the duty which is incumbent upon us at this time consists in humbling ourselves before God, under a deep sense of those sins which have provoked him to send down so many heavy judgments upon our land, in confessing those sins with a godly sorrow, and in turning from them with a repentance not to be repented of. And that we may all be stirred up to a due discharge of this duty, we should be fully persuaded that our public calamities come from our sins. God is angry at nothing but sin. Every man therefore should look into his own heart, and see what great reason God has to be angry with him, and accordingly to humble himself under the mighty hand of God, that he may pardon him and exalt him in due time.

Let each of us, then, at the appointed hour, retire from the world, and in the presence and before the footstool of the sovereign Creator and Redeemer, examine what grounds and reasons we have for deep humiliation. And,

First, We have great reason to mourn and be afflicted before him for the sinfulness of our nature, which is the fruitful parent of all our actual sins. We have corrupted ourselves in every faculty of soul and body; and the sight and feeling of this corruption should give us the most humbling views of our sinful, lost, and helpless condition: for by this fault and corruption of nature every man, naturally engendered of the offspring of Adam, is not only far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the spirit, but also deserveth God's wrath and damnation. How can we believe ourselves to be thus conceived and born in sin—thus by nature the children of God's wrath—and not be deeply humbled? What can be matter of greater humiliation than to consider how low we are fallen, that we have lost original righteousness, have lost the image of God, have lost his love and favour and grace, and have lost all hope, as to any thing we can do, of his glory? Let us, then, begin with lamenting the sinfulness of our nature, which is the fountain of all sin. Let us beg of God to cleanse it by the blood of Jesus, and to renew us daily by the grace of the Holy Spirit, that we may put off the sinful nature, the old man with his deeds, and may put on the new man, which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness.

Secondly, we have great reason to be humbled for the sinfulness of our lives. God requires nothing of us but what is for his glory and for our happiness. His law is holy, just, and good: but how often have we broken it in thought, word, and deed! how presumptuously, after so many solemn vows and resolutions, against the light of conscience, against the light of the gospel; ungratefully, after receiving numerous mercies; hardened in sin, after being visited with heavy judgments! Who amongst us is not deep in guilt in these respects? Let us look back upon our past lives, and remember wherein we have particularly offended. Let us recollect our sins of commission against God's holy law, and our sins of omission, with the aggravating circumstances attending them; and then, considering how injurious the least of these things was to the glory of God, let us be humbled to the very dust: for the scripture is clear and express, "that we have all sinned, and come short of the glory of God;" we have robbed him of his glory. Now it is our duty, as Christians, to live to the glory of God, and to have a single eye to his glory, even in the common affairs of life, when we eat or drink, or whatever we do. Have we, then, at all times, and in all things, had a single eye to God's glory? Oh! guilty, guilty, must we all plead to this charge; with shame and confusion of face must we confess that we have not spent all our lives to God's glory: seldom have we had an eye to it; and when we had, very rarely have we indeed promoted it. And, after we have thus taken an humbling view of our sinful nature, and of our sinful lives,

Thirdly, Let the consideration of our national wickedness humble us still lower before God. Christianity is the religion professed in this country. Ours is a reformed church. We are a free people. God continues to us the light of his gospel. We have his word and his ordinances, and all the blessings of the establishment. We are highly favoured above all the nations on the earth. Now, to whom much is given, of them men always require the more; and so does God. He requires more of the professors of Christianity than of the ignorant heathen. But do we make him more returns of love and obedience than they do? Look around the kingdom, and judge. You will find in several parts of this land as great ignorance of the life and power of Christianity as in the deserts of Africa. What distant corner of the kingdom has not heard the blaspheming tongue speaking treason against God our Saviour? And where is the happy village free from open and scandalous immoralities? Here is our condemnation, that light is come into the world, and shines among us, and yet we love darkness rather than light. This makes our sins exceeding sinful, that Christ came to destroy the works of the devil, and yet they abound among us. To repeat these works by name would be tiresome; to aggravate them is impossible. Open your eyes, you see them covering our land like a deluge. Open your ears; you can scarce hear any thing but cursing, lying, and evil speaking. Go where you will, you meet with sin at noon-day. It has thrown off restraint, and is not afraid to appear without a mask. Yea, sins abominable to nature are heard of in our land; and there are too many men among us who refuse to believe that God ever rained down fire and brimstone from heaven, and miraculously destroyed certain horrible monsters of sin. Stop, and consider whether these things be so. If they be, have we not great reason for humiliation? Ought we not to be humbled for our national wickedness, and still more humbled for that, having so many means of reformation graciously vouchsafed to us, we not only continue wicked, but also are hardened, and thereby grow worse and worse.

While we are thus mourning for the wickedness of our people, let us never forget that we ourselves are part of the people, and that our sinfulness has made a large addition to the national guilt. Let us never lose sight of this consideration, lest we should find matter for censoriousness where we only want matter of humiliation. The sight of our sins, as part of the sins of the nation, will serve to keep us in a proper frame to profit from the Fourth humbling circumstance we have to mention; namely, that God is now visiting us for our public sins. This is the scope and design of his present judgments: and shall we not be humbled under his almighty hand? He has shown himself offended at our sins, and has chastised us for them as a nation. Hereby he would teach us this useful lesson, that we should turn to him with a national repentance, if we hope to be pardoned and saved. If we now humble ourselves before him, his former chastisements will be turned into blessings: but if, after often being chastised, we refuse to glorify him by our humiliation, he will certainly be glorified in our destruction. If the rod of his mercy does not humble us, the scourge of his justice shall destroy us. Humbled we have not been by any of God's past judgments; therefore we have reason to fear greater: for if, being chastised for sin, we nevertheless will not leave it, what can we expect but to be cut off in our sins? This has been the constant method of God's providence in his dealings with private persons, as well as with public communities. Fearful is that sentence which is already gone out of the Lord's mouth. Oh that it may strike fear into every careless sinner who hears it! "He that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Prov. xxix. 1. We have often been reproved; and yet we have hardened our necks. What, then, should hinder sudden destruction from coming upon us, and that without remedy? Let this awful consideration stir us up to plead earnestly with God for the hardness of the people's hearts. Let us be deeply humbled for these obstinate sinners who refuse to be humbled for themselves; and let us beg of God to spare them. Spare thy people, O Lord! spare them, and give not thine heritage over to reproach.

Let us lay all these things together, and see whether there be not matter enough for the deepest humiliation. We are altogether sinful in nature, sinful in life, a country professing Christianity, and yet abounding with sin, and hardened in it at this very time, when God is chastising and punishing us for our sins. He has given us, during this unsuccessful war, some severe chastisements; but they have not brought us to a right sense of ourselves, and therefore we may expect they will be more severe. God has shown us plainly that he is not on our side, and we have felt his displeasure; but we are not humbled under it. Without humiliation, he will continue to fight against us: and what calamity is there so great, which we may not then justly apprehend? What success can we hope from our fleets and armies, if the Almighty go out against them? What is our security, as an island, if he put it into the hearts of our enemies, and if he come with them, to invade us? In this case, how exceedingly should we be alarmed to think that our sins may provoke God to join with our enemies and give them success. Every thing dear and valuable to Englishmen and Protestants would then be lost; heathenism and slavery would get possession of our religion and liberties. While God threatens us with these calamities, he gives us time to pray against them. While they are at a distance, prayer is our weapon, and God seems now to put it into our hands. Oh that we may use it aright to his glory, and to the preservation of this church and kingdom!

My Christian brother, after you have weighed these things attentively, judge whether it be not a seasonable and a safe measure which we would persuade you to take. And you will take it, if you are indeed a friend to our present happy establishment in church and state. Your love for them will put you upon doing every thing that lays in your power to serve them: and here you have a fair opportunity, which, if you make use of it, cannot but do you service, and may be a blessing to them. Pray for them at the appointed hour. Determine, through God's assistance, that nothing shall hinder you from joining us. Break through all engagements, all hindrances, to meet the Lord's people at the throne of grace. And for your encouragement, remember that he who sitteth upon the throne is the God who heareth prayer, and who has invited you to call upon him in the day of trouble: "So will I hear thee," says he, "and thou shalt glorify me."

If it has pleased God to put it into the heart of any person who reads these few lines to make part of this praying congregation, and he is at a loss to know particularly what he should ask of God, let him first beg of the Father of mercies to give him the spirit of prayer and supplication, that he may offer up his petitions acceptably through Jesus Christ our Lord. And then let him request the grace of humiliation, that he may be truly and deeply affected with the four particulars before mentioned. Let him pray to God to give him still more humbling views of his sinful nature, and to bring to his remembrance his sinful life, with the sinfulness of his sins, that, seeing himself to be nothing but vile and sinful dust and ashes, he may be disposed to mourn for his own sins, and then for the crying sins of this guilty land, and for the hardness and impenitency of our people's hearts, upon which the heavy judgments of God have as yet made no impression. And then let him implore mercy, first for himself, and afterwards for the nation, through the atoning blood of the Lamb of God. Earnestly let him plead with the Father, that for the sake of his dear Son he would give us grace to turn from our sins by true repentance, that iniquity may not be our ruin. And although the past judgments have not reclaimed us, yet let him pray the more fervently for the gift of the Holy Spirit, that his grace may be poured out abundantly upon us, to show us the error of our ways, and to revive the spirit and power of Christianity, that we may receive Christ Jesus the Lord as our Saviour, by the merits of whose most precious blood we may be saved from the guilt and punishment of sin, and by whose almighty grace we may also be saved from the dominion of sin, that, being thus delivered by him from the hands of our enemies, we may serve God without fear in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life.

In these our requests, let us never forget to pray for the preservation of the protestant church, and all its members throughout Europe, and especially for the peace of our established church, and for all orders and degrees of its ministers, beseeching God to give them his grace and heavenly benediction, that both by their life and doctrine they may set forth his glory, and set forward the salvation of all men. And to the end there may never be wanting such persons in the church, let us pray for all seminaries of Christian education, especially for the two universities. May the Spirit of wisdom preside over them, and water them with the dew of his heavenly grace, that the youth educated in them may come forth to the work of the Lord, fitted with all proper graces as well as gifts! And, since the harvest is now great, may the Lord of the harvest send forth more of his own labourers!

May the God of love dispose us also to pray fervently for all the protestant dissenting congregations, which love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. May he shed that love abroad in all our souls which alone can effectually free us from party spirit: and may he thus reconcile our hearts to them, and theirs to us. Oh that we may see an end of those bitter disputes which have so long disturbed the peace and hindered the union of protestants; and may there be only this one holy contention between us, whether the ministers out of the establishment, or we in it, shall labour most for the glory of our common Lord, and for the salvation of those souls for whom he shed his blood!

And as the hearts of kings are in the hand of God, we must pray him to direct the heart of our gracious sovereign lord, King George, to do what will be for the glory of God, and for the good of his people, beseeching the Almighty to enrich him with every temporal and with every spiritual blessing, until he place upon his head a crown of eternal glory.

Let us also pray for the Queen, for the Prince of Wales, and for all the Royal Family, that God would endue them with his Holy Spirit, and enrich them with his heavenly grace; that he would prosper them with all happiness, and bring them to his everlasting kingdom.

And let us desire the Spirit of wisdom to direct both houses of parliament, all the king's counsellors, and judges, and all the magistrates throughout the kingdom, and to enable them faithfully to discharge the great trust reposed in them for the punishment of wickedness and vice, and for the maintenance of God's true religion and virtue.

Let us beg of God now to go forth with our fleets and armies, and to give them success against our enemies in this war, in which we are engaged. And let us pray him to bless our officers, and soldiers, and sailors, and to protect them in all dangers, and to cover their heads in the day of battle. And let us earnestly and heartily pray for their reformation, and also for a reformation at home, without which we cannot expect success from our arms abroad. May the Spirit of the living God work upon the hardened hearts of our people, and soften them by his grace, that they may see the error of their ways, and cry for mercy before it be too late; and may they find it through the atoning blood of the Lamb of God. Oh that there may be a general turning to the Lord; and may our eyes live to see it. Amen. So be it, Lord Jesus.

These short hints may be enlarged and improved, as time and occasion shall offer. My Christian brother, may the Spirit of the living God direct thee how to enlarge and to improve them. And after thou hast once begun, and hast spent some evenings of the Lord's day in this devout exercise, be upon thy guard lest thou shouldst be tempted to leave it off. Never be tired of such a good work. Pray for the Spirit of grace and supplication, and carry thy prayers into practice. The more thou prayest, the more will God make thee joyful in the exercise of prayer. Go on in his strength, and persevere. Hold on thy suit, and wait upon the Lord our God, until he have mercy upon us. Be not weary of joining with us; and in God's due time thou hast his promise; "thou shalt reap, if thou faint not." Lord, grant none of us, who set out well, may faint, until we who sow our prayers, and they who reap the fruit of them, may rejoice together here, in the peace and reformation of our land, and hereafter, through Jesus Christ our Lord, in eternal glory. Amen.

AN ALARM TO A CARELESS WORLD:

A DISCOURSE

OCCASIONED BY THE LATE EARTHQUAKES, PREACHED NOVEMBER 30, 1755, BEING THE FIRST SUNDAY IN ADVENT, AT ST. DUNSTAN'S IN THE WEST.

Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh.—Matt. xxv. 13.

PREFACE.

Dr. Sherlock, Bishop of London, in his letter concerning the late earthquakes, has these words:—"As to you, my brethren of the clergy, who share with me the care of the souls in these populous cities, let me exhort you (though I trust you want not to be exhorted) to awaken the people, to call them from the lethargy in which they have too long lived, and make them see their own danger. Speak to them, persuade them, as knowing the terrors of the Lord. Speak to their hearts and consciences with such plainness as becomes the ministers of the gospel: tell them in season and out of season, that unless they repent, they must perish. If the warnings we have had are a call to the people to repentance, remember they are still stronger calls on us to preach repentance, and to discharge the duty we owe to God and his church, and to the flock of Christ over whom we are placed. May this work of God prosper in our hands!" Amen, say I. This advice is worthy of a Christian bishop, and I wish all the clergy in England would follow it. I have endeavoured to follow it in this plain discourse, and although it was drawn up and printed in a hurry, yet it is seasonable and necessary. The design of it was to rouse careless sinners out of their lethargy, and the necessity of calling upon them is now evident. I waited, while the former editions were selling, to see how they would be affected with the desolation which God hath wrought in the earth. But they are not alarmed. They lay it not to heart, but go on secure in the ways of sin, as if no such dreadful providence could befal them. They fortify themselves in their security by several very absurd opinions, which only to mention is to confute.

It is one very prevailing opinion, that earthquakes are not common in this country. They are not. But the less common they are, the more should they alarm us when they come; for there is a providence over this country, and when He orders, our land shall shake and reel like a drunkard. He sent two earthquakes lately, to stir us up to repentance; and he who sent these can send a third, and London may share the fate of Lisbon.

It is another opinion, that earthquakes are the effects of second causes. Be it so. Then there is a first cause on whom they depend.

But the learned can give a philosophical account of them. What! such an account, I suppose, as they did of the earthquakes in the year 1750, by changing their names into airquakes, and then they were explained philosophically. It will not be so easy to account for the shaking of the land for several hundred miles, and of the sea for several thousands at once, which was the case in these last earthquakes. What natural cause will they assign equal to this effect?

There is another opinion, from which men promise themselves security, and that is the great wickedness of the Portuguese. Doubtless they were sinners, but not above all the inhabitants of the earth. We rival them in immorality, and we exceed them in infidelity. They were cut off in judgment. We are spared in mercy. From their punishment if we take no warning, we shall be greater sinners than they could be: for if neither the goodness of God can soften our hardened hearts, nor his judgments terrify us, then we may fear, that when he draws the sword of justice, we, who would not cry for mercy at such a time as this, shall receive judgment without mercy.

Careless sinners may flatter themselves with notions of safety, but unless they leave their sins they cannot be safe. While the Almighty is their enemy, they can have no peace. May he open their eyes to see this truth practically, that they may find the necessity of being at peace with God. The way and means thereto is to sue for mercy through Jesus Christ by faith and repentance: but there is such a general and violent opposition to this method of reformation, that we have more to fear from the anger of God against this dreadful sin, than even from the trembling of the earth under us. May the prayers and humiliation of the righteous avert the judgments of God due to this and all the other crying sins of this kingdom.

Prepare to meet thy God.—Amos iv. 12.

The church calls upon us, by the present solemnity, to bring into our most serious thoughts the advent of our blessed Lord in the flesh, when he came to visit us in great humility. He appeared upon earth in the character of a meek, suffering, dying Saviour. But there is another advent not far off, when all flesh shall see him in the majesty of the Godhead. His first advent was in the lowest humiliation, his second advent will be in the highest exaltation. And we wait for that great day, when he will come again in his glorious majesty to judge both the quick and the dead, hoping to be found, when he comes, watching and praying, that we may rise with him to the life immortal.

We do not pretend to know the precise time of his coming: for of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man; but the Judge himself has given us some signs and marks, by which we might be as certain, that he is nigh and standeth before the door, as that summer is nigh, when the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs. And whenever we see these scripture signs and marks, it is our office and duty, as faithful watchmen, to give you notice, that you may be ready, lest your Lord should come in a day when ye look not for him, and in a hour that ye are not aware of, and should cut you asunder, and appoint you your portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. On this account, the subject appointed by the church for this day falls in seasonably with these remarkable providences, which have been lately manifested in this and other countries. And I have therefore chosen a scripture proper to awaken your attention to the second advent of Christ. It is exceedingly awful and solemn. The very reading of it must make a deep impression upon every serious mind. "Prepare to meet thy God," the eternal and almighty God, who is coming in all his glory to judgment; and if the righteous scarcely be saved in that great day, where shall the wicked and the infidel appear? They will then have no excuse for their sins—self-condemned they will stand with guilt and horror before his tribunal, to hear their sentence of condemnation passed, which is never, never to be reversed. So that unless an eternity of pain and misery be the best thing we can work out in our short life, we should now think of making some provision for an eternity of happiness. We should now be preparing to meet our God. As we must meet him soon, it should be our whole business to get ready and to be prepared, that whenever he comes, we may enter in with him into the joy of our Lord. This is the instruction which I shall draw from the text, "Prepare to meet thy God."

First, We here learn that God our Saviour, who once came in great humility to visit us, is now preparing to meet us in judgment. And

Secondly, We should therefore be prepared to meet him. And

Thirdly, I shall endeavour to stir you up to the true gospel preparation, that whenever our Saviour comes, you may lift up your heads with joy, knowing that your redemption draweth nigh. And May the ever blessed Spirit, from whom the preparation must come, assist us with his grace, that our meditation first upon our Saviour's preparing to meet us in judgment, may be the means of preparing us to meet him. "Prepare to meet thy God." The suffering Jesus was united to the eternal God, and so united, that as the reasonable soul and flesh are one man, so God and man are one Christ. At his first coming he visited us in great humility, and the Godhead was veiled under a covering of flesh, but at his second coming all flesh shall see that Jesus is God indeed. Every eye shall then behold the divine glory of the suffering Saviour, and they who once pierced him at his bitter passion, or since with their horrid blasphemies, shall then confess to their everlasting shame, that he is the almighty God of heaven and earth. On this account we should be prepared to meet him. At the time appointed he came to suffer for the sins of the world, and at the time appointed he will come to judgment. His second advent is as certain as his first. It was foretold in the Old Testament, and promised in the New, and the scriptures cannot be broken. God had revealed it in the clearest manner to the patriarchs, so that Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, saying, "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds, which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches, which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." The father of the faithful knew that he was to come to execute judgment upon all, and speaks with confidence, "shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" And Job had the same holy confidence, when he made his supplication to his judge; and the solemnity of his coming to judgment, Solomon, being a prophet, foresaw, and has plainly described it in these words, "God shall bring every work into judgment with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." And the judge himself has given us a very circumstantial description in three of the evangelists, of the process of the great day, and has called upon us again and again, to be always ready and prepared for it. His apostles argue from the certainty of our appearing before the judgment-seat of Christ, and frequently make use of these terrors of the Lord to persuade men to faith and repentance. And there is a very remarkable circumstance, which gives great weight to these authorities; when our Lord is describing the general judgment, he confirms his account with a promise, that he would come to judge the Jewish nation, before that generation should pass away. Accordingly he came; and there has not a tittle failed of what he foretold concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, or concerning the dispersion of the Jews over the face of the earth. It is then a matter of fact, that he has already acted as judge, and he will come to complete his office. It is not more certain that the sun will rise to-morrow, than that he who judged the Jewish nation, will soon come to judge the whole earth. His second advent is fixed and determined to the fulness of time, as well as the first was. He will come in his glorious majesty at the last day. And, in the mean time, he comes with many signal strokes of vengeance to awaken a careless, sleepy world. He visits the inhabitants of the earth with his judgments, that they may learn righteousness; and he has lately visited us with some of his heaviest judgments, and I hope many of you have been stirred up by them to prepare to meet your God. And it is high time we should be all prepared: for the marks and signs of his second advent are fulfilling daily. His coming cannot be far off. The day, indeed, and the hour, are not known; but if you compare the uncommon events, which our Lord says were to be the fore-runners of his coming to judgment, with what hath lately happened in the world, you must conclude, that the time is at hand. He foretells us, that there should then be wars, and rumours of wars: and are there not wars, and rumours of more wars? There were to be pestilences, and we have had the pestilence for more than ten years in this kingdom. There were to be great earthquakes in diverse places, and there have been earthquakes lately in many parts of the world, and in a far greater number than they ever were in any other age. And these earthquakes were to be attended with fearful sights; and did not many fearful sights in the element attend the two last earthquakes we had in this city? But the worst sign of all is the present decay of religion among us: this renders the rest more terrible, and makes it to be feared, that as we are ripe for destruction, so we may soon expect to have our candlestick removed; "for when the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith upon the earth," says Christ. There will be so little, that he shall scarce find any. The true saving faith will be diminished from among the children of men; and it has for some time been banished out of the popish countries, and the reformed churches have lately fallen sadly from the faith, and have preserved very little more of Christianity than the mere name: and in our own church we have kept up the form of godliness, but we are so far from having the power, that we deny any person can have it, and the few who say they have it are treated as madmen and enthusiasts. These are some of the infallible signs of our Lord's second advent. From them we are assured that it is not at a great distance. When we behold the fig-tree and all the trees shooting forth, then we know that summer is near; and so likewise, when we see these things come to pass, we know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. It will not be long before the Son of man will come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory; and because we are assured that he will come soon, and yet know not the day nor the hour, we should therefore be always waiting with watchfulness and prayer. Our Lord required us to be always in this devout frame of mind, when he closed the volume of revelation with these words, "Surely I come quickly;" surely, says the almighty Judge, I come quickly to judgment. To which the faithful reply, "Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus." Happy would it be for us all, if we were so well prepared to meet our God, that when we see the signs of his coming speedily, and hear him promise, surely I come quickly, then we might give our "Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus." And are you, then, my brethren, not only ready, but also praying, for his coming? Do you wait for it with faith, and are you looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ? If you are in this happy state, then you can cry out with joy, Lord, we believe the promises, and we see the signs of thy speedy coming, even so, come Lord Jesus. But if you are not in this happy state, then I proceed,

Secondly, To show that since Christ will soon come to judgment, you ought therefore to be prepared to meet your God. He will come in all the glory of the Godhead, attended with the multitude of the heavenly host, and before him shall be gathered all nations. Every one of us must appear before his tribunal. We must meet the almighty God in judgment, when he cometh to take vengeance of his adversaries: and ought we not to be prepared for this awful meeting? We cannot resist the Almighty, we cannot fly from his presence, we cannot conceal one secret thought from him; and is it not then our interest to make the almighty Judge our friend? "For what king going to make war against another king, sitteth not down first, and consulteth whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand; or else, while the other is yet a great way off, he sendeth an ambassage, and desireth conditions of peace." When the King of kings cometh against you, armed with his omnipotence, you can have no hopes of safety, but in desiring conditions of peace. Your only way is to submit, and to try to make him your friend. Then you will be safe. So soon as you have secured the friendship of the sovereign Judge, and are under the protection of his almighty power, then you are prepared to meet him in judgment; and, therefore, since this preparation is the principal business of life, we ought to labour to secure his friendship, as the means to it. And how then shall we make him our friend? Sin made him our enemy, and it is the guilt of sin in the conscience, which makes his coming to judgment terrible, and will make the eternal punishment of sin terrible indeed. Take away sin, and God is reconciled. Let the soul be cleansed from the pollution, and the conscience purged from the guilt, of sin, and there will no fear remain of condemnation. The Judge will then be the Saviour, and we shall have no dread of his judgment, having already received the blessings of his salvation.

The gospel has proposed a plain method of bringing the mind into this happy state, and it is generally effected in the following manner. While the sinner lies secure in sin, he cannot be prepared to meet his God. He must be awakened. He must be deeply convinced of his guilt and danger, and under the sense of them, he must be humbled to the very dust. These are the first steps towards his preparation. The Holy Spirit has now opened his eyes, and he sees his lost, ruined condition. He beholds the God of nature at enmity with him, and all the powers of nature combined to destroy him, and if he be ever saved, it must be all free mercy: for in himself he is miserable and helpless, and therefore not daring to look up unto heaven, he smites upon his breast, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Under these convictions he labours, which though painful for a time, yet being the door and entrance into salvation, are therefore a blessing, and the greater blessing, as they are the general way by which God brings sinners unto himself: for the deeper and more distressing these convictions of sin are, the greater necessity will the sinner find of mercy, and the more earnestly will he seek, until he obtain it. And he has the infallible promise of God to encourage his seeking, "blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." In God's own good time he begins to find his interest in this promise: he has faith given him to apply it to himself: he sees his interest in the righteousness of Jesus Christ, and has the love of God shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost, giving him all joy and peace in believing. And the sense of this pardoning love casteth out fear: for now as his faith grows, so does he with comfort know that Jesus Christ is his Saviour and his God: he finds daily proof of it in the change of his life and conversation, not walking now by sight, but by faith. His will is now become renewed, and he loves and delights to do the will of God in the inward man. He has grace and strength given him to run the way of his commandments, now his heart is set at liberty. Thus walking with God, his reconciled Father in Jesus, and trusting to his grace and strength, he will be found watching and praying, whenever his Lord comes, and will therefore be always ready and prepared to go forth to meet him.

In this method the Holy Spirit prepares us to meet our God: he first convinces us of our sinful state, in which we are at enmity with God, and are not prepared to meet him; and then he convinces us of our reconciliation with him, of which we have the witness of the word, together with the witness of the Spirit, bearing his testimony with our spirits, that we are the children of God, and we have the outward witness of our lives and conversations, which we are enabled by faith to direct according to the rule of God's commandments. And then we need not doubt of our interest in the almighty Judge: for he has washed us from our sins in his blood, and has clothed us with his all-perfect righteousness, and having thus saved us from our sins, we are thereby saved from the fear of judgment. And what have we then to fear? Our Saviour is our Judge—his omnipotence is our protection—he comes in all his glory to take us up with him into his heaven, and to make us partakers of his everlasting joys. Blessed and for ever blessed are they, who are thus prepared to meet their God.

And are you, then, my brethren, prepared in this manner? Have you secured the friendship of the Judge, so that whenever he comes you are ready to meet him? An eternity of happiness or misery depends on your preparation, and therefore I hope the vast importance of the subject will command your attention, while I am endeavouring, under the Third and last head, to apply what has been said, as a motive to stir you up to be always prepared to meet your God. You have heard the character of the Judge. He is the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity—the Lord of Hosts is his name. He is the almighty Creator of all things visible and invisible—when he spake the word, they were made. He commanded, and they stood fast. His providence ruleth over them all, and he upholdeth them by the word of his power. And this eternal, infinite, and almighty God, hath appointed a day, wherein he will be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. Such is the glorious majesty of the Judge! And are you prepared to meet him? Have you no fear nor dread in your minds, if he should come this night? If you should this moment hear the loud trump of God calling the world to judgment, and should see the Lord of heaven and earth coming with thousands and ten thousands of angels and saints, how would it affect you? Consider whether you could stand the shock. Look into your hearts, and see if you be this moment in the very state in which you would wish to appear before Christ's tribunal. Put the question to yourselves, Suppose the Judge was to come this hour, am I prepared to meet my God? If you are prepared, you are happy. But if not, you are and will be miserable, unless you can be persuaded to seek an interest in the Judge. And this I will attempt, in the help of God, under two or three short remarks.

First, To them who do not believe the doctrine. These are deists and professed infidels, the open enemies of Jehovah and his Christ, who having denied him to be God, think they are out of the reach of his judgment. I hope there are not many of them here present. Some perhaps there may be; for I know they are terribly affrighted at the late earthquakes, and their leaders have no way to quiet their consciences, but to assure them that they are mere natural effects, produced by natural causes; as if it were less terrible to be destroyed by a natural cause, than to be destroyed by the God of nature. Poor little philosophers! in what a despicable light do they appear, who are forced to exclude a providence, in order to get rid of their fears? And so for safety, they take shelter in atheism; and let them talk ever so much of one supreme being, yet they are rank atheists; for their one supreme being is one supreme nothing. God has been pleased to reveal his essence and personality to us, and his revealed account of himself they deny, and consequently whatever they set up against him, be it a God in one person, or thirty thousand gods, it is all a mere imagination, a one supreme being without any existence. No wonder, they should live loose libertine lives, since they are without God in the world. And what can we do but pity and pray for these men, who have adopted this system of practical atheism? Oh that the eternal Spirit would open their eyes, and if they have but a glimpse of truth, they will see that Jesus is God. And if they will not confess him here before men, there is a day coming, when they shall confess that he is a God indeed. At the glory of his appearance, these bold blasphemers, who now ridicule his divinity, will then be calling to the mountains to fall on them, and to the hills to cover them. The majesty of God the almighty Judge will strike them with terror, and when they are called before his throne to give an account of the hard speeches which they had spoken against him, they will stand guilty and trembling, waiting for that righteous sentence, which will carry with it inexpressible misery, "Go ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Oh that these terrors of the Lord may sink deep into the heart of every unbeliever, who is now at open war with his Judge, while I am, Secondly, Addressing myself to the careless sinners among you, who are, I fear, a great number. The generality of them who profess Christianity live to this world, and seldom think about the next. Their pleasures and diversions are the chief object of their pursuit, and money, and honour, and power, are sought after, that they may enjoy themselves the better. All worldly men are upon this scheme; and while they pursue it, they go on securely in their sins, and are careless about the concerns of eternity. Their hearts are engaged upon other matters than preparing to meet their God. Their attachment to the world is the greatest obstacle to their preparation; and therefore we are forbidden to "love the world, or the things of the world; for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." And if the love of God be not in us, we cannot be prepared to meet him in judgment.

Consider this all ye who speak peace to your souls, while you indulge yourselves in sin. You believe that God will call you before his judgment-seat, and that if you live and die in your sins, you cannot escape the eternal punishment of them. You know not but the Judge may call you before him this night, and you are not prepared, and yet you have no concern about it. You sin on with the judgment-seat of Christ before your eyes to which you may be brought before the next act of sin be finished. What can we think of this unaccountable conduct? Certainly men in their sober senses cannot act such an absurd part. It is against reason: for if these very men were setting out upon a journey of two or three hundred miles, they would make more preparation than they do for eternity. It is against self-interest: for who would take some present empty indulgences of sin, as an equivalent for eternal happiness? It is against all principles of good sense to prefer sin to holiness, and to choose hell before heaven. And it is destroying religion, whose sole business it is to prepare the soul to meet its God. And are any of you, my brethren, in this strange careless state? Do you act thus against reason and self-interest, against common sense and religion? You are guilty of all these inconsistencies, if the Judge should come in an hour, when ye look not for him. And he may come and find you unprepared as you are at present. You cannot promise yourselves an hour to prepare in. His judgments are now in the earth, and they are sent to rouse you out of your security. Oh that you would be awakened by them and see your danger. Do you not suppose, that the inhabitants of Lisbon thought themselves as safe as you may do at present? They had no apprehensions of an earthquake. They did not imagine that God was going to destroy them that morning. But you hear how they were surprised and overthrown with a great destruction. While they were speaking, peace, peace, unto themselves, they were called and hurried in a moment to judgment. One had set his heart upon getting a handsome fortune, and was just sitting down to cast up his accounts, and he was cut off that moment, and called to judgment, with a soul full of the love of money. Another, intent upon his pleasures, was feeding his imagination with a vile scene of indulgences, and his filthy soul was taken in the midst of this impurity, and brought before the all-pure and holy God. One with an oath in his mouth was calling for damnation upon his soul, and it came, while the words were in his mouth, and down he sunk into the pit of hell. Dreadful it is to think of the manner in which they were surprised and cut off in their sins. Suppose such a judgment should be sent to this city at the same time of the day, how would it overtake sinners both high and low? The great, tired with diversions of the preceding day, would be surprised in their sleep, and would awake in the eternal world, full of hatred to Jesus Christ, and his people, and his holy faith. What can they expect from the Judge? And the lower people would be up, but at the devil's work, going on careless in their sins, lying and cursing, and swearing, and blaspheming God, and snatched away with some horrid imprecation in their mouths. Why may not this happen to you, as well as to the inhabitants of Lisbon? Why may you not be thus cut off, and die in your sins, yea, in the very act of sin? You have more reason to fear it than they had: for your sins are greater than theirs. Think not that they were sinners above all the inhabitants of the earth, because they suffered such things. I tell you, nay; but except you repent, you shall all likewise perish. The same immoralities which reigned among them, reign also in this city; but the contempt of Jesus Christ and his religion, and the opposition now made to the progress of the gospel by every method but shedding of blood, from which God withholds the enemies' hands, these are crimes of a deeper guilt than the unhappy Portuguese had to answer for. The common people in those popish countries are kept in great ignorance, they have not the light of the gospel shining clearly among them, as you have, and therefore they were not guilty of that one damnable sin, which makes all your other sins so exceeding sinful. You sin against the fullest evidence; you reject the light of the gospel in your understandings, and you act against it in your lives: and you sin on, when you are invited to forsake your sins and live. God sends his ministers to plead with you, but their counsel you reject with contempt. The means of grace are before you, but you refuse to make use of them. You have the scriptures in your hands, and you may there read the danger of your careless way of life, but the scripture has no influence. If none of these motives can prevail, be assured, that your guilt will increase in proportion to the advantages you enjoy: and the more reason there was for your being prepared to meet your God, the heavier will the condemnation be, if he should come and find you unprepared. May you lay these things to heart, and by the grace of the Holy Spirit, now resolve to prepare for the coming of our almighty God and Saviour.

And if you have any desire to be prepared, there is one motive which ought to have great weight with you, and it is taken from a matter of fact. There are, God be praised, many persons in this city, several I hope in this congregation, who have obtained the love and friendship of the supreme Judge. Look into their lives and examine them closely. See how they are affected with the report of these judgments which are now in the earth. You will find no dread or fear in their minds. They are not afraid of any evil tidings. The inward peace and joy, which arise from the sense of God's loving them in Christ Jesus, are not lessened by any outward calamity. They know that he who is the Lord of nature will make all things work together for their good, and therefore their heart is established and will not shrink, though the earth should quake from its very foundations, and the hills should be carried into the midst of the sea. If the whole course of nature should be disturbed, they have nothing to fear. God is their friend. They are kept by the arms of the Almighty, and if the heavens should pass away, and the earth, and all that is therein should be burnt up, yet still they are safe. In life and death they can stay their minds upon God in perfect peace. You cannot deny, that there are Christians in this safe and happy state: for God has promised it them, and we declare that God is faithful and true; and if you believe it, how does it affect you? Do you find no desire to be as safe and happy as they are? Does no wish arise in your hearts, that you might be under the protection of the almighty God, and that he would set you on high out of the reach of public calamity; so that whenever he comes to visit a sinful people laden with iniquity, and to be glorified in their destruction, then you may rejoice and be exceeding glad, knowing assuredly that your eternal redemption is at hand?

Lay all these considerations together, and may the Lord let you see the importance of them. God is preparing to meet you in judgment, and eternity depends on your being prepared to meet him. You have no time to lose. He may come this night. And you are not prepared. What would your condition be, if he should call you unprepared? Therefore as you love your souls apply to him this moment. Now go to the throne of grace for pardon, lest you should be called before the throne of glory unpardoned. Cry aloud for mercy. The judge may still be intreated. Oh plead with him then, and be importunate, until he become your friend. Remind him of his love to sinners. Urge his bloody sweat, his bitter cross and passion, his cruel mockings, buffetings, and scourgings, endured all for sinners. Plead these with him, and lay before him the torments and the shame of the cross, and the piercing of his hands and feet, which are the engravings of his love to sinners, and be assured that tender heart cannot want love for them, which bled to death for their salvation. Hold on this plea until you find him gracious, and are enabled to place your whole trust and confidence in the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. Then you will be safe. There is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus. They shall be found in him at the great day, when he will become to them the author of eternal salvation. Knowing this by faith, they are prepared to meet their God.

I hope he has heard my prayers for you this day, and if it be his blessed will, has disposed you to seek an interest in the Judge of all the earth. He will come to judgment, and quickly. May the Holy Spirit prepare us all to meet him. Oh! if he should come this night, how would he find you? Are you all ready? Is every one of you fit to die? Have you all got your lamps trimmed, and ye yourselves prepared, that if there should be a great cry made at midnight, Behold the bridegroom cometh, ye may be ready, and enter in with him to the marriage? And if he should call you by an earthquake, or by any other judgment, have you so sure an interest in him, that sudden death would be welcome? Think what an awful thing it would be, if you were to enter upon the eternal world this night, where your state is to be unalterably fixed for ever. Oh what continual preparation should you be making for eternity. For if you die unprepared, all is lost. Hell and torments are your everlasting portion. And if you are not quite in love with misery, now beg of God to show you your danger, and to deliver you from it. The door of mercy is still open, Oh that you may find an entrance, and press forward with an holy violence, until you receive grace to prepare you to meet your God. And let us all agree to look up to him for it, in that excellent form of prayer, which our church has appointed for this day.

"Almighty God, give us grace, that we may cast away the works of darkness, and put upon us the armour of light, now in the time of this mortal life, in which thy Son Jesus Christ came to visit us in great humility; that in the last day, when he shall come again in his glorious majesty to judge both the quick and dead, we may (be prepared to meet him, and may) rise to the life immortal, through him who liveth and reigneth with thee, and the Holy Ghost, now and ever. Amen."

THE DUTY OF WATCHFULNESS ENFORCED:

IN

A DISCOURSE,

PREACHED DECEMBER 14, 1755, BEING THE THIRD SUNDAY IN ADVENT, AT ST. DUNSTAN'S IN THE WEST.

Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching. Luke xii. 37.

Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.—Matthew xxv. 13

THE church is still preparing our minds for the second advent of our blessed Lord. He is to come again in his glorious majesty to judge both the quick and the dead; and because we know that he certainly will come, and yet are uncertain about the precise time of his coming, we ought therefore to be always ready. And this temper of mind is recommended to us in the text, wherein the Judge himself requires us to watch, because we know neither the day nor the hour wherein he will come to judgment.

The words are part of the parable of the ten virgins, who set out to meet the bridegroom, and while he tarried, they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight he came unexpected, and the five wise virgins, who had kept the oil of grace burning bright in their lamps, were ready, and went in with him into the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterward came the five foolish virgins, who had been seeking to buy oil at a time when it should have been burning the brightest in their lamps, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not. Christ's inference from hence is, that we should be always watchful, because we know not when the bridegroom will come. "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." Be always prepared and ready to meet me, lest I should surprise you in your sins, and the door of mercy should be shut against you. Remember that I have the key of David; and if I open, no man shutteth; and if I shut, no man openeth. If I shut the door of mercy against you, it cannot be opened, but you will be delivered over to the tormentors, to dwell with them in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone for ever and ever.

In the words, then, we have, first, A duty enjoined, which is watchfulness—watch therefore. And

Secondly, A particular reason to enforce it, because "ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh."

And while I am opening these particulars, I hope the Spirit of God will open your hearts to receive instruction from them. May he keep every vain and wandering thought out of your minds and make you watchful indeed, while I am recommending watchfulness.

First, From the authority of our Lord's command, watch therefore. I define watchfulness to be that ready and prepared temper of mind, with which the believer is always waiting for his being called out of this world. He watches, and is ready and prepared, because he knows that he shall be called soon. If no judgment should cut him off before he reach to the full age of man, yet he sees death approaching; and put it at the greatest distance, yet the eye of faith can bring it near: for what are threescore years and ten? Compared with eternity, they are but a mere point of time. All men know this truth, but the believer alone knows it practically. He has learnt the true value of this short life, and is assured that it cannot be long before he must enter into the eternal world. He is convinced of the vast importance of being ready and prepared for his great change, because death will fix his condition for ever and ever, either in happiness or misery; and therefore he resolves with holy Job, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come," (Job xiv. 14). He will wait all the days of his appointed time, lest death should surprise him. He knows that the sting of death is sin, and consequently he watches against sin, that whenever death comes, it may come unarmed of its sting, and therefore without any power to hurt or terrify. Sin is his most deadly enemy, because it stirred up all his other enemies against him; he is in arms and at open war against it—he is ever upon his guard—and he does not trust to his own strength, but he takes to himself the whole armour of God, that he may fight manfully against sin, and all the allies of sin. And being strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, he goes on conquering and to conquer, watching, and praying, and fighting, until death come to put an end to the engagement, and to proclaim the glad tidings of everlasting peace.

No person can watch in this manner but the Christian, and I make it the principal part of the definition of watchfulness, that it is the readiness and preparation, wherewith the believer always waits for his being called out of this world. This watchfulness is to be found nowhere but among believers; because without the true living faith, it is impossible to watch. The unbeliever denies the matter of fact, upon which watchfulness is grounded. Christ's coming in the glory of the Godhead to judgment makes no part of his creed. And every sinner who admits the fact must fear and dread Christ's coming, and can have no motive to watch for it, until he believe, that the almighty Judge is his friend. When faith assures him of this, then he begins to lift up his eyes with joy, and to look for the coming of his Judge and Saviour. And this faith is wrought in all the children of God by the operation of the Holy Spirit, who gives them joy and peace in believing. He sheds abroad the love of God in their hearts, and thereby takes out the fear of death and judgment. Then watchfulness becomes pleasant. To be always ready and prepared to meet his God, is the happy frame and temper of mind which is formed in the believer by faith working by love. He believes, therefore he watches. His faith is operative, therefore it keeps him watchful. It is a faith working by love, therefore it makes him love to watch. He loves God, and finds a heaven of joy in loving him, and therefore he waits with a steadfast hope for the blessed time when he shall be filled with love. Oh what must it be to see and to love God in glory? when but a ray of divine love darted into the soul at present, brings with it such pure and spiritual delight, as makes all the joys of the world fade away into nothing, yea, even to become vanity itself. Therefore happy is he who watches—more happy the believer who loves to watch—but thrice happy is that faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing.

This is the true gospel watchfulness; it is made up of the active graces of faith and hope and love, which keep the Christian soldier always upon the alarm, lest his implacable enemies, who are ever waiting for his destruction, should surprise him. And among what set of men shall we find this watchful spirit? Look around the world, and see who they are that are waiting for their Lord's coming with watchfulness and prayer. Alas! their number is very small. The generality of men professing Christianity, live careless and unconcerned about their salvation: and careless sinners do no more watch, than a man fast asleep can be said to be watchful. Carelessness is the very contrary temper to watching, and carelessness in sin is directly opposite to Christian watchfulness: for sin makes the soul as unfit to watch, as drunkenness does the body; and to be careless in sin lulls the soul fast asleep. And in this condition, the Judge, whenever he comes, surprises sinners. He finds them sunk down into the dead sleep of sin, when they should have been watching and praying against sin, and they do not even dream of his coming. As it was in the days before the flood, though the Lord's prophet admonished them of their danger, yet they went on eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the flood came and swept them all away: so shall it be when the Son of man cometh; he will find careless sinners in the same state, neither watching nor prepared. If you look at their particular vices, you will see how each indisposes them for watching. How can the glutton watch stupified with meat, and the drunkard intoxicated with drink? The one will be taken while he is dosing and sleeping under the load of an overcharged stomach, and the other while he is dead drunk, and their filthy souls and bodies will appear in this shocking condition before the all-pure God. The worldly-minded man, whatever worldly object his heart be set upon, cannot watch. Take heed of the cares of this life, says the Judge himself. We should take great heed, lest they should get too much room in our hearts, because the love of this present world is inconsistent with watching and preparing for the eternal world. The profane swearer can have no thoughts of watching. He defies God, and is so secure in his cursing and swearing, that he is not afraid to call for damnation. He prays all the day long, and earnestly too, that his poor soul may be damned. If God should hear his prayers, what will become of him? How can he escape, when the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to call ungodly sinners to an account for the hard sayings which they had spoken against him? The whoremonger and adulterer cannot watch. Their impure souls are enslaved to unholy and beastly lusts, which indispose them for watching. Whenever Christ comes, he will surprise them: for the immutable decree is gone out of his mouth—"Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge:" but they live secure in their sins, and have no concern about being called to judgment; therefore he will come in a day when they look not for him, and in a hour that they are not aware of. Surely you will not say that any of these men watch, unless it be for their own destruction. And as to the other lovers of pleasure, they are afraid of Christ's coming, and therefore it is impossible they should watch for it. The love of pleasure is the characteristic of this age. It is seen in nothing so much as in the madness with which men are running at this very time after public diversions. The playhouses are crowded. The opera house is full of the politest company. Balls and concerts increase every day. The effects of carding and gaming are felt every where. The spirit of pleasure is gone forth, and has seized all orders of men from the highest to the lowest. Now are any of these people watching? Are they waiting for Christ's coming, who are seeking to please themselves? And when he comes, will he delight to find his servants taken up with diversions, and their hearts set upon pursuing them? Certainly, this is not the spirit of Christian watchfulness, which he recommended and enjoined to all his disciples: for they cannot be prepared to enjoy happiness with him, while the love of diversion is the ruling passion of their souls: and it is certainly the ruling passion, when they are so absolutely fixed upon their pleasures that no divine visitation, no remarkable providence can move them. Though they see the finger of God visible in his judgments, yet they take no warning. Neither wars, nor pestilence, nor public calamity—no earthquake, however dreadful, even if it destroy cities, and lay waste kingdoms—no earthquake, be it such as never was before, since God made man upon the earth; for we have no account in history of the sea and the land shaking and trembling for thousands of miles at the same time, as they did in the late earthquakes:—none of these divine visitations can awaken the lovers of pleasure from their spirit of slumber. God calls upon them by all these providences, but they hear him not. The more loudly he calls, the more do they harden their hearts, and sink the deeper into their pleasures; and the more loudly his ministers call, they fret and rage the more at these troublers of Israel. And if conscience at any time begin to grow uneasy, they fly for relief to the world and its amusements. The playhouse is the general place of refuge, where they go to quiet conscience, and to lull it asleep. This brings together that vast crowd, which daily frequents the playhouse, and which fills every part and corner of it from top and bottom. And yet these very persons, who would not go to a play, unless they knew it would be a full house, are very angry at a full church; nay, so very angry, that they will not come to church, if it be full; nay, so exceedingly angry, that I know some of them, who think the minister should be starved, and they will do what they can to starve him, who happens to have a crowded congregation. I mention this with great concern, because it shows by what spirit these men are actuated, who rejoice in a full playhouse, but fret and rage with malice at a full church. What spirit is this, that is pleased to see the devil's house crowded, and is vexed to see the house of God filled? Is the playhouse, then, a fitter place to watch in than the church? And are they in a proper posture of watchfulness, who are sitting and delighted to the soul to see a filthy play acted; and if they should be called out of the world in the midst of one of these lewd scenes, would their minds be in a proper temper to appear before God? Dreadful it is to think what their condition would be, who should come reeking hot out of the playhouse, with an imagination full of lewd ideas, and indulging and enjoying them, and in this detestable impurity to stand at God's tribunal. Whenever you go to the play, you do not know but this may happen; and if it should happen, you die in the very act of sin, and you are lost for ever. Consider this, and lay it to heart, all ye who are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. Be convinced that the way of pleasure is the very reverse of Christian watchfulness; and therefore unless you prefer time to eternity, now shake off the lethargy of sin, and begin to watch. Suppose Christ should come this night, and this city should be destroyed, as Lisbon was, by an earthquake, consider what the consequence would be, if you should be found unprepared. If you live in the open breach of God's commandments, if you are running greedily after pleasure, nay, if you are but careless and unconcerned about the state of your souls, you will not be found watching. The Judge has commanded you to watch, and this command is as much your duty as any of the ten commandments, nay more, because you keep them to no purpose, unless you keep them with a watchful spirit. If Christ should come, when you are not waiting for him with faith and love, he will find you neglecting his advice, and despising his admonitions, and cry ever so loud for mercy, "Lord, Lord, open to us," then it will be too late; the door of mercy will be shut for ever, and he will declare, "I never knew you." Where will be your portion, when heaven is shut against you? Where, but in everlasting burnings, in torments that know no intermission, no end! "Watch, therefore, because ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." And the reason here given for watchfulness, because we are uncertain of the precise time of Christ's coming, is the second particular to be considered.

You have heard, wherein the Christian watchfulness consists, and how opposite it is to carelessness in sin, because it watches against all sin, and the chief enemy that would make us unprepared for our Lord's coming. To be always watchful, is the believer's character. He watches against every thing that may indispose him for meeting his Lord with joy, against sin, against pleasure, particularly against the pleasures of sense, remembering the command of Christ, "Take heed unto yourselves, lest at any time your hearts should be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and so that day should come upon you unawares." The believer takes heed not to fall into these sins; he sets faith and love to watch against them, and puts them upon watching with greater vigilance, lest that day should come upon him unawares. "Watch, therefore, because ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the, Son of man cometh." This motive works strongly upon the believer. He is certain that Christ will come, and being uncertain of the time, he knows not how soon it may be, and therefore he watches always. He considers himself as fixed upon a certain station, where he must stand upon guard and do his duty, until he be called off and relieved. While he is upon this post, he is to watch. If the sentinel leave his station, or fall asleep upon it, you know what punishment is his due. And will not a greater punishment be your due, whose eternity depends upon your watching? and yet you cannot watch one hour, no, not for the sake of eternal happiness. Your own conduct in civil affairs will rise up in judgment against your carelessness in your spiritual: for we are now apprehensive of an invasion from that faithless people whom God suffers to be a scourge to the rest of Europe, and our army is upon the coast watching their landing. Now, if all the sentinels should fall fast asleep, and the French should land unobserved and without opposition, I appeal to every honest Englishman, what shall be done to these traitors? If the court-martial should sentence every one of them to be shot, I suppose no lover of his country would think his punishment too severe? I am sure the believer would not, because he would think himself deserving of death, and knows that he cannot escape it, if he leave off watching. But he will not leave off, because he loves to watch. His heart and his affections go along with his duty. Love is active and vigilant. It will keep him awake; for he does not watch against an enemy, but waits for a friend. He watches to meet his beloved Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who has promised to come to judgment speedily, and has commanded his faithful servants to watch, and has spurred them on to greater vigilance, by assuring them that the day of judgment shall come as a snare, and as a thief in the night, upon all them that dwell in the world. And though it come unexpected, yet it shall not find the believer unprepared. The uncertainty of the time will not weaken his belief of the certainty of the fact, but will be a powerful motive to spur him on to be always watching and praying, that he may be accounted worthy to escape all those things that are to come to pass at the last day. And thus he fulfils Christ's direction, "Watch, therefore, for ye neither know the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh."

Men and brethren, let me speak freely unto you concerning this scripture. It is of great and of eternal importance, and you ought to examine your hearts, and see how it operates in your lives. Are you, then, watching? And do you watch the more carefully, because ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh? Look around you, and consider your situation. You are upon the verge of eternity. The joys of heaven and the torments of hell are before you. And you are not sure of a day longer to provide for them. Time flies. Death approaches. Behold the Judge standeth before the door. The late extraordinary providences proclaim his near approach. By the mouths of these his harbingers and forerunners he speaks aloud, Surely I come quickly. In a moment you may meet him in judgment. And is all this nothing to you? Will it be the same thing to you whether you live in heaven or in hell for ever? Certainly eternal torment cannot be a desirable thing, and how then do you quiet your consciences, while you are in danger of it? If you are going on careless in your sins, you cannot escape it. How can the devil delude you so far, and give you stupifying opiates, that you either do not see how near you are to everlasting misery, or else do not fear it? Your case is almost desperate; may the eternal Spirit open your eyes to see it, before it be too late. God has commanded you to watch, you do not watch. He has required you to be always ready, you are not ready. He has threatened to come in a day when ye look not for him, and you go on careless in your sins, neglecting his threatenings. He is now alarming a careless world with his judgments, but they make no impression upon you. He has sent war and pestilence to arouse you out of your security, you are not alarmed. He has arisen to shake terribly the earth, you are not moved. He has come to take vengeance on a guilty race, and has punished them with a most exemplary destruction, but you are not affected. He has overthrown large and populous cities, which are now nothing but heaps of wide-extended ruin; all this makes no impression upon you. Although many thousands of their inhabitants be buried under the ruins, yet you neither feel for yourselves, nor for your fellow-creatures, whom vengeance suffered not to live. Oh hardened, insensible sinners! your hearts are more obdurate than the nether millstone; for what could the almighty God do more to alarm you, than he has done? And yet how few of you are alarmed? This strange stupidity and hardness of your hearts will soon bring down some heavy calamity upon you: for if you still return to your sins, refusing to repent, although you see the arm of justice lifted up to destroy impenitent sinners, what can you expect but that it should fall next upon your guilty heads, and that you, who would not cry for mercy at such a time as this, shall receive judgment without mercy? And of this be ye assured, that the longer mercy withholds the blow, the heavier will it fall, when the long-suffering of God is wearied out, and his almighty justice comes to be glorified in your destruction. Oh that this may never happen, but that he may be glorified in your salvation! May he give you grace no longer to abuse his goodness and forbearance, but now to leave your sins, and while his judgments are in the earth to learn righteousness, that you may receive justification to life by the all-perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Happy will it be for you and me, if by any means I may prevail with you to flee from the wrath to come. God is now pleading with you. He calls aloud to you by various judgments to repent. And it is my heart's desire to second his call, and to be useful under him in stirring you up to repentance. I think the ministers of the gospel cannot be too earnest and importunate at such a time as this. When God is pleading powerfully with sinners, and yet we see them sleeping on in security, surely we should then cry aloud and spare not. The heavier the spirit of slumber is upon them, the more pains should we take to awaken them. And

It is indeed amazing to see how hardened and insensible mankind are under these remarkable providences, with which the world is now visited. None of these have moved them. This strange stupidity is an evident sign of their total corruption, and is the forerunner of their total destruction. Mercies have been long tried, but in vain. Now the Almighty tries his terrors; and still in vain. Neither his mercies nor judgments can awaken them. They will not break off their favourite sins and pleasures; no, not when they see his glittering sword drawn, and cutting off many thousands at one stroke. They have not sense to apply it, and to ask themselves, Suppose the sword of the Almighty should be turned against me next, am not I as great a sinner as any of those who perished in the late earthquakes? What would become of me, if I should be cut off in a moment as they were? Alas! my body and soul would be miserable for ever and ever. My conscience is awake, and assures me that I cannot escape the wrath to come, unless I get my sins pardoned, and secure an interest in the Judge of all the earth. This I will seek night and day with prayers and tears until I find it. May the Lord Jesus put these good resolutions into the heart of every careless sinner, and may he give you grace to carry them into execution immediately; to which I shall encourage you under two or three short remarks, which I have to make on what has been said.

And first you have heard, that it is of the spirit of Christianity, to make believers watch for their Lord's coming; and it keeps them always watching, because they know not when he will come; and when the judgments of God are upon the earth, as they are remarkably at present, then it inspires them with stricter watchfulness. The greater the danger is, the more watchful are they. You hear what has been offered upon these heads; but being determined not to give up your sins, it does not affect you. You are as cold and lifeless as if I had been talking upon a subject in which you were no way concerned. Would to God there were none of you in this state! How many soever careless sinners might come here to-day, I wish not one of them was to go away without finding some uneasiness of conscience, and some true, and deep, and lasting conviction of sin. If any of you leave the church with as much carelessness as you come, how do you stupify yourselves, that no sense of danger can alarm you? Lord, what is man—yea, sinful man—that he should think himself safe, when the earth has been for many days quaking and trembling, and he knows not but in a moment he may be swallowed up and called to judgment! How can you dream of safety at such a time as this? Perhaps you may dismiss your fears by promising them, that our country is not so subject to earthquakes as other places. When providence orders, no country can be free from them. We have had two earthquakes in this city, and though but a little while ago, yet they are now almost forgotten, and since we take no warning from them, he who sent these two can send a third, and London may share the fate of Lisbon. So that this motive by which you try to quiet your consciences should alarm them the more, because the less common earthquakes are in this country, the more certainly ought they to affect you, and yet you are not affected at all. But perhaps you think you need not be under any great apprehensions, because earthquakes are only natural effects produced by natural causes. Be it so. What security do you get by this? Has the God of nature no influence upon these natural causes? Supposing he had none, which is atheism to suppose, and a natural cause should destroy you and send you to hell, would this make your torments more supportable? If you could go and tell the poor sinners who perished at Lisbon, that it was not providence which destroyed them, but only a natural cause, what good news would this be to them? They are destroyed and lost for ever, and the cause of the earthquake is of no consequence to them? They are only concerned about the effects of it, and would now give thousands of worlds, if they had them, that they had been found watching. And so will you, if you take not warning from their destruction. They are lost, but you have still an offer of mercy. You may escape if you will look more into yourselves than into the causes of this earthquake. Look at the one thing needful for you. Repent. Get your sins pardoned. Make God your friend, and then you will be safe. Let little infidel philosophers say what they please, be ye assured, that providence orders and directs even what are called natural causes. And when you are reconciled to him, he will make them all work together for your good. What he sends for judgments to others will be mercies to you, and you will experience his love in every visitation, be it prosperous or adverse. Whoever has attained to the true spirit of Christian watchfulness is in this state, and to them who desire to attain it I will make my second remark.

I am now speaking to these persons who are alarmed at the signs of the times, and begin to be concerned about the salvation of their souls. You want to have your hearts established, that you may not be afraid of any evil tidings, but whenever your Lord comes, may be found watching. He that put this good desire into your minds, will place you secure upon the rock of ages, if you wait upon him. When you are once united to Jesus Christ by faith, you are then out of the reach of every calamity. Nothing can hurt you; for the guilt of sin, from whence all your danger comes, is taken out of the conscience. You know that your heavenly Father loves you in his beloved Son, and that he will keep you in the arms of his mercy in life, and death, and to eternity. Being assured of this, then, you can watch; you will love to be watching, and whenever your Lord comes you will be ready to enter in with him into his joys. This is Christian watchfulness. It is always prepared, always looking out for death and judgment, and therefore is never surprised. And in this happy state all believers live, and there is no happiness upon earth but this. All the rest is but a shadow of joy, and in the end proves vanity and vexation of spirit. The thought that they must die, gives a damp to the highest pleasures of careless sinners; but the thought that they may die in the midst of their enjoyments, turns their fancied pleasures into real pains. Nothing can make life sweet and happy, but a constant preparation for death. And since God has led you to seek this happiness in Jesus Christ, seek it in the right way, and you will assuredly find it. Go to the throne of grace with humility and prayer. Pray without ceasing. Be importunate. Knock at the door of mercy until it be opened. Hear and read the word of God. Frequent his table. Be found in all the ways of his ordinances, and he will be found of you. He will give you living faith working by divine love, and with these graces your hearts will be strengthened, and enabled to watch, until your Lord come. And to those who are in this happy state I make my third and last remark.

My Christian brethren, your Lord's command should be much in your thoughts at present, Be watchful. You find none of his commands grievous: for love has made them all pleasant, and to keep them with a watchful spirit is become your delight. Faith and hope enable you to look out for Christ's coming without any fear or dread, and love makes watching for it sweet and joyful. It is a pleasure to you to meditate upon his coming. You can reflect with joy upon that blessed day, when you shall see the dear object of your affections, shall behold him in all the glory of the Godhead, and shall be admitted into his presence, where is the fulness of everlasting joys. Oh! there is heaven in these reflections. The happiness you find in them disposes you earnestly to wish and pray for the great day of your Lord's appearing. And his repeated commands to you to watch for it, keep you watchful. It would be no surprise to you, if you were this moment to lift up your eyes, and to see the crucified Jesus coming in the clouds with power and great glory, to hear the loud trump of God calling you to judgment, and to behold the dead rising out of their graves, the earth in flames, and to feel yourselves caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. Are not these hopes the joy of your hearts? I know they are. You long to meet your beloved Lord and Saviour. And are you all in this happy situation? Say. Have you such pure and perfect love for the Judge of all the earth, that you wish, and pray, and watch for his coming. Ask your consciences, as if I put the question to every one of you by name, is this your case? Every true believer can, without presumption, declare: Glory be to God, it is my happy situation; through grace I wait for the coming of my most blessed and adorable Saviour, and in his strength I now watch, and hope, whenever he comes, to be found watching. Oh that his good Spirit may bring every one of you into this watchful frame and temper of mind, and may he enable you all now to ask it of him in the prayer of faith; and I know of no words more suitable to the subject, or more truly pious, than these which our church has taught us to use on this day.

"O Lord Jesus Christ, who at thy first coming didst send thy messengers to prepare thy way before thee! Grant that the ministers and stewards of thy mysteries, may likewise so prepare and make ready thy way, by turning the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, that at thy second coming to judge the world, we may (all be watching and praying, and may therefore) be found an acceptable people in thy sight, who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Spirit, ever one God, world without end. Amen."

THE SURE FOUNDATION.

TWO DISCOURSES,

PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, APRIL 11, 1756, IN THE MORNING AT ST. MARY'S, AND IN THE AFTERNOON AT ST. PETER'S.

Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold I lay in Zion, for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation. He that believeth shall not make haste.—Isaiah xxviii. 16.

SERMON I.

Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.—1 Cor. iii. 11.

In every undertaking it is the principal point to lay and to secure a good foundation. In temporal concerns, all men see and acknowledge this truth, and are careful enough to act agreeably to it The men of business, of pleasure, and of ambition, have each their foundation to build upon, from whence they promise themselves success. The learned also have their data and first principles, in every art and science, which are laid down as a sure foundation, whereon the art or science may be built. The Christian, in like manner, has his foundation. Divinity has its first principles, with this manifest advantage above the arts and sciences, that God hath built it, and upon one plain simple truth, which is clearly ascertained both in the Old Testament and the New. Jesus Christ being proposed in both as the only foundation of faith and obedience. This one sure foundation is laid, and no other can be laid: "For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." What words can be more clear and decisive than these are? and yet the mistakes of men about them are endless, even of men who allow the divine authority of this very passage! The Papists have multiplied the one foundation into a great number, building upon the Virgin Mary as much as they do upon the ever-blessed God her Saviour, and upon a multitude of fabulous saints. And the Arians and Socinians, the pests of this age, have been trying to dig up the foundation, and would willingly leave no traces of it remaining. And some of the reformed churches, which set out well at first, laying Christ, and Christ alone, for the foundation, have since built upon him wood, hay, stubble, and such like reprobate stuff, which, when it comes to be tried in the fire, will be burnt. And the generality of men have no foundation at all, but live careless and unconcerned about the state of their souls, never examining whether they are built upon Jesus Christ the Rock of Ages, on whom the building fitly framed together, groweth into an holy temple in the Lord. Each of these mistakes has at present numerous advocates, some of them have great interest, and others have enjoyed a long establishment, and the espousers of each have something specious to offer in its defence, which being dressed up with the ornaments of false learning, and falling in with our own corrupt inclinations, is very apt to seduce us from the foundation of truth. For these reasons it will be proper and seasonable to look to the foundation, and to see whether we stand secure upon it. In this enquiry the words of the text will be useful; they are so plain and clear, as to leave no doubt in every honest, teachable mind, which is willing to be determined by the authority of the written word, and hears and reads it under the guidance of its all-wise inspirer. St. Paul is here reproving his Corinthians for the envying, and strife, and divisions, which were among them. He had converted them to the faith, and Apollos had built them up in it, and they had great reason to join together in giving praise and glory to God, who had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light. But the common enemy of their souls prevented this desirable effect, by sowing discord among them. He tempted them into a party spirit, and they divided about the gifts and talents of their ministers. One said that he was of Paul, another that he was of Apollos; and they forgot, that neither is Paul that planteth any thing, neither Apollos that watereth, but God that giveth the increase. All the glory of planting and watering, as well as of the increase, is God's. For we, says the apostle, are only labourers together with God. Although, by our ministry the good seed was sown in your hearts, yet ye are God's husbandry. Although by our preaching ye were built up in your most holy faith, yet ye are God's building. We could do nothing without his grace: for according to the grace of God, which is given to me as a wise master builder, I have laid the foundation. This wise master builder laid the foundation, when he converted them to Christianity, and he cautions every minister of the gospel to take heed how he buildeth thereon, because there was but one foundation on which all doctrines and duties rested—"for other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid." The foundation is the entire groundwork of religion, upon which every part of it must rest. The whole building is to stand upon it, and therefore it should be laid secure. Certainly that cannot be too strong and firm, which is to support our present and our eternal happiness. Look at this tempestuous world, and behold what rains descend, what floods come, what winds blow, and beat upon our weak tabernacle, threatening its fall; how can we stand against these mighty assaults, unless we be founded upon a rock? For our comfort God hath laid a foundation, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, and therefore we need not doubt of its stability or duration. He laid it first in the covenant of grace, ordered in all things and sure, when he purposed, before all worlds, to bring many sons unto glory through Jesus Christ. He afterwards revealed his purpose in the written word, and he hath therein laid but one foundation, and there is no other. Moses and the prophets have laid no other foundation in the Old Testament than what is established throughout the New, which is Jesus Christ, on whom we may safely build all our hopes of salvation, because he is God and man united in one Christ, who came as our representative, to act and suffer for us, and thereby to restore us to the happy estate which we had forfeited by the fall. As man he obeyed the divine law to atone for our disobedience, as man he suffered what we should have suffered for disobeying; but then his obedience and sufferings could never have wrought out perfect righteousness for a guilty race, unless the holy, suffering Jesus had been united to the most high God, and God and man had been as intimately united in one Christ, as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man. The merit of all that he did and suffered, rests upon his being a divine as well as a human person. Take away his eternal, self-existent Godhead, and you sink him down into a mere creature: and then place him ever so high, suppose him to be at the very top of the scale of creatures, yet you make him finite; and being so, clothe him with every grace and perfection short of divine, he could save no person but himself, for it is an adjudged case upon record, that no man can redeem his brother, or pay to God a ransom for him.

The divinity, then, of Jesus Christ is the foundation on which the whole of our salvation rests: for there is salvation in none other; and if he be not true and very God, there is no salvation in him. Our preaching is vain, and your faith in him is also vain. We are all yet in our sins, for nothing short of divine and infinite can save us from the guilt and power of them. But the scripture has clearly revealed his divine and infinite nature. It has not left us in doubt concerning the power of the Son of man to forgive sins. The Saviour of sinners was Jehovah, a person of the self-existent essence; for we are taught by the Christian verity to believe, that in the unity of the Godhead there are three persons of equal glory and co-eternal majesty, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, who were pleased to display their attributes and perfections, by sustaining distinct offices in the economy of man's redemption, to whom we therefore owe equal glory and worship, because their love to us in sustaining these offices for our recovery was equal. God the Father was glorified by having honour paid to his holiness and justice. He demanded full and perfect satisfaction for sin, which God the Son paid by taking upon him the human nature, and therein obeying and suffering for sinners: for which stupendous act of love and condescension, he was seated upon the throne, and had all power in heaven and earth committed to him, and he is now glorified by all the heavenly host, angels and archangels, and by the spirits of just men made perfect, thousands, thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand, a great multitude whom no man can number. Glory be to his holy name, for that his courts will be filled with such an innumerable company, ascribing salvation to our God who sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever. And God the Holy Ghost is glorified for abiding with us, even unto the end of the world, to carry on the work of salvation, for awakening the dead in sin, enlightening them with the light of life, and guiding them in their Christian course by his grace, until he bring them unto glory. Thus God the Father demands satisfaction—God the Son pays it—God the Holy Ghost applies it; but still in these offices the glory is equal, because the persons are equal. If the Son was not equal to the Father, how could he pay him an infinite satisfaction? If the Holy Ghost was not equal to the Father and the Son, how could he sustain his office, which requires an all-wise, all-present, and almighty Spirit? These distinct offices make no difference or inequality between the persons, as it is well expressed in that form of sound words to which we have all subscribed, "In the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity none is afore or after other, none is greater or less than another, but the whole three persons are co-eternal together and co-equal." Jesus Christ is co-equal and co-eternal with the Father and the Holy Spirit; and being a truly divine as well as an human person united in one Saviour, in this character every thing he did and suffered for us must be perfect and complete. Nothing can be wanting to make him a sure foundation. When he obeyed—when he suffered—when he died—he was paying the satisfaction demanded by the justice of the Father, who demonstrated his acceptance of it by raising the manhood from the dead. And then the foundation of God was established immovably. God himself, even God manifested in the flesh, is the foundation that standeth sure. It is neither the Blessed Virgin, nor the saints and martyrs; it is neither repentance nor good works: neither morality nor natural light, but the one foundation is the God-man, Christ Jesus. As God, he is almighty: for he created all things, and he upholdeth all things by the word of his power. As God manifested in the flesh, he has engaged to use his almighty power for our salvation. In his obedience and sufferings, death and resurrection, he laid a foundation that can never be shaken, upon which sinners may safely build their hopes of pardon and forgiveness, of righteousness and holiness, of heaven, and eternal glory. And they may build on him with greater safety, because the scripture throughout sets him forth as the only foundation. He is laid, and other foundation, the apostle says, can no man lay. There is an utter impossibility of laying any other: because to attempt it, would be opposing the immutable decree of heaven, by which this one foundation was laid in the covenant of grace; it would be opposing God's revealed will, which has established this one foundation in the written word; and it would be opposing the sufficiency of Christ's obedience and sufferings, by which alone we can obtain acceptance with God the Father. Will not these men be found fighting against God, and how then can they succeed, who oppose his covenant, confirmed by his revealed will, and established by his miraculous works? So long as this scripture stands upon record, it will overthrow all their attempts to lay any other foundation. Will the metaphysician think of laying his reason and the light of nature? It is written, Jesus Christ is the foundation, and there is no other. Will the moralist think of laying a system of ethics, and the religion of nature? Jesus Christ is the foundation, and there is no other. Will the Arian, Socinian, and other infidels think of being justified with out the merits of the God-man? Jesus Christ is the foundation, and there is no other. In short every doctrine and duty stands established upon him. He is the foundation of all: "For other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

The scope and design of the words thus in part opened and explained, offer to our consideration the following truths:

First, Jesus Christ is the foundation of all saving knowledge.

Secondly, he is the foundation of all acceptance with God the Father.

Thirdly, he is the foundation of all holy obedience. And,

Fourthly, he is the foundation of all present and eternal happiness. And may the spirit of the Lord Jesus direct our hearts to make a right use of this scripture under the first particular, which was to prove, that he is the foundation of all saving knowledge.

By saving knowledge, I understand all the knowledge which respects the salvation of sinners. And man, in his fallen state, neither has any of this knowledge, nor can he attain it by any means in his own power. His reasoning faculties, in their highest refinement, could never have discovered to him, how he might be pardoned; for when sin cut him off from all communion with the Father of spirits, who is to the soul what the sun is to the body, it then deprived him of all spiritual discernment, and without the light of revelation he is unable to discover those objects which can only be spiritually discerned. He is blind and ignorant in the things of God, and obstinate too in his ignorance. He is in the dark, and he loves darkness; and being a slave to the prince of the powers of darkness, he is taught to hate the light; and he hates it with a perfect hatred. He flies from it, lest his works should be manifest, and their horrid deformity should fill him with shame and painful conviction. While he is in this condition, and every man is in it by nature, the eyes of his understanding have no more perception of any spiritual object, than his bodily eyes would have of material objects, if there was no light to enlighten them. The organ of sight would remain; but then, without light, it would be of no more use than if it was quite destroyed. The scripture has given us a melancholy account of this spiritual darkness and blindness, and represents it to be so far above the power of nature to remove, that it was one principal end of Christ's coming from heaven to preach recovery of sight to the blind. And to enable him to recover it, the Spirit of the Lord was poured out upon him without measure; for it required the power of an almighty spirit to cure the obstinate blindness of a sinful world, who loved darkness rather than light. Read the first chapter of the Romans, and you will there find, what horrid deeds of darkness were, and always will be, the fruits of nature, when left to its own fancied light. The apostle does not scruple to declare the refined taste of this polite, classical people, "that they were become vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened." The imagination of their finest poets—even Virgil's imagination, St. Paul being judge—was vain. And Tully with his great parts, with his vast reading, and all his attainments, had a foolish heart, St. Paul being judge, and in the things of God was exceeding dark. And this was true of the rest of the heathen world, as well as of the Romans. When St. Paul received his commission from Jesus Christ, it run in these words—"I send thee to the Gentiles to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light." And accordingly we find it the principal subject of his preaching and writing, to call them out of darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel. His Ephesians he cautions, iv. 8—"Not to walk as other Gentiles in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart." And lest this darkness and blindness should be supposed to take place only in the heathen world, the scripture has expressly declared it is the case of every son of fallen Adam, of whom not one in his natural state can attain to the knowledge of saving truth; "for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know him, because they are spiritually discerned." 1 Cor. ii. 14. And for want of this spiritual discernment, the apostle says, that the natural man, that is, every man in a state of nature, not only does not, but also cannot, there is an absolute impossibility that he should, know the things of the Spirit of God. Nay, when they are proposed to him, they appear to be foolishness, and he receiveth them not.

But why need I multiply texts in defence of a truth, for which scripture speaks so plain, and matter of fact speaks for itself? It is an undoubted truth, that there was no saving knowledge in the heathen world. We therefore call it heathen, because it wanted this Christian knowledge. What discoveries did the classical ages of Greece and Rome make in the doctrines of salvation? Rather, what had they not done to obliterate the scope and intent of the ceremonies, which God had instituted to keep up the knowledge of these doctrines? The very traces of them were so entirely lost, that among the numerous altars in the famous university of Athens, there was but one erected to anything like divinity, and that was to an unknown god. St. Paul made an excellent use of this inscription, taking occasion from it to preach Christianity to the Athenians, and assuring them that this god, confessedly unknown, was Jesus Christ; and if a faith in him, that purifies the heart, and that works in a holy life, be the basis of saving knowledge, then neither Greeks nor Romans had any of it; for in none of their authors do we find the least mention made of the nature, virtue, and efficacy of the purifying faith in Jesus Christ.

And this matter of fact is confirmed by every day's experience. Are we not forced to teach children the first rudiments of letters, and as their minds open, the first rudiments of saving knowledge? Is not a Christian education everywhere acknowledged to be necessary, as well to restrain and subdue the headstrong passions of corrupt nature, as to instil the wholesome truths of Christian faith and obedience? And are there not, in every country, schools and universities founded for these laudable purposes? And when we leave these places of education, does not every good steward of the mysteries of God still find the necessity of continal study and application to the written word, that he may be able out of his treasure to bring forth things new and old for his own and his people's instruction in righteousness; and these circumstances may convince us, that we are naturally blind and ignorant in the saving truths of the gospel. We know only as much as we are taught. Without the light of revelation, the inhabitants of England would be no wiser in the things of God, than the inhabitants of the deserts of Africa—the same spiritual darkness would cover both lands, the same gross darkness the people. And whether they be polite or savage it makes no difference, until the sun of righteousness arise to dispel their heavy night of ignorance; for what the sun is to the natural world, such is Jesus Christ, the sun of righteousness, to the spiritual world. The scripture hath set him forth as the only light of the spirits of men, from whom all saving knowledge must flow; "for he was made unto us wisdom," says the apostle. In his divine nature, wisdom—perfect and infinite wisdom—is essentially inherent. He is the all-wise God, in whom are stored all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, which he was pleased, as our Saviour, to open for our use and to communicate. The word of God most high is the fountain of wisdom, from whom, by the covenant of grace it was to flow; and ever since the fall it has been flowing in the richest streams. And from him every sinner must be enlightened before he can enter into the light of life; for he said of himself, "I am the light of the world;" and he must fulfil his word by enlightening every dark, benighted soul, until the number of the elect, the children of light, shall be perfected, and then he will shine for ever in the fulness of glory in the heavenly Jerusalem; for the glory of God shall lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof, and the nations of them that are saved shall walk in his light for ever and ever. Thus the light has been, and always will be, the glorious title of the incarnate God. He took this name to denote his gracious office of enlightening our blind and dark understandings. Under this character the prophet Isaiah speaks of him (ix. 2.) "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light, they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined." These words are applied to Christ by an infallible interpreter. St. Matthew makes them relate to Christ's being a light to lighten the Gentiles. And again in the same prophet the Lord saith (xlix. 6.) "It is too little a thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up only the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel, I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the ends of the earth." Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii. 47.) apply these words to Christ: he was the true light, the day-spring from on high that visited the Gentiles, to give them the knowledge of salvation; for if the eyes of them who sit in darkness and the shadow of death be ever opened, if they see that they have lost the way to heaven, if they desire to walk in it, and are enabled to go on steadfastly unto the end, all this is the work of the divine light, in whom whosoever believeth shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.

From these scriptures it is evident, that every man who cometh into the world is by nature dark and blind in the things of God. Sin blinded his eyes, and left him without the least spiritual discernment. The intellectual faculty indeed is not totally destroyed. The organ of sight is not annihilated. It remains, but not enlightened. It is in the same state our eyes would be, if the sun, moon, and stars were to withhold their shining, and not one ray of light was left in the creation. If men could live in this gross darkness, the organ of sight would not be destroyed, but it would be quite useless. All things would be invisible, because whatsoever doth make manifest is light. And this is the state of the soul; for the eye of the soul can no more see without its proper light, than the eye of the body can see without its proper light. And what the sun is to the body, that is Christ to the soul. He is the light of the world, not of this outward world, which is abundantly supplied from the fountain of created light, but he is the light of the spiritual world, which lay in darkness and the shadow of death, until he arose with healing under his wings, and brought with him from heaven the reviving light of life.

Upon the authority of God's word these truths are established. The evidence for them is clear and full. If our bodily eyes cannot see without light, it is equally certain, that our spiritual eyes cannot see without Christ; because both are spoken of in the same language, and under the same expressions. And as he is the Lord God omnipotent, he is certainly able to enlighten the darkest soul; and as he is God incarnate, he is engaged to do it. He will use his almighty power; and if he give the word, "Let there be light," there will be light. Upon the strength of this evidence we must believe, that it is the name, and the office, and the glory of Jesus Christ, to be the light of the faithful through this dark wilderness of sin and sorrow.

Convinced of this, there is an important inquiry to be made, without which our conviction will be of no use; and that is, have we reduced it to practice? Since Christ is the foundation of all saving truth, have we been led to seek it from him, and him only? In our studies of divine learning, do we always read the scripture with humility and prayer, desiring, in the royal psalmist's words, which are devout and short, and which contain an excellent prayer always to be used before we open a Bible, "Lord, open thou mine eyes, that I may see wondrous things in thy law." And in our studies of human learning, have we taken Christ for a light to guide us and bless us, that we might attain more understanding than the aged? Rather have we not robbed the eternal light of his name, and office, and glory, by seeking saving truth from the light of nature? If God be true, and the scriptures which I have read be his word—nature is dark and blind. To talk of the light of fallen nature, and all nature is fallen, is more absurd than to talk of the darkness of light. There cannot be a more wicked contradiction to God and his word, to experience and matter of fact, than for men professing Christianity to talk about the light of sinful, dark, and blind nature; neither can there be a greater insult offered to the incarnate God, than to seek that light which he was made incarnate on purpose to give, from metaphysics, or any science that pretends to manifest spiritual objects without revelation; neither can there be a greater crime, than to think of seeing and reasoning à priori, because this is God's incommunicable attribute, of which he is so jealous, that for pretending to it we were all cast out of paradise. In honour, then, to the God whom we worship, and out of love to our own souls, let us talk no more of the light of fallen nature; let us degrade the unnatural science of metaphysics, and forget all abstracted reasonings; they can give us no light in the things of God, but what is borrowed, and it is fainter than the faintest stars; and were they brighter than they are, yet when the sun arises, his superior lustre hides their pale and glimmering rays. God be praised, the sun of righteousness has arisen among us in perfect beauty, and false science is hiding her head. He shines with his noon-day glory upon this highly favoured church. Long may he shine unrivalled by any fancied light of fallen nature. And may his brightest beams enlighten this university, that every member of it, guided by his word and Spirit, may receive the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the person of Jesus Christ.

If it should be inquired, in what manner Christ enlightens the spirits of men, whether it be in some certain regular way, or he has left no sure direction in this case: the answer is, God has established the means of grace for this very purpose, of which his word is the principal—"For the commandment is a lamp, and the law is light." And when his good Spirit accompanies the hearing or reading of the word, then it is indeed a lantern unto our feet, and a light unto our paths. Then the word discovers to us the wretched darkness of our natural state, strips reason of all its high and divine titles, and thereby humbles us before God, and brings us low before his footstool, waiting upon him in all the means of grace, and particularly in prayer, that the light of the glorious gospel of Christ may shine into our dark and sinful hearts. To expect this light without the use of the instituted means is enthusiasm; and to expect to keep this light, after you once have it, without continuing in the use of these means, is the very madness of enthusiasm. In them God has promised to be found of those that seek him. Out of them you have no promise; and you may as reasonably hope God will create a new light for you to read by in the night, as that he will enlighten you without the established means, without prayer, and the word and sacraments. And therefore, whenever you are tempted to entertain such hopes, be assured it is a delusion of the devil's, and beware, at the peril of your souls, lest the light which you suppose to be in you be darkness; for remember it is written, "Woe be unto them that put darkness for light and light for darkness." In order to keep clear of this woe, let us wait in the use of the appointed means, and then we may with truth and soberness expect, that Christ will enlighten us with all saving truth, and particularly with a full and practical conviction of that great truth, which I proposed to consider in the second place, viz. That Jesus Christ is the foundation of all acceptance with God the Father.

The same sinfulness which darkened the faculties of the soul, and separated us from God, stirred up his holiness, and justice, and truth against us. Against these attributes we had sinned, and they were become our enemies, and until they received full satisfaction, God the Father would not accept us. He declared under the law that he would accept nothing in atonement but what was perfect, and perfection is not in the sinner. The sacrifices were to be without blemish. This was the standing rule—"Whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer, for it shall not be acceptable for you—and whosoever offereth a peace-offering or a free-will offering, it shall be perfect, to be accepted, there shall be no blemish therein." (Lev. xxii. 20, 21.) This was both to shadow out the absolute perfection of our holy, harmless, and undefiled high-priest, who should by the one offering of himself make a perfect satisfaction for sin, and also to convince the sinner of his utter inability to make any satisfaction: for the sinfulness of his nature and the sinfulness of his life would render every thing he could do imperfect and sinful, until he should be accepted in the Beloved.

Men are not much affected with the sinfulness of their nature until Christ enlighten them. Sin which first blinded their eyes, by its deceitfulness keeps them blinded. And although the fountain of iniquity, the corrupt heart within, is always sending out filthy streams, yet it gives them little uneasiness until the divine light break in, and lay open to view its impurity. Then the sinner finds and confesses, that he is by nature a child of wrath. He freely subscribes to the scripture account of the corruption of mankind, as it is described by Moses and the prophets, and expressly treated of in the 14th and 53d Psalms, upon which St. Paul has given us a comment in the 3d chapter of the Romans, and he sums it up in these emphatical words: "for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

If any doubt should remain concerning the meaning of these scriptures, our church has removed it in her 9th article, where she determines, that "original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk) but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit, and therefore in every person born into the world it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." This is a truly scriptural account of man's sinful and guilty state by nature, to which add the sinfulness of his life, and you separate him still farther from God: for what man is he that liveth and sinneth not? And sin is the transgression of the law—and the law is holy, just, and good—it is so pure and spiritual, that it cannot overlook the least offence. It must have perfect unerring obedience in thought, word, and deed, or it puts the offender under the curse: for it is written, "Cursed is every one, who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them." You must continue (without intermission) in all things (not keeping nine commandments and breaking the tenth, not keeping them all outwardly, and breaking them in thought) that are written in the book of the law to do them; not only to purpose well, and to make good resolutions, but you must also do and execute them, or the law can show you no mercy. And which of us has kept the law in this perfect manner? Who can say, that he never offended in thought, word, or deed? Certainly every mouth must be stopped, and all the world must plead guilty before that righteous Judge, who trieth the very hearts and reins.

Now God has already past the decree against a sinful nature, and against a sinful life. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." God is faithful and just to fulfil his decrees—he is almighty to execute them—and what can man do under a state of guilt and condemnation to reverse them? Two things are requisite, each of which are as much out of his power as to create a world. He must first change his own nature, which is like the Ethiopian's changing his skin, and he must be renewed in the spirit of his mind with every sweet and holy temper. And then this change wrought by himself must make a full satisfaction to the holiness of God for his past pollution, to the justice of God for the violation of his laws, and to the truth of God, that he may be true, and yet remit the threatened punishment. But alas! man has neither will nor power to change his nature: who can say I have made my heart clean—I am pure from my sin? No man can truly say, I have done it: for it is God's work. To create a clean heart, is as great an act, as to create the heart at first; and accordingly we find the prophet praying to God for it—"Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." And until God create a clean heart, how can any thing clean proceed from it? Who in an impure nature can do a pure action? Who under the curse of the law, and under the sentence of condemnation, can perform a meritorious service? Who by his own works can attain such perfect unspotted righteousness, that God the Father will accept him in virtue of it? The scripture hath determined that there is none righteous, no not one, and that by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified; and our church has determined the same in her articles and homilies, affirming that we are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and not for our own works or deservings.

A great part of the mistakes in religion arises from men's not attending to these truths. They have not a deep conviction of their lost estate by nature, which occasions their not seeing in its proper light the necessity of their recovery by grace. The malady of a sinful heart is not painful enough to make them apply to the sovereign Physician: nor is the burden of a sinful life heavy enough to persuade them to seek the comfort of this scripture—"Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." But when conscience alarms them, when guilt terrifies, and they read the sentence of condemnation passed upon them in the law, then helpless and miserable in themselves, with transports of joy will they receive the glad tidings of the gospel, which discovers to them how they may be reconciled to an offended God. To such persons, whose eyes the Lord has opened to see their guilt and their misery, the gospel sets forth Jesus Christ as the sole foundation of their acceptance. We are said to be accepted in the Beloved, who came in our nature to work out that perfect righteousness for us, which infinite holiness, and justice, and truth required, and which we could not by our own power attain; but by the merits of his obedience, sufferings, death, and resurrection, he is able to clothe us with the immaculate robe of his righteousness, in which we shall be presented before God the Father without spot of sin unto salvation.

It must be always remembered, that our Saviour was God and man united in one Christ; by which union, whatever he did and suffered for us became truly divine and infinite. Jesus shed his blood, and the scripture says it was the blood of God. Jesus died for us, and the scripture says, that God laid down his life. In what sense can these expressions be understood, unless the Godhead and manhood were united in one person? This fundamental doctrine of God's being in Christ reconciling the world unto himself must never be forgotten, when we are speaking of the merits of Christ's actions and sufferings. Our nature was impure and corrupt, the imaginations of our hearts were only evil continually. Christ came in a pure spotless nature, separate from sinners, that whatever he did for them might appear without blemish before God the Father. He began his ministry with resisting the devil and all his temptations, to atone for our yielding to them; for us he conquered, and from his conquest, grace is derived to the faithful to resist all his temptations. Then he obeyed the law; its purity, its spirituality, its extensiveness, could find in him no transgression in thought, word, or deed. Its highest demands were answered: for according to its utmost rigour, "he continued in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them." And thus he redeemed us from the curse of the law, and as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. Then he humbled himself to suffer what we ought to have suffered for our disobedience. The holy, innocent Jesus bore our griefs and carried our sorrows throughout the scene of his bitter passion. See him on the eve of the crucifixion in the garden, alone, prostrate upon the cold ground, in an extreme sharp night, and lo! at the sight of that load which he was going to take upon him, a preternatural sweat flows through his raiment, and falls to the ground in great drops. Oh cursed sin! with what an holy hatred ought we to crucify thee, since the prospect only of the number and guilt of our sins, and the wrath and vengeance of the Father due to them, forced our blessed Lord to sweat as it were great drops of blood falling to the ground. Being apprehended, he came as a free, ready victim to bear those sufferings, of which we cannot form a perfect idea at present, and unless the vengeance of a justly offended God should hereafter pour the vials of his wrath upon our guilty heads, we shall never know them. God grant that Christ may have endured them for every one of us. The outward part of his passion was but a faint picture of what he endured, when the chastisement of our peace was laid upon him, and yet of the outward part he might truly say, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if ever there was any sorrow like unto my sorrow," &c. The shame that ought to cover all our faces he endured; for us the guilty, and shameless in guilt, if by continuing in sin we put him again to an open shame, he was despised and rejected of men; he was mocked, and derided, and spit upon, buffeted and scourged, crowned with thorns and blindfolded, falsely accused, and falsely condemned. Then behold him bearing his cross. When we see him fainting and sinking under the load, and his face and raiment covered with blood, does it not bring to mind what he says of himself in the book of Psalms? "The ploughers ploughed upon my back and made long furrows"—they ploughed up his back with the long and deep wounds of their stripes and scourges; but by these stripes we were healed. Nay, he says more in another Psalm, that he was so wounded from head to foot, there was no whole part in his body: and you cannot doubt of it, if you raise your eyes to the cross, and see the suffering, bleeding Lamb of God in the last scene of his passion. And yet this was the least part of his sufferings. "Give me any grief," says the wise man, "but the grief of the mind, for a wounded spirit who can bear?" Who indeed can bear a spirit wounded of God? When Jesus was in the garden, his soul was exceeding sorrowful, was in an agony, even unto death; but these were only the beginning of sorrows. When he took upon him the iniquities of us all, and almighty justice finding them upon him demanded full satisfaction, and received it to the uttermost farthing, then he had a wounded spirit, such as all the men upon earth, no, not all the holy angels in heaven could have sustained for a moment. He bore it for six hours, hanging upon the cursed tree, until all was finished; then he bowed his head and gave up the ghost. And thus he was made sin for us, and suffered for our sins, who knew no sin himself, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him: and he became obedient to death, even the death of the cross, and tasted death for every man. He died to save our souls and bodies from the power of death. And he rose again, that we might receive justification to life, that our souls might arise here from the grave of sin, and that our bodies might in God's good time arise from the grave of death, and both of them, united in a glorified state, might receive eternal life as the free gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. And being thus made perfect through obeying and suffering, through death and resurrection, he became the author of eternal salvation. He wrought out such perfect righteousness to be imputed unto sinners, that he is now able to save them to the uttermost. He has the infinite merit of his obedience to atone for their disobedience. He has the infinite merit of his sufferings to free them from suffering. He died, to save them from the first and the second death. He rose again, that they might rise to a newness of life here in grace, and to life everlasting in glory. And he is now the one Mediator between God and man, able and willing to plead the fulness of his merits for the acceptance of every sinner, who comes unto God the Father through him. From

Hence it follows, That Jesus Christ is the foundation of our acceptance. If God the Father ever receive us as just and righteous, it must be in the perfect righteousness of his Son. We must be accepted in the Beloved; in whom the Father was well pleased, and through whom he will be well pleased with us. The passages before cited clearly prove, that this is the doctrine of all scripture. The Psalmist has given us the sentiments of the Old Testament worthies—"I, will go in the strength of the Lord God— I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." And God forbid that we, under the New Testament, should make mention of any other. Shall we go about to establish our own righteousness in opposition to the righteousness of God? Or shall we, under the guilt of original and actual sin, think of working out any righteousness for which we shall be accepted in part or altogether? If we could, then Christ obeyed and suffered in vain. If we could attain saving knowledge by the light of nature, and could act agreeably to it by the law of nature, then of what use would be the light and law of the gospel? But nature has no light, it is dark and blind in the things of God, and what can its law be, that is discovered by a dark and blind nature, but darkness and blindness? Nay, it is something worse. If fallen nature has any law, it is the law of the members, which warreth against the law of God, and bringeth a man into captivity to the law of sin. This is the only law of nature to be met with in the word of God: for nature is fallen and corrupt; it is depraved in the will and affections, as well as ignorant in the understanding. It is always inclined and prone to evil; "for the flesh," (which stands in scripture for the fallen depraved affections of the natural man) "lusteth always against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these two are contrary the one to the other"—the will of the natural man is always contrary to the will of God; from hence it follows, that what is called the religion of nature, is contrary to the religion of God: because nature used with religion confines it to man's nature, no other nature being concerned in the question; and man's nature is fallen and corrupt, sinful in the fountain, and sinful in the streams, and what then can the religion be, which this nature is able to discover and to practise? Certainly it must be a blind and corrupt religion. Jesus Christ makes no part of it. He is not the foundation upon which it stands. The finest system of the religion of nature that ever was delineated, builds nothing upon him, and since there is no other foundation but him, consequently it stands upon nothing. And if the heart was not corrupt as well as blind, it would be unaccountable what should tempt men with the pure word of God in their hands, which is able to make them wise unto salvation, to neglect it, and to write, and read, and study those antichristian systems, which can teach no wisdom but what is earthly, sensual, devilish.

Men and brethren, be not offended; it behoves me to use great plainness of speech. If I was to speak smooth things, and to give flattering titles to the religion of nature, I should not be the servant of Christ; for this religion was set up, and has been used, to hurt his interest; and when we see it has succeeded, surely it is high time for those servants, who love their master's praise more than the praise of men, to set themselves strenuously against it. Happy will it be for this place, if the noble company of his servants should increase, until the religion of nature has not one admirer left. Jesus Christ will be exalted among you in proportion as the religion of nature falls in esteem: and he has promised, "them that honour me, I will honour." Honour Jesus Christ, and exalt him above all, and then his highest honours shall descend upon this university, and he will make her very enemies to be at peace with her. Oh for that happy day, when the honour that is of God shall be sought after as the crown and reward of all your studies! And why need we doubt it? We have an earnest before our eyes. Do we not see the religion of nature losing its interest every day? Do not men begin to be afraid of trusting the vast concerns of eternity upon it? And have they not good reason? For has it not appeared, from what has been said, that its first principles are antichristian? They suppose man's natural faculties to be able to investigate the things of God—Scripture absolutely denies it. They suppose he has will and power to act agreeably to the will of God—Scripture absolutely denies that he has either will or power. They suppose that, by practising the duties of natural religion, you may altogether or in part render yourselves acceptable to God—Scripture absolutely denies this, declaring that there is no other foundation of acceptance but Jesus Christ. And besides, the religion of nature manifestly tends to rob the God of our salvation of his glory, and to lessen the merits of his righteousness, as much as scripture tends to exalt both. And both are exalted, wherever the scripture is received pure and unmixed with human systems; and we have melancholy experience of the contempt offered to both, wherever the religion of nature is embraced. The doctrine of the ever-blessed Trinity, on which all scripture stands, makes no part of this religion. So that the religion of the Bible and the religion of nature have different objects of worship. The Christian worships one God in trinity, and trinity in unity; but this is rank idolatry with the natural man, who adores one supreme being, a metaphysical divinity, existing in one person, with certain imaginary attributes, such as infinitely extended, filling all space, &c.—Hence he explodes the divinity of Jesus Christ—hence he despises the authority of his laws—hence that dissoluteness of morals throughout the kingdom, which all men see, and even the professors of natural religion confess. Would to God they were convinced, what a great share they have in it, and how much of it they have to answer for. It would be for their present and eternal peace, if, instead of maintaining and teaching this unscriptural religion, which is the sink of heresy and corruption, they would join their hearts and hands in exalting the religion of Jesus Christ, and his infallible word, wherein that religion is contained, and in labouring to bring the lives as well as the opinions of men into obedience to it. How highly it is incumbent upon you, my brethren, to promote this much desired reformation, I need not further urge at present. than by reminding you of a very awful truth, to which we have all set our hands, and may God set our hearts to act agreeably to it. What I mean is the 18th article of our church, wherein we have declared, "They also are to be had accursed, that presume to say, that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature. For holy scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved." In this article we have given in our public testimony before God and his church against the light and the law of nature, and with our own mouths have put both of them under the curse. And shall we with the same mouths afterwards preach up the light and law of nature, and pronounce them blessed? God forbid. I hope his good Spirit will keep us free from this monstrous guilt, and enable us in all our preaching to set forth only the name of Jesus Christ whereby men must be saved.

But it may be here enquired, if man in a state of nature be at enmity with God, and can be accepted only through Jesus Christ, by what means shall he seek this reconciliation? The scripture has given us this plain and easy method; God the Father accepts us through the all-perfect righteousness of Christ; this righteousness is imputed unto us by faith; and the true living faith is a divine grace wrought in the soul by the giver of every good and perfect gift. It is not the result of comparing evidence, and of giving the assent to the strongest arguments; for a man may do this without the least grain of saving faith: but it is, according to St. Paul, the gift of God.—And in another place he calls it one of the fruits of the Spirit.—And St Peter says, it is God that purifieth the heart by faith. He enables the sinner, who finds his want of Christ's righteousness, to seek it, and to lay hold of it: for whoever hungers and thirsts after Christ's righteousness, has a promise, that he shall be filled, even filled with peace and joy in believing that this righteousness is imputed unto him, and with the love of God, which is shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Spirit. And if there be any truth in God or man, this promise is now fulfilled, and every one that enters into our Lord's kingdom finds righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Some persons think they can easily evade the force of this reasoning by suggesting it to be possible, that all this may be a delusion. If a man is not acquainted with the scripture marks of true faith, and is not careful to compare them with his own experience, possibly he may be deluded, and fancy, that God has accepted him, when he has not. But if he sets out deeply convinced of his want of faith, waits for it in the instituted way, in that way receives it, and the effects of true faith follow upon receiving it, then if such a person may be deluded, there is no certainty in the world. The scriptures were written to direct us in these points, and they are so plain, that the wayfaring man, though foolish, cannot err therein. They have given us one infallible rule to guide our inquiries, which is to examine the nature of faith by its purifying virtue. Wherever the true faith is, it purifies the heart, cleansing it from the pollution and from the guilt of sin, and destroying also the dominion of sin, so that the believer daily grows in grace, and goes on in his Christian course, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

If faith does not work thus in an holy life, it is indeed a delusion. What doth it profit my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, and have not works? If he have not a working faith, an active, operative grace, purifying the heart from sin, and producing in the clean heart all the fruits of the Spirit, he wants the scripture marks of true faith; and let him talk ever so much, and be ever so strongly persuaded of his acceptance with God, he is in a dangerous delusion. It is but a dead thing which he supposes to be the living faith: for it is written, "As the body without breath is dead, so faith without works is dead also." Works are the breath of faith. If it be alive it will breathe, as certainly as the living body breathes. If it have no breath, no works to evidence its life, the scripture looks upon it to be a dead carcase; but if it breathes, and acts, and abounds in every good word and work to the glory of God, and to the service of men, then we may with as much certainty pronounce it to be the true faith, as we can pronounce the body to be alive, when it is able to perform all the offices of its animal life: for as the body while it breathes is alive, so faith while it works is alive also. In this case there can be no delusion; because we follow the sure rule laid down for our direction, "By their fruits ye shall know them." How can we mistake the fruits of the Spirit for the fruits of the flesh? Is not every tree known by its own fruit? Do men ever think of gathering figs of thorns, or grapes of a bramble-bush? The fruits of grace, and of fallen nature, are as opposite as the two spirits which produce them. The one abounds in the works of the flesh, the other crucifies the flesh with its affections and lusts. The one fills the mind with spiritual pride, envy, and malice, the other begins with humility, and works by love. The one lives in open transgression of the laws of God, the other conforms his words and works, and even the thoughts of his heart, to the standard of scripture. Can you see these different fruits, and be at a loss to determine who is the author of each? Surely we want no evidence to disprove the pretensions of an adulterer, a fornicator, an unclean person, and the rest mentioned by the apostle. Their lives speak their want of faith. By their fruits we see that they have not the root of the matter within them, because they hold the truth in unrighteousness. They must either have deluded themselves, or else they are downright hypocrites: for it is of the very essence of true faith to destroy sin, and to work in an holy obedience. When we are accepted in the Beloved, and faith in his blood has purified our hearts, then we are, through his grace, both prepared and also able to show this work of faith in our lives and conversations; and this point comes to be considered under the third head, which was to prove, That Jesus Christ is the foundation of all holy obedience. But this I must leave for the subject of another discourse, and would only observe at present from what has been said, that since Christ is the foundation of all saving knowledge, it is our duty to seek it from him in all means of grace, and especially in the word: for the commandment is pure, enlightening the eyes. Whoever hears and reads it with humility and prayer, will find the eyes of his understanding enlightened. He will see clearly the things of God, and will see more clearly than others can, the useful arts and sciences. If he study them under the direction of divine grace, and with a view to the divine glory, the eternal light will shine into his heart, and give him more understanding than his teachers. And since Jesus Christ is the foundation of our acceptance with God the Father, let us seek to be accepted through faith, and never think of setting up any righteousness of our own in opposition to his. He is the Lord our righteousness, through whose merits imputed unto us by faith, God will receive us as just and righteous. And may the Holy Spirit give you the practical conviction of these two important truths, that you may find the knowledge of the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ, and may, through his all-perfect righteousness, be presented before God the Father without spot of sin unto salvation; to whom with the Son and the Holy Spirit, three persons in the unity of the Godhead, be equal glory, worship, and praise, in the church militant and triumphant, now and for ever. Amen.

SERMON II.

Other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.—
1 Cor. iii. 11.

From the scope and design of these words, which were opened in a former discourse, it was proposed to consider the following particulars:

First, That Jesus Christ is the foundation of all saving knowledge.

Secondly, He is the foundation of all acceptance with God the Father.

Thirdly, He is the foundation of all holy obedience. And,

Lastly, He is the foundation of our present and eternal happiness.

Under the first head it was proved, that man's natural ignorance and blindness in the things of God made it necessary he should be enlightened. Jesus Christ came into the world to open the blind eyes, and to be a light to them that sat in darkness. He says of himself, "I am the light of the world, and whosoever believeth in me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." He is as truly the light of the spiritual, as the sun is the light of the material, world, and whoever seeks to be enlightened with any saving truth, must receive it from the gracious influence of his divine rays. And under the Second head, man's natural corruption and actual sinfulness were considered. The holiness, justice, and truth of God could not accept the sinner, while he lay in this state of pollution and guilt, and he could do nothing to deliver himself from it, but must have lived here and for ever separated from God, unless Jesus Christ had obeyed and suffered, died and risen again, to work out that perfect righteousness, through the merits of which, imputed unto the sinner by faith, God the Father will now accept him, and receive him as just and righteous into his love and into his heaven. From whence it follows, by direct consequence, that until he be thus accepted he can do no good works, which comes to be considered under the Third head, viz., that Jesus Christ is the foundation of all holy obedience. Man in his natural state cannot perform any holy obedience. He wants both will and power, until his person be accepted through Jesus Christ, and united to him by true and lively faith. The doctrine of our church upon this point is very clear and full. In the 13th article, entitled, "Of works before justification," she teaches that —"Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God; forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace or (as the school authors say) deserve grace of congruity: yea rather for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin." Our works are not acceptable, until we have the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit to render our persons accepted. Nay, the very best works we can do, if they be not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, have certainly in them the nature of sin. "We doubt not but they have the nature of sin," is a very strong expression; but our pious reformers could not soften it. They had left the bishop of Rome upon account of the doctrine of merit, which the Papists hold, and it is the most dangerous of all their tenets; for hereby they go about to establish their own righteousness, not submitting themselves to the righteousness of God. All the reformers joined in asserting justification by faith only, knowing that Christ was the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. It is impossible to be more clear and express against the merit of works, than the compilers of our articles and homilies are; they seem to have been guided in their opinion by two principal reasons, both taken from scripture, the first respecting God, the second ourselves.

It is impossible to do any good works well pleasing to God, until we are accepted in Christ, because our whole nature is sinful—in it dwelleth no good thing, and without the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, no good thing can ever dwell. The scripture declares us to be by nature children of wrath. We became objects of God's wrath when, by the original offence, mankind transgressed his holy, just, and good law. Then his holiness, justice, and goodness became concerned to inflict the threatened punishment, which they did inflict, and to which every son of Adam is subject, until he be accepted through Jesus Christ. In this fallen state he is like an attainted rebel, who cannot do any action that is deemed good and valid in law, until his attainder be reversed, and he be restored in blood. This is our very case in spirituals. What can we do that will be deemed good and valid in the court of heaven, while we are under a state of forfeiture, our persons are guilty, and our whole nature (as our church expresses it) deserves God's wrath and damnation ?

And we are still more incapable of doing any acceptable works, if we consider the state we are in by actual transgression. We are under sentence of condemnation for the first offence; for the law is of so pure and spiritual a nature as to reach to the inmost thoughts of the heart. It requires truth in the inward parts, and expects perfect obedience there, as well as in the words and actions. The style of it is, "Do this, and thou shalt live." It promises life, but to them only who never err from its commandments. One single failing cuts us off from the promised life, and puts us under the curse: for it is written "Cursed is every man who continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them." Now the same law which has brought him in guilty before God, cannot acquit him afterwards; because he is already a convict, is sentenced, and under the curse, and he can think of no method of escaping the deserved punishment, but to pay an unerring obedience for the future. Supposing he could do this, yet it would be making no satisfaction; because after one transgression by the deeds of the law can no flesh be justified. It is an adjudged case, that partial obedience can make no atonement to the law which required perfect obedience: the equity of this proceeding we acknowledge in our own laws. If a criminal, found guilty of murder, was to allege in his defence that he had broken no other law of the land, that he was not a thief, nor an adulterer, &c., would this plea be allowed in court? Would he be acquitted of the murder, because it was not attended with robbery? No. The judge would observe to him, that he came there to be tried for a murder, and that he was found guilty by the law, and as such must be condemned; for he that said, Thou shalt not steal, said also, Thou shalt do no murder. Now if thou commit no robbery, yet if thou kill, thou art a transgressor of the law: for whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all, and is under guilt and condemnation as if he had offended against the whole law. The law of God is pure and spiritual, and allows of no deviation from it. If it gives life, it must have perfect and unerring obedience: where this is wanting in one instance, it cannot take partial obedience as any atonement for disobedience: from whence it follows, that men under the guilt of original and actual sin cannot, with respect to God, perform any holy obedience. And

With respect to ourselves, there is another reason, which being taken from a matter of fact, should carry with it full conviction. Our fallen nature is so entirely depraved, that it has neither will nor power to perform any holy obedience. The old man of sin, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, can do nothing but sin. And until he be put off and crucified with all his affections and lusts, we cannot put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness; for we are not only corrupt, but also under the bondage of corruption: not only sinners, but also slaves to sin, sold under sin, and led captive to commit it by the devil at his will. Sin has such an absolute dominion, that although it exercises the most cruel tyranny, yet men have no desire to shake off its yoke. Sin wears away their bodies in its service, and yet they are pleased with their own destruction, and sin on. Whenever the tyrant commands—Do this, the natural man doeth it, though it be at the peril of his life. When sin puts him upon a course of uncleanness, which he knows will bring the infirmities of old age upon him before he has come to manhood, or a course of intemperance, which must end in painful and acute distempers, the poor slave submits. And must not sin reign in his mortal body, since he thus obeys it in the lusts thereof? Must it not have absolute dominion over him, since he thus yields his members instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, and yields them even to work out his own destruction? And when he sees this destruction before his eyes, yet he has no desire to avoid it; we have neither will nor power to deliver ourselves from sin's dominion, because when we were yet without strength, Christ died for the ungodly. The soul was enslaved, and without strength to recover its liberty as well as the body. Which of its faculties are free and able to cast off the tyranny of sin? Can this good desire arise first in the imagination? It cannot. The imaginations of the heart of the natural man are evil, and only evil, and that continually. Can it arise in the understanding? It cannot; for it is in darkness. When the Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek after God, he found none, no not one—they were wise enough to do evil, but to do good they had no knowledge: neither had they a will to choose it; for the natural man follows the will of the flesh, which is always contrary to the will of God, and with the heart and affections he serves the law of sin.

Thus the dominion of sin is universal. It commands all the faculties of soul and body, which serve it with a willing and uninterrupted obedience; and from what has been said with respect to God, and with respect to ourselves, it is evident that the natural man is utterly unable to perform any holy obedience. This is the plain doctrine of scripture, and it is confirmed by our church in her 10th article, which declares, that "the condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will." Both the good will and the power to work with it come from Christ; and the manner in which he bestows both upon us is thus described in scripture. God the Father accepts us as righteous through the merits of Jesus Christ, whereby we are justified; upon which we are united to Christ, through faith given us by his Holy Spirit; and from this union we receive continual supplies of grace to enable us to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, which are well pleasing unto God the Father.

This vital union with Christ, the head of the body, is the principle of divine life in all his members, and it is expressed in scripture by various phrases, which denote the reality and absolute certainty of it, and which cannot admit of a metaphorical sense, such as "Christ's dwelling in us, and we in him; our being rooted and planted into him, and built up in him; our being of one spirit and one flesh with him; our living and being led by his Spirit." And it is also represented by various images, such as the union between the head and the body:—What a strange body would it be, which had only a metaphorical union with the head? Between the bread and the eater:—What sort of a constitution must it be which could live upon metaphorical bread? And between the foundation and the building:—What kind of a building would it be, which should stand upon a metaphorical foundation? But chiefly between the vine and the branches, which our Lord has largely treated of in John xv. "I am the vine," says he, "ye are the branches. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing." If any man abide in Christ, and bear much fruit to the glory of the Father, he must be as truly and as vitally united to Christ, as the branches are to the vine; for he is the root and stock, from whence the branches receive their nourishment, and are enabled to bring forth fruit; and therefore whoever is not united to Christ can have no principle of divine life in him, but is like a branch cut off from the stock and withered, whose end is to be burnt.

From these scriptures it is evident, that we cannot live to God, nor bring forth any fruit unto holiness until we are united to Christ, and have fellowship with him. The Spirit of God is the bond of this union; for he gives us the true faith, whereby the soul is enabled to reject every thing that would seperate it from Christ, and to cast away all hopes of salvation in its own endeavours and works, and thus placing no merit in any thing it can do, it closes in with the free offer of mercy in Christ Jesus, whom faith has a peculiar fitness to receive, and does actually receive him with all his fulness, as these scriptures testify; "For we have access," says the apostle, "and entrance by faith into that grace of Christ, wherein we stand." And, again, "Christ dwelleth in our hearts by faith." And that most holy faith, whereby Christ dwelleth in us, enables us to live the life of Christ: for by purifying all the faculties of the soul, it makes us to be like him, to love his image, and to desire it may be perfectly formed in our souls. And, accordingly, by the close and intimate union which faith keeps up between Christ and us, we are made comformable to his death and resurrection; for faith draws virtue from his death to destroy the dominion of sin, and from his resurrection to rise to newness of life. Nothing but the influence of the death of Christ, and a real fellowship with it, can free us from sin's dominion. We must be planted together in the likeness of his death, if we ever get any mortifying power over the body of sin. And we must be also planted into the likeness of his resurrection, that we, who are by nature dead in trespasses and sins, may be quickened in Christ, and made alive in him. St. Paul had happy experience of this doctrine—"I am crucified," says he, "with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God." And whoever is crucified with Christ in the same manner, has the body of sin destroyed, that henceforth he should not serve sin; and whoever liveth by the same faith in the Son of God, has continual supplies of grace from Jesus Christ to enable him to live a life of holiness unto God.

This is the scripture doctrine of holy obedience. We are therein taught that God must work in us whatever is well pleasing to him. St. Paul prays thus for his Hebrews: "Now the God of peace make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ," who came in the flesh to destroy in us ungodliness and worldly lusts, that we might be fit to perform holy obedience. "The great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," says he, "gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." And again another scripture saith, "We are created in Christ Jesus unto good works." When we are made new creatures in him, then have we a new nature with new affecctions, which delight to obey the will of God, as much as the old sinful nature hated it; for if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, old things are passed away, behold all things are become new. He is renewed throughout, in body, soul, and spirit. The body, which sin enslaved and defiled, is cleansed by the blood of Christ, and consecrated by his Spirit for a holy temple to the living God. The soul is enriched with the divine graces of faith, and hope, and love, which work upon all the faculties, restraining the imagination, enlightening the understanding, regulating the will, and turning the heart and affections to God; and then renewing the spirit day by day with the sweet and holy tempers of the blessed Jesus, that the whole man may grow up to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Nothing availeth in Christ Jesus but this new creature. God the Father will accept of no obedience, unless it be the work of this new nature. Our best duties and services are displeasing to him, unless we be renewed by faith in the spirit of the mind, as our church has clearly determined in the 12th article. "Albeit that good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after (don't go before) justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment, yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith, insomuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known, as a tree discerned by the fruit."

From these authorities it is evident, that Jesus Christ is the foundation of all holy obedience. Until you be accepted in him, you can do no good works; nay, without him you can do nothing. The scripture and our articles and homilies speak full to this point, and they entirely overthrow the destructive doctrine of the Papists and Socinians, who agree in maintaining the merit of works. Every true son of our church has renounced their heresies. The scripture has assured him, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord; but he finds the sinfulness of his nature reigning in many unholy tempers, and breaking out into many offences, against which he strives, but not in his own strength; for he is convinced that his soul is by nature dead in trespasses and sins, and that all his striving can no more give it spiritual life, than rubbing and chafing a dead carcase can restore to it animal life, and therefore he does not seek to attain holiness, while his nature continues corrupt and dead in sin. The gospel method is directly contrary. It first cleanses the heart, from whence are the issues of life, and then the streams will certainly run pure. It directs you to labour first to be reconciled unto God, that you may be accepted through the righteousness of Jesus Christ, and justified by his merits, and then you will have a new nature inclined to holiness, and endued by the Holy Spirit with power to seek and to attain it. After you have received justification to life, you may go on with the work of sanctification; for by justification your nature is regenerate and new born, and sanctification is the proper work of this regenerate nature, as it brings all its parts and faculties into use, whereby they improve and grow in strength. Justification, which is the new birth of the soul, is like the first birth of the infant into this world. When it is born, it has all the parts of the body perfect; no new ones are added afterwards, only these grow in size and strength, until they reach to the stature of a man, as the graces grow in the justified soul until it arrive to a perfect man in Christ. And then God, who has been glorified by it upon earth, will receive it into his eternal glory through Jesus Christ our Lord—

Who is the foundation of our present and eternal happiness, as I proposed in the fourth and last place to consider. This is a direct consequence from what has been said, and does not require many words to illustrate it; for since the sinner has no saving knowledge, until Christ enlighten him; since God the Father will not accept his person, but through the righteousness of Christ, nor his works, but as done in Christ, and flowing from living faith in him, then it is certain that whatever happiness he enjoys must be derived from the Lord and giver of grace and glory. He can merit none; for when he has done all these things that are commanded him, which yet no man has done, he was even then to say, I am an unprofitable servant, I have done that which was my duty to do; and therefore I cannot deserve present, and much less eternal, happiness from the hand of God.

By present happiness I mean those comforts of the gospel which I have been describing, and which the heavenly Comforter administers to the sinner, when he is enlightened with saving truth, when he is convinced of his reconciliation with God the Father, and satisfied that the divine holiness, justice, and truth, are no longer his enemies, but will now make all things work together for his good: and when he is assured of the truth of his reconciliation, as well from the inward witness of the Spirit of God with his spirit, as from the holy obedience in which he now delights, and which he has power to perform, this happy soul enjoys the comforts of present salvation, which are daily strengthened in it more and more, as it grows in grace, and bears fairer and richer fruits of holiness: for this growth in grace is an evident proof of our acceptance with God, and a fruitful source of spiritual comfort: when we find ourselves renewed in the spirit of our minds, and are pleased with the will of God in the inner man, and are enabled to run cheerfully in the way of God's commandments, the happiness arising from hence can no more be described than the joys of heaven. If you would know what blessings, love, joy, peace, and the other fruits of the Spirit bring to the soul, O taste and see how gracious the Lord is. And whenever he gives you the experience of them, you will then find that in them heaven is already begun in the soul; and if by believing we can rejoice at present with joy unspeakable, and full of glory, what must our joy be when we receive the end of our faith, even the eternal salvation of our souls? When Jesus Christ admits us into his kingdom, and bestows upon us all his spiritual blessings in heavenly places, what happiness we shall then feel, tongue cannot utter, nor can heart conceive. And inconceivably great though it be, yet it is all the free gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, "for he hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—And faith is the hand by which we receive it: "for he that believeth on me," saith the blessed Jesus, "hath everlasting life." He purchased it for us. We could not attain it by any of our own works, nor could the highest angel in heaven merit it for one of the sons of men. It was bought for us by an inestimable price, by the obedience and sufferings of the God-man Christ Jesus, and he therefore obeyed and suffered, died and rose again, that we might be heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ. He acted as our representative, by which means we have an interest in all that he did and suffered. He resisted the temper, obeyed the law, suffered the punishment due to the transgression of it, even unto death, rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sat down on the throne of glory, as the head and representative of all the elect people of God. In all these things he acted as the head of the body the church; and we commonly say, a person is crowned, when the crown is put upon his head. Now our head is already crowned, and therefore so long as he possesses his glory, we his members shall possess ours, and shall share in the glories of our heavenly king. What these eternal glories are, it surpasseth all understanding to comprehend. The scripture has revealed them to us chiefly in negative descriptions. It removes from them that imperfection to which all sublunary good is subject. It calls them riches; but then they are not subject to rust and moth, nor can thieves break in to rob us of them. It compares them to an inheritance; but then it is always in peace: no armies can lay it waste, no irregular passion can interrupt the happy enjoyment of it; and there can be no fear of losing it, because all tears are wiped away from every eye; and upon every head there is placed a crown of glory, which is "incorruptible," has no principles of dissolution, and therefore no defect in it; is "undefiled," has no stain of sin, or infirmity under it, and "fadeth not away." All human glory, like a flower of the field, withers and dies; but this is always flourishing, and blooms in never-fading spring. Thus the scripture removes every thing from our heavenly happiness, which renders our present enjoyments imperfect; and then, to make the description full, puts eternity to it. And yet, even of this eternal happiness we have but faint ideas; we know it at present but in part. We shall know it better when our almighty Saviour bestows it upon us. When he admits us into his presence, receives us into his heaven, and places the never-fading crown of glory upon our heads, then we shall feel what an eternal weight of glory is. Then we shall enjoy that beatific vision, without which heaven would not be desirable, and we shall see the Lord Jesus face to face, and shall know that he is above all blessing and praise. We know indeed at present that he is God over all, blessed for ever; but the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind, so that our knowledge and our praises are imperfect. But then we shall be free from this earthly clog, and shall see more of his excellences, and shall be more able to praise them. We shall continually find new beauties, new worlds of delight in him; for his perfections being infinite, will afford us fresh subject of praise to eternity. And our interest in them being an act of his free grace, will render them to us more precious, and the completion of them more sweet. Every new day of glory (if I may so speak, when time is no more) will bring us more in debt to his free grace. The holding of glory shall be free grace without end; so that Christ's relation of creditor, and ours of debtor, shall grow and be greater for ever. Redeemed sinners can never say, Now our tribute of praise to Jesus is fully paid, because they will be always contracting new debts, and while they stand confirmed in bliss, the more broken debtors will they be. The longer they enjoy the glory of heaven through millions of ages, the debt to the Lamb that purchased it for them by his blood with grow infinitely. Praises to eternity can take nothing from the debt; for the debt increases, while they are praising. And let the innumerable company of angels join the spirits of just men made perfect: let them raise their hearts and voices to the highest strains of praise, they would still fall short of the greatness of his merits. O Holy Spirit! now give us a heart and a tongue to join our imperfect praises with theirs. With them we ascribe salvation to the Lord God omnipotent. "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever."

I shall here finish the doctrinal parts of this discourse; but I cannot conclude without making a short application. Every useful doctrine may be reduced to practice; and all the Christian doctrines have a direct tendency to operate in our lives, and to produce their proper effects in our conversations. We have been considering some of the excellences of God our Saviour, which are not mere speculative points; because he was made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption. He is our all-wise prophet to enlighten the blindness of our understanding, and to teach us saving knowledge. He is our al meritorious priest, through the merits of whose perfect sacrifice the pollution and the guilt of our sins are taken away, and we are accepted as righteous before God the Father. And he is our almighty king, by whose grace the dominion of sin is destroyed in us, and we are enabled to perform an holy obedience. "Jesus Christ is all and in all: for we are complete in him." Salvation from first to last, from the first ray of light which broke into our dark and sinful souls until we see Christ in the fulness of glory, is all his work, and to him must the honour of it be ascribed. He is the foundation on whom it all stands: for "other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

Men, brethren, and fathers, suffer the word of exhortation. You profess, that Jesus Christ is the foundation of all saving knowledge: do you then seek it from him in the study of his holy word, and through the blessing of his good Spirit upon your studies? or are any of you seeking it from the unscriptural, unnatural light of nature, from that nature which is totally dark and blind, until the abstracted metaphysician has stolen some great truths from the revealed word, and then boasts that he was self-enlightened, and that they were self-irradiated upon his own mind by a more mysterious and enthusiastic light than the maddest Quaker ever pretended to. In their metaphysical reveries, let them talk of their light of nature; yet if God may be heard, nature is in darkness. It is blind in the things of God; nay more, until it be renewed, it cannot see and know them. To whom then would you go for the knowledge of them? To Christ, as held forth in his word, and applied by his Spirit, or rather to human learning and its arts and sciences? God forbid. They have not one ray of their own to give. Their boasted lustre is but a borrowed light. Blot the sun out of heaven, and these bright stars are at once in the blackness of darkness: for there is but one created sun to enlighten this material world, as there is but one uncreated Sun to enlighten the spiritual world here in grace, and for ever in glory. When the arts and sciences keep their proper station, reflecting the light cast upon them by the sun of righteousness, then the study of them is sanctified, and they are highly useful in the school of Christ; but unsanctified, they only tend to puff up and to feed the pride of corrupt nature. Let this be an answer to the adversary, who may object, that I am a decrier of human learning. When it is preferred to divine, I do decry it, but in no other respect. Am I an enemy to light because I prefer the all-reviving light of the sun to the faint glimmering light of the stars? Christ is the sun of righteousness, the light of the spiritual world. Let it then be your first and principal study to attain from him divine learning, and in subordination to it seek human learning. Let God be your teacher in things of God. Read his word, as he who was wiser than his teachers did, day and night; but read it with humility, and always begin with the excellent prayer before mentioned, "Lord open thou mine eyes, that I may see wondrous things in thy law." The Lord will open them, and you will not only see spiritual truths clearly, but will also be more diligent in the study of useful knowledge, and will attain more of it, than a man of the best parts, trusting to the mere strength of genius, can ever attain. And one great truth the word and the Spirit of God will certainly manifest to you, and that is,

Secondly, The manner of your acceptance. To a sinner convinced of the corruption of his nature, and of the transgressions of his life, nothing can be more interesting than to know, whether God's justice, and holiness, and truth can pardon him. The fancied light of fallen nature cannot teach him this. It never did. It never led one learned heathen, Greek or Roman, to Jesus Christ. It never can: because it is blind, and with the aid of all the sciences, blind it remains, until Christ by his word and Spirit open its eyes. Then it sees, that his righteousness imputed to it by faith is the only method of being accepted as righteous before God the Father. Are you, then, seeking to be accepted in the righteousness of the Beloved? Or, are you trying to work out some righteousness of your own, which altogether or in part may render you accepted? It must never be forgotten, that justification by faith only is the grand protestant doctrine. Justification by works is downright Popery. We separated from the bishop of Rome, because he set up the merit of works in opposition to the righteousness of God. And lo! protestant divines have fallen back again into the sink of Popery, maintaining the merit of works: as every man must do, who talks of the dignity and rectitude of human nature, of the dignity of sinful nature, and of the rectitude of fallen nature, of natural religion, of the moral sense, and of the moral scheme, and of the fitness and relation of things: for these systems are big with contradictions, unless man be able of himself to discover and to practise such duties as will render him acceptable to God. And, indeed, metaphysical writers have ascribed to blind, fallen nature both this will and power, maintaining that "every one may find within himself the rule of right, and obligations to follow it."—Bishop Butler's Sermons, p. 32. But what saith the scripture? Positively and expressly it speaks of man's having neither will nor power, unless they be given him of God. Being sinful in heart and life he lies under sentence of condemnation by the just law of heaven, and like an attainted rebel, he cannot do a legal act, until he be pardoned. Jesus Christ is the foundation of this pardon; and until we are accepted through his righteousness, our best works have in them the nature of sin. This is scripture, and the doctrine of our church. And can you believe a man to be a friend to either, who wants to establish the merit of works? Can he be a sound Protestant, or a good Church of England man? No, he cannot. Certainly, my brethren, you will condemn him with one voice. Away, then, with all the metaphysical rubbish, which has long obscured the scripture doctrine of acceptance; for the love of the Lord Jesus, and of his flock, for whom he shed his blood, let us hear no more of the religion of nature—of that religion which finds us and leaves us children of wrath: for the sake of your own present and eternal peace let all metaphysical systems of the religion of nature be no more your favourite studies. You have the holy scripture in your hands; whither would you go, but to it, for the words of eternal life? And does it not teach you that Jesus Christ came into the world to redeem us from the miseries of our fallen nature? And whose cause then are these men defending, who want to establish a religion founded on that nature, from which Christ came to redeem us? Good God! what an attempt is this, for Christian men, Christian ministers, ambassadors of Jesus Christ, not only to preach up the religion of nature, as if nature was not fallen, but also to make this religion of nature the foundation of revealed. What a monstrous paradox is this, natural religion the foundation of revealed? Is not this taking away Jesus Christ, the sure foundation which God hath laid, and putting the religion of nature under him as a foundation to bear him up, and thus trying to lay another foundation, which, if God be true, no man can lay. The folly, the guilt, and the danger of this proceeding are so evident upon the principles before laid down, that I shall not urge the matter farther at present, only if there be here any admirers of this metaphysical and unnatural religion, it may be useful to them to consider, what this religion can do for them, even as they understand it, which the religion of the Bible has not promised to do for them in a more full and ample manner, especially with respect to their performing an holy obedience, of which Jesus Christ is the sole foundation:—which is the third inference from what has been said.

Until you are accepted in Christ you cannot do any good works: because your whole nature is corrupt, and nothing but corrupt fruit can grow upon it. Are you then seeking for an holy nature, that in it you may perform an holy obedience? Are you then praying to God to be renewed in the spirit of your mind, that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith, that his will may become yours, his word your study and delight, his Spirit your guide? And is it the desire of your soul, that you may be enabled to run cheerfully in the way of God's commandments unto the end? Is Christ the foundation of this great work? And are you convinced you want grace from him every moment to carry it on? Then bring this conviction into practice. Let it operate in your lives. Where would you seek his grace, but in the means of grace? And when your persons are accepted through the righteousness of Christ imputed to you by faith, then God will accept your attendance upon these means, but not before. Then he will be found of you in them, will give his blessing to the use of them, and will enable you to abound in every good word and work to the praise of his glory. The scripture is express, that we are created in Christ Jesus unto good works. We can bear no fruit until we be grafted into him the true vine. Our church is exceeding clear upon this head. To their authorities we must submit, and we shall find the happy effects of embracing them, if they dispose us to seek, until God gives us a new nature with new faculties and affections, and enables us to bring forth much fruit to the praise of the glory of his free grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved: for then we shall find the present comforts of the gospel sweetly drawing us on in the way of duty, until we be at last presented perfect in Christ Jesus. Perfect and complete in him, but not in our own righteousness, we shall be presented before God the Father without spot of sin to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us.

To these truths every Christian assents. He lays no other foundation for his present and eternal happiness than Jesus Christ, and he is a sure foundation: for he is the author and finisher of the faith, the author to begin it here in grace, the finisher to end it, when faith shall be swallowed up in vision. As he is the author of all the works of creation, so he is the author of all the works of redemption, by whom they begin, through whom they are carried on, and in whom they will be completed: "For I am Alpha and Omega," says he, "the first and the last, which was, which is, and which is to come, the Almighty." He is the Lord God omnipotent, by whom all things were made; by his overruling providence they are supported: for he upholdeth all things by the word of his power. He is the most blessed God and Saviour in the offices of a prophet to enlighten our blind eyes and to be our wisdom—of a priest to atone for the pollution and the guilt of our sins and to be our righteousness—and of a king to destroy in us the dominion of sin and to be our sanctification. And he is God the Sovereign Judge, before whose awful tribunal we must all soon appear. View Jesus Christ in these exalted stations, where he sits far above all principalities and powers, as the first and the last in the works of creation, providence, redemption, and final judgment, and then see whether you can exalt him high enough. Is not this almighty God and King far above all blessing and praise? You cannot sufficiently extol the works of creation. Survey them with a philosopher's eye, and they will appear great and wonderful in wisdom and power, affording an unexhausted subject of praise. And how then shall we be able to magnify their Maker, who is great above all his works? Especially great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God almighty, in the redemption of a sinful world: for when you glorify the Lord Jesus for this inestimable mercy, exalt him as much as you can, even yet will he far exceed; and when you exalt him, put forth all your strength and be not weary: for you can never go far enough. How should we upon earth go far enough, when the glorified spirits, who try to exalt him as much as they are able, yet fall short? He will always, to eternity he will, be above all blessing and praise. The thousands, thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand, who are now standing round his throne, admiring his perfections, and singing the song of Moses and the Lamb, when they put forth all their strength and are not weary, still they can never go far enough. And when all the sons of God, who shouted for joy at the first creation, shall again join their voices upon the number of the elect being perfected, still he will far exceed their most exalted song. Angels and men with their highest strains of praise cannot come up to the greatness of our Lord's merit. Let the heavenly song be continued through millions of ages, yet the God whom they celebrate is infinite, and their praise therefore must fall short of the subject. The perfection of the almighty Creator, and the love of the all-merciful Redeemer, are, to the redeemed of the Lord, subjects which eternity cannot exhaust. Oh that it may be your happiness and mine to lay Jesus Christ, and him only, for the foundation of all saving knowledge, of all acceptance with the Father, and of all holy obedience, that having spent our time here by the strength of his grace in his service and to his glory, we may be admitted to see his perfections, and to be happy in the enjoyment of them, and may join our grateful hearts and voices with the blessed company of angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect, in singing the eternal hymn of thanks and praise. So be it

Lord Jesus, to the honour of the Father, and to the glory of the eternal Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, whom the church militant now worships, and the church triumphant praises for ever and ever. Amen.

A PRAYER FOR FAITH.*

We are taught by thy holy apostle, O most loving Saviour, that whatsoever is not of faith is sin, and that it is impossible to please thee without faith. And therefore they that come unto thee must believe that thou art God, yea and such a God as is both able and will also abundantly reward all them that with true faith seek thee. For thy eyes, O Lord, look upon faith, and thou dost appear and show thyself unto them that have faith in thee: yea, through faith, thou being the King of glory, art married to the souls of the faithful, and makest them partakers of thy divine nature, through the wonderful working of thy blessed Spirit. Through faith so many as believe are justified, made the sons and heirs of God, and have everlasting life. By faith we obtain of God all good things, even whatsoever we ask in thy name. Seeing that faith is so precious a jewel in thy sight, that without it nothing is acceptable unto thy divine majesty; and we of our own nature cannot have this most singular treasure except thou givest it unto us from above, and dost breathe it into our hearts by thy Holy Spirit: for we of ourselves are blind, ignorant, foolish, and by no means can perceive the things that pertain to the Spirit of God; we most heartily beseech thee to take away from us all infidelity and unfaithfulness, which we received of old Adam, and to plant in us true faith and undoubted belief, that we may be thoroughly persuaded that thou art the Son of the living God, very God and very man, our alone sweet-smelling sacrifice, our alone mediator, advocate, and intercessor, our alone wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, by whom alone, and for whose sake only, thy heavenly Father is well pleased with us, our sins are remitted, grace and everlasting life are freely given unto us. Oh Lord God, suffer us not to lean to our own wisdom, nor to believe as blind flesh fancieth, nor to seek salvation where superstition dreameth; but let our faith only be grounded on thy word, and give us grace truly to believe in thee with all our heart, to put our trust in thee, to look for all good things of thee, to call upon thy blessed name in adversity, and with joyful voices and more merry hearts, to praise and magnify it in prosperity. Suffer us not to doubt, neither of God thy heavenly Father, nor of thee, God his Son, nor of God the Holy Ghost, but earnestly to believe that you being the distinct persons in the Deity, are, notwithstanding, one very God, besides whom there is no God, neither in heaven nor in earth. Grant also, that we may assuredly believe whatsoever is contained in the holy scriptures, and by no means suffer ourselves to be plucked from the verity thereof, but manly and steadfastly abide in the same, even unto death—rage world, roar devil. And this faith, oh sweet Jesus, increase thou daily in us more and more, that at the last, through thy goodness, we may be made perfect and strong men in thy holy religion, and show ourselves both before thee and the world truly faithful, by bringing forth plenty of good works unto the glory and honour of thy name: which with God the Father, and God the Holy Ghost, livest and reignest true God, worlds without end. Amen.

JEPHTHAH'S VOW FULFILLED AND HIS DAUGHTER NOT SACRIFICED;

PROVED IN

PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY, AT ST. MARY'S IN OXFORD.

And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.—Judges xi. 30, 31.

THIS vow has been the subject of much ridicule; it has been represented, as rashly made and immorally executed, and the scripture itself has suffered through the character of Jephthah: the vindication of it also has been attended with so many difficulties, that an attempt to remove them must be of service to religion; and this I shall at present undertake. I shall endeavour to free it from the false interpretations which have been put upon it, and from the objections which have been made against it. But it is not the whole history I shall treat in this manner: that would be too extensive a design for a single discourse. The principal point alone shall be now considered, namely, Jephthah's fulfilling his vow, which I purpose to show he might, and did fulfil, without sacrificing his daughter.

The history has been generally understood in this sense: when the men of Gilead had placed Jephthah at their head, in order to deliver them from the children of Ammon, he gathered together his army, and before he begun the battle he vowed a vow unto the Lord, and promised, that if God would prosper him, he would sacrifice whatever should first meet him on his return. Upon this he begins the attack, and the Lord delivered the Ammonites into his hands, so that he slew them with very great slaughter. By this success he became obliged to a strict observance of his vow; and it unfortunately so happened, that as he was returning to his house in peace, his only daughter, not knowing of his vow, came out with joy to meet him. Hereby she became, according to his vow, the person to be sacrificed, and he did offer her up for a burnt-offering.

This is the common interpretation of Jephthah's vow. It has generally been supposed that his daugher was sacrificed. An action so contrary to the laws of God and man, and so inconsistent with the good character which St. Paul has given of Jephthah's faith, that it is not easy to conceive, how it came to pass, that such an opinion was ever entertained at all, much less how it became so general; especially as no historical passage of scripture has laid more open to the wanton jests of the infidel, or is more difficult to be explained by the sober believer. From these difficulties which the history now labours under, I trust, I shall be able to free it by showing;

I. That the opinion of her being sacrificed is exposed to so many solid objections, that it is not defensible, and

II. By proving from the history itself, that she was not sacrificed.

1. And the first objection against the history's being explained in the common manner is this, that Jephthah could not have sacrificed his daughter, though he had vowed to do it; because human sacrifices were absolutely forbidden by the law of Moses. And Jephthah knew this: he did not only live in obedience to the law, but was also at that time the judge of it. And would he act contrary to his knowledge? Could he live in obedience to the law, and yet dispense with the breach of one duty, which Moses had made indispensable? Or what an unjust judge would he be, who should undertake to punish the offences of others, while he himself was a most notorious offender! These circumstances, indeed, prove, rather that he ought not to have done it, than that he did it not. But,

2. When we consider further, that the same Spirit of the Lord was upon Jephthah at the making his vow, as was upon Moses at the writing of the law; this clearly proves that he did it not: for the Spirit of the Lord could not give one law by Moses, and another opposite to it by Jephthah—he could not, whilst the first was still in force, direct any person to transgress it—the infallible Spirit of God cannot contradict himself—nor can human sacrifices be both lawful and unlawful at the same time—so that if the same Spirit, which spake in Moses, directed Jephthah (as the text expressly says he did) in making his vow; then no doubt he did not sacrifice his daughter. But,

3. Further, supposing he had offered her up, and pretended to be directed by the Spirit of God, yet how came it to pass that he was never punished? To offer human sacrifices was made a capital crime by the law, and yet it is not so much as hinted, that he suffered death for what he did; nay, where does it appear that he was ever called to an account for it? And yet there was something so particularin the offence, in the person of the offender, and in the time when he offended, that then the Jewish state ought not to have overlooked it; and God, who then presided over it, was in equity bound not to spare such an offender. And if Jephthah under these circumstances was not punished, it is at least probable, that he did not deserve punishment, which yet he must have deserved, if he had sacrificed his daughter. And,

4. These circumstances are further confirmed from the nature of the action, which was certainly immoral, and such therefore as Jephthah did not. There is nothing in which the general sense of mankind is more agreed, than that every man's life is his own property; this general sense arises from the natural principle of self-preservation, it comes confirmed to us by the laws of all free nations, and is further strengthened by the laws of God. And that action which should break through all these laws must be immoral. But though the action be immoral, yet perhaps it may be said, was Jephthah such a man as would not do an immoral action? St. Paul has here provided us with an answer which fully clears up the character of Jephthah in this particular: for the most considerable circumstance in the life of this eminent judge, was the history before us: this was the most material action recorded of him in scripture, and which placed his character in the most conspicuous light. Now St. Paul could not form a judgment of his life and character without considering this his principal transaction; and in the 11th chapter to the Hebrews, where he is celebrating the praises of those ancient worthies who did such great and excellent acts though faith, among others he mentions Jephthah, and the time, he says, would fail if he should set about praising him and the other worthies as they deserved. Such a commendation from an apostle was the highest honour which could be conferred: for praise is ever judged of according to those who give it, and that is the greatest praise which is given by them who are themselves the most praiseworthy. What an high honour then was it to be commended by a St. Paul! Certainly there could be nothing immoral in the character of Jephthah whom he thus commended, and yet the principal point of view in which St. Paul considered him, that indeed which gives us the strongest proof of his faith, was the making his vow; which if he had fulfilled by sacrificing his daughter, it must be confessed was an immoral action. And, therefore, if Jephthah could not sacrifice his daughter without breaking through all those moral laws of God and man, which say, "Thou shalt not kill;" and if St. Paul, when he considered him in this light, could not have recommended him had the action been immoral: then it is evident, that Jephthah did nothing immoral in fulfilling his vow, and consequently did not sacrifice his daughter. And,

5. Besides, when he made his vow, he promised to fulfil it upon condition that God would prosper him in the undertaking he had in hand; and can it be supposed but that Jephthah would word his vow with so much caution, as not to be obliged by it to do an immoral action? There are still extant proofs enow of his great abilities as well as faith, which clearly evince, that he was far from being either rash or weak, and yet he must have been both to a very great degree, if he could first have vowed to sacrifice his daughter, or afterwards thought himself obliged to do it, because God had given him success: in either of these respects he must have acted out of character; in the first, without his usual prudence, for which he is recommended; in the latter without his faith, for which he is celebrated. But still,

6. Whatever Jephthah was, yet God is perfect; and how shall we vindicate the divine perfections, if he gave success to those means, which led directly to an immoral end? The Spirit of God was upon Jephthah, when he made his vow—the hand of God enabled him to succeed—and it was this success which obliged him to perform his vow. In these instances he was certainly under the divine guidance. And was it of God that he vowed to sacrifice his daughter, or could God in any sense be the means of such a sacrifice? These things cannot be. Far be such proceedings from the All-perfect. His goodness, justice, veracity, nay, every divine attribute, forbid us to think of it. So that, if the perfections of God will not suffer him to countenance an immoral action, and if he did countenance Jephthah's vow by assisting him with his Holy Spirit, and by giving him success, then certainly the thing he vowed was not immoral, and of course he did not sacrifice his daughter.

Out of many more objections that might be urged, let these suffice at present, as it fully appears from them, that the account commonly given is not rational, is inconsistent with the truth of scripture, and contrary to the history itself. Let us then seek out for some other explanation, which may be fairly deduced from the words themselves, may be agreeable to the reason of the thing, and consistent with the good character St. Paul hath given us of Jephthah; and such an interpretation I shall first lay down, and afterwards endeavour to establish, in order to,

II. Prove from the history itself, that he did not sacrifice his daughter.

The matter of fact was this: when the children of Israel were in great distress by the invasion of the Ammonites, and had no captain who might lead them out to battle, the Lord raised up Jephthah to be their deliverer; and, as it was common in such cases during the era of the judges, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him to enable him to execute his office. And when he entered upon it, he made a vow unto the Lord, "That upon condition of success, whatever should meet him at his doors when he returned in peace, should EITHER be the Lord's, OR offered up for a burnt-offering." This was the vow; and if it consists of two distinct sentences, as I shall presently show it does, then Jephthah will be found to have worded it with so much caution, that he lay under no obligation to sacrifice his daughter. When he returned and met his only child, the history represents him under great perplexity; but this did not arise from his concern to offer her up: there were other reasons. The text itself tells us, that it was losing all hopes of descendants, losing the inheritance, which in default of heirs went to the nearest kinsman, and many other privileges which then subsisted among the Jews, but have now ceased among us, that occasioned his grief: for we find, "that she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains. And it came to pass at the end of two months that she returned unto her father, who did with her ACCORDING TO HIS VOW WHICH HE HAD VOWED;" i. e. according to the FIRST PART of the vow, he dedicated her unto the Lord, and in consequence of such dedication she continued the remainder of her life a virgin: for, AFTER the vow had been fulfilled, the text observes, "She knew no man." Hereby the purpose of the vow was answered; from the time that she was dedicated unto the Lord, she continued to the end of her days in an unmarried state: because as the vow happened to fall upon her while she was in that state, she could not change it without causing her father to break his vow. This was the fact: whether it can be justified or not, is another question, which no ways concerns my present argument. It is sufficient for my purpose, that the text clearly asserts, she was, according to the words of the vow, to be dedicated to the Lord—was dedicated—at the time of dedication was a virgin—continued so some years afterwards—and therefore continued so till her death.

This was, indeed, a singular case: the design of it was so uncommon, the reasons to justify it so extraordinary, that no precedents can be drawn from hence for recluses of any kind; it might easily be shown to be a confutation rather of such practices, if that were within the design of my present argument. But I waive this, and proceed to observe, that it was in her so remarkable an instance of filial piety, so evident a proof of her public-spiritedness, and love of her country; and these virtues were in her so eminent, in her condition so illustrious, that the nation, in gratitude to her, made it a law, so long as she lived, "for the daughters of Israel to go yearly to MAKE PRESENTS to the daughter of Jephthah, four days in the year," And here certainly I need not point out the absurdity of going year after year to make presents to a dead person, though the propriety of making them to one in her state must be manifest to every one.

This is the true interpretation of the history; and it is free from all the objections to which the common opinion is exposed. It only remains, that I support it by sound arguments; and the following, I trust, will appear to every one satisfactory. And,

1. The first is taken from the history not mentioning her being sacrificed; and when the history is thus silent, from whence can it be proved that she was sacrificed? If there be any proof, it must be either in the words of the vow, or in the fulfilling it; but there is no proof in them: for there is nothing more said in the latter, than that "he did with her ACCORDING TO HIS VOW."—So that here we are referred to the words of the vow, to know what it was he did with her; and all that Jephthah vowed was—"If the Lord would give him success, whatever met him on his return in peace, should EITHER be the Lord's, OR he would offer it up for a burnt offering." Here it is plain what he promised in these words consists of two parts: for what met him and was to be dedicated to the Lord, was one thing; but what met him and was to be sacrificed, was another. and it is certain these two things are distinct. Though every thing sacrificed was dedicated to the Lord, yet every thing dedicated to the Lord was not sacrificed. The incense—aromatics—vestments—and all the apparatus of the temple were dedicated to the Lord; but yet none of them were sacrificed. The vow then consists of two senses, which mean two different things, and which do not follow in consequence—"whatever meets me shall be the Lord's, AND I will sacrifice it:" but the true construction is, "It shall be the Lord's, OR I will sacrifice it;" for the particle used in the original, has the sense of OR, and the translators have so often rendered it thus, and have mentioned it even here in the margin of the bible, that no one can object to its being so interpreted in this place, where the whole history fixes it to this sense. As the vow then consists of two distinct parts, it would be kept by observing either of them—and as one thing Jephthah promised mentions nothing about sacrificing his daughter—and as when he fulfilled what he had promised, it is only said, "he did with her according to his vow," then it is evident that the history is quite silent about her being sacrificed; which as clearly proves, as any negative argument can, that she was not sacrificed. But,

2. This is still further evident from hence, that though Jephthah had vowed to sacrifice whatever creature should first meet him, yet if a creature had met him which the law forbade to be offered up, it is certain he could not have offered it; and how then could he his daughter? If an unclean creature had first met him, would he have thought himself obliged by his vow to offer it up, when God had forbidden it? Certainly he would not. No vow can lay a man under any obligation to transgress the laws of God.

What then was to be done in this case? The law itself had provided a remedy. As the unclean creature could not be sacrificed, it was to be ransomed, and another allowed of for sacrifice was to offered up in its stead: and why ought not this rule to take place in the case of Jephthah? The same law, which forbade offering up an unclean creature, forbade human sacrifices. If a vow should fall upon an unclean creature, it was to be ransomed—if it should fall upon a human creature, it was also to be ransomed—and God promised to accept of one in place of the other. As I lay great stress upon this argument, and would have it carefully considered, I must refer to the 27th chapter of Leviticus, where this point is fully treated of. Now Jephthah must have read this chapter. He could not but know that this was the rule prescribed in the law of Moses, and therefore though he had vowed to sacrifice whatever creature should first meet him, yet he was not obliged by this vow to sacrifice his daughter; because by the law she was to be ransomed: and this eminent judge could not be ignorant, that it was lawful to ransom her, and absolutely unlawful not to do it. So that, put the case either way, the point is clear—either her father did include her in his vow, or he did not: if he did, then she was to be ransomed; and if he did not, then she could not be sacrificed. And therefore this is another strong negative argument that she was not made a burnt-offering. But

3. The evidence does not rest here. There are other arguments, which clearly prove that she was alive after her father had fulfilled his vow, and therefore of course she could not be sacrificed: for the sacred historian observes, as a consequence of the vow's being fulfilled—as what followed upon her entering into it, that she continued a virgin all the rest of her life—"Her father did with her according to his vow: AND SHE KNEW NO MAN." But when? After she was sacrificed? No. This remark would have been absurd, when she was dead; whereas being a description of her after the vow was fulfilled, it must describe some state or condition she was in, even after the completion of the vow and in consequence of it—and this was her being or continuing afterwards a virgin. Jephthah, as I before observed, was not obliged by his vow to sacrifice her; his vow would be kept by dedicating her to the Lord—he did dedicate her: after she was dedicated, the sacred historian remarks, that she remained a virgin. Can any thing be more plain or self-evident than that she, who remained a virgin, was also alive? Could she with any propriety be said to be the one without being the other? Nay, if he had written purposely to prove her alive, could he have brought any stronger proof than this—"that from the day of her dedication she continued a virgin?" This, therefore, I look upon as a positive argument, taken from the history itself, for her not having been sacrificed. But

4. The history proceeds further, and asserts that she was alive at least some years after the vow was fulfilled. The words are—"And it was a LAW in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went yearly (to lament as it is rendered, or as it is in the original) to MAKE PRESENTS to the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a year." How the translators happened to mistake this passage, is not easily to be conceived: for the word, which they here render lament, and which signifies to make presents, they have given the true idea of, in every passage but this and another. They have translated it by these three words, reward, hire, gift. The use of it is very remarkable in the lxviiith Psalm, 18th verse; "Thou art gone up on high, thou hast led captivity captive, thou hast received GIFTS for men." Here they have rendered the same word GIFTS, which they have in the passage above made to signify lament. And gifts it does signify—I have their own usage and authority to say it does—and, what is more, the authority of all the lexicographers. To make presents is, therefore, the meaning of it in this place; and when these presents were made to her, she could not be dead. When the daughters of Israel went according to the laws of the land four days in a year to visit her, she must be alive. She was a recluse dedicated—therefore alive. The nature of the presents which they carried, shows that she was alive. The intention of making them, proves as much. So does the setting apart four days in a year to make them. The very thing speaks itself—she received these presents—therefore was not dead: and besides, by the law of Moses it was a crime to make them to the dead. And further, it was provided by a law, that these presents should be made her yearly; but this law was contrary to the law of Moses, if she had been dead: and yet no censure is passed upon it; therefore she was living. And when these circumstances are considered together, what further evidence would any person require than this? That she could not be dead, who was visited four days in every year by the daughters of Israel, and had then such presents made her as none could receive but one who was living.

5. And what greatly strengthens all these arguments, what demonstrates that she was alive long after the vow was fulfilled, is a proof taken from the sacred historian's observing, "that she RECEIVED these presents. Four days in every year the daughters of Israel made their presents TO the daughter of Jephthah"—they made them for HER USE AND BENEFIT: the particle used in the original does not only denote the dative case TO—TO the daughter of Jephthah; but frequently expresses something further. When spoken of two things, where one is said to act upon the other, it denotes, that one was the cause of the other, and produced whatever action or condition the writer was then treating of; in this sense it is most elegantly used in the first chapter of Genesis. When spoken of persons, where one is doing something to another, it often denotes that one did the action for the use and benefit of the other. This is a well-known idiom of the sacred tongue; and the literal sense of the word, as well as the scope of the history, require that in the passage before us it should be thus understood. The phrase therefore expresses that the daughters of Israel made their presents "for the use and benefit of Jephthah's daughter." For the use of one who was sacrificed? For the benefit of one who was dead? Could this possibly be? Certainly there can be no greater absurdity. The dead are out of the reach of our good offices: but she shared in them—presents were made TO her, therefore she must have received them—they were made for her use and benefit, therefore she was sensible of them. She received them and was sensible of them for some years after the vow was fulfilled, therefore was for some years after alive, and of course was not sacrificed. If this argument required any thing to add to its clearness and conviction, I might support it by other authorities; but it seems to me undeniably conclusive. I shall only mention by way of illustration, two historical passages of heathen writers, in the grand lineaments of which there is so great a resemblance of the present history, that I doubt not they took their origin from hence: I mean the vows of Agamemnon and Idomeneus. Their cases were almost the same as Jephthah's. A parallel might easily be drawn between them to show this; and if it could be proved (with some degree of probability I think it might) that both of them took their rise from his history, it would strengthen the interpretation I have now given of it: because if these were borrowed from it, and tradition had preserved perfect the chief marks of likeness, this would be a probable reason that Jephthah's daughter was not sacrificed. Neither of their daughters were offered up, though they were in parallel circumstances with his, and it is likely the tradition of her being saved was the foundation of their histories being so represented. And,

What tends strongly to confirm the opinion, that these histories were derived from Jephthah's vow, is an instance of the same sort of presents being offered to certain recluses in the heathen world: and it will be very difficult to assign any satisfactory reasons for the origin of such a ceremony, unless we trace it up to the days of Jephthah. It was in all appearance a corruption of his history. Men retained the knowledge of the fact, after they had forgot the reasons upon which he acted, and this led them to ingraft upon it numerous errors. The practice of dedicating recluses without any obligation or necessity, must, I think, have had its original from hence. It took its rise from a gross mistake of this history. It could not come into the heathen world from reason—it was unreasonable; nor from nature—it was unnatural: there must have been some authority which at first seemed to countenance such a practice; and by length of time, and the corruptions of mankind, the case of Jephthah might be so much mistaken, as to be made a precedent for that very error, of which it is a most clear confutation. Now if this custom among the heathens came from Jephthah, it will greatly establish the interpretation of the text. This it will prove at least, that they who are dedicated, were not sacrificed; and that they who received certain presents by virtue of such dedication, were indisputably alive. The heathens made the same presents to their recluses, as the daughters of Israel did in the case before us. This is abundantly evident from their own writers. And for what reason should they thus agree in this ceremony, unless it had been derived from one common cause? And so far as this is probable, it must be admitted, that if the heathens offered these presents to none but them who were alive, then she who received the same presents was also alive.

I might have been more copious upon these arguments, but they seemed to me so plain and conclusive, that they needed not be further insisted on: and now the case hath been fairly stated, I leave it to every impartial man to determine on which side the truth prevails. The common received opinion is, that Jephthah, according to his vow, sacrificed his daughter; but this opinion I showed was not defensible: because human sacrifices were forbidden by the law of Moses, and Jephthah did not transgress this law: for he was directed by the Spirit of God in making his vow—he was never punished for it—he is commended for it by St. Paul—and had success in consequence of it. And if the common opinion cannot be supported against these objections, much less against the arguments brought to prove that she was not sacrificed—the historian has neither included her in the vow, nor in the fulfilling it—and if she had been included, the law had provided a ransom, whereby the vow would be kept, and she not made a burnt-offering. From these negative arguments I endeavoured to establish the true interpretation, which was settled beyond all doubt from certain passages in the history, which gave her the attributes of a living person some years after her father had fulfilled his vow; and I think no truth can be more evident than this, that she could not be sacrificed and dead, who still had the attributes of a living person.

Thus is the character of Jephthah vindicated, and neither rashness nor immorality entered into the making of his vow, or the fulfilling of it: but this eminent judge appears to be distinguished for his faith and other virtues. The scripture also is cleared in this particular, and reconciled to reason and common sense; and this historical passage was recorded, as all scripture was, "that the man of God might be perfect, thoroughly furnished to every good work."

THE PARABLE OF THE DRY BONES;

INTERPRETED IN

A SERMON,

PREACHED AT ST. OLAVE'S, SOUTHWARK, OCTOBER 24TH, 1756.

And you being dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with Christ, having forgiven you all trepasses.—Col. ii. 13.

O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord.—Ezek. xxxvii. 4.

All our ideas of spiritual objects are comparative, taken from matter, and carried up to spirit. In our present state we have no knowledge but what is first sensible, but what comes into the mind from some of the senses, and is borrowed from objects upon which they can make their observation. This is at present a received truth among the learned. Happy for us that it is received, because scripture knowledge is conveyed in this manner. God accommodates his instruction to our capacities: he makes use of outward and sensible objects to explain inward and spiritual: he applies the book of nature to illustrate the book of grace, thus bringing heavenly things down to the level of our understandings, and setting them (as it were) before our eyes by their natural pictures and just similitudes.

The very language of the Old Testament is of this nature. Every word stands for some sensible object, and from thence raises the idea of some correspondent spiritual object. Since this is the genius of the Hebrew tongue, it is not to be wondered, that it should so much abound with what some call figures and metaphors; these are not the ornaments of language or beauties of diction, as it hath been supposed, but they are of the essence of the sacred tongue: neither is this method of using natural objects to give us ideas of spiritual the Oriental way of writing, as we have been told, as if it delighted in bold figures and lofty metaphors; but it is the method of instruction, which man's present state renders necessary. While we are here in the body, we have no means of discovering spiritual objects but by divine teaching. God informs us, that such an object in the natural world stands for, and is the perfect representation of, such an object in the spiritual world; and this kind of information he has given us in every Hebrew word: like a parable, it teaches and illustrates heavenly things under the expressive figures of earthly. And while men were accustomed to this method of instruction by the very nature of their language, one might expect it would run also into their compositions; which we find from fact that it has. The Old Testament, the prophetical writings especially, abound with natural images; and the great Prophet of the New Testament made such use of them, that without a parable spake he not unto the people. Wherever he was, the objects before him gave him an opportunity to spiritualize them; and this application of material things to illustrate spiritual, is what the scripture calls a parable. Of this kind are the words of the text. They are a parable in which the all-wise Spirit teaches us the things of God, by comparing them to material and outward objects. The lesson he would teach us is of eternal moment; and may the Lord God take the veil off all your hearts while I am explaining this part of the Old Testament. May he give you to understand it, and to profit from it, and to experience the truth of the whole parable in your own souls.

The prophet gives us the literal sense in these words. "The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley, which was full of bones. And caused me to pass by them round about, and behold there were very many in the open valley, and lo, they were very dry. And he said unto me, son of man, Can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. And again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God, unto these bones, behold I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live. And I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live, and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied, as I was commanded; and as I prophesied, there was a noise, and behold a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above, but there was no breath in them. Then said he unto me, prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, thus saith the Lord God, come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet an exceeding great army."

Now what instruction are we to receive from this scripture? It was certainly applicable to the state of the Jewish church, which was then deprived of all its ordinances. It was carried away captive into Babylon, where it had neither a temple nor the presence of God, neither an officiating priest, nor a sacrifice, and was as void of spiritual life as these dry bones were of animal life. To the church in this state the application is made—God himself makes this use of it. "Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts; therefore prophesy and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel, and ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I shall place you in your own land, then ye shall know that I the Lord have spoken it and performed it, saith the Lord."

In this sense the scripture was then fulfilled, when God did bring the Jews from their graves; he placed them in their own land, and restored the life of their civil and ecclesiastical policy. He performed what he had spoken, and they knew that he was the Lord their God. But is this the full sense and meaning of the parable? Are we to understand nothing more by it, than this outward completion? Are we to rest here? By no means. It is of more general use and instruction. We may all receive profit from it, as I hope the following reasons will convince you. And

First, We are assured by the apostle, that "no scripture is of private interpretation." It was all written for the general use of the church of Christ, in all times and circumstances, therefore we may not yet rest in the private interpretation of this parable, applicable to the Jewish church in the Babylonish bondage, but we must look out for a more extensive sense, applicable to the catholic church of Christ: For,

Secondly, we otherwise get no farther than the literal sense. It was a matter of fact, that God did bring the Jews after seventy years' bondage up again to their own land. This is the letter of the parable. But the apostle forbids us to rest here. We must seek for the spiritual sense; "Because the letter," he says, "killeth, but the Spirit giveth life." And that we may and must attain the spiritual, which is the life-giving sense, he expressly teaches us when he declares

Thirdly, That God's outward dealings with the Jewish church were a type and figure of his spiritual dealings with the Christian church. For thus he says, 1 Cor. x. 11, "That all these things happened unto them for ensamples, and they are written for our admonition." Among the rest, what happened to them in the Babylonish captivity was for an example to us, and this parable treating of their state under it, and of their deliverance from it, was written for our admonition, and is to have its completion in us spiritually, as it had in them bodily.

These arguments may suffice to prove, that this parable cannot be of a private interpretation. It has a spiritual as well as a literal sense, which belongs to us, which is to set before us an example, that we are to follow, and from which we are to receive admonition and instruction to our souls. And it sets before our eyes some of the great truths of the gospel in a most striking light. We have here an affecting representation of our lost and dead state, while we are in the bondage of sin, and of our happy revival to newness of life, when we are born again of the Spirit of God. These are the great outlines of the parable, which may the divine grace deeply impress upon all your hearts, while I am giving you a short paraphrase upon the words, and then applying them, as God shall enable me, to each of your consciences.

The prophet begins with informing us, that it was the eternal Spirit who showed him this vision. "The hand of the Lord (the power of Jehovah) was upon me, and carried me in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley, which was full of bones," even in the midst of the valley of the shadow of death, where I saw sin and corruption reigning, and where I beheld the souls of men as dead in trespasses and sins, as dead to God and to the things of spiritual and divine life, as dry and dead bones are to the offices of animal life. When the scripture speaks thus of the death of the soul, the idea is evidently taken from the death of the body; for as the body, when it dies, ceases to be actuated by the natural agents which carry on animal life; so the soul when it dies, ceases to be actuated by the divine agents which carry on spiritual life. But this spiritual death does not imply any dissolution or absolute insensibility; it only signifies, that the sinful soul is cut off from all communion with God, who is the fountain of life; it is alienated from the life of God, and has lost its life of happiness in him, being now dead to his grace, as it may, ere long, be dead to his glory. And what then could be a more proper representation of a soul thus dead in sin, than a body dead in the grave? And what could paint in stronger colours the exceeding deadness of a sinful soul, than the exceeding dryness of the bones of a dead body? Under the death of the outward man the prophet was made to see the death of the inward man. The Spirit of the Lord gave him a full view of these souls dead in sin: "for he caused me," says he, "to pass by them round about, to go all around them, and behold there were very many upon the face of the valley, and lo they were very dry:" their number was very great, and their condition was very dead; they had so long, so entirely lost all spiritual life, that the bones of dead men, from which the flesh is worn quite off, and which are become exceeding dry, were not farther removed from life, than the souls thus dead in trespasses and sins. After the prophet had gone all round them, "The Lord said unto him, Son of man, can these bones live? Is there any power that is able to quicken them to newness of life? And I answered, O Lord God, Thou knowest"—Thou only knowest what power is requisite to raise a soul dead in sin. All the powers in nature I am certain cannot do it. They can no more give life to a dead soul, than they can raise the bones of a dead man to life. Although this was the Prophet's opinion, yet the Lord said unto him, "Prophesy unto these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live, and ye shall know that I am the Lord. So I prophesied as I was commanded." He did not consult carnal reason, which would have showed him the absurdity of doing what God commanded; but he instantly obeyed, and began preaching to the dry bones, and calling upon them to hear the word of the Lord. Would not some of you, my brethren, have taken him to be quite disordered in his head, if you had seen him preaching in a churchyard to a great number of dead dry bones? Would you not have thought Ezekiel as mad as any of our modern enthusiasts? For men reproach and ridicule the ministers of the gospel for doing the very same thing that he did. We are reckoned visionaries and madmen, and what not, because, after his example, we preach the word of the Lord to the dead When we tell sinners that they are all dead, dead to God, dead to grace, and may soon die to glory; and when we call upon them in the name of the Lord to awake from the dead sleep of sin, that Christ may give them life, then they mock and ridicule. The same men would have made as great a jest of the prophet, if they had seen him preaching to a congregation of dry bones. But he preached as he was commanded, and so do we. Lord, grant the success may be the same. The blessed Jesus sends us to preach the word to dry bones, and we obey. He sends us out in his name, with his commission, and in his strength, and promises to be with us by his Spirit. We should be enthusiasts indeed, if we thought ourselves able to awaken one dead sinner without the effectual working of his power. We know that it is he who worketh in us and by us, for without him we can do nothing; and therefore let men reproach us for doing his work, we will go on, pitying, and praying for them, and the more they reproach us, the more we will preach, and the more earnestly, to the dead in sin; and who knows but as the work is God's, he may speak to the inward ears of the soul, while we are speaking to the outward ears of the body, and bid the sinner awake and live. Glory be to his holy name, for that he often accompanies this foolishness of preaching with his divine power. Thanks be to him for setting his seal to the truth of our words, by awakening the dead through our weak ministry. Oh that his good Spirit may now seal the word, and by his blessing fulfil what follows in the parable—"So I prophesied as I was commanded, and as I prophesied there was a noise," in the Hebrew, a voice, namely, the voice of God. The prophet was speaking; and to say that there was a voice while he was speaking, would be mere tautology, and unmeaning repetition, if we apply it to him. But if while he spake, the power of the Lord was present, then the driest bones would hear; and if while we address ourselves to the outward ears, the voice of God carries the sound at the same time to the heart, then even the dead hear this almighty voice, and awake, and see their guilt and danger, and begin to be concerned about their salvation. When the Spirit of God speaks conviction to the heart, these effects always follow, and it is evident the voice was his from what is mentioned next in the parable; "for as I prophesied there was a voice, and behold, a shaking"—behold, a matter worthy of the closest attention, there was a great shaking among the dry bones, even as it were an earthquake among them: for the word rendered shaking is the scripture term for an earthquake. And behold, there is as great a shaking in the soul of the sinner when he is awakened and convinced of sin. He that has been dead in sin, helpless and lost for ever in himself, then begins to quake and tremble: he sees the corruption of his nature —odious and abominable altogether: he sees his life was one continued scene of open injury to God, and dishonour to his law: looking back, he beholds nothing but guilt; looking forward, he beholds nothing but everlasting destruction: upon which fear and a horrible dread overwhelm him. The Holy Spirit sets home these convictions upon the conscience. He gives it such a sight of the guilt and danger of sin, that the sinner sees he cannot save himself. In this distress he continues, until the remainder of the parable be fulfilled in him: for we read, that after the shaking—"The bones came together, bone to his bone. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above, but there was no breath in them." Here is in the letter of the parable the outside and shape of man—a body, but it is inanimate—there is no life in it. So in the spiritual sense, if the soul should rest in the externals of religion, and sit down content with any thing short of the vital influence of the Holy Spirit, there is no life in it. Whatever may promise to animate it, still it will remain dead. Good works, ordinances, orthodoxy, are but the letter that killeth, unless the Spirit that giveth life be in them. You may belong to the best constituted church upon earth, which has sound articles and creeds like strong bones and sinews and flesh upon them, and which has a good liturgy, and decent public worship like a fair skin to cover all; and yet in this communion your soul may be dead: for these external privileges cannot give the breath of life to the soul. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing," the flesh (the externals of religion) profiteth nothing unless the Spirit animate them, as we learn from the next words in the parable. "Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army." Glory be to God for daily fulfilling this part of the parable. His good Spirit daily awakens poor dead sinners, and puts the breath of divine life into them; and this he does by the weakest means, even by the foolishness of preaching, that it may appear the power comes from him, and that all the glory may return to him. He sends us out to preach, bids us call to the dead—we do as we are commanded; but we know that we could no more raise a dead soul from the grave of sin, than we could raise a dead body from the grave of corruption. We speak our Lord's words, and he blesses them. He sends his grace along with them, and the dead hear his voice. They awake. They see their guilt and their danger: at the sight of which their hearts sink within them—they find themselves perishing—and a great trembling and violent shaking seizes them. Fear is on every side. No way is left to escape, but to fly to the Saviour of sinners. And as soon as they turn to him, he receives them gladly. He sends the Holy Spirit (the dearest pledge of his love) to give them evidence of their new birth unto righteousness, and to assure them of their justification to life. Then they live unto God—and "stand up upon their feet," being enabled to go forward in the ways of holiness—"An exceeding great army,"—an innumerable multitude, which no man could number, and they all hold swords, being expert in war, a great army of the faithful soldiers of Jesus Christ fighting their way to a crown of righteousness, against all the opposition of sin and Satan, of the world and the flesh, and never quitting the field of battle, until the Captain of their salvation place the never-fading crown upon their heads.

This is, I think, the spiritual sense of the parable. We have in it, a description of man in his natural state as dead in trespasses and sins—in his awakened state as unable to do any thing to raise himself from the death of sin to newness of life—and in his justified state, as raised to spiritual and divine life by Christ, who is the life of the world, and by the effectual working of his good Spirit. These great truths are beautifully painted in the parable. It sets them before our eyes in a very affecting manner. And I hope every one of you has been properly affected according to the view he has had of the state of his soul. But whatever impression has been made, I cannot leave the subject, without making some short practical remarks, and may the almighty Spirit apply them to the necessities of those who are concerned in them.

And first, I have a word to the dry bones, to the dead in sin. We are all in this state by nature—dead in trespasses and sins—dead to God and to the things of God. If you believe the scripture you cannot deny this. It describes your souls to be as incapable of performing any of the offices of spiritual life as the dry bones of a dead body are of performing the offices of animal life. If God and his word be true, this is the condition of every one of us by nature, and it is the first work of grace to convince us of it. When the Holy Spirit begins to move in the sinner's heart, he convinces him of his lost and helpless state, and he sees and finds that without Christ he can do nothing. And can every one of you say from his own experience—I have had this conviction. If you had, then one step is taken—may he who hath begun, carry on the work, until he make you living members of Christ's mystical body! But if you were never yet convinced of your being by nature dead in trespasses and sins, then you are still alienated from the life of God; for you will not seek life from him, until you be convinced of your want of it. As transgressors, his holy law condemns you to death. The solemn sentence is passed, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Did you never read this sentence as standing out against yourself? Have you never had any sense of the exquisite misery of being eternally separated from God the fountain of life? Have you no sense of it at present, no thought, no concern about being alienated in body and soul, and to all eternity, from God and his glory? O almighty Saviour, if there be any persons here present in this state, speak to the dry bones. They can hear no voice but thine. Oh let the all-reviving sound, which Lazarus' dead body heard, now be heard in every dead heart. Now Lord Jesus prove thyself to be the resurrection and the life. Call to every unawakened soul in this congregation, and say, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead." O Almighty God and Saviour, send these words home to every dead sinner, that he may awake and be concerned for his salvation, and thereby may follow me in my second remark.

While the prophet was preaching, the voice of God spake to the heart, while he spake to the outward ears, and "behold there was a great shaking." The sinner shook and trembled for fear. The Lord showed him his former dead state, and his present danger, and at the sight of both an horrible dread overwhelmed him. He beheld the perfect purity and spirituality of the divine law—he saw the vile and loathsome nature of sin—he beheld the holiness, and truth, and justice of God, armed with almighty power and ready to destroy him. Conscience witnessed against him, and haunted him with its horrors night and day. He found that hell was his desert, and he saw no way open to escape it. However hardened and obdurate he had been before, yet all these circumstances put together set him a shaking and trembling. Had he been in an earthquake, when the ground heaved and tossed with such violent shocks, that he could not stand upon it, and had he seen it opening its mouth in many a hideous crack, and swallowing up multitudes all around him, he could not have shaked and trembled more. His soul fainted within him; and he had not a ray of hope left, unless God would be pleased to stretch out his omnipotent arm, and to save him from going down to the pit of destruction.

And can every one of you, my brethren, remember when this was your case? If you were never in any distress less or more, at the sight of your sinfulness and misery—Oh consider, I beseech you, your danger. You are still secure in sin, yea dead in trespasses and sins. When the Holy Spirit is come to awaken your soul, his first work is to convince you of sin, and if he has not begun this work—fancy yourself to be alive—reform your outward life—become civil, and moral, and honest, yet you have not taken one step in the divine life; if you have never been deeply convinced of sin, you have not been stirred up nor shaken from the lees—your poor soul is still dead to the grace of God, and unless you be convinced of sin it will, ere long, be dead to his glory. But if you have been awakened, and convinced of sin, then the parable is so far happily fulfilled in you. There has been a shaking among the dry bones. They have been trembling and quaking, and with great reason. Sinners while under conviction, have every thing to fear that is terrible. They have an offended God set in battle array against them, a broken law thundering out its curses upon their guilty heads, conscience owning the guilt, the devil ready to torment, and hell open to receive them: and if the prospect of these things be not terrible, what is? Am I now speaking to any of you, who says, I am acquainted with these terrors

—I have been made to see my sinfulness and my danger, and I find my helpless lost condition—dangers so surround me on every side, that I know not whither to turn myself. Is this the language of thine heart? Art thou indeed shaken from all trust and confidence in self? Then turn thee to the blessed Jesus. He is a Saviour for thee. Such as thou art he came to save—such poor, lost and ruined sinners. Wait on him. Be found in the ways of his ordinances, and he will supply all thy wants. He will give thee freely out of his fulness, grace for grace, and glory to crown all his graces.

But, methinks I hear some afflicted soul reply—I have been waiting upon the Lord Jesus long, but have found no comfort. It may be so. But who is to blame? May you not have sought comfort in a wrong manner, by placing religion in the form instead of the power, according to what is described in the third part of the parable, where we have all the parts of an human body, but for want of breath there was no life in them; and this was written to show, that you are not to stop short of Christ and his comforts by resting in externals. You are not to be content with the form and the outside of religion, without the life and spirit of it. And herein the parable condemns those persons, who upon their being first brought under some concern about their souls, are apt to trust in duties, instead of going to Christ. They set about reforming their outward behaviour, go to church, say their prayers, read the scriptures, give alms, attend constantly at the sacrament—supposing that these outward things can give life to the soul: they rest in them, as of themselves sufficient and meritorious, which is setting them up against our Saviour, and resting in them as saviours, whereas Christ alone has life to give to the dead in sin. "I am the life," says he. Whosoever is not united to him by faith, has no true spiritual life in him, as he found, who had more duties to depend upon than any of us have, and yet he counted them but dross and dung that he might win Christ. "The life which I now live in the flesh," says the blessed apostle, "I live by the faith of the Son of God;" it is a spiritual life derived from the Son of God, and received from him by faith, which is the breath of life in the justified soul, inspired into it by the Holy Spirit, as the last part of the parable proves. The dry bones had come together, the sinews and flesh had grown up upon them, the skin was spread over all—here were all the parts of an human body, but there was no life, until the Spirit of the Lord put breath into them, and they lived, and stood up. It is the very same case with the sinful soul. Nothing can give it life but the Spirit of God. He is to the soul what breath is to the body. He is so much the breath of life, that in the Old Testament and the New the same word which stands for the breath that supports the life of the body, stands for the Holy Spirit, who supports the life of the soul. The air that we breathe, and the Holy Spirit, have but one name in scripture. And therefore as the body is not alive until it breathes, so neither is the soul alive to God until the Holy Spirit infuse into it the breath of life. And as the body is alive only so long as it breathes, in like manner the soul lives to God only so long as the Holy Spirit breathes in it. Let his influence stop, and the life of grace is at an end, as the life of the body is at an end so soon as its breathing is stopped.

My brethren, this is one of the most important truths in the Christian religion. It is the Holy Spirit and his work upon the heart that makes us Christians; "For if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his"—he is no Christian. So say the oracles of truth. If any man—be he ever so moral and honest—a strict observer of outward duties, a good churchman—a charitable man; yet if he has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his—he is none of Christ's family. He is not a living member of Christ's body. He may have a name that he liveth, but he is dead. And what good would it do you to have the name of a living man, if your body was dead? If you could neither stir nor move, if your breath was stopped, would it be of any service to you, that men said you were alive? Could their saying so raise you to life? Infinitely more useless is it to have a name, that your soul liveth, while it is dead to God. Hear this, ye formal professors, who are destitute of the life and power of religion. You are but so many dry bones. And what vast numbers have we of them in all our congregations! Oh that the almighty Spirit may put the breath of life into you, and quicken you together with Christ, and make you sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus!

Perhaps you think you don't stand in need of his grace. Then, if God be true, you have no more life in your soul than these dry bones had, when they lay loose and scattered up and down in the valley. Until he put his life-giving Spirit into you, you are as dead as they were. Or perhaps you think you may have his grace, and not know it. That cannot be. The Holy Spirit is the convincer of sin. When he awakens your conscience, fills it with conviction, and there is a shaking in every part and faculty, what a strange shaking would it be, if you should neither know it, nor feel it. So again, when he infuses into you the breath of life, and you live to God, what an unaccountable breath would this be, if having it and living by it, you should not know it? Did these dry bones know, when they were alive, and stood upon their feet? Most certainly they did. Do you know now, whither you breathe and live, or not? Just the same evidence has the soul of its being alive to God. "We know that we are passed," says an apostle, "from death unto life." We know the same, say all his disciples—We know that God hath given to us eternal life—We have his Spirit the witness, the earnest of it in our hearts, and the world may see the evidence of it in our lives and conversations.

But is not this, will some say, talking like enthusiasts? It is their very language. But then it is also the language of scripture. The Old Testament is full of this enthusiasm.—The New abounds with it. You can scarce open the Bible any where, without finding some high flights of enthusiasm, something concerning being quickened by the Spirit, being born of the Spirit, and raised up by him, being instructed and led by the Spirit, having the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, concerning his dwelling in believers, and their having the witness of the Spirit, and being sealed by him, and sanctified, and strengthened with might by him in the inner man. If these scripture expressions savour strongly of enthusiasm, so does the liturgy of our church. Every day we pray to God that he would not take his Holy Spirit from us, but would cleanse our hearts by the inspiration of his Holy Spirit, and would enable us by his holy inspiration, to think those things that be good, and by his merciful guiding to perform the same, would renew us daily by his Holy Spirit, and grant us by the same Spirit to have a right judgment in all things: we pray to him to comfort us, even that we may rejoice evermore in his holy comfort, and that he may exalt us unto the same place, whither our Saviour Christ is gone before. No words can be stronger than the petitions, which we have been offering up this very day at the throne of grace—"O God, forasmuch as without thee, we are not able to please thee; mercifully grant that thy Holy Spirit may in all things direct and rule our hearts, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen." Such is the language of scripture, and the language of our church. They both speak of the Holy Spirit as the vital principle of the Christian religion, so that if you take him out of it, you leave its professors like a body without breath: for the Holy Spirit is to their souls what breath is to their bodies, insomuch that they cannot live one moment to God without his continual inspiration. And surely it is not enthusiasm to say, that our bodies cannot live without breath; and how then can it be enthusiasm to say, that our souls cannot live without the Holy Spirit, who is the breath of our spiritual life?

Since, then, there lays no objection against the doctrine contained in the parable; since all men are by nature dead in trespasses and sins: since nothing can raise them from the death of sin to newness of life, but the inspiration of the Almighty; and since Christ has purchased life for the dead in sin, and the Holy Spirit is to apply it and to quicken them, the discourse is now brought to a point. Only one question now remains, and that is, Has this parable been fulfilled in us? Can every one of us lay his hand upon his heart, and declare in the presence of God, "I know this scripture to be true by my own experience. The Spirit of God showed me my guilt and danger, at the sight of which my unbelieving heart shook and trembled for fear, but he gave me grace to resolve, that I would seek Jesus until I found him: on him I was kept waiting, enabled to reject all hopes in my own power or works, until he put his witnessing Spirit within me, and I knew that I was one of the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Can every one of you say, that God had dealt thus with your souls? If he hath, happy are ye. In you this scripture is fulfilled. But if he hath not, it was written for your instruction—to teach you, how God would deal with you, if ever he brings you to himself. Oh that his good Spirit may deal with you in the manner here described, that he may now begin, and carry on the work of grace step by step, until all the dry bones, until every dead sinner be awakened, and hear the word of the Lord; until every awakened sinner be pardoned and justified, and sanctified, and at last glorified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. May he who is almighty to quicken the dry bones, exert his power in quickening all this congregation to a life of grace here, and to a life of eternal glory hereafter. Grant this, blessed God and Father, through the merits of thy Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and by the influence of the Holy Spirit upon all our hearts now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

A METHOD FOR PREVENTING THE FREQUENCY OF ROBBERIES AND MURDERS; PROPOSED IN

A DISCOURSE

DELIVERED AT ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER-SQUARE, AT ST. DUNSTAN'S IN THE WEST, AND AT SEVERAL OTHER PLACES IN LONDON.

The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond; it is graven upon the table of their heart.—Jer. xvii. 1.

Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies: these are the things which defile a man.—Matthew xv. 19, 20.

All these evil things, which defile the man, proceed from the heart: here the desires are first formed, and from hence they flow out, and put in motion, and animate the other faculties. And such as the fountain is, such are the streams which flow from it. If the heart be evil and corrupt in itself, the thoughts of the heart will also be evil and corrupt, and the actions which are directed by these thoughts, must also partake of their evil and corruption. For the heart thinks, resolves, and then acts; and if the thought be evil, the resolution and the act, which are the direct consequences of it, must be also evil. Nothing but evil can flow from an evil heart. Whenever the scripture speaks of the faculties of the soul, it uses words borrowed from the faculties of the body, because we are not capable of forming any idea of spiritual, unless they be compared to material objects. The soul has its spring and principle of motion as well as the body, and this we call the heart, borrowing the word from that part, which is known to be the spring and principle of all the motions in the human frame; for from the heart proceeds that vital blood, which carries on every operation throughout the body, and from which every vessel and organ has its proper nourishment ministered. The heart has the same use and office in our little world, as the sun has in the great world, being the fountain of life and genial warmth, of growth and strength in the microcosm of man. And when we apply this word to the soul, we fix the same meaning to it. The heart is that part which puts all the other faculties of the soul in motion, it is the fountain from whence our thoughts flow, and our resolutions and actions are only so many streams, which take a good or bad tincture according to the nature of the spring from whence they have their origin.

In this sense our blessed Lord here speaks of the soul; he makes the heart the fruitful cause of every vice, supposing it to be polluted even at the very fountain-head; and how then is it possible there should be any thing but pollution in the channels, which issue from it? If the heart be corrupt, so will be the actions. From an evil heart nothing can proceed, but murder, adultery, fornication, theft, false-witness, and blasphemy: for when the principle which sets all these in motion is defiled, what can spring from it but defilement?

This is our Lord's doctrine, and never was there greater occasion to consider it, than in the present times, when these vices are grown to such an enormous height, that they are openly committed in defiance of all law, divine and human. The legislature has been lately alarmed at their prodigious increase, and has been trying to find out some effectual remedy: but what has been hitherto attempted has not met with the desired success. Robberies, murders, &c. are still as common as ever, and will become daily more common, unless we strike at the root of the evil. The heart is the cause of all, and no act of parliament can touch the heart. It is out of the reach of every human tribunal. The vices by which our natural corruption have got into the heart, cannot be displaced by the wisest laws and edicts; these can only regulate the outward actions. The polluted fountain is still inaccessible to any authority but the great Creator's. He alone can give the almighty fiat, let it be clean, and it is clean. Nothing can purify it from the unclean thoughts of murder, adultery, fornication, &c. but his divine grace and virtue; to which may he enable us now to commit the guidance of our hearts. We beseech thee to take them, O eternal Spirit, under thy gracious influence, and let no unclean thought enter into them, while we are meditating upon these words of our God and Saviour—"Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false-witness, blasphemies: these are the things which defile a man."

First, It is here asserted, that the heart, the fountain of all our actions, is polluted.

Secondly, The manner in which it became polluted is here plainly implied; and this will lead us, Thirdly, To enquire into the means of cleansing and purifying it.

First, our blessed Lord here declares, that the heart, the fountain of all thought and motion, is polluted. In its natural state it is entirely impure. It is the unclean residence of the foulest spirits, even of murder, adultery, fornication, theft, perjury, and blasphemy. These are they which by nature dwell in the heart and defile the man: for corrupt nature is always disposed to receive some one or all of these polluted tempers, as temptation shall offer. The propensity to them is universal. Our church has accurately described this point in her 9th article.

"Original sin is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit, and therefore in every person born into the world it deserved God's wrath and damnation."

This was the opinion of our reformers, and if you find any difficulty in giving your assent to it, the arguments upon which they built it will, I hope, satisfy you perfectly. The express testimony of the Creator of the hearts of all men, and the experience of thinking men from the beginning of the world to this day, were the chief authorities upon which they grounded their opinion. The whole scripture supposes man to be in a state of corruption, and several passages express the universality of this corruption. It is thus delivered, Gen. vi. 5, in the clearest terms. "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Man does not here signify any one man, or race of men, but mankind, the whole human nature, which is said to be so polluted with original wickedness, that every imagination, not one excepted, of the thoughts of his heart was only evil, and continually too. What a fountain then of deadly poison is the human heart; since all the streams which flow from it are evil, and continually evil! The universal spreading of this malignant infection could not be expressed in stronger words, than to declare, that there was not one imagination in the heart, but what was evil, and always evil. Such is man in his natural state: and might not then the apostle truly say of it, Eph. ii. 3. "We are all by nature the children of wrath even as others; for the scripture hath concluded all (men, both Jews and Gentiles) under sin."

This is the scripture account of the heart of the natural man, and experience confirms it. Men are in fact such as the scripture describes them, a race of fallen corrupt beings. We find none of them upright and perfect, no not one. That moral rectitude of nature, which some metaphysical divines dream of, has no existence among the sons of Adam. Heathen writers as well as Christian prove it to be but a dream: for of the corruption of nature they all complain, and give us melancholy proofs of the prevalency of the vices mentioned in the text in every country and in every age. In the present age we see and feel them: they are grown to such an enormous height at present, that they are become a reproach to our religion, and a dishonour to our laws. Not a day passes, but we hear of some robbery, or murder, or adultery, &c., and the fountain from whence they all spring is the heart. And can the heart then be clean by nature, and yet send forth such polluted streams? Certainly the same spring cannot send forth sweet water and bitter? That which sends forth nothing but corruption, must be corrupt in its very origin. The peccant matter must lie at the fountain head, and how rank and venomous it is, we can have no doubt, if we will but open our eyes, and survey that deluge of wickedness, which now covers the face of the earth.

It is certain then that the heart of man is by nature polluted. Scripture and sad experience forbid us to doubt of it; and yet against the evidence of these authorities there are some men, who call it in question, and who think they show their superior reason by believing neither God, nor their own senses. What God declares to them they cannot but see is a matter of fact, and yet because they find some difficulty in accounting for the manner in which the heart became so polluted, they would therefore strangely infer, that it is not polluted at all. This is a very absurd conduct, but it is common to all unbelievers, and therefore it is necessary to speak to the Second particular, wherein it was proposed to consider the manner in which the human heart became thus polluted. None of the ancient philosophers, nor none of the modern reasoners, have given us any satisfactory account upon this head. The origin of evil is a subject, which has been always debated in the schools of the infidels, and they have not yet produced any solution which their own advocates are agreed to defend. How evil came into the heart is, upon the plan of their natural and metaphysical religion, absolutely unaccountable. And this is a good presumptive proof in favour of the scripture account: for the heart is certainly polluted, and the greatest men among the ancient philosophers and the modern unbelievers have been able to offer nothing satisfactory, neither to themselves nor others, concerning the manner of its pollution. But the scripture accounts for it thus, in a plain intelligible way.

God created all things at first in a perfect state. When he had finished his works, he took a survey of them, and pronounced them all to be very good. There was no pain in the natural, and no evil in the spiritual, world. Man was innocent. His heart was right with God. The thoughts of it were clean and pure altogether. He knew no guilt; he had no fear; and therefore he was happy.

The creature, who first introduced evil into the works of God, was the devil; for thus says our blessed Saviour, "The devil was a murderer from the beginning, and a liar, and the father of it," John viii. 44. In the beginning he murdered our first parents, by seducing them into that sin, which subjected their bodies to death, and both their bodies and souls to eternal condemnation. And he was the father of lies as well as of murder: for all was truth and innocence, until he offered the first lying suggestion to the heart, and basely insinuated, that God had maliciously forbidden our first parents the use of the tree of knowledge. To this insinuation they hearkened, they suffered it to make an impression upon their hearts, and disbelieving what their gracious Creator and heavenly Father had revealed to them, they built their faith on the words of the lying spirit, and acted accordingly. Thus he deceived them, and in them all their posterity; for St.

John, speaking of the great dragon, says, "This is that old serpent called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world." Rev. xii. 9.

The consequence of our first parents being deceived by his lying insinuations was the loss of their innocence and happiness. With their innocence they lost the grace and presence of God: "For he is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity," and after his divine grace and presence were withdrawn, the heart was left to itself, and to its own natural workings, which under the tempter's management could produce nothing but murders, adulteries, thefts, &c. which are the corrupt fruits of a corrupt heart. And into whatever heart the divine grace is not returned, the same corruptions still remain, and we see the effects of them still breaking out in the same abominable vices: for the heart of the natural man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked—so wicked, that sin is engraven upon it with a character, which no human art or power can erase. "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond; it is graven upon the table of their heart." Jer. xvii. 1. And what hand can come at these impressions, which are cut so deep as to be incorporated into the very substance of the heart? What power can reach and deface them, but his alone, whose prerogative it is to search the heart and the reins?

This is the scripture account. And as it is most plain and rational, to what can unbelievers object? They have nothing to substitute instead of this: and they can urge nothing against it, except they inquire, Why God should suffer man to fall, if he foresaw that it would be attended with such dreadful consequences? But this is only asking, Why he made man a free agent? For if he was free, he must have a capacity to make a wrong, as well as a right, use of his free will; and therefore he could not be placed in a state falling from which was impossible. That the first man was created with free will we have a most melancholy demonstration, the effects of which are still seen and felt all over the world; and that he had every assistance which could enable him to make a right use of his free will, the scripture gives us a full account: but he abused it. Upon which the assistance before given was withdrawn; and after this assistance was taken out of the heart, there was nothing left in it but its own fleshly desires and inclinations; and when these were spirited up by the lying suggestion of the infernal tempter, what could come out of such a heart, but murder, adultery, fornication, robbery, with all the other polluted works of the flesh and the devil?

Upon this state of the case it appears, that man lost by the fall the two chief blessings of his spiritual life, namely, the image of God, and the Spirit of God. Sin blotted out the image of God, in which man was at first created, and the scripture expressly declares, that we were afterwards born in the image of our father Adam with all his worldly desires, and corrupt inclinations. Gen. v. 3. And these the sacred writers generally term "the flesh," signifying by this word all the carnal appetites which govern man since the fall, and of which the apostle declares, "That they who are in the flesh cannot please God," Rom. viii. 8. Because while they are governed by the flesh, and not by the Spirit, they continue in the image of the earthly Adam, and in the likeness of his fallen nature; by which they are also alienated from the Spirit of God. The divine and holy Spirit left the polluted temple of the heart after sin had profaned it. He is of purer eyes than to behold the least iniquity, and therefore he could not dwell in an impure heart; and upon his retiring, it became alienated from the life of God, being now a perfect stranger to all the graces of that spiritual life, which innocent man had always, and liberally enjoyed. And after the divine image was thus extinguished, and the divine Spirit was gone, which the scripture expressly declares were the two fatal effects of the fall, then the heart of man was under the dominion of its own fleshly desires, and was ready to commit any of the abominable deeds of the flesh, whenever opportunity should offer, and inclination invite, and the devil strongly solicit to the commission of them.

Now every man who comes into the world is by nature in this state, and he will continue in it, until he finds the misery of it; until the sense of his distress force him to cry out, Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? This conviction of our misery is the first step towards a deliverance from it. So soon as we find ourselves sick, we are half cured: for if we can but bring ourselves to go with humility and prayer to the almighty Physician, he has promised to give us freely every thing proper for our relief. He is both able and willing to cleanse the fountain of the heart from all its corruptions, which is the Third and last inquiry I was to make: for though man be miserable in himself, yet God hath not left him without remedy. The great design of Christianity is to restore man to the state from whence he fell, and by the same steps through which he fell. Sin put an entire stop to the divine grace and influence, which are as necessary to the soul as breath is to the body, and when they were withdrawn, the sinner then lost the image of God, and the Spirit of God: through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ the divine grace and influence are offered to us again, and whoever seeks them by humility and prayer, until he receive them, is then made a partaker of the Spirit of God, who first makes the heart faithful and penitent, and afterwards justifies it by the blood of Christ, and sanctifies it by forming in it all the sweet and holy tempers of the blessed Jesus, in which the image of God now consists. And when the heart is thus created anew and regenerated, then is that great change perfected, of which the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. xv. "As we have born the image of the first Adam, who is of the earth, in like manner shall we bear the image of the second Adam, who is the Lord from heaven." And whoever is renewed after the image of this second Adam, he has a clean and a pure heart, and a sweet fountain might as soon send forth poisonous water, as this sanctified heart can produce murder, adultery, fornication, or any of the filthy works of the flesh.

This is the scripture account of the means of cleansing the heart. The great purifier is Jesus Christ, whose blood has infinite merit to wash away the pollutions of the whole world. The Holy Spirit is the gracious agent, who purifies the heart with this all-meritorious blood. It is his office to take out by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus all the guilt of our corrupt nature, and "to create in us a new heart and a right spirit,"—the new heart bears the image of our merciful Saviour, and the right spirit is no longer alienated from the life of God, but lives in holy communion and fellowship with the Holy Spirit. And thus the sinner becomes a new man and a new creature. His soul is endued with a new set of faculties and tempers entirely Christian, and his heart which was formerly the habitation of the foulest vices, of murder, adultery, fornication, &c. is now consecrated, and made an holy temple for the living God.

This is the only method, which the scripture has taught us, of cleansing the heart from those worldly and carnal tempers with which it is by nature infected. If you refuse to believe the scripture, try any other method; but be assured you must come to this at last. Experience will bring you to it. You will find, God grant you may find it in time, that nothing is able to purify the heart, but the blood of the Lamb of God, and that nothing is able to apply it to the heart, but the eternal Spirit. You will be the more fully convinced of this the more you try other things: see first how far the boasted religion of nature, and its moral rectitude, and the fitness of things, and such like metaphysical nonentities, can reform the heart—make your experiments upon the liberal arts and sciences—go through them one after another—study books and men—try every thing that wit can invent or money purchase, and withhold nothing from your soul of all its desires—and then sit down, and carefully and impartially examine your own heart, and judge, how far all these worldly pursuits and attainments have reformed it. And what is the issue? Are you really better? Do you find your heart more free from corruption than it was when you first set out? You will not, you cannot assert it: because reason and matter of fact are against you; they demonstrate, that our worldly tempers must be fed and encouraged by these worldly pursuits and attainments; for it is a glaring contradiction to suppose that we can increase our spirituals, by laying out all our time and pains upon temporals. Be therefore assured that the more you try these worldly things, the worse you will be: and the longer you try them, the more difficult you will find it to be set right. They have no virtue to take one single vice out of the heart, but as they fall in with our corrupt inclinations, they must encourage and strengthen every vice, which is in the heart. If you try all the powers upon earth, you will find by experience, that the heart is out of their reach, and at last, if ever you see the face of God with joy, you must conclude, that there is nothing but the blood of Jesus Christ, and the operation of his good Spirit, which is able to cleanse your polluted hearts, and to renew a right spirit within you.

Thus it is abundantly evident from experience, that nothing can purify and take away the natural pollutions of the heart, but the blood of Jesus Christ sprinkled upon it by the Holy Spirit. This is the only gospel method. And it is able to purify by faith and take away all these pollutions which nothing else can: for its power is also abundantly evident from experience. It has been found effectual, after all other methods have failed. It has been tried ever since sin first entered into the world, and has ever succeeded. And this single circumstance seems sufficient to recommend it to the minds of all serious persons, and to determine them to receive it as the sovereign remedy of their natnral corruptions. We have in the first ages after Christ, a particular account of the great change made in men's hearts upon their embracing the gospel. And these accounts are so well attested, that if the strongest historical evidence can gain your assent, they will appear to you full and decisive. I remember to have seen a passage in Lactantius, where in his apology for the Christians of his time, he has these words, "Give me a man," says he to the heathens, "who is passionate, malicious, headstrong; with a few gospel precepts, I will render him as meek as a lamb. Give me one who is covetous, I will soon persuade him to be liberal and charitable. Give me one who dreads afflictions and death, I will make him run and court martyrdom. Give me an unclean, intemperate, unjust, cruel, sinful wretch; I will, by the knowledge of Christ, and by the influence of his laws, render him chaste, sober, merciful, innocent, and holy." Lactantius had good reason for what he here asserts: he had seen the gospel of Christ take these vices out of men's hearts, and we have seen the same happy effects of it in our days; not indeed in so great a number, but, God be praised for it, we have enow to demonstrate to any unbeliever, that the same gospel has still the same power. You do not see so much of its power, because you do not hear so much of the gospel. But wherever the pure gospel of Jesus Christ is preached, and men receive it with faith, their experience daily confirms what Lactantius long ago observed You still see it work the same real change in men's tempers, which cannot arise from any heat of fancy, or flight of enthusiasm, or sudden rapture of devotion, because it is a sober, regular, thorough change, that reforms the heart, and all its affections, and influences the whole behaviour, rendering a man confident and uniform throughout the whole course of his future life. That such changes are wrought at this day is an undoubted matter of fact. Sinners, and great sinners too, are brought to see the error of their ways, to forsake their wicked courses, to lead a new life, to follow the commandments of God, and to walk from henceforth in his holy ways. This is an entire, a total change. When a sinner becomes a Christian, he is absolutely a new creature and a new man, insomuch that you may truly say of him, "old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new;" for he neither thinks, speaks, nor acts, as he used to do. He has a new set of senses and faculties. He neither sees things in the same light he did before, nor hears after the same manner. What formerly pleased him, now displeases. The very end of all his pursuits is changed, and his happiness is placed on a different object. We see this perfect change produced every day, when the gospel enters into any man's heart. As it takes possession, the corrupt passions retire. The Holy Spirit purifies the fountain, and then all the streams run pure. It is evident, that he has given the heart a new nature, because what proceeds from it is not influenced by the natural man. All is renewed. The murderer is humane and loving, the fornicator and adulterer are chaste, the thief is honest, the false-witness true, the blasphemer a Christian. Such is the glorious change, which the Holy Spirit makes when he sprinkles the heart with the all-purifying blood of the Lamb of God.

And now we have discovered the cause of the evil, and its remedy. The heart of every man we find to be by nature corrupt, destitute entirely of divine grace, and disposed, as temptation shall offer, to commit any wickedness: for from this fruitful fountain, from the heart of the natural man, proceed murders, adulteries, fornication, thefts, perjuries, and blasphemies. And nothing but the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus can dry up this fountain of sin, and nothing can carry the virtue of it to the heart but an almighty Spirit. Human laws, which are the only expedient lately attempted, cannot come to the head and source of this corrupt fountain. It lies too deep. Their power cannot reach it, and much less purify it. An act of parliament can only regulate the outward behaviour. It can take no cognizance of a crime, until it break out into some overt act, and therefore it can have no influence over the heart. If murder, adultery, robbery, &c. be in the heart, there all statute laws leave them; and the inclination only waits for a fair opportunity, which it will always embrace, whenever there is a prospect of escaping the lash of the law. Thus no sin is hereby prevented. Only the commission of it is rendered more private, and the heart is put upon inventing schemes, how it may gratify itself in its pleasures, without incurring the pains and penalties, which the law threatens to inflict. By this means the corruption that seems to be diminished in the channels, gathers and increases at the fountain-head, where the more it is stopped, the more it ferments and pollutes itself. Since this is the case, what reformation can we expect from the interposition of human authority? Supposing the legislature should follow his majesty's gracious instructions from the throne, and try to find out some new laws for putting a stop to robberies and murders, yet experience would soon prove them to be ineffectual. All the human laws which ever were made, or ever will be made, cannot reform one single person, because they cannot reach the heart. Gospel and not law should be here employed. The gospel can take sin out of the heart, but the law can only make the commission of it more private. The clergy therefore should be called upon, and not the magistrate. This is, under God, the peculiar business of the ministers of the gospel, and it is, I fear, owing to their great neglect of their duty, that robberies and murders are become so common. Our people grow more corrupt in their morals, not for want of good statute laws, but for want of good gospel ministers. For it is certain, that the gospel, and nothing else, can take murder, adultery, fornication, robbery, &c. out of the heart, and it is as certain, that the gospel has taken them out of the heart, wherever it has been properly received: and therefore either in the manner of applying the gospel, or in not applying it at all, there is a great failing somewhere or other among us. God Almighty grant, that they who are guilty may see their error, and may have grace to repent and amend.

And now let me intreat you, my brethren, to pray that these truths may make a proper impression upon your minds. You have heard me labour this point much of late. It appears to me to be the most important in Christianity, and therefore in several discourses I have been endeavouring to give you a just sense of your state and condition by nature. What success they may have met with depends upon God, whose blessing upon them I do most sincerely implore. All our preaching can do nothing to your hearts without his grace, and I beseech him that, out of the riches of his infinite love to sinners, through Jesus Christ, he would be pleased to let you see your own hearts: for until you behold that defilement and corruption, in which the heart of every man lies by nature, you will see but little necessity for a Saviour. And this divine grace I hope he will now send into all our hearts, that you may be disposed to receive favourably, and to profit by, two short remarks, with which I shall apply the doctrine, first to them who do not believe it, then to them who have given their free assent.

If any of you do not believe the doctrine, you are in a very dangerous situation. because you are on the very brink of destruction, and yet do not see your danger. Can you think your heart is not corrupt? This very thought demonstrates its corruption; for sinners you certainly are, and all sin comes from the heart; and can the heart send forth a whole life of sin, and not be sinful itself? This is impossible. To believe such an impossibility argues a most dangerous state of mind. A man does not cheat himself more, who fancies himself to be in good health, when he has been long ill, and is just dying, than he who fancies his heart to be pure, although every thing that flows from it is impure. This is one of the greatest delusions of sin. It lulls the sinner into a state of security, and tempts him to believe, that his heart is pure and without spot, although it be nothing but corruption and deformity. Whoever is tempted into this belief does not know himself. And if any of you have fallen into this fatal error, I pray God to let you know yourselves: for you are as yet perfect strangers to your own breasts. If you were to see them naked and open, with all the little lurking places, where self-love and vain-glory conceal your failings, the moment you beheld the horrid sight, it would force you to cry out, "Jesus, master, have mercy on me." Oh! what a blessing would it be, if you could now speak these words from your hearts! I hope you will. And may the Lord God of heaven show you, what you really are by nature, and then make you what you ought to be by grace.

To you who believe the doctrine, I need not use many words, because you are convinced, that the heart is a polluted fountain, from whence all vices spring, and that nothing can purify it, but the blood of the Lamb of God sprinkled upon it by the Holy Spirit. This is the firm belief of every Christian. I hope you know it to be true, both from scripture and from experience. You find that the fountain has been cleansed, because the streams run pure. Your lives and actions show, that God has created a new heart, and has renewed a right spirit within you, and it is your whole care and study to keep this new heart clean and holy. But whenever you find any defilement beginning to arise, even in thought, immediately send up your prayers to God. Intreat his grace to keep you from the pollution of sin, and if you always make him your refuge and strength, constantly seeking him in the ways of his ordinances, then his Holy Spirit will keep out of your hearts all those corruptions, which defile the man, and your Lord Jesus will so purify you by his infinite merits, that you shall be presented before God the Father without spot of sin unto salvation. Blessed Lord and Saviour, carry these truths to all our hearts; accompany them, we intreat thee, with thy blessing; and keep our hearts pure by thy grace, until thou bring them safe unto thy glory. Amen.

A DISCOURSE

ON THE BENEFIT WHICH

THE HOLY SPIRIT OF GOD IS OF TO MAN, IN HIS JOURNEY THROUGH LIFE.

PREACHED AT

CHRIST CHURCH, IN NEWGATE STREET, ON WHITSUN-MONDAY, MAY 19 1755, PURSUANT TO THE WILL OF MISS ELIZABETH HILL, LATE OF FALMOUTH, CORNWALL

The fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness.—Eph. v. 9.

PREFACE.

THE following discourse was drawn up at the request of Miss Hill's executor, to whom I am greatly obliged for appointing me to preach on Whitsun-Monday, agreeably to the words of her will, on the benefit which the Holy Spirit of God is of to man in his journey through life. And what I thought myself bound in duty to deliver from the pulpit, I have since been persuaded to send from the press; for although it contains nothing new either in the matter or manner, yet I think it incumbent upon me to bear my public testimony to the great doctrine of Christianity here inculcated. I am prepared for the reception it will meet with, not only from the Monthly Reviewers, the avowed enemies of the established church, and its established doctrines, but also from all mere nominal Christians.

But let them ridicule it ever so much as Hutchinsonian Enthusiasm, yet since it is expressly taught in Scripture, and maintained in the clearest manner by our church, it will give me no concern to be reckoned an enthusiast, while the scripture is on my side, or an Hutchinsonian, while the church of England supports me; and if men will call the plain doctrines of Scripture enthusiasm, and will treat the articles, and homilies, and liturgy of our church as Hutchinsonianism, I hope I shall live and die a Church of England-Hutchinsonian-Enthusiast.

Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them.—Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, 27.

Our blessed Saviour showed himself alive after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of his apostles forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and being assembled together with them, he commanded them, that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me; for John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence. And according to his most true promise, the Holy Ghost came down as at this time from heaven with a sudden great sound, as it had been a mighty wind, in the likeness of fiery tongues, lighting upon the apostles, to teach them, and to lead them to all truth, giving them both the gifts of divers languages, and also boldness with fervent zeal, constantly to preach the gospel unto all nations, whereby we have been brought out of darkness and error, into the clear light and true knowledge of Jesus Christ.

This is the subject of the present festival. We are here assembled to commemorate the gifts and graces which the Holy Spirit bestowed upon the apostles, and to bless God for our interest in them. The same Spirit is still with us, and will abide with us for ever. He is with us, not to bring the world over to the outward profession of Christianity; for that is already effected, and the extraordinary powers which were necessary to effect it are ceased. Christianity is established, and outward miracles are no longer needful to be the outward proofs of it. But the Holy Spirit has still the same inward work to carry on, which he had in the apostles' time, and it requires the same degree of divine and almighty power, although it be not exerted in outward miracles. The mind of every man is by nature in darkness and ignorance, blind as to the things of God; this he has to enlighten with saving truth. The will and all the affections are depraved, and it is his gracious office to incline and dispose them to comply with the will of God. And after the understanding is enlightened, and the heart renewed, we have still no power to walk in the ways of holiness, without the special grace of the Holy Spirit, whose guidance is necessary every moment, and for every thought, and word, and work. These are called the ordinary operations of the Spirit of God, not as if they were less divine, or any thing short of the almighty operations, in the apostolic age, but because these were extraordinary, given for a certain fixed time, to carry on a particular work, but the former were common to all believers, to the apostles themselves as believers, and are to be the ordinary gifts and graces of every Christian unto the end of the world. And whoever has received these ordinary operations, has in his own heart clear and full testimony of the Godhead, and almighty power of the blessed Spirit. He wants no outward miracles. This great inward work is to him complete evidence; and he is able to rest his salvation with as full trust and confidence upon it, as if he had seen the apostles exert their miraculous gifts and graces. May the Lord and giver of all grace be pleased to bestow upon you this inward witness, and may he enable you to look up to him for it while I am,

First, Illustrating these truths from the prophet's authority in the text, and then

Secondly, Applying them to your spiritual use and benefit.

And by the consideration of these two particulars, I hope to be able to answer the good purposes of our present meeting. We are called together by the will of a late charitable and pious lady, who appointed a sermon to be preached upon this day concerning the "benefit which the Holy Spirit of God is of to man, during his journey through this life." The subject is suitable to the great festival, which the church now celebrates, and the words which I have read contain a clear and full account of the benefit we receive from the Holy Spirit from the beginning to the end of our Christian life. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean," &c. The clean water was to be sprinkled upon them to cleanse the soul; this effect is here ascribed to it; but water cannot reach the soul, or if it could, yet it was not able so to act upon it, as to cleanse it from any sinful filthiness. But the Spirit of God acts upon our spirits, as water does upon the body, and therefore it was the outward and visible sign of his inward and spiritual grace in the Old Testament, as well as the New. The phrase of sprinkling clean water to cleanse them from sin refers to the legal ablutions, and more particularly to the great typical purification for sin, of which we read Numbers xix. The ashes of the red heifer, which was burnt without the camp, were to be mixed with pure running water to be a purification for sin, and whoever contracted any legal uncleanness, and had not this sin-water sprinkled upon him to purify himself, that soul was to be cut off from among the congregation. St. Paul has applied part of this service to our Lord's suffering without the gate, Heb. xiii. 11, 12, 13, and St. John has applied the other part, John vii. 38, 39, where, upon Christ's describing the rivers of living water which should flow from believers, he says, "But this he spake of the Spirit," he spake of water as the known emblem of the Spirit, and the Christian church has always used it for his emblem in the sacrament of baptism, wherein his grace cleanses to the purifying of the soul, as water cleanses to the purifying of the flesh.

Water, then, is the instituted type of the Holy Spirit, and pouring out water to cleanse is, in the scripture manner of expression, pouring out of the Holy Spirit to cleanse the soul; and his cleansing grace must be the thing here spoken of, because it was to purify them from all sin. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean, from all your filthiness and from all your idols will I cleanse you," from all the filthiness of sin, and from all the guilt of idolatry I will purify them. Sin polluted all the faculties of the soul, and my good Spirit shall cleanse them all. The understanding he shall purify by removing its natural blindness, and by opening their eyes to see the error of their ways, that they may be brought to Jesus Christ for salvation, and may have their hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience with the all-purifying blood of the Lamb of God, which will justify them, and may have grace and power to walk in the statutes of the Lord, and to keep his judgments, which will sanctify them; and thus he cleanses all the faculties: for it follows in the second verse of the text, "A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh." The cleansing of the heart is the greatest work of divine grace, because there is in every sinner hardness, and an impenitent heart, which no human power can soften. The scripture speaks of it in the strongest expressions, "The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond, it is graven upon the table of the heart;" and what power is able to erase this deep engraving, except the Almighty God, who declares, "I will give you a new heart," renewed in all its faculties, "and a new spirit will I put within you," endued with new appetites and new affections, "and I will take away the stony heart," the refreshing streams of my grace shall soften the old hardened heart of sin, which would take no good impression, "and I will give you a heart of flesh," soft and pliable, yielding to the motions of my grace, and willing to have the law engraved by the Spirit of the living God upon the fleshly tables of the heart. And after the heart and the affections are thus renewed, and disposed to love the will of God, the Holy Spirit was still to proceed, and to go on in the work of sanctification, in which his grace is absolutely necessary. Even after the stony heart is taken out, we still want his guidance; and whenever he leaves us to ourselves, we cannot take one step in our journey towards heaven. And therefore God promises to them who had a new heart, "that he would put his Spirit within them, and cause them to walk in his statutes." His Spirit should be their guide, both to lead them into the way of God's commandments, and to give them strength and power to walk in these ways steadily unto the end: for the light of nature could never direct sinners into the paths of God's commandments, nor could the best natural abilities go forward in them, unless God should put his Spirit within us, and give us power to walk in his statutes. We want his support every step we take throughout the whole work of sanctification. If we go forward, he is the cause. He gives us both the will and the power; for it is he who worketh in us both to will and to do. It is the Spirit of God within us, who causes us to walk in his statutes, and to keep his judgments and do them.

And thus the prophet has taught us of what benefit the Holy Spirit is to man during his journey through this life. We cannot so much as set out upon our journey to heaven, until he cleanse all the faculties, by removing the blindness of the understanding, and the depravity of the will and affections. It is his office to give us a new heart and a new spirit, disposed to receive impressions of the divine law, and then to endue it with power to walk in the statutes of God, and to keep his judgments and to do them; so that every step we take from the first moment we set out, until we happily arrive at the end of our journey, is directed and supported by the Holy Spirit of God. This is the prophet's doctrine, which I come Secondly, To apply to your spiritual use and benefit. And if we make a right use of it, we must not only endeavour to be convinced of its truth, but also to find the power of it operating upon our lives and conversations; for it would be to no purpose to believe, that the Holy Spirit is the author and finisher of the whole work of grace, if this belief should rest unoperative in the head, and never dispose us to seek the experience of it in the heart, and in the rest of the faculties. Since his grace is to cleanse us from all the pollutions of sin, and to create in us a new heart, and to renew a right spirit within us, and to give us power to walk in the way of God's commandments, let us not hear these truths as mere speculative points, but let us suffer the conviction of them to operate in our lives, and to carry us to seek our own interest in them. And I hope the blessed Spirit will render profitable to these good purposes what I have to offer concerning the usefulness of his guidance throughout the journey of life.

Sin polluted the whole man, and made every part and power unclean and abominable altogether, and the prophet ascribes to the Holy Spirit the whole work of cleansing the soul. His grace is necessary to purify every faculty. He begins with removing the darkness of the understanding, and enlightening it with all-saving truth, of which by nature we are ignorant. Sin rendered us incapable of seeing spiritual objects. It did not entirely destroy the organ of sight, but it entirely stopped all communion between it and the fountain of light, and brought the soul into such a state as the body would be in if the sun was blotted out of heaven, and the moon and stars were no more to reflect their enlivening rays upon the earth. This would be a most uncomfortable and heavy night, in which, although the bodily organ of sight remained, yet these outward objects would be as invisible, as if the organ was quite destroyed. And sin produced the same effects in the spiritual world. Every son of Adam is in darkness and the shadow of death, until the Holy Spirit of God enlighten the eyes of the understanding. St. Paul's account of the Gentiles is this, (Eph. iv. 18.) "they had the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart." Sin darkened the understanding and alienated them from the life of God, by separating them from that divine light, which is the principle of their spiritual life, and therefore they lived no longer unto God, but were cut off from all intercourse and communion with him. In this state of darkness and blindness we all continue, entirely ignorant of the " things of God," until his good Spirit manifest them unto us. The natural understanding in its highest refinement cannot discover them; " for the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." (1 Cor. ii. 14.) The natural man cannot receive spiritual things. God must reveal them unto him by his Spirit, before he can have the least discernment of them, even what is revealed concerning them in scripture cannot be discerned, until the Holy Spirit open the eyes to behold it. And under the sense of this truth the prophet thus intreats God, " Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law," Psalm cxix. 18; to open the eyes to behold them was the work of God. And again he prays, " Give me understanding," (it was the gift of God) " that I may learn thy commandments. I am thy servant, give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies," Psalm cxix. 73, 125. And to the same effect St. Paul prays for his Ephesians, that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, would give unto them the Spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him, " that the eyes of their understanding might be enlightened." This was the work of God. He was to give unto them the Spirit, and the Spirit was to give them wisdom, and to reveal the knowledge of God to them, by which means the eyes of their understanding would be enlightened.

This is the doctrine of Scripture; and I may confirm it from an authority, which I esteem next to the word of God, and that is the sense of our church upon this point. In the collect for the 5th Sunday after Easter she teaches us to pray, " O Lord, from whom all good things do come; grant to us, thy humble servants, that by thy holy inspiration we may think those things that be good," &c.: we cannot so much as think a good thought unless we have the holy inspiration of God. And again on the 9th Sunday after Trinity we pray, " Grant to us, Lord, we beseech thee, the spirit to think and do always such things as be rightful, that we who cannot do anything that is good without thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy will, through Jesus Christ our Lord." To the same purpose we read in the third part of the homily for Rogation week, " Let us meekly call upon the bountiful Spirit, the Holy Ghost, to inspire us with his presence, that we may be able to hear the goodness of God to our salvation. For without his lively inspiration, can we not so much as speak the name of the Mediator. No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Much less should we be able to understand these great mysteries, that be open to us by Christ. " For we have received," saith St. Paul, " not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, for this purpose, that we may know the things which are freely given to us of God." In the power of the Holy Ghost resteth all ability to know God and to please him. It is he that purifieth the mind by his secret working. He enlighteneth the heart to conceive worthy thoughts of Almighty God." These authorities are clear. They expressly declare, that we cannot think such things as be rightful without the holy inspiration of the Spirit of God. These are the sentiments of Scripture, and of the Church of England, concerning the first step we are to take in our Christian course.

By removing the darkness of the natural understanding, and by enlightening it with all saving truth, the Holy Spirit enables us to see the way to heaven. The next step is to dispose the will to walk in it; for after we see the right way, yet we have no desire to walk in it, until he renew the heart. It is the work of his grace to incline the will, and to dispose it aright, that it may consent to the will of God: for our wills are by nature corrupt. The will of the flesh is opposite to the will of God; and our affections are so depraved, that they choose only evil, and continually. " And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. vi. 5. And this continually evil heart is also obdurately evil. It is stony and rocky, harder than adamant. All the powers in nature cannot soften it. Sin has rendered it incapable of any good impression, unless it be made by an almighty arm. He alone who created the heart can make it relent before him. To soften an hardened heart is as great a work as to create a world, and therefore the prophet prays, "create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." To create, is to make a thing out of nothing, and the same creative power which brought the heavens and the earth out of nothing is necessary to create in the sinner a clean heart: for to cast him in a new mould, and to make him a new man, is harder than to make him a man at first; because nothing opposed his creation. God spake, and it was done. But the heart, which was conceived in sin, has lived in sin, and has loved sin, and placed all its affections upon it, has an utter aversion to this new creation. And what power is able to take the love of sin out of the heart, and to render it willing to be made pure and holy? Say, who is equal to this great work? Certainly, no created power. He alone can do it, who turneth the hard rock into a standing water, and the flint stone into a springing well. He can do it, and he has promised, "I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away your stony heart, and I will give you an heart of flesh, and I will put my Spirit within you." My Spirit shall work this great change. He shall take the hard stony heart out of you, which is altogether sinful, and shall enable you to delight in the law of God in the inner man. And thus he renews the heart, "for we are saved by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." (Titus iii. 5.) And

This is the language of our church. On Christmas day we use these words, "Almighty God—grant that we being regenerate, and made thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by thy Holy Spirit," &c. And again on the 19th Sunday after Trinity we pray, "O God, forasmuch as without thee we are not able to please thee; mercifully grant, that thy Holy Spirit may in all things direct and rule our hearts, through Jesus Christ our Lord." We are taught the reason for offering up these petitions in the 10th article "of free-will."

"The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself by his own natural strength and good works to faith and calling upon God: wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good-will, and working with us when we have that good-will." We have lost by the fall the power of turning and preparing our hearts to any religious exercise, and we have not even the good-will, much less the power, to do any one good work, until the grace of God go before and dispose the will, and afterwards work with us, when we have that good-will; from whence it is evident, that the will and the affections must be renewed by the Holy Ghost, before there can be any good in fallen man; agreeably to what we read (Prov. xvi. 1.) "that the preparations of the heart in man are from the Lord."

From these authorities of scripture, and of our own church, it must be evident to every unprejudiced person, that the heart is by nature inclined to evil, hard and stony, and unwilling to receive any good impressions, and no power can soften it but an almighty Spirit, whose grace alone is able to renew it after the image of him that created it.

And after the understanding is enlightened, and the will and affections renewed, we still want grace every moment to enable us to go on in the ways of holiness. After we have received justifying grace, we continually stand in need of the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit. We cannot take one step without his assistance: for it is he who worketh in us both to will and to do. We have no power nor might in ourselves, but all our sufficiency is of God. In our spiritual course his grace is as necessary, as breathing is to the body. There is but one word in scripture for the air which the body breathes, and for that grace which is the breath of our spiritual life; and if you cannot move, much less run a race, without breath, how then can you run through your Christian course without grace? You must breathe the air in at every step, and you must have grace breathed into you every step you take in your way to heaven. And therefore when our blessed Lord breathed upon the apostles, he at the same time explained the meaning of what he did by saying, "receive ye the Holy Ghost," whose gracious office it is to act upon the soul as breath does upon the body, and hence it is called inspiration, which signifies breathing in; and since this inspiraon is as necessary to our spiritual life as breath is to our animal life, is it not from hence certain, that we cannot take one step in the ways of holiness, unless the inspiration of the Almighty enable us to proceed?

And these are the sentiments of the word of God. "O Lord, I know," says Jeremiah (x. 23.) "that the way of man is not in himself, it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." The Psalmist acknowledges it, for he prays, "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not. Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and make me to go in the path of thy commandments." And again he says, "I will run in the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart," when thou shalt give it freedom and liberty, that it may walk with pleasure in those paths which are to the natural man grievous. And the New Testament opens and explains these expressions of the Old, by assuring us, that believers "walk in the Spirit, and are led by the Spirit," and are strengthened by the Spirit in the inner man, "who gives them grace to serve God acceptably: for the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth, proving what is acceptable unto the Lord." And to enable us to produce these fruits, the Comforter is to be with us for ever. He is to guide and direct our lives, and to govern our conversations. He will never leave us, nor forsake us, but will support us with his grace every moment. And this his continual assistance our church prays for in these words: "O God, forasmuch as without thee we are not able to please thee, mercifully grant that thy Holy Spirit may in ALL things direct and rule our hearts." (9th Sunday after Trinity.) And again, "O Lord—grant that by thy holy inspiration we may think those things that be good, and by thy merciful guidance may perform the same." (5th Sunday after Easter.) From whence it is evident, that the holy Spirit is our guide through the journey of life. The whole work of sanctification is his. He cleanses the heart, purifies it, fills it full of faith, and hope, and love, and enriches it with all the sweet and heavenly tempers of the blessed Jesus. He sanctifies every visitation to God's people; if it be prosperous, he keeps them humble; if it be adverse, he arms them with patience, and thus he makes all things work together for their good. God grant you may all find these truths verified by your own experience: for truths they are, and you cannot deny them. If you believe the word of God, and if you pay any regard to the doctrines of our church, you must confess, that the Holy Spirit is the author and finisher of our happy journey through life. Sinful fallen man has no light to direct him in the way, until the Holy Spirit remove the darkness of the understanding, and reveal every saving truth, and then he sees the paths which lead to everlasting joy. This is the first step. But when he sees them he has no will to walk in them. His heart is set against them, it is hard and stony, and inflexibly evil. The Holy Spirit alone has power to work upon it, and to melt it down into a softer tender heart, which will freely yield to have the law of God engraven upon it. And after we have taken this step, after we have seen the right road in which our journey lies, and are disposed to walk in it, yet we want power to succeed successfully. Sin made us weak and infirm, and inbred corruption keeps us so, and therefore the same good Spirit, that worketh all in all, must go along with us every step to strengthen our weakness, and support us every moment to help our infirmities. We are not sufficient for these things of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God.

And since the evidence of this doctrine is clear and full, and not to be denied by any person, who allows the authority of Scripture, I may here rest the matter at present, and enquire what effect your assent to it has produced. Have you desired to experience the truth of it? Or have you found the comfort of it in your souls? Do you remember when the Holy Spirit opened your eyes, and brought you out of darkness into his marvellous light? Is your will reconciled to the will of God? And are you able to conform your lives and conversations to it? If you are in this happy state, and if before God the searcher of hearts, you can declare that he has done these wonders for your salvation, O be thankful unto him, and live a life of praise and gratitude. May the Holy Spirit direct every thought, and word, and work, to the honour and glory of Jesus Christ your Saviour and your God. But which the Holy Spirit must work in your hearts before you are Christians indeed, O consider in what a dangerous state you live. If God be true, your souls are in darkness, your hearts in sin, and all your faculties under the power of Satan; and until you be enlightened and converted, have a new heart, and a new nature, you are children of wrath, and if you die in this state, you are lost and ruined to all eternity. If ever you see the face of God with joy, you must be renewed in the Spirit of your mind. You must be made just and holy. All this must be done. You must experience it, and you will know it as certainly as you know any truth, when the Holy Spirit bears testimony with your spirits, that you are the children of God.

But you have been told, that this doctrine is enthusiasm. It is so, in the opinion of the world, and it ever was, and ever will be. It must be enthusiasm to the natural man to talk of the inward working of the Holy Spirit; for he discerneth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because he has no spiritual discernment. To a man who never found himself in darkness, never felt the hardness of his heart, never mourned over his inability to walk in the ways of holiness, it must appear like vision and madness to talk of being enlightened, and renewed, and strengthened in the inner man by the Holy Spirit. And indeed this doctrine is become ridiculous. It is become the very mark and badge of religious frenzy. As soon as you mention any work of the Holy Spirit, you are supposed to be a little turned in the head; and if you dare maintain the necessity of his grace, you are quite given over. And this shame and reproach is hard to bear. Many persons, who in their consciences assent to the doctrine, are terrified from owning it, for fear of the world, and thereby lose all its comforts. I am acquainted with several persons in this unhappy state. God grant you may be all free from it. But as it is a common temptation, with which it is probable every Christian will be tried, it will therefore be proper to consider it.

This is, I suppose, your state. You assent in your minds to the truth of the doctrine, but dare not own it, for fear of being called enthusiasts. What weakness is this? Consider well what you lose by being afraid of a nickname. Can any thing be more weak and foolish, than to set out alone upon your journey for eternity, and to reject the only guide who can direct you safe, because you will be ridiculed for following his directions; and so for fear of being laughed at, you blunder on in the wrong way, until you fall at last into the pit of destruction? And then how will this reflection add to your misery, that you had no temptation to reject the Holy Spirit's guidance, but the ridicule of the world. The Scripture assured you, that he was your only guide, and you believed it. The church of England taught you to pray to him, and to seek him for your only guide, and you assented to her doctrines. And yet you gave up the Scripture, gave up the doctrines of your own church, for fear of a nickname; nay more, you gave up your hopes of eternal glory. Good God, what magic is there in a name, that it should charm you out of heaven! How dreadful is reproach, if it should terrify you more than hell! Should not we have thought it unaccountable, if we did not see it every day, that a hard name, which is but a sound and nothing more, should work so wonderfully upon the mind. But, men and brethren, use your reason. Will you give up all that is dear and valuable to avoid a nickname? Will you lose all the graces and comforts of the Holy Spirit for fear of being called an enthusiast? Certainly you cannot act so weak and wicked a part, and you will not if you fly to the Holy Spirit for grace, whenever you find reproach like to stagger your faith. He will enable you to overcome the temptation, if you seek his strength. He can so arm you with might in the inner man, that the ridicule of the world will make no impression upon you; nay, he can make it sweet, he will enable you even to bear it and love it. God grant you may now seek his strength. Oh that he may now be present among you with his almighty grace, and dispose every one of you to take him for your guide through the journey of life, and then he will fill your hearts with that perfect love of God, which will cast out the fear of men.

But if you are not affected with these motives, if you still see no necessity for being guided by the blessed Spirit, would to God I could discover the secret springs of your hearts, and turn them to that adorable person, whose grace alone can make you happy. Oh that I could convince you so far, as to put you this moment upon seeking the gracious guidance of the eternal Spirit. But this is his own work. We must plead, and intreat, and importune you to seek his assistance, but the success must come from him. The word itself is but a dead letter unless he animate it; and therefore the preaching of it can have no power, unless he accompany it. We may plant and water, but he must give the increase. Oh that it may be abundant this day to the glory of Jesus Christ. And all of you who desire it, will join your hearts with mine in requesting it of him.

O almighty God, who as at this time did teach the hearts of thy faithful people by the sending to them the light of thy Holy Spirit, send, we beseech thee, the same Spirit to enlighten our understandings, that we may have a right judgment in all things, and may his grace operate with power upon our hearts, softening their hard stony nature, and making them willing to obey the law of God; and then grant that he may finish this great work, by enabling us to proceed in the ways of holiness, until we happily end the journey of life. Oh may the eternal Spirit come down upon this whole congregation, and enlighten, and renew, and strengthen every one of us in the inner man, that we may now and evermore rejoice in his holy comfort, through the merits of Christ Jesus our Saviour, who liveth and reigneth with the Father and the Spirit, three persons of equal honour, and glory, and dominion, now and for ever. Amen and Amen.

A SERMON

PREACHED

AT ST. ANNE'S, BLACKFRIARS, ON SUNDAY, SEPT. 30, 1764.

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Gal. vi. 14.

We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.—2 Cor. iv. 5.

THE apostle speaks these words of himself, and of Timothy. He is clearing their office and their character from the charges brought against them by some false teachers in the church of Corinth. In the foregoing chapter, he has been comparing the ministry of the law with the ministry of the gospel, and stating the difference between them. The law was written on tables of stone, and was the ministration of death, and of condemnation, but the gospel was written upon the fleshly tables of the heart, being the ministration of the Spirit, and of righteousness, and therefore whatever glory the law had, the gospel did far exceed it in glory. Paul and Timothy, being appointed preachers of this most glorious gospel, and having received this ministry, did not faint through any difficulty or opposition, nor did they labour in it upon any corrupt, selfish motives: for they renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, every base principle that would not bear the light, not walking in craftiness with an intention through subtlety to cheat their hearers, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, on purpose to deceive and beguile unstable souls; but they acted openly and honestly, by manifestation of the truth commending themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God, making the truth so plain, and their views in preaching it so noble and disinterested, that every man's conscience rightly informed must approve of them: but, however, God saw the secrets of their hearts, and to him they could appeal for the uprightness of their motives; so that if there were any who did not receive their gospel, it was their own fault, and was a sad proof of their being in a lost state: for if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them who are lost, who are under the power of the devil and of unbelief, in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not: this is the grand stratagem of Satan. Wherever the gospel comes, he tries to blind and harden men's minds against it, knowing well, that if the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine into them there would be an end of his reign; therefore he labours with wiles and force to shut out the light of the gospel, that he may continue to rule in the evil heart of unbelief. But, blessed be God, the preaching of the gospel is the means of dethroning Satan: he fears no weapon formed against him but the two-edged sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. With this he has been defeated thousands and thousands of times; for it is the appointed instrument of bringing sinners out of darkness into light, and from the power of Satan into the kingdom of God's dear Son. And the Lord works this mighty deliverance by the preaching of the gospel. When the able ministers of the New Testament have a single eye to Christ, and aim solely at his glory, then the Holy Spirit sets in with their words, and according to his office glorifies Christ in the understanding, and in the hearts of the hearers. Of this, St. Paul had long and happy experience. He was enabled to renounce self in all his ministrations, and to exalt Jesus. We preach not ourselves—we disclaim self in all its shapes—we renounce self-seeking and self-pleasing—we abhor selfish views—we would have self debased; and in all our preaching, we would have self brought to nought, that Christ may be ALL in ALL. "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord." Of his wonderful person, God-man—of his gracious undertakings —of his divine offices—of his finished salvation—of his almighty power and faithfulness to carry all the purposes of his love into execution, that his people may be receiving out of his fulness grace in time, and glory in eternity:—of these things we would be telling all the day long. He is the subject matter, his glory is the end and aim of all our preaching; and if he be but glorified and souls won to him, we have reward enough. His love constraineth us to love him, the head of the body, and to love all his members, for his sake ready to do any good office to the souls or bodies of mankind. "Ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake, willing to do, willing to suffer any thing for you, to spend and be spent, yea, not counting our lives dear to ourselves, so that we may but finish our course with joy, and the ministry which we have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God." The apostle's words, thus in part opened and explained, will be suitable to the present occasion in these two views,

First, As they relate more immediately to ministers, and Secondly, To their people.

Under the first head, these particulars offer themselves to our consideration,

First, Paul and Timothy did not preach themselves, but

Secondly, They preached Christ Jesus the Lord, and Thirdly, Themselves servants to the Corinthians for Jesus' sake. And may the grace of our God enable us so to meditate upon these points, that self may be humbled and the Saviour exalted: For

First, Paul and Timothy did not, and ministers ought not, to preach themselves. They ought not to have an eye to self in any part of their work. Self is a wrong object. It cannot be looked at without forgetting Christ, or made any thing of without degrading Christ. Where self is an idol, Christ is become nothing. Therefore a minister, whose heart is devoted to Christ, and would with his lips and life glorify him, is ever afraid of self. In his preaching he would not aim at those things which feed and nourish selfishness, such as

Fame, which is an universal passion. Self loves to be esteemed, and to be called of men, rabbi, great, and noble, and learned, and good. There is nothing which our corrupt nature covets more than to be well spoken of, and to have every body's good word: for this applause wonderfully feeds all our selfish tempers. But this St. Paul was enabled to renounce for Christ. He was once a famous scholar, but he lost his character for determining to know nothing but Jesus and him crucified. He had once great reputation for holiness, but there was an end of it when he came to his—"God forbid that I should glory, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." He did not desire now to be admired for a fine orator, nor did he preach for this end, that his hearers might be pleased with him, and go away pleased with themselves, but he was bold for God to speak plain truths, which he knew would offend those who were living, and wanted to live, in their sins. When he insisted upon the doctrine of the cross, which is to them that perish foolishness, then bad designs were imputed to him, and the abandoned sinner and the self-righteous Pharisee agreed to look upon him as the scum of the world, and the offscouring of all things. And this he did not deserve, he did not seek it; but he met with it in the service of Christ. It was the reproach of Christ, brought upon him for serving such a master, and heightened for his being so like his master. And yet in this Paul could rejoice —not only bear it, but also glory in it. He received it as an honour, and found it a blessing to be evil spoken of for Jesus' sake. He was happy in bringing sinners to think and speak well of Jesus, whatever evil some might think and speak of him for it. O for more of this self-denying spirit. May the Lord pull down self in all his ministers, that Jesus alone may be exalted in them, and by them, and that they may not study in their ministry filthy lucre, any more than basely purchase fame.

This is another selfish principle. The love of money, which is the root of all evil, is deeply rooted in every man's heart. They all look to their own way, every one for his gain from his quarter; but by the grace of God, Paul was of another mind. In his doctrine he insists upon it, to Timothy and Titus, that ministers should not be given to filthy lucre, and in his example he showed that he was not given to it himself. When he went to Ephesus, he did not go upon any sordid motive, such, as How much a year shall I get by preaching at that place? His view was very exalted—How shall I serve the cause of Jesus, and his dear-bought people there? Accordingly he says to the Ephesians, "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel, yea, you yourselves know, that these hands have ministered to my necessities, and to them that were with me." As he was a preacher of the gospel he had a right to live of the gospel, yet he waived his right, and chose rather to work at his trade, than it should be said he preached for gain. Christ being his Saviour, and the unsearchable riches of Christ his portion and his inheritance, he had enough. For he had not only the promise of spiritual, but also of temporal things, such as the love of Christ knew best for him; and he found Christ so faithful, that he learned in whatever state he was therewith to be content, content to be abased, to be hungry, and to suffer need, yea content to suffer the loss of all things, counting them but dross and dung, that he might win Christ. And having won him, the pearl of great price, he was willing to part with his ease, as well as fame and riches, for Jesus' sake.

This is another very selfish principle We all love ease and self-indulgence. Our nature abhors the least suffering. What noble views, then, must Paul have been actuated by, since he knew, that in every city bonds and afflictions did abide him, and yet none of these things did move him! How dear and precious must Christ have been to him, since the continual cross could not drive him from preaching the gospel of Christ! He made a mere slave of his body, denying it the dearest gratifications, even lawful ones, and laying upon it the heaviest burdens and crosses, when his Lord's cause required these things at his hands. Like a good soldier he endured hardship, was in perils often, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Such was his flaming love to him who had called him to be a soldier, that no suffering could make him leave the service. He fought on bravely, strong in the Lord, till the battle being won, the Captain of his salvation granted him his discharge, and put upon his head a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

Thus Paul made it appear that he did not preach himself. He renounced those things which are dearest to self, and showed how much he loved Jesus, by willingly parting with applause, and riches, and ease for his sake, "we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord," which is the Second particular to be considered. St. Paul disclaimed self, that he might exalt the Saviour. He did this from a true heart-felt attachment to Jesus. "When it pleased God," says he, "to reveal his Son in me, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood." From that time forward he became enamoured with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord. Paul found Christ revealed to him so precious, he saw such wonderful beauty and matchless loveliness in him, such an infinite fulness, and such a readiness to communicate out of it all spiritual blessings; yea, he himself enjoyed so many of them, that other things were nothing, and Christ was ALL. He had won Paul's heart. He had discovered so much of himself, that Paul was become in body and soul devoted to him, and cared not what he suffered so that he could but please his Lord and Saviour. To his honour he had an eye in all his ministerial labours, setting forth the perfect freeness, the rich fulness, and the everlasting glory of his salvation. We preach Jesus; that name is full of grace: for he was called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins. They had all turned away from God and his law, as the prophet says, "All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way," and this was the way of sin, according to the apostle, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," they had all robbed God of his glory by transgressing his law, so that there was none righteous, no not one; and thereby they had rendered themselves liable to those threatened pains and penalties which justice was bound to inflict: for the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness. From this state of sin and misery Jesus came to save his people; and this he undertook in the covenant of the eternal Three, in which, being a person co-equal and co-eternal with the Father, he agreed to stand up as the head and surety of his people, in their nature and in their stead to keep the law for them, and to suffer the pains and penalties of it for them, that by his obedience unto death, the law and justice of his Father might be infinitely and everlastingly glorified in saving all those who should believe in him from sin, and death, and hell, and in admitting them to life and glory. In the fulness of time he came to fulfil what he had undertaken, and the Word was made flesh. "Lo, I come," saith he, "to do thy will, O God:" to do it in my life, to suffer it in my death, and thereby to bring an everlasting righteousnes for my people. The Father accepted him as their surety, witnessing by a voice from heaven—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," and witnessing also that as their surety he had finished the work which he had given him to do, when he declared him to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection from the dead, and when he put all things under his feet, and gave him all power in heaven and earth, that he might be able to save sinners to the uttermost—were they ever so far from God that he might bring them nigh—if they had sinned to the uttermost, so far that one step more they would have been in hell, yet he could save them still with his great salvation: for he is exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, that the worst and vilest may in him be saved from all their sins, no sins being so sinful, so numerous, but there is redemption from all through faith in his blood, no state of guilt so desperate, but he can bestow grace, that sin shall not be imputed, and that righteousness, even the righteousness of God shall be imputed. Such a Saviour is Jesus, exalted to this office by the covenant of grace, and acting in it by the full commission of the eternal Three, by whom he was constituted the Christ. Thus saith the Father, "God the Lord, the Creator of heaven and earth, I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thy hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people."—With Christ the covenant was made, by him it was to be made good, and therefore the second person in the Godhead was truly united unto him, and God and man was one Christ, and the Holy Spirit was poured upon him without measure to fit and qualify him for his work, that he might become the Saviour of his people, as their prophet, priest, and king; for which offices he was divinely commissioned and consecrated, and therefore was called the Christ, or the anointed one of God.

As he was the great High Priest of our profession, he was called of God to offer gifts and sacrifices for sin: and he gave himself, his Godhead, his manhood, as the surety of his people, to his Father's law, that whatever demands of obedience it had upon them, he might answer and pay them all, to the end that by his obedience they might be made righteous. And he gave himself as their surety to his Father's justice, that whatever demands of sufferings it had upon them, he might endure them all, and accordingly the Lord laid upon him the sins of all his people. He knew no sin. He was in himself just, when he suffered for the unjust, and therefore all his sufferings were upon their account. He was bearing their griefs and carrying their sorrows in every part of his passion. For them he was stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. He felt what the sins of their souls deserved, when he cried out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death;" and he felt the sins of the bodies, and the burden forced him to sweat as it were great drops of blood falling to the ground. They were bound with the chains of sin, and ought to have been bound with chains of everlasting darkness, therefore when Jesus was apprehended they took him and bound him. For that shame which was due to their sins he turned not away his face from shame and spitting, nor his cheeks from them that plucked off the hair. He was buffeted and scourged, and stricken for their transgressions, that by his stripes they might be healed. For the sins of their heads, his holy head was crowned with thorns. Their feet were swift to run into sin, and their hands mighty to commit it, therefore when the Lord laid upon him the iniquities of them all, his feet and his hands were pierced through with nails. There never was sorrow like unto that sorrow, wherewith the Lord afflicted him in the day of his fierce anger, when he endured the curse to redeem his people from the curse of the law, when he was forsaken of God, that they who deserved to be forsaken for ever might be brought nigh to God, and when he bowed his head, and gave up the ghost, dying for them that they might live with God for ever. Thus he was made sin for them who knew no sin, and thus he put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and by this alone can it be put away. God hath laid no other foundation for the salvation of sinners, than the finished work, the life and death, the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ. When you heard the minister just now give notice that the sacrament would be administered next Sunday, he said, it was in remembrance of the meritorious cross and passion of Christ, "whereby alone," mind that, "whereby alone we obtain remission of our sins, and are made partakers of the kingdom of heaven," whereby alone we are saved from hell, and entitled to heaven. Whatever grace or glory God the Father gives to any poor sinners he gives it on this account, and on nothing else. He looks only at what his Son did and suffered, when he vouchsafes to bring any of them from darkness to light, and from sin to righteousness. He sees them in his Son, and accepts them in the Beloved. They stand at his bar in the righteousness of his Son, and are therefore justified from all things. He views them in the graces and loveliness of his Son, and they appear not only without spot or blemish, or any such thing, but also fair as the moon, clear as the sun—complete in Jesus: and therefore it is owing to the precious gifts, and infinitely meritorious offerings of the great High Priest of our profession Christ Jesus, and to these alone, that any sinners are pardoned and saved; because there is salvation in none other, either person or thing.

But because this way of salvation through faith in a crucified Saviour was a stumbling block unto the Jews, and unto the Greeks foolishness, and is not received to this day except by those to whom it is given, therefore the Lord Christ sustains another gracious office, and is the great teacher of his people. He is the divine prophet of whom it is written, "In the latter days they shall be all taught of God;" for by his word and Spirit he brings his people to an heart-felt discovery of their own guilty state and ruined nature, and teaches them the infinite sufficiency of his finished work, and enables them with the heart to rest upon it, as the alone foundation of present peace and of eternal joy. This is the great lesson which he has to teach us, as our prophet, and none can teach it but himself. Men may give one another some notion of the way of salvation, but they can go no farther. Christ only can teach as never man taught. The words which he speaks, they are spirit, and they are life. The Spirit accompanies them with his divine power and energy, and by them he quickens the soul that was before dead in trespasses and sins. He speaks life into the dead, and the life which he gives, being from him, is to bring the soul to him, that it may be kept alive by living upon his fulness: for this Jesus is the Christ, consecrated of God to be the great Prophet of his people, and made of God unto them wisdom, that he might instruct them all in saving knowledge, by bringing them to rest wholly by faith upon his life and death for every grace and every blessing.

And because there is in our fallen nature a proneness to turn from Jesus, and to rest upon something besides him alone for righteousness and strength, and for a comfortable and holy walk heavenwards, therefore Jesus is the almighty King to rule in and over his people, and to manage all their matters, spiritual and temporal, for them. And for this purpose he has all power in heaven and earth, that whatever would turn them from him, enemies within or without, he might be able to subdue them all. Having brought them to himself, and fixed them upon the foundation, he is the Christ, the consecrated King to keep them there by his almighty arm. They are now become his lawful subjects, and no enemy, not even the gates of hell, shall pluck them out of his hands; and they know it, and are therefore safe and happy. Surely, can they say, in the Lord have we strength. In the midst of their weakness and helplessness he makes his strength perfect, the excellency of it never appearing so manifest, as when he keeps them sensible that without him they can do nothing, and yet then enables them through him to do all things.

Happy are the people who are in such a case, yea, blessed are the people who have Jesus Christ for their King; because he is the Lord, that is, Jehovah, we preach Christ Jesus the Lord. This crowns all. Jesus is Jehovah, one of the eternal Three in the Godhead, co-equal and co-eternal with the Father and with the Holy Spirit, possessed of all the divine attributes and perfections. All his works are perfect, infinitely, everlastingly perfect. His work of salvation is absolutely complete. Jehovah hath laid the foundation. Jehovah hath brought forth the top stone. It is the masterpiece of his wisdom, and power, and love, to which nothing can be added, and from which nothing may be taken away: for God was in Christ, and finished the work. "Thus saith the Lord, I am Jehovah, and besides me there is no Saviour;" no Jesus, therefore Jesus is Jehovah; as he says himself to the Jews—"If ye believe not that I AM, ye shall die in your sins." Now none can forgive sins but God only, and therefore Jesus must be God, because he had power upon earth to forgive sins. The prophet Isaiah says, "Unto us a child is born, and he shall be called the mighty God"—mind, the child was God, the infant child just born was the almighty God—according to the apostle, "God over all blessed for ever." This is the fundamental article of our religion. Take this away, Christians are as great idolaters as they are who worship stocks and stones: for if Jesus be not Jehovah, if God and man be not in him one Christ, of what idolatry have you been guilty of this morning? The whole litany is a prayer to Christ. In the creeds which you have been repeating, you have acknowledged his Godhead. In the liturgy are these words:—"The same that we believe of the glory of the Father, the same we believe of the glory of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, without any difference or inequality." Therefore against all opposers we must insist upon the equality of the Persons in the Godhead. We must preach Christ Jesus the Lord—Jesus a perfect Saviour, consecrated to his office by the covenant of the eternal Three, and acting in it, as the great High Priest, who was to offer gifts and sacrifices for the sins of his people, and to teach them, as their prophet, to rely wholly upon him for the infinite and everlasting efficacy of these gifts and offerings to take away sin, and to obtain salvation; and to trust to his royal power that they might be kept by it, until they should receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls. And we are to insist upon it, that Jesus is the Christ, able to fulfil all those offices, because he is Jehovah, the Lord God omnipotent, who therefore took flesh and was made man, that as man's surety he might live and die for him, making in his life and death reconciliation for iniquity, and bringing in everlasting righteousness. This was the Lord's doing; whose works are like himself. They are all infinite, and therefore the salvation of our God is everlastingly perfect. And it is offered freely in the gospel, not to him that worketh, but to him that believeth, which shows the rich fulness and absolute sufficiency of it. Is not that plainly a divine liberality which can make such a free grant as this? Whosoever will, let him come and take the grace of God, and the glory of God freely. And observe to whom the free grant is made —to any that will receive it. To any sinner, be he ever so vile, if he be black as hell, heavy laden with a burden that would sink thousands of thousands of souls into the bottomless pit, labouring under the guilt of sins as numerous as the sand upon the sea-shore, to such an one is the word of this salvation sent. He may come just as he is: for all things are ready, ready for sinners, yea, for the chief, to cleanse, to justify, to sanctify, to glorify them. Whoever he be, he that believeth shall be saved, and shall be kept by the power of God through faith, until he be made a partaker of the eternal salvation of God.

Thus we preach Christ Jesus the Lord, directing sinners to look nowhere but to him—" Behold the Lamb of God." Look unto him, and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth. And this is the good news of the gospel, which after ministers have experienced themselves, then will they be able clearly and feelingly to preach it to others; for then the love of Christ will constrain them. The work of the ministry may be hard, the difficulties many and great, but his love in their hearts will make them willing to do, and suffer any thing for his glory, and for the good of his people, which is the Third particular under this head to be considered. If we mention any thing about ourselves, it is to humble self, and to bring honour to Jesus—" ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." In this ordinance of preaching, and in all our ministerial labours, we are not lords but servants, servants to our great Lord and Master, to whom we ought always to have an eye, and to whom we must give an account; and servants also to you, bound to perform every good office, ready to every work and labour of love, which may promote your spiritual and eternal interest: for this end we have given up ourselves to serve the Lord Christ, and have devoted ourselves to your service for his sake: so that we ought to refuse no difficulty or trouble, which his glory or your profit require of us. But in whatever case one or both these ends cannot be promoted, we are acting quite out of character, if we engage in it. And for this reason I have not been able to behave towards you in the common way of soliciting for your favour. Some have insinuated it was from pride, that I would not go about the parish from house to house canvassing for votes; but truly it was another motive. I could not see how this could promote the glory of God. How can it be for the honour of Jesus, that his ministers, who have renounced fame, and riches, and ease, should be most anxious and earnest in the pursuit of those very things which they have renounced? Surely this would be getting into a worldly spirit, as much as is the spirit of parliamenteering. And as this method of canvassing cannot be for Jesus' sake, so neither is it for our honour: it is far beneath our function: nor is it for your profit. What good is it to your souls? What compliment to your understandings? What advantage to you in any shape to be directed and applied to by every person with whom you have any connexion, or on whom you have any dependence? Is not this depriving you of the freedom of your choice? Determined by these motives, when my friends, of their own accord, put me up as a candidate, to whom I have to this hour made no application, directly or indirectly, I left you to yourselves. If you do choose me, I desire to be your servant for Jesus' sake; and if you do not, the will of the Lord be done.

From what hath been said upon the text it appears, that not self, but Christ Jesus the Lord, is to be preached. Our subject matter is his nature, God-man, full of grace and truth in all his offices. When God was manifest in the flesh, he was called Jesus, because he was to save his people from their sins; and he was Jesus the Christ, chosen to this office in the covenant of the eternal Three, and consecrated to be the great teacher and prophet of his church, able by his word and Spirit to make manifest the secrets of the heart, discovering to a man his own fallen state, his guilt, and his misery, and making him so to feel these things, as to be forced to go out of himself for salvation; and also to make manifest to him, how he may be saved through faith in the blood and righteousness of a crucified Saviour, by and in him alone can be had forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. Upon this foundation Jesus is able to establish and ground the soul, because he has all power in heaven and earth for that very purpose; as God-man he reigneth over all, King of kings, and Lord of lords, until all his enemies be made his footstool. Not one enemy, not one sin shall have dominion over them, who live by the faith of the Son of God; yea, he will so rule over them, that they shall be preserved from all evil, and he will make all things work together for their good. And for the glory of Christ in these his offices he bestows his blessings freely:—the most ignorant he teaches, the greatest sinners he justifies, the most helpless he keeps by his mighty power. He is the Saviour of such, not for any merit in them that is or can be, but to the praise of his own grace. He is able to do all this, because he is Jehovah, to whom all things are possible; and he does it because it is his office, his honour to save. He is Jesus, the Saviour, and he is the Christ, the consecrated Saviour, in whom dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead, that he might be able to save to the uttermost, yea, that he might be the author of eternal salvation. This is the gospel which has been preached with success by many faithful ministers in this place, whose names are still remembered with honour; and this gospel is to this day preached unto you, and we desire to deliver it faithfully, that you may receive it profitably, which brings me to the Second general head of discourse, namely, to the application to the hearers, which consists in receiving the truths delivered. Preaching is the ordinance of God, which he has appointed, and by which he acts. On which account it is not an indifferent matter, but is either the savour of life unto life, or the savour of death unto death; therefore our Lord requires you to take heed how you hear, when Christ is evidently set forth in the preaching of the gospel. My word, says he, shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I send it. The Spirit accompanying it makes it effectual for the accomplishing of what the Lord pleases, and by his mighty working in the word, faith cometh, and Christ is received. The soul, which was dead, is made alive by the word of life—which was in darkness, is enlightened, when the light of the glorious gospel shines into it—which was in guilt, is acquitted by believing the word of righteousness—which was mourning, is made joyful through patience and comfort of the scriptures—which being on the foundation yet could do nothing to build up itself, is edified and built up by the word of grace in its most holy faith. Thus by and in the word the Spirit acts, and Christ is received into the judgment, the believer clearly apprehends him, the conscience is satisfied with him, and sees in his life and death enough to be saved from condemnation, and to be entitled to heaven; the will chooses him, the heart embraces him, and the whole man is influenced to give up himself to be governed by the grace of Jesus, that in spirituals, in temporals, for time and for eternity, Jesus may be ALL, and in ALL.

Now, sirs, we therefore preach Christ Jesus the Lord, that you may thus receive him, and be happy in him. We would glorify him in our preaching, that his Spirit may thus glorify him in your hearts and lives. And has he done this for you? Examine; for it is of infinite moment. What does it signify to you, how glorious Christ is in the eyes of others, if he be not so in yours? How blessed he makes them, if you be not blessed in him? You will be no better for their views of Christ, and for their happiness in him. Oh think then, why it is that Christ, who is infinitely, inestimably, everlastingly precious, is not precious to you. Is it not because you do not believe? For the scripture declares, "to them that believe he is precious." And what keeps you under the power of unbelief? Is it not written, that the god of this world blindeth the minds of them that believe not? He deludes the judgment and hardens the heart through the deceitfulness of sin, insomuch that they are content with the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season, and while these delight, they feel not their want of a Saviour. If there be any who hear me now in this dreadful case, oh think how much you will one day want him! In the time of distress, when the law accuses, conscience condemns, and you see the wrath of God to be your due—when the arrows of the Almighty stick deep in you, and his law presseth you sore—how exceedingly desirable will Jesus the Saviour then be? But supposing this day of conviction never come, yet it is appointed unto all men once to die: how will you appear and stand at God's bar? With sin unpardoned? Alas! there is then no way left to escape—your sentence is upon record—Go, thou cursed, into eternal fire, &c. Sirs, before it be too late, think of these things, and may God put it into your heart so to think of them, that you may flee from the wrath to come.

Whenever it shall please God thus to make you sensible of your want of a Saviour, or if he has already been thus gracious unto you—remember, sirs, that Jesus Christ is the Lord Jehovah, and that in our nature he has wrought out a finished salvation. Here is your object. The command is: look unto Jesus, see in him all fulness dwelling, and for the use of such sinners as you are. The enemy will try all his wiles and malice to keep you from Jesus, and your legal, unbelieving hearts will help him mightily; but consider what a free grant he has made in the gospel of all the blessings of his salvation. He requires no condition of you, wants no qualification in you. Take what he offers. Receive it, and it is yours. All is by free gift. Christ himself is a gift, and so is grace, righteousness, holiness, and heaven. All good things are the free gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. What can be a greater encouragement? The salvation finished in all its parts is offered and made good, not to him that worketh, but to him that believeth. And therefore whoever or whatever you are in your own eyes, yet Jesus Christ came into the world to save such. This is a faithful saying, that he came to save the chief of sinners. This is worthy to be received. It has the honourable testimony of God himself, and therefore surely you may receive it, and depend upon it. Come, for all things are now ready; and you shall be saved freely by grace through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.

If you are a convinced sinner, make what objections you can against yourself, they are all answered in the gospel. Say you are a great sinner, but not so great as Jesus is a Saviour. Perhaps you are old in sin, yet his mercies are from everlasting to everlasting. Suppose your sins are numerous as the stars, far infinitely more are his mercies. Say you are very deep in guilt, what scarlet crimson sins cannot his blood wash clean? If thou hadst all the sins of earth and hell upon thy guilty soul, yet it is written, "He that believeth shall be justified from all things." Oh that you may not stand reasoning against the infinite sufficiency of Jesus to save. All things are possible to Jesus, and so are all things possible to him that believeth. Be not faithless, then, but believing: may it be given thee to believe in the only begotten Son of God.

If this be thy happy case, then thou art already a partaker of the precious gift of faith. Jesus is still thy object. Look unto him for all things. They are treasured up in his fulness, and all received by believing. Thy safety, thy victories, thy holy walk, thy comforts and joys, these come unto thee and are enjoyed by faith. He is thy all-perfect Saviour; and he being thine, all he has, and all he is, is thine also. He has made them over to thee in the free grant of the gospel, and all the perfections of the Godhead stand engaged to keep thee in possession of them: therefore walk close to Christ and live up to thy privileges, and see thou stop not short of any thing promised, which will be to his glory, and to thy comfort. There are unsearchable riches of grace in Jesus, full authority in Christ, and absolute power in Jehovah to bestow them. Whatever grace thou wantest at any time, thou wilt honour Jesus Christ the Lord, if thou wilt by faith live upon him for the receiving it: and thou wilt infallibly receive it according to thy faith. Believe in him for safety, for righteousness, for holiness, for happiness; and as thou believest, so shall it be done unto thee—thou shalt have all that thou canst ask, yea more than thou canst think. May this be the happy case of all who hear me to-day. If I never stand up any more in this place, may we all so know and believe in Christ Jesus the Lord, that we may be found in that happy number who shall ascribe honour, glory, and blessing, and power, to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three persons in one Jehovah, to whom be equal praise for ever and ever. Amen.

THE SCRIPTURE DOCTRINE

OF THE

SACRAMENT OF THE LORD'S SUPPER,

BRIEFLY STATED.

Then said Jesus unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.—John vi. 53.

THE following short Treatise was drawn up at the request of a charitable lady, and published for the benefit of the poor. The design of it was to open to them the nature and use of the Holy Sacrament; and it was thought the most proper method not to be large and full upon the subject, but to lay it before them in one view, that they might understand it more easily, and remember it the better. Reader! before thou openest it, ask Him, from whom cometh every good and perfect gift, to accompany thy perusal of it with his grace and blessing; and if it be of any service to thee, give the glory to God! and pray for the author,

W. ROMAINE.

THE sacrament of the Lord's Supper was ordained by Christ himself. Before his passion, he took bread and blessed it, and brake, and gave it to his disciples, as the outward and visible sign of his body broken; and he took wine and blessed it, and gave it to them, as the outward and visible sign of his blood poured out, and shed for the sins of the world. And then he commanded them, and us, to continue to do the same in remembrance of him; so that we must first know what we are to remember of him in this ordinance, before we can keep it aright. We must consider the scope and design of it; for what end Christ left us these memorials of his body and blood; upon what motive he required us to partake of them; and what benefit we are to receive thereby. For these reasons it is of great consequence clearly to understand the nature and use of the Lord's Supper. Reader! I hope thou seest the importance of it in a strong light. May God give thee a right judgment in this weighty matter. Consider, then, that

I. You have an immortal spirit within you, whose life of happiness depends as much upon God the Father of spirits, as your body does upon the food and elements of this world.—Moses has given us this account of the two parts of which man is composed: "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a livig soul." Gen. ii. 7. The bodily part was formed of the dust of the ground, but the spiritual part was immediately infused, and breathed from God; and as they had a different original, so they go to different places: when the body dies, it returns to dust, but the spirit, the breath of life, returns to God that gave it. While man continued innocent, his soul had a life of happiness dependent upon God; for as it is created, it must be dependent, and its life must be supported by that Being, on whom it depends. And this being is God: "For with thee is the fountain of life," says the Psalmist, Psal. xxxvi. 9. All spiritual life flows from God, as from its proper fountain, and is supported by a vital union with him, as much as the body is supported by a vital union with the food and elements of this world: what these are to the life of the body, that is God to the life of the soul, "for he holdeth our souls in life," Psal. lxvi. 9. He holdeth and maintaineth the soul in its spiritual life. And when there was no sin in the world, it was an happy life. So long as all things continued very good, the soul enjoyed sweet and blessed communion with God. It walked in the light of his countenance, and the sense of his continual presence filled it with peace and love and joy. But this happy state of things did not last long: for

II. Your soul lost this life of happiness by sin.—The whole book of God proves this truth. In express words it says, that fallen man is "alienated from the life of God," Eph. iv. 18; being estranged from that life which God hath given to and supported in man, while he continued innocent. Upon sins entering into the world, the sentence took place—"dying thou shalt die;" the body became mortal, and the soul was alienated from that divine support wherein its life of happiness consisted, and died from God, which is the worst kind of death. The vital union between him and the soul was broken; "for your sins have separated between you and your God," Isa. lix. 2; they have separated between you and the fountain of life; they have cut off all communion with him; by which means, being dead in trespasses and sins, which we all are by nature, the soul is as dead to the offices of spiritual life as a cold lifeless corpse is to the offices of animal life.

If these scriptures do not appear to you with convincing evidence, consult matter of fact. How is the case with your own soul? Were not you by nature dead to God? If not, then you were always alive to the things of God. From your very infancy you took no delight in childish diversions, much less in sin, in pride, in envy, in lying, and swearing, or in any act of uncleanness; but your heart was full of love to God, and every expression of that love was delightful. You knew no joy like that of prayer. To be continually pouring out your praise and thanksgiving to your Creator, was your heaven—the world so dead to you, that its strongest temptations had no force. Wealth and honour, and pleasure, and whatever is called great and mighty, had no charms compared with devotion. Say, was this always the sweet and holy frame of your soul from the first dawning and opening of reason? Was your heart always thus full of love to God, and always thus happy in communion with him? Were your affections never drawn away by any worldly objects, whereby you robbed God of that continual service of all your faculties, which was his due? Can you lay claim to this perfect uninterrupted obedience? Surely you will not; for what man is he that liveth, and sinneth not? Nay, what man is there that has not found a coldness and deadness of his affections when he tried to fix them upon God, and the things of God? Have not you found it in yourself? Do you not now find it? Try, then, to pray for three or four hours together without one wandering thought. You cannot. Why, then, these are evident proofs that your soul is alienated from the life of God, and

III. You have no power in yourself to recover this life of God in the soul.—The law runs in this style:—"the soul that sinneth, it shall die." Death is the wages of sin; you have sinned; for all have sinned; and God is just to give you your wages. He has promised them, and he is faithful and true to fulfil his promises. He must fulfil them, unless you can by some means be restored to his favour, and recover the life of grace in the soul; for if there be truth in God, "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." But you can do nothing to merit the recovery of this life, because your whole nature is sinful and guilty. You are in the state of a condemned malefactor, with this peculiar circumstance of distress, that you have not even a desire to apply for pardon. Your soul is so absolutely enslaved to sin, that it loves its prison and its dungeon. Every faculty is under the bondage of Satan, and able to work out nothing but sin. In this state you are utterly helpless and miserable. "Your condition is such," as our church, in her tenth article, expresses it, "that you cannot turn and prepare yourself," and much less attain, "by your own natural strength, to faith and calling upon God: the grace of Christ must go before, to give you a good will, and then work with you when you have that good will." The first good motion of the will comes from Christ, even the desire to live unto God is his free gift; and every step is his work, until the life of God be perfected in the soul. He only, whose voice is to call the dead out of their graves, can call to the sinner, and be obeyed, "awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life." Christ, and Christ only, has life to give to the dead in sin. The fancied light of nature, the religion of nature, morality, learning, arts, and sciences, these with all other natural and acquired talents, can no more revive a dead sinner than they can create a world. The conviction of this truth is absolutely necessary; for you can never apply to Christ for the free gift of his divine life until you be perfectly convinced that you want it, and that you can do nothing to merit it. You can have no motive to apply to him until you find your own helplessness; and therefore, if you never saw your want of this divine life, intreat him to show you your deadness in sin. Beg of him to open the eyes of your understanding, that you may be able to see in what a wretched dead state you have been all your days, and may be thereby stirred up to pray, with strong crying and tears, to the Prince of life, that he would raise you from the death of sin unto a life of righteousness: for,

IV. Jesus Christ came into the world to recover for sinners that life of happiness which they had forfeited.—The scriptures are full of this truth, from beginning to end. Jesus Christ is there set forth as the almighty Saviour and Redeemer, who "giveth life unto the world." He was the eternal and self-existent God, equal in every perfection and attribute with the Father and the Holy Spirit; and he was pleased, out of his infinite mercy and love, to be united to our nature; by which union God and man became one Christ; so that he who obeyed the law, suffered, and died for us, was truly a divine and infinite person. By his obedience he atoned for our breach of the divine law; by his sufferings he freed us from the punishment due to the breach of it; and he died that we might "live through him" (1 John iv 9) a life of grace in this world, and a life of glory for ever in heaven, whereby what he said of himself might be fulfilled: "I am come, that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." John x. 10.

This is the scripture account of the gracious method by which our forfeited life was restored. It is the free gift of Jesus Christ, the Lord of life and glory. He is the Lord God omnipotent, who created the heavens and the earth, and without whom was not any thing made that was made. He gave us our life at first. And when it was forfeited by sin, he came from heaven to redeem it: so that we owe him a double debt of gratitude. It was wonderful love that he should create us at first out of nothing; but more wonderful that he should come down from heaven to lay down his own life a ransom for ours. This love surpasseth all understanding. Men who have never tasted it can form no estimate of it; and they who have tasted it by faith, acknowledge it to be greater than heart can conceive, or tongue can utter. However, they know all that can be understood of it in the present world; for faith receives this spiritual life from Jesus Christ. Faith is that divine grace planted in the soul by the Holy Spirit, whereby it is vitally united to Jesus Christ, and receives support from him to begin, carry on, and perfect its spiritual life: and this brings me to prove that,

V. Faith receives from Jesus Christ the spiritual life, which he came to give unto the world.—Faith, as a Christian grace, is widely different from an historical assent; for it does not only believe that Christ has life to give to a sinful world, but also receives it from him. This is essential to a true living faith, which is a vital uniting principle, and by which the believer is intimately joined to Christ, and draws supplies of nourishment from him, for the support of his spiritual life. The following scriptures prove it to be of the essence of true faith to receive this life from Christ. "These are written," says St. John, xx. 31, "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name." "I am the resurrection and the life," saith the Lord, John xi. 25; "he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die;" for he shall be as closely connected with the root and stock of all spiritual life as the branches of the vine are with the root. "I am the vine," saith the Lord of life; "ye are the branches: as the branch cannot live, and bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." By believing, we abide in him; for faith is the bond of this union. It engrafts us into Christ, who is the root and stock of our spiritual life. In him we live; from him we receive nourishment, and are enabled to bear much fruit to the glory of God. This is the happy state of Christians, who believe on the Son of God, and have everlasting life; but miserable beyond conception is the state of those who are not united to him; for he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. John iii. 36.

These scriptures clearly prove that faith is the hand which God enables us to put forth, and by which we lay hold of Christ, and life in him. The blessed apostle Paul had happy experience of this doctrine: he relates it in these remarkable words, Gal. ii. 20: "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." In this passage we have a full proof of all the former propositions; as, first, St. Paul was crucified and dead to sin with Christ, which plainly supposes him to have been alive to sin before; and being thus crucified and dead, "nevertheless I live," says he, a life of righteousness and holiness, but not by any power or virtue in myself. No; I could not make myself righteous or holy—"Yet not I, but Christ liveth in me:" he is the author of this life, and faith is that grace by which we receive and enjoy it; "the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Oh happy Paul! who could without presumption say, the Son of God loved me, and gave himself for me. Reader, wouldst thou not give all the world to be able to say the same? Thou wouldst. Why, then, pray to God for the gift of faith; and when he gives it thee, it will make thee as happy as it did Paul. It will let thee know that Christ also loves thee, and gave himself "for thy sins." May the spirit of grace bestow upon thee the truly living faith, that upon thine own experience thou mayest be able to repeat the words after the apostle, and say, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

VI. In the sacrament, the body and blood of Christ, from which faith receives its spiritual life, are represented by bread and wine.—It was the great end and design of the Christian revelation to discover to us in what method the life, which we had forfeited, was to be restored. The knowledge of this is of the greatest moment. Our happy eternity depends upon it; and therefore God has been pleased to teach it us in the plainest manner. He has condescended to our capacities, and has made use of sensible objects to explain matters of faith. The soul does not see at present but through the eyes of the body. Invisible and spiritual things must be brought down to our understandings by visible and material: and this is done in the sacrament of the Lord's supper. We know that our animal life cannot be sustained without proper nourishment, neither can our spiritual life; for God has been pleased to institute and appoint the meat and drink which sustain the life of the body, to be the outward and visible signs of that spiritual meat and drink which sustain the life of the soul. He has ordained bread and wine, to represent to the outward senses the spiritual support which the soul receives from the body and blood of Christ. And in consequence of God's ordination,

VII. It is as certain a truth, that the body and blood of Christ support the life of grace in the soul, as that bread and wine do support life in the body.—Man, as before was observed, in his present embodied state, does not see spiritual objects but as they are compared with material. The revelation of God, in the Old Testament and the New, is adapted to man in this state. Objects of faith are represented to him by objects of sense. Outward things are ordained to stand for inward; and God, who cannot lie, has instituted the outward sign, to give us evidence of the inward grace. He has instituted bread and wine, to represent the body and blood of Christ: and as bread is the staff of the life, it is therefore a just picture of the bread of life, which Christ brought down with him from heaven; and as wine maketh glad the heart of man, it is therefore a just picture of that most precious blood which alone taketh away the sins of the world, and therefore which alone maketh glad the hearts of sinners. The bread and wine, thus instituted, are signs to set before our senses what Christ's body and blood are to do to the soul; from whence arose the necessity of giving the same name to the sign as to the thing signified; because, what the sign does to the body, the thing signified does to the soul. When Christ took up the bread, and said, "This is my body," and the wine, and said, "This is my blood," he spake the language which the Old Testament had always used, and the only language which men could understand: for it was a received rule in the Old Testament to call the sign and the thing signified by the same name; and it will always be a received rule, so long as men are confined to sense, and cannot see spiritual objects but by their material types and instituted figures. You cannot see how the body and blood of Christ support the soul; but you see that bread and wine do support the body: and the infallible God has engaged his word and truth to you, that there is as true and real support for your souls in the body and blood of Christ, as there is for your bodies in the bread and wine. He instituted the sign, to set before your eyes a picture both of the life which Christ gave, as also of the manner in which he gave it; for his death was the purchase of your life. His body was so bruised, wounded, and smitten for your transgressions, that he says, in the Psalms, "There was no whole part in it;" therefore the sacramental bread is broken, and the wine is poured out, as his most precious blood was, out of every pore and vein. I might trace the likeness in many other instances; but these may suffice to show the propriety of instituting bread to represent the body of Christ, which is meat, not figuratively or metaphorically, but in deed and in truth; and wine to represent the blood of Christ, which is drink in deed and in truth. Thus far the meaning of the sacrament, as to the outward and visible sign, and as to the inward and spiritual grace, is plain enough: as a sign it is generally well understood, but then it is not merely a sign; it is something more:

VIII. The bread and wine are not only signs that there is spiritual life in Christ, but also as under a seal they convey it.—This is the chief part of the sacrament; and I fear it is greatly mistaken. To set a seal to a writing or instrument, is making all that is contained in it authentic and valid. When a man sets a seal to an instrument, he declares, this is my act and deed. So setting a seal to the elements is a legal conveyance of what they signify; and whosoever receives them under God's seal, he verily and indeed receives the body and blood of Christ, together with the spiritual life purchased by them. In this sense St. Paul certainly understood the Lord's supper; for he speaks of it, 1 Cor. x. 16, not only as a sign, but also as a real seal. "The cup of blessing, which we bless, is it not the communion of" (or that which communicates to us) "the blood of Christ?" "The bread which we break, is it not the communion of" (or that which communicates to us) "the body of Christ?" In the cup, we communicate and partake of not the mere sign, but of the blood of Christ; in the bread, we communicate and partake of not the mere sign, but of the body of Christ: and whoever thus communicates and partakes of the body and blood of Christ, to him the outward elements are a seal of that spiritual and divine life which Christ's body broken, and his blood poured out, were the means of purchasing for a sinful world.

IX. The bread and wine are not signs to all receivers, but signs only to the faithful.—Our church has determined this point in her 28th article, where it is said, that "the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean, whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten, in the supper, is faith." Faith is the means of our communicating the elements in a heavenly and spiritual manner; and this faith is the gift of God. His good Spirit alone is able to apply to the hearts of the communicants the divine support signified by the outward elements; and it is his office to make the application, and to give us an interest in all the promises of the gospel; for it is certain, none but the Holy Spirit of promise can seal to us a spiritual blessing His grace must be in the heart, convincing us of our want of spiritual life, and of the necessity of seeking it from Jesus Christ, before we can perceive any thing more in the elements than bread and wine; and he must have given us some knowledge of our interest in Christ, before faith can live and feed upon the body and blood of Christ under the outward elements. Sacramental communion is, no doubt, to communicate and partake of the body and blood of Christ. But who are able to communicate in this manner? None but believers, who have the eye of faith open to look through the signs to the things signified. And who enables them to communicate and partake of the things signified under the signs? The Spirit of God, who dwells in the hearts of believers, and who seals to them the promises of God made to them in this sacrament. The necessity of his application and sealing them was so evident to the primitive Christians, that at the consecration of the sacramental wine the priest used to mix water with it, which was as if he had declared in so many words—I believe the influence of the Holy Spirit to be necessary to apply to our souls the merits of Christ's blood, and therefore I pour in this water, which is the known emblem of the grace of the Holy Spirit, that no person may expect spiritual and divine life from the bare receiving of the outward elements: the Holy Spirit must be in his heart, in order to make it a spiritual service, and to render it the means of conveying spiritual blessings.

X. The state of the doctrine from what has been said.—We are all by nature dead in trespasses and sins. We forfeited and lost that life of happiness, which innocent man enjoyed, while he walked in the presence of God, and had sweet communion with him. And we can do nothing to recover this life of God in the soul; so that if he had left us to ourselves, we must have dragged on a miserable existence until the mortal body should have fallen into the grave, and the soul should have perished for ever from God and glory. But thanks be to the ever-blessed Trinity for contriving the gracious plan of our redemption. Thanks be to God the Father for sending the Son of his love to recover the spiritual and divine life which we had forfeited and lost. Thanks be to the Holy Spirit, who enables us by the hand of faith to receive this spiritual and divine life. And thanks be to Jesus, the Prince of life, who was pleased to institute bread and wine, to be signs to the bodily senses of his body and blood, and to be seals to the soul when applied by faith. This is the state of the doctrine; from whence it follows, that unless you eat of the flesh of Christ with faith, and drink his blood with faith, receiving verily and indeed, under the signs, the things signified, then Christ himself declares, John vi. 53, "That you have no life in you"—you have none of that life which he came to give unto sinners, but you are as dead to God, and to the things of God, as a lifeless corpse is to the things of this world; for you are alienated from the life of God, and must be separated for ever, unless faith unite you to Jesus Christ, and give you life through him.

XI. The application of the whole to three different sorts of persons: to them who have not the true living faith in Christ; to them who desire it; and to them who have it.—Reader, this is the main point; and thou must bear with me while I ask thee in the spirit of love, Whether thou hast received this true living faith? Hast thou an interest in Christ? and dost thou know it so clearly, that thou canst trust all thy concerns in time and in eternity with him? If thy soul be not in this happy state, then consider what danger thou art in. Thou art under the guilt of all thy sins; the holy, just, and good law of heaven has found thee guilty, and thou must suffer the deserved punishment in soul and body for ever. And when an almighty God comes to inflict this punishment on thee, wretched man! think, oh! think, what will be then thy distress! Does the apprehension of it, while thou art reading this, give thee no uneasiness? That is an exceeding bad symptom; for then sin has destroyed all motions of grace, and thou art quite dead in trespasses and sins.

What! may some of you say, can I, who am alive, and in good health, be in this dead state? Yes, you certainly may; and as you have no living faith, you are indeed in it; for this spiritual deadness is very consistent with all the offices of animal life. Nay, you may be a man of gaiety and pleasure; you may be seen at all public places; you may be the delight and admiration of the polite world; and yet you may be all the time dead to God and the things of God; the more alive you are to the world, the more dead will you be to God; as the apostle says: "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth," 1 Tim. v. 6. A life of sensual pleasure is a spiritual death: so that you may be alive and cheerful, and in high spirits, and yet the immortal soul within you may be all the time dead to God. You may feed and indulge your dear body with good things, and your poor soul may be starving. And when this is the case, the more flourishing your outward condition is, the less will you perceive of your spiritual deadness, because you will go on the more smoothly and merrily until God shall stop you by some sickness or affliction, or shall call you by his word, and shall send his good Spirit with it, to speak to your hearts, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead; and Christ shall give thee life." Oh that he may awaken thee, reader, if thou art now in the dead sleep of sin, and may give thee faith to find life to thy soul in Jesus Christ!

But, however, until God begin this work, you are not expected at the Lord's table. Until you be awakened, and see the deadness of your hearts to the things of God, you must eat and drink unworthily; for you do not desire that Christ's body and blood may support your spiritual life, as the bread and wine support animal life. Without this desire, you cannot discern the Lord's body; you cannot discern any thing more in the elements than in common bread and wine, and therefore, if you partake of them, it must be upon some wrong motive, because you want the proper dispositions; namely, an humble sense of your want of spiritual life, and an earnest desire to receive it from Jesus Christ.

In hopes that God will send some of these considerations to your hearts with the effectual working of his grace, and stir up in you this good desire, I proceed to apply what has been said to them who have already this desire. Reader, is this thy case? Hast thou been deeply convinced of thy sinful and dead state by nature? and hast thou been led to seek life from the free grace of the Lord of life? and art thou now waiting for it in his appointed ways and means? If this be thy state, thou art safe. Thou art invited; and thou wilt be a welcome guest at the Lord's table. Whoever is awakened, and finds his soul alienated from the life of God, and his hungering and thirsting for that spiritual life which was purchased for him by the body and blood of Christ, he will attend upon this holy ordinance. Come, my brother, with full trust and confidence to this spiritual and heavenly feast. Lift up thine heart to God in prayer, and desire thou mayest find his presence in his own ordinance. Be encouraged from the experience of others, who went hungering and thirsting as thou dost, and he sent them away filled with good things. Oh that their case may be thine, and soon! that thou mayest find grace to enable thee to live a life of holiness, to the glory of thy redeeming God. And to them who have received spiritual life from Christ, through faith, I make my last application.

My Christian brethren, I need not try to stir you up to a frequent attendance at the Lord's table. The many sweet and refreshing seasons which you have enjoyed there weigh more with you than a thousand arguments. Let me only remind you of the dignity of these holy mysteries. Here are the signs of Christ's body and blood, and the seals of the life which we receive from Christ's body and blood, in this world and in the next. The faithful now receive with the elements that spiritual and divine life from Christ which they are to receive from him in heaven; for here is the "bread which he brought down with him from heaven," and "the hidden manna" with which he has promised "to feed them that overcome for ever and ever:" and for these reasons faith sets a high value upon the instituted signs of spiritual life; because it receives under them the thing signified. Raise your devotion from this consideration: go with humility to receive the signs and seals of your spiritual and divine life; and may the Lord Jesus be with you at his own table! May his good Spirit prepare us all to communicate worthily, that we may spiritually eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood; that we may dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; that we may be one with Christ, and Christ with us: and, being thus united, may the body and blood of Jesus Christ preserve our bodies and souls unto everlasting life! So be it, Lord Jesus. Amen and Amen.

A SEASONABLE ANTIDOTE AGAINST POPERY.

IN

A DIALOGUE UPON JUSTIFICATION.

Bona opera non præcedunt justificandum sed sequuntur justificatum.

PREFACE.

THE Papists have their emissaries everywhere; and they are vastly busy at present. They have more interest in this kingdom, and their doctrines have more advocates, than people imagine. Some of their pretended enemies are their best friends, and do them the greatest service. While they cry out, popery! popery! and would make men believe that they are no Papists, they maintain the fundamental principles of the church of Rome. These were maintained openly in a little piece lately printed at Bristol, in defence of the popish doctrine of justification by works. It was given out gratis, and made some noise. Reader, thou hast here a faithful copy of this choice performance. That the author of it might have no reason to complain of his meaning being misrepresented, his words tortured, his scope and design perverted, it was thought proper to give thee his words at full length. Here they are. Read and admire!

"To the inhabitants of the parish of St. S——— in the city of Bristol, this little paper (drawn up with a view towards the prevention or removal of dangerous errors—the taking away of the groundless presumptions of some—the clearing up the necessary doubts and scruples of others—but, at the same time, towards exciting the serious attention of all, and keeping their consciences awake as to real duties) is most humbly addressed by their faithful pastor,

J——H T——R.

"A short and familar way of explaining the important doctrine of justification, and the points dependent on it, agreeably to scripture and the church of England.

"Justification is a law term, derived from judicial proceedings, and is opposed to condemnation. When applied to persons in this life, it anticipates the idea of a day of judgment, and declares the happy issue of a certain process supposed to be carried on in the court of conscience between God and the soul.

"This being the case, when a person is brought to the bar, and acquitted by his judge, he is then said to be justified; that is, he is declared to be just or innocent in regard to the charge laid against him. But there is this circumstance in the Christian, wherein it differs from all other justifications; viz. That the justified person is not only acquitted, but rewarded; and this reward is an eternal weight of glory.

"Therefore take notice, That the first indictment brought against you in the court of conscience is,—That you have sinned and thereby broken the law of God; and against this indictment you can make no defence, but must be infallibly cast and condemned; for all the world are become guilty; all having sinned, and come short of the glory of God. But Christ's merits are here pleadable in arrest of judgment; for when you can make no defence of your own, and would otherwise be necessarily condemned, you can plead the merits of your Saviour, and assert, that, as far as relates to the covenant of works, or the covenant of a never-failing obedience, you are freed from the curse and sentence attending the breach of it by the mediation of Christ and the imputation of his righteousness. You can assert also, that this mediation, and these merits, have obtained for you a covenant of better hopes; one more gracious in its nature; being attended with the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, and, upon all accounts, more easy for you to perform; viz. the covenant of faith and repentance; to the performance of which a free promise of immortal happiness is annexed.

"The man is therefore brought to the bar a second time; and is then to be tried upon the terms of this new and better covenant; viz. Whether he has so co-operated with divine grace, and so improved his talent, as to have repentance and present obedience towards God, and faith and gratitude towards our Lord Jesus Christ. If he has these qualifications, his plea is allowed of, his person accepted, and he is justified: so that were he to die that moment, he would be secure in the inheritance of eternal glory. But if he is found destitute of true faith and sincere repentance, his mouth is stopped, and he has no plea to make, nor apology to offer. As to the sacrifice and satisfaction of Christ, his merits, his obedience, or imputed righteousness; the consideration of them will only serve to aggravate his guilt, and increase his punishment, instead of lessening them; because these things were never intended to supersede the necessity of repentance, and a return to obedience; but, on the contrary, to make this repentance, and this return to duty, become valid and acceptable in the sight of God; and to purchase for them that reward of immortal happiness, to which the most perfect obedience (supposing such an obedience possible) could have no right or claim, without the free promises of God in Christ.

"To say more than this concerning the effects of Christ's imputed merits, is blasphemous Antinomianism, which opens a door for all manner of sin and wickedness, by taking away the necessity of personal virtue and inherent holiness, and by making the imaginary transfer of Christ's righteousness to serve as a cloak for the unrighteousness of mankind.

"To say less, is Socinianism (but one remove from modern deism), which destroys the idea of a Saviour and Redeemer, and sinks the Christian covenant of grace and mercy into a mere system of moral duties.

"Between both these extremes lies that happy gospel medium which displays the mercy of God to the returning and repenting sinner, and his justice on the impenitent and incorrigible.

"Hence, therefore, a rational and scriptural evidence of your justification; hence a genuine and authentic proof of your being a new creature; and the proper, never-failing credential, that the spirit of God dwelleth in you: for if you have true faith and sincere repentance, you want no other signs or evidences But if you have not these, to pretend to any other assurances, tokens, feelings, or experinces, is vain and delusive.

"Hear, therefore, the judicious decision of our excellent church, as the conclusion of the whole matter;—'Oh! but how shall I know that the Holy Ghost is within me? some man perchance will say; forsooth, as the tree is known by his fruit, so is also the Holy Ghost. The fruits of the Holy Ghost (according to the mind of St. Paul) are these: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance, &c. Contrariwise, the deeds of the flesh are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, wantonness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, debate, emulation, wrath, contention, sedition, heresy, envy, murder, drunkenness, gluttony, and such like.—* * * Here is now that glass, wherein thou must behold thyself, and discern whether thou have the Holy Ghost within thee or the spirit of the flesh. If thou see that thy works be virtuous and good, consonant to the prescript rule of God's Word, savouring and tasting not of the flesh, but of the Spirit; then assure thyself that thou art endued with the Holy Ghost: otherwise, in thinking well of thyself, thou dost nothing else but deceive thyself.' (The first part of the Hom. onWhitsunday.)"

This is the extraordinary piece which gave occasion to the following dialogue:

Believer. How do you do, my dear sir? You are welcome to town. How did you leave all friends at Bristol?

Inquirer. Sir, I thank you, I left them all well.

Bel. Pray, do you bring us any good news from thence?

Inq. We have nothing very particular at present, except that religion is more talked of than any other topic; and we have had some stir about a little piece printed by our minister about justification.

Bel. I suppose you mean "The short and familar Way of explaining the important Doctrine of Justification," which you sent me up?

Inq. Yes, that is it; and have you read it carefully, as I desired you?

Bel. Yes, sir, at your request I have read it over several times.

Inq. And what is your opinion of it?

Bel. It is indeed short, but far from being familiar; and instead of explaining from scripture this important doctrine, he leaves scripture quite out of the question, leaves the church of England and all the protestant churches, and chooses to go to the church of Rome for his account of justification.

Inq. Although this be a very heavy charge against my doctor, yet, I dare say, you would not lay it unless you could make it good.

Bel. You know that my charge is not against the man, but against his tenets: for I never saw Dr. T. in my life.

Inq. True: but are you not too sharp and severe in supposing him to be a Papist? I know the man; and he cries out against popery as much as you can do.

Bel. Does he, indeed? Then I am sure he does not know what popery is; for he is an open defender of its fundamental doctrine.

Inq. How do you prove that?

Bel. Why, from this very paper of his. He here maintains justification by works, which is the grand heresy of the Papists, and from which their most dangerous errors are derived; and he denies that justification is by faith only, which all sound Protestants maintain; and therefore he cannot be a Protestant.

All Protestants hold justification to be by faith only; but Dr. T. holds justification to be by works: therefore he is not a Protestant.

And he must be a Papist, because the grand heresy of popery consists in holding justification to be by works, and Dr. T. holds justification to be by works; therefore he is in the grand heresy of popery.

Inq. But from whence does it appear that Dr. T. holds justification by works?

Bel. It appears from the general scope and design of this little tract, in which he sets out at first tolerably well, and until he comes near the end of his third paragraph there is something like the truth; but he begins to lose sight of it when he talks "of Christ's having obtained for us a covenant of better hopes, and that faith and repentance are the terms of this covenant."

Inq. And are they not?

Bel. No. The scripture considers faith and repentance as the privileges and free gifts of the covenant of grace, which the Doctor mistakes for terms and conditions. And this mistake runs throughout. He all along supposes the graces of the covenant to be the terms, and its free gifts and privileges the conditions of it; which is downright popery.

Inq. Do you take the gospel, then, to be a revelation of grace and mercy, and not a proposal of a covenant of terms and conditions?

Bel. I take the gospel to be glad tidings of salvation for poor sinners, informing them what Christ hath done for their salvation, and how by the obedience of his life, and by the sacrifice of his death, he made a full atonement for sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness; and showing how the free grace of God applies to them the benefits of Christ's atonement and righteousness; namely, by the Holy Spirit's working in them repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. By the gift of repentance they are turned unto God; and under a sense of their fallen, sinful, and miserable state, as transgressors of his holy and righteous law, each of them is constrained to cry out, "God be merciful unto me, a sinner!" And to alleviate their distress, and to bring peace and comfort to their souls, they are enabled by faith, which is also the gift of the Holy Spirit, to trust in and to plead the righteousness of Christ only, who is of God made unto them wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. And hereby the believer is entitled to immortal happiness, on account of what Christ hath done for him, the comfort of which he enjoys by what the Holy Spirit hath wrought in him; viz. a believing apprehension and conviction that he has an interest in the righteousness of the God-man. This is, I think, the true gospel of Jesus Christ, which is evidently no covenant of faith and repentance, but a revelation of grace and mercy, and in which we have the free promises of eternal life, but not annexed to the performance of faith and repentance as works of man, or the terms or conditions of the covenant, but to Jesus Christ and to the perfect obedience and full satisfaction he hath made for sin; for the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Inq. I see how widely different your view of the gospel is from the Doctor's. He absolutely insists upon there being some terms or conditions of justification; whereas, if I understand you right, there are none.

Bel. The gospel has mentioned none. "Do this and thou shalt live," is the language of the law. Here life is promised upon the terms of obedience: whereas, in the gospel, life is purchased for us by Christ, and also all the gospel promises are freely made through him, and all the gospel graces are fully given through him, not to be received upon the performance of any previous terms or works, but freely given by the mere grace of God in Christ Jesus our Lord.

And the Doctor strangely errs, not knowing the scriptures, when he talks of faith and repentance as terms; for I suppose he means, by terms, the conditions upon the performance of which we are justified: but that which is promised as a free gift cannot be received upon the performance of any terms or conditions; and justification itself, as well as faith and repentance, are promised in scripture as free gifts, consequently they are not to be received upon the performance of any terms or conditions.

You may read, Rom. v. 16, 18, that justification is the free gift of God. So is faith, Eph. ii. 8. It is the gift of God, wrought in the heart by his operation, and one of the fruits of his good Spirit. So likewise is repentance, Acts v. 31. God hath exalted Jesus with his right hand, to be a prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance. Now, since faith and repentance are the free gifts of God, how can they be the terms or conditions of our justification? How can they be conditions to qualify us to receive what God gives freely, and according to the pleasure of his own will? Can you reconcile this difficulty? How can God give that freely which he does not give but upon certain terms or conditions?

Inq. But is it not a very common expression among divines, "the terms of acceptance?" I think I have seen a celebrated book with that title.

Bel. You will find neither the expression nor the doctrine in scripture; but, in direct opposition to both, the scripture says, "We are accepted in the Beloved;" and again, "we are justified freely by grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." Here we are said to be accepted in Christ without any terms or conditions of our own fulfilling. And is it not a palpable contradiction to say that we are justified freely by grace, and yet at the same time upon certain terms or conditions?

Inq. But are there no terms of acceptance?

Bel. You hear what the scripture says: "We are accepted in the Beloved."

Inq. What! without any terms?

Bel. Yes, without any terms to be previously performed by us to qualify us for acceptance.

Inq. But how, then, am I to understand the Doctor; for he says, "the man is therefore brought to the bar a second time, and is then to be tried upon the terms of this new and better covenant; viz. Whether he has so co-operated with divine grace, and so improved his talent, as to have repentance and present obedience towards God, and faith and gratitude towards our Lord Jesus Christ. If he has these qualifications, his plea is allowed of, his person accepted, and he is justified." What am I to think of these words?

Bel. You are to think that they contain the grand heresy of the Papists; and they state it as clearly as any doctor of the Sorbonne could have done; for

First, Here we have a man brought to the bar.

Second, His trial is put upon this issue—Has he so co-operated with divine grace, and so improved his talent, as to have repentance and faith, present obedience and gratitude?

Third, If he has these qualifications, and good works, then he is justified: but,

Fourth, As the Doctor adds, "if he is found destitute of true faith and sincere repentance, his mouth is stopped, and he has no plea to make, nor apology to offer: " from whence it follows,

Fifth, that no man is justified without these qualifications and good works: they must go before his justification. All this is downright popery. It is contrary to the whole tenor of scripture, contrary to the doctrines of the church of England, and contrary to the Doctor's own oaths and subscriptions.

Inq. Not so fast, my dear friend. You charge too high. I see, indeed, that the Doctor does require these qualifications before hand, as previously necessary to justification: but how do you prove this to be unscriptural?

Bel. I might prove it from the general scope and design of the sacred volume, which is to direct sinners to the righteousness of the God-man Christ Jesus for justification; but I refer you to the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians, which were written to establish this truth—that "a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Christ," Gal. ii. 16, which excludes all qualifications and works. Rom. iii. 24. God declares, "we are justified freely by his grace: and if by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace."

Again we read, Rom. iv. 5, "To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." Observe how widely St. Paul differs from Dr. T.

Dr. T. says, A man is not justified without certain works and qualifications:

St. Paul says, "He is justified that worketh not."

Dr. T. teaches that a man is not justified unless he first have faith and obedience.

St. Paul asserts that God justifieth the ungodly. What faith and obedience has an ungodly person?

St. Paul sends sinners to Christ for righteousness, that they may be made the righteousness of God in him; but,

Dr. T. sends them to their own qualifications and works, without which they cannot be made the righteousness of God in Christ.

Moreover, St. Paul says, Rom. iv. 6 "God imputeth righteousness without works."

Dr. T. denies it, and maintains that God imputeth not righteousness unless there be works and qualifications going before. Now what do you think of these scriptures? Do they not entirely overthrow Dr. T.'s notion of justification?

Inq. Indeed, they appear to me in a stronger light than ever I saw them in before: but what do you think of the person who is tried and cast for want of qualifications?

Bel. I suppose you refer to this passage: "But if he is found destitute of true faith and sincere repentance, his mouth is stopped, and he has no plea to make, nor apology to offer." How widely different is this from this scripture state of the case, which represents the persons who are to be justified freely as "ungodly, as working not, as found to be sinners while they are seeking to be justified:" whereas Dr. T. makes them saints, before they are justified. They have repentance, obedience, faith, and gratitude; and upon pleading these qualifications they are pronounced to be righteous in themselves, and are justified. How opposite is this to the scripture doctrine, which teaches us that we unrighteous sinners are made the righteousness of God in Christ! but how exactly agreeable is it to the sentiments of the Papists!

Inq. You are still harping upon that string. I tell you again that Dr. T. is a bitter enemy to popery, and a sound friend to the church of England.

Bel. He may call himself so; but he and the church of England are as wide as the east is from the west. Her doctrine is founded upon an old maxim; namely, That good works do not go before in the person who is to be justified, but follow the person being justified. Bona opera non præcedunt justificandum, sed sequuntur justificatum. Dr. T. makes them go before, and thereby forgets what he once set his hand to; viz. the 13th Article, the title of which is this: "Of Works before Justification." "Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of his Spirit are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or, as the school authors say, deserve grace of congruity; yea, rather for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin."

Compare Dr. T.'s paper with this article, and you will see that they are diametrically opposite. The article says, "Works done before justification have in them the nature of sin." The Doctor once set his hand to this doctrine; but now he writes against it, and says that they have in them the nature of merit; for they are qualifications indispensably necessary to justification. Let a whole college of Jesuits reconcile these contradictions if they can.

Inq. Truly, I cannot see how they can be reconciled. But have good works no place in our justification?

Bel. No; none at all; for works done before justification, all Dr. T.'s qualifications, have in them the nature of sin, according to our church.

Inq. How am I to understand this doctrine?

Bel. Hear what our church says of it in the second part of the Homily on Salvation: "The true understanding of this doctrine—we be justified freely by faith without works—is not that this our own act to believe in Christ, or this our faith in Christ, which is within us, doth justify us, and deserve our justification unto us (for that were to count ourselves to be justified by some act or virtue that is within ourselves); but the true understanding and meaning thereof is, that although we hear God's word and believe it; although we have faith, hope, charity, repentance, dread and fear of God within us; and do never so many works thereunto; yet we must renounce the merit of all our said virtues, of faith, hope, charity, and all other virtues and good deeds, which we either have done, shall do, or can do, as things that be far too weak, and insufficient and imperfect, to deserve remission of our sins and our justification." Is not the meaning of these words very plain and clear? And what can the Doctor object to them? If he denies their authority, what becomes of his oaths and subscriptions? If he allows of it how can he insist upon faith, repentance, &c. as qualifications requisite to our justification, after the church has absolutely excluded faith and repentance by name, and all other virtues and good deeds, from deserving any part of our justification? How does this reasoning appear to you?

Inq. Why, really, it is decisive. I did not think you could have brought such convincing proofs, but I am now satisfied that our justification is not from any works which we have done, can do, or shall do; yet there is a difficulty still sticks with me.

Bel. Pray what is it?

Inq. It is this: Does not your doctrine of justification supersede the necessity of repentance and return to obedience, as the Doctor expresses himself?

Bel. Do not call it my doctrine. It is the doctrine of scripture, and of the church of England; for you know we are taught that Christ was exalted to be a prince and a Saviour for to give faith and repentance, even that faith which worketh by love: and how then can this doctrine supersede the necessity of faith, repentance, and return to duty, since Christ always gives these graces to those persons whom he justifies?

Inq. But certainly this doctrine does supersede the necessity of repentance and return to duty.

Bel. No; far from it. It only supersedes them as qualifications for our being justified; for the scripture and our church allow of no qualifications or conditions. And the Doctor, without intending it, has fallen into their opinion; for, in direct contradiction to what he had been maintaining, he says, "That the imputed righteousness of Christ was to make repentance and this return to duty become valid and acceptable in the sight of God:" from whence I argue, upon his principles, that without this imputed righteousness they would not be valid nor acceptable; and if not valid nor acceptable, how could they be necessary qualifications for our justification? How could that make us accepted which was itself not acceptable? So that here we have J———h against T———r boldly contradicting him to his face.

Inq Surely you must misrepresent the Doctor.

Bel. No, my good friend, I do not. Look at the paper. See, here are the very words. Read them over.

Inq. Well, I protest, I could not have thought Dr. T. would have contradicted himself in such a palpable manner. I am sorry for him.

Bel. Sorry! Ay, so you ought. If you are sorry for his false reasoning, how sincerely sorry should you be for his false doctrine? For the scripture teaches that our persons are justified, and the church asserts that we are accounted righteous, through the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. But Dr. T. assigns the obedience, sacrifice, satisfaction, and imputed righteousness of Christ, no other place than to make our works valid and acceptable, and to purchase for THEM (what? for righteousness and return to duty? Yes, for I find no other case to agree) the reward of immortal happiness. I could never find in scripture that all that Christ did and suffered was to make our repentance and return to duty valid and acceptable in the sight of God, or that he came into the world to purchase the reward of immortal happiness for repentance and return to duty; but I read often of his giving himself for sinners, of his dying to atone for sin, and of his purchasing eternal life for them that were dead in trespasses and sins. Can you reconcile this with the Doctor's notion of Christ's righteousness making our obedience and return to duty valid and acceptable?

Inq. No, indeed, I cannot, and am sorry the Doctor should maintain things so absurd and unscriptural.

Bel. I am glad you are already sorry for him: you will have more reason when I come to his next paragraph. There he affirms, "that to say more than this concerning the effects of Christ's imputed merits, to say more than that our good works qualify us to receive Christ's imputed merits, is," he says, "blasphemous Antinomianism." But the scripture and our church say more: therefore the Doctor calls the scripture and our church blasphemous Antinomians; and he says their doctrine "opens a door for all manner of sin and wickedness, by taking away the necessity of personal virtue and inherent holiness." The scripture abhors the Doctor's charge. What! shall we make Christ the minister of sin? God forbid! Our church enters her protest in the third part of the Homily on Salvation, in these words: "How can a man have the true faith, sure trust and confidence in God, that by the merits of Christ his sins be forgiven, and be reconciled to the favour of God, and to be partaker of the kingdom of heaven by Christ, when he liveth ungodly, and denieth Christ in his deeds?" And as to these unscriptural terms—personal virtue and inherent holiness—they are brought in to be a kind of contrast to the righteousness of Christ, and to throw contempt upon it. You know my opinion of Christ's righteousness; and you can imagine how sensibly I must have been affected at the reading of the next words. I declare, my blood ran cold, and I even now shudder, at the repeating them! Lord, grant they may never be laid to the Doctor's charge!—"And by making the imaginary transfer of Christ's righteousness to serve as a cloak for the unrighteousness of mankind."

Inq. My dear sir, what offends you herein so mightily? What necessity for this great outcry?

Bel. Do not you see the reason? Is not that righteousness here trampled under foot as a mean and vile thing, in which the Lord's people here below, and above, appear before him without spot of sin unto salvation? For

First, It is here asserted that, to say a man is justified by Christ's righteousness without works, is destroying personal virtue and inherent holiness:

Secondly, That the transfer of his righteousness serves as a cloak for the unrighteousness of mankind: and Thirdly, That the imputed righteousness of Christ, which the doctor treated before as a real thing, he now treats as an imaginary thing.

Inq. Does he indeed? What! does he call Christ's imputed righteousness unaginary?

Bel. Yes; he does not mince the matter, but treats it as a fable! the righteousness of God he treats as a mere imagination! He once indeed thought it a real thing, and set his hand to the truth of it; and he still acts in the ministry in consequence of his subscription to the thirty-nine articles, although he now writes against the 11th, "Upon the Justification of Man," which says, "We are accounted righteous before God ONLY, for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings." What do you think of this article? Does it not say more than the Doctor does? And is it, then, blasphemous Antinomianism? Is it opening a door to all manner of sin and wickedness, to say that we are accounted righteous ONLY through Christ's imputed righteousness? Answer me, my friend.

Inq. Indeed, this article has struck me. That word ONLY is an answer to all the Doctor's paper. I now see clearly he is in the wrong; and I thank you heartily for convincing me of it. I understand how free and full the righteousness of Christ is, and that it is imputed to the ungodly, who have no qualifications, no good works, no personal virtue, no inherent holiness. And I pray God, I may be found in Christ, not having my own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ—the righteousness which is of God by faith.

Bel. I have reason to be thankful if my discourse has been of any use to you. I have spoken freely, and more so, as I know not the Doctor, and cannot be supposed to have any dislike to him. If ever you should bring him into my company, I would speak more freely to him than I have of him, both for the sake of his own soul and of their souls who are committed to his care. I doubt not but I could convince him that his general inference, which begins thus, "hence, therefore, a rational and scriptural evidence of your justification is neither rational nor scriptural. If you have true faith and sincere repentance, you want no other signs or evidences," says he, "of your justification." Observe this faith and this repentance are to go before as qualifications of our being justified; and considered in this respect, our church says, they have in them the nature of sin; and therefore they are no signs or evidences at all. "But if you have not these," as the Doctor adds, "to pretend to any other assurances, tokens, feelings, or experiences, is vain and delusive." Does he know any one who maintains that a man may be in a state of justification, and yet have no faith or repentance? I do not hear of any person who maintains this; but I know some who talk of certain marks and evidences attending true faith, which the scripture has promised; and these must not be discarded as vain or delusive; for the scripture has promised us the assurance of faith as the gift of God, and to be wrought in us by the operation of God, and mentions the earnest or token of the Spirit, and speaks of feeling after the Lord and finding him, yea, feeling in ourselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, as our church expresses it in article 17, and in another place, feeling our consciences at peace with God through remission of our sin (third part of the Homily for Rogation Week), and feeling this with so much certainty, that we can tell our experience with David: "Come hither, and hearken, all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul." So that we must not reject all tokens, feelings, and experiences, as vain and delusive.

Inq. Doubtless, there is such a thing as the assurance of faith; and I pray God I may attain it.

Bel. God grant you may. And now let me ask you—Does it not appear to you, upon the whole, that the Doctor was greatly mistaken even in the very title of his paper? For he has been establishing groundless presumptions instead of taking them away; giving further handle to unscriptural doubts and fears instead of clearing them up; and lulling consciences asleep upon the sandy foundation of human righteousness instead of building upon Christ, the rock of ages, for righteousness to justification, and for true holiness of heart and life. His notions are opposite to scripture, and inconsistent with the determinations of the church of England; and therefore they come under one of the marks of the fruits of the flesh enumerated by St. Paul, and quoted by the Doctor from the Homily—namely, HERESY. Are these things so?

Inq. Indeed they appear to me with such full conviction, that I need not trouble you about the last part of his paper; for I now see plainly enough, that this quotation from the Homily is nothing to the purpose; because it only says, that when the Spirit of Christ is within a man, he will bring forth the fruits of the Spirit; but the Homily does not maintain, with the Doctor, that these fruits will justify us.

Bel. No; far from it. The doctrine of the Homilies is this:

The righteousness for which a sinner is accounted righteous before God is the righteousness of Jesus Christ.

It was not the end of Christ's fulfilling all righteousness, to make repentance and return to duty valid and acceptable, nor yet to purchase for repentance and return to duty the reward of eternal happiness; but he fulfilled all righteousness, that our persons might first be made righteous; after which our works would be acceptable. And

Accordingly we never read of his righteousness being imputed to them who have repented and returned to duty; but it is said to be imputed to the ungodly, to him that worketh not, without any qualifications or conditions.

Faith is the hand which apprehends, or the instrument which applies, Christ's imputed righteousness, and thereby justifies.

This justifying faith is the gift of the Holy Spirit.

He gives us evidence of our being justified, by bearing his testimony with our spirits, that we are the children of God, and

By enabling us to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit.

These fruits do not justify us, but prove us to be justified; as the fruits upon a tree do not make it alive, but prove it to be alive.

Inq. I heartily assent to these truths; and I desire to experience the comfort of them in my own soul.

Bel. I am glad to leave you in this sweet frame of mind. I wish all our Bristol friends were in your way of thinking.

Inq. I promise you it will not be my fault if they be not. I will do my endeavour to convince them

Bel. I hope God will prosper your endeavours, and give his blessing to your magistrates and people. May they love Christ and his righteousness! may your clergy and Dr. T. among the rest, preach Christ, and teach men to submit to his righteousness! and may Christ pour his choicest blessings upon the city of Bristol, that it may be celebrated through the earth for the city of righteousness, the faithful city!

AN

ESSAY ON PSALMODY.

Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people: sing unto him, sing Psalms unto him.—1 Chron. xvi. 8, 9.

PREFACE.

In the service of the church of England there is great use made of the Psalms. They are read in every day's service, both at morning and evening prayer, and are constantly sung in public worship. It is much to be wished they were better understood, that the daily reading and singing of them might be the means of grace. Very few, it is to be feared, receive the profit from them, which, as an ordinance of God, they were intended to administer. I have long seen the design of them greatly mistaken, and have long lamented the contempt put upon them. At last I have been persuaded to try to make the subject of these divine hymns plain and clear, and to restore the singing of them in the congregation to their primitive usefulness. This is my present attempt. Success in it depends on help from God. He revealed the book of Psalms, and he alone can make the singing of them profitable. I hope he will. May he accompany my well-meant performance with his presence, and prosper it with his grace. If it bring any honour to his holy name and word, thanks be to him. If any body reads it, and is stirred up to sing more and better: if our public singing of Psalms be reformed, and become in the least like the great concert of saints and angels, this will be altogether his doing; may he have all his praise. I deserve none, being only in his church and service what he is pleased to make me. Through his grace I wish to live to his glory, and to be useful in my day to his cause and interest. Help me, reader, to exalt him in life and death. May it be thy happiness to do the same: for which thou hast the hearty prayer of thy servant in him,

W. Romaine.

Men and Brethren,—We are the creatures of God, dependent on him for being and for well-being. He gives us all our faculties, both of mind and body, and he requires us to use them in his service, and to his glory. This is our bounden duty. It is the peculiar dignity of man, who never acts more nobly than when he employs the powers bestowed upon him to the praise of the giver. None of them should be useless, but each should be exerted, whenever an opportunity offers of glorifying God.

In the common actions of life, this may and should be done: the rule is, "Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God;" but it is far more needful in spiritual matters, which have an immediate relation to God and his worship. These he has appointed to be the means of showing forth his praise. Among them singing of Psalms is not the least. It is frequently commanded, and with a promise—faithful is he who hath promised—he will render the means effectual to answer the end. When believers employ the faculties of soul and body in singing of his goodness and greatness, he does accept the service, and testifies his acceptance. He does indeed communicate to them, by his Spirit, joy and peace, and he renders singing to the Lord, with melody in the heart, the means of increasing the melody and joy.

But where is such singing? In what church? Among what people? There are some. May their number increase. It is worth while to try to increase them, especially as this ordinance is so much neglected. The holy affections, which should be stirred up by so heavenly an exercise, are generally damped by it. When it is performed with coldness and indifference, how can it produce sensations suitable to such exalted means of grace? Or when contempt is put upon it, how can it convey any of the promised blessings?

Many things have contributed to the present neglect and abuse of this ordinance, and I have been led to the following reflection, in order to try to bring it again into repute. Happy, indeed, shall I think myself, if the Lord should be pleased to make use of them, as any way conducive to the singing of his praises with the understanding; I shall pray and labour for it: may he give his abundant blessing.

One of the first and great causes of neglecting the singing of Psalms seems to have arisen from not attending to

CHAPTER I.

The Subject of the Book of Psalms

The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy: for to him give all the prophets witness. With one voice they speak of his wonderful person, of his divine undertakings, and of his complete and eternal salvation. It is the spirit of their writings to reveal and to teach the good knowledge of the Lord. Whoever understands them perfectly, will find the prophets treating of the coming of Immanuel in the flesh, as clearly as the evangelists. When this most blessed event was to be accomplished in the fulness of time, a New Testament witness, filled with the Holy Ghost, prophesied, saying, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath according to his promise visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David, as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began." The Lord never left himself without witness. Ever since the world began, he had prophets, who foretold what Christ was to be and to do, who testified beforehand of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

This is the subject of the book of Psalms. It treats of Christ, and contains the praises of the Father's love, and of the Spirit's grace, as they were manifested in the person and work of Jesus Christ. The salvation of sinners through him is the greatest display of the covenant mercies of the eternal Three: therefore the Psalms celebrate his wonderful person, and his divine undertakings—they describe his obedience and sufferings—his conflicts with, and victories over, all his enemies—his resurrection and ascension—his sitting upon the throne, the great king of all worlds, visible and invisible—his gathering together, and perfecting the number of his elect—his coming at the last day to judge men and angels—and the glory which he will bestow upon his redeemed, when they shall be with him, and like him, kings and priests unto God and his Father, and shall reign with him for ever.

What subject can be more noble in itself than this: here are the greatest transactions of the greatest personages that possibly can be—the ever blessed Trinity purposing and covenanting to bring many sons unto glory—displaying their wisdom, and love, and power, in an infinite degree, through the incarnation, obedience, and sufferings of the God-man, Jehovah Jesus, and through the effectual grace of the Holy Spirit, calling and bringing the elect to experience the Father's love to them by faith in the Son's perfect salvation, and then guiding them safe by his council and might unto the glory provided for them. This wonderful theme is treated of in the book of Psalms in a manner suitable to its dignity—it is not only spoken of, but also celebrated—not merely described, but also praised. The language therefore is exalted. The sentiments are sublime. The poetry is divine. And no wonder: the author is equal to the subject. He is capable of extolling the mercies of that covenant, which reaches from eternity to eternity; and of extolling them according to their true greatness. The Psalms are the composition of the all-wise Spirit: for the Holy Ghost spake by the mouth of David, and of the other inspired penmen. He guided both their hearts and their hands. The sentiments and the words are his: for the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost—they spake as he moved them—they indited the Psalms under his inspiration. The praises therein given of the person and work of the ever blessed Immanuel are not human, but truly divine. What may not be expected from such an author? Who is by essential union one in the Godhead with the Father and the Son, and who is by his office to testify of Jesus, and to glorify Jesus. If the Psalms be read under his influence, they will be found equal to the subject, in every view suited to exalt the incarnate God, and if they be sung with grace in the heart, they will increase the faith and hope of every devout worshipper. There are several Psalms which are applicable to none but Jesus Christ, and many expressions which could not be truly spoken by any one but by him who was God and man in one Christ. Many will receive new lustre and emphasis, when viewed in the same light. The proper Psalms, which are appointed to be read on the festivals, do certainly treat of the birth, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Christ, and of the coming of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, in consequence of Christ's ascension: for, says he, "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I go away, I will send him unto you." Our reformers certainly understood those proper Psalms to be descriptive of Christ, and took them in the same sense our Lord and his apostles did; who have quoted the book of Psalms eighty-two times. Their manner of quoting it demonstrates, that they took it for granted it was written concerning Christ. Indeed many passages cannot be applied to any one, but to him: for instance—he appeals to God to be tried according to his innocence—to be rewarded according to his righteousness—he desires to be judged according to the cleanness of his heart and hands—could any one of us say, "Search me to the bottom, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any way of wickedness in me." All have sinned. All we like sheep have gone astray, and if we were to be tried according to the holy law by a heart-searching God, every mouth would be stopped, and all the world would become guilty before him. Oh what would become of the best of us, if God was to judge us as we are. The cxixth Psalm is a description of the love of Christ to the law, his study in it and his perfect observance of it. Oh what love have I unto thy law—with my whole heart have I sought thee—I have not departed from my judgments—"I have sworn" (with the oath, of the covenant) "and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments." Are not these the peculiar descriptions of the work of the God-man, in which he was alone, and of the people there was none with him—any more than there was in the offering for sin, when he trod the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with him, of which the xlth Psalm treats--any more than there was in bringing in everlasting righteousness, for which the church praises him in several Psalms, particularly in lxxi, and will triumph in his righteousness, and in his only, for evermore. The glory is his. No offering, no righteousness, but his can save: the praises therefore of the great salvation of our God, which run through the book of Psalms, are the peculiar prerogatives of the King of saints. They are his crown and diadem. The honours are solely his, and he will wear them with unrivalled fame. His name is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and the armies of heaven follow him with one mind and one heart, ascribing unto him honour and glory, and blessing and praise, for ever and ever. Amen.

But although the work was altogether his from first to last, none being capable of any part, but he who is God as well as man; yet, eternal blessings on him! he did it for us and for our salvation. His people have an interest in what he is—God in our nature—they have their share in what he did and suffered for them, and they have an unspeakable benefit in what he is now doing for them in the presence of the Father. By believing, they have pardon and peace through his offering on the tree. By believing, they put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and find acceptance in his righteousness. By believing, they commit their persons and concerns into his hands, and he ever liveth their prevailing intercessor to obtain for them every needful blessing. Thus they learn to trust him, and in trusting, to experience his faithfulness. He gives them cause to love him, and to rejoice in him. For having received a new birth and life in him, they can sing the Psalms of his nativity, and join angels and men in ascribing glory in the highest to the incarnate God. They read of his dying love in several Psalms, and they worship him for bearing their sins, and shame, and curse, in his body and soul upon the cross: the lamb that was slain, and redeemed them to God by his blood, is the constant theme of their grateful songs. When they read or sing the Psalms of his resurrection they look upon him as the first fruits of the dead, the earnest of the whole harvest, and with grateful hearts they bless him for making, and for keeping them alive to God. They share in all his victories and triumphs, being his happy subjects: for he has a kingdom, which is celebrated in many of the Psalms. These treat of his almighty power to rule all beings and things: and of the sweet sceptre of his love, by which he governs his willing people. He manifests to them the greatness and majesty of his kingdom, so that under his royal protection they find deliverance from the temptations to sin, and from the miseries of sin, and through his special love he gives them here in the kingdom of his grace a happiness, which all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, cannot possibly give. They live happy indeed: for he makes them sing of the good of his chosen: they do rejoice in the gladness of his nation, and they glory in his inheritance. These are high privileges; but they are only the earnests of that kingdom which endureth for ever. Oh what glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God, in which the great king delighteth to dwell, and to manifest his glory. Wonderful things are written of his everlasting kingdom in the book of Psalms with which his happy subjects mix faith, and can then sing them with a hope full of glory and immortality The Psalms throughout so describe the King of saints that they who partake of his grace may find in them continual exercise of their faith, and continual improvement of it: for they have an interest in all he was, and in all he is. Was his trust in God unshaken? They hope he will make theirs steadfast. Was his walk holy, harmless, and undefiled? They depend on him for strength to tread in his steps. Were his tempers perfectly holy? They admire his example, and through his Spirit they daily put off the old man, and put on the new. Was he carried through the greatest sufferings with entire resignation? They look up under all their trials for his promised support. Has he all his enemies under his feet? They are waiting in joyful hope for the fruit of his conquest. Is he now in our nature in the highest glory? It is promised them, their eyes shall see the king in his beauty. Oh blessed prospect! They shall soon be with him, and like him too, when they shall see him as he is. The Psalms are so written of Christ, that every believer may find comfort in what he reads or sings. Christ being the head of the body the church, all the members do share with their head in what he is and has, in his incarnation, life and death, resurrection and intercession, yea, they shall live and reign with him for ever and ever. That my meaning may be better understood, I will give an instance in the first Psalm. Let us consider, how it is to be understood of Christ, and in what manner it is useful to those, who, through faith, are with Christ.

As it treats of Christ, it is a proper preface to the whole book. It gives an account of the subject, and is an abridgment of it, containing in substance what is largely handled in the other parts. For Christ is here described under the character of that perfect person, who was to retrieve for his people all the losses of the fall. He was in their nature, and yet he was by nature and practice, in heart and life, separate from sinners; negatively he had not the least communion with them, being without one spot of sin, positively he was perfectly holy. He fulfilled all the righteousness of the law in its highest requirements, both in obedience to its precepts and also in suffering its penalties. Thus he became to his people the tree of life, having life in himself, as God self-existent, and having life communicatively, as God-man, to bestow upon every branch in him.—" I am the vine," says he, " ye are the branches:" by him they are quickened, in him they live, through him they become fruitful, and by his influence they prosper and bring forth much fruit to the glory of God. Herein they are directly contrary to the wicked, who are never quickened by him, but left to perish in their sins.

PSALM I.

1. Successful are the steps of that person, who never walks in the counsel of transgressors, and in the way of sinners never stands, and in the seat of mockers never sits.

2. But in the law of Jehovah is his delight, and in his law will he meditate day and night.

3. For then he shall be like a tree that was planted by the streams of waters, which will yield its fruits in their season, and its top-shoot shall never fade, but whatsoever he shall take in hand he shall be able to make it prosperous.

4. It shall not be so with transgressors, but they shall be like the chaff which the wind blows away.

5. Because the transgressors shall not be set up in judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6. For Jehovah acknowledgeth the way of the righteous, but the way of sinners shall be destroyed.

This Psalm is a general description of the success of Jesus in his work, showing what steps he was to take for the salvation of his people: he was to be a man like us in all things, excepting sin; from which he was perfectly free: no thought of it ever entered his mind, not one moment did he decline from the way of duty, but always acted under the influence of divine love, in his life, and by his example, reproving those who made a mock at sin. He was holy, harmless, and undefiled in his nature, and separate from sinners in his practice: for

He was perfectly acquainted with the divine law: it was his continual study, and to obey it was his continual delight. It was his meat and drink—" Lo, I come," says he, " to do thy will, O God." He rejoiced to fulfil its precepts by his life, and he was a willing sacrifice to suffer its penalties in his death. In both he magnified the law, and made it infinitely honourable. And,

Thus it became him to bring many sons unto glory. Whatsoever he undertook for them had perfect success. He was the tree of life watered with abundant streams of grace, the Spirit being given not by measure unto him; a tree subject to no change, but always growing and flourishing, always bearing forth fruit, and making every branch in it a partaker of the heavenly influences of the stock upon which it grows.

But the transgressors, who are not grafted into him by faith, have no spiritual life or fruit—they are lighter than vanity itself: and they shall be driven from the judgment seat of God, as easily as any light chaff is driven about by a strong wind, and they shall be justly banished for evermore from the general assembly and church of the first born.

For Jehovah always approved of the way of the righteous, whom he chose and called, and justified freely by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus; but the way of transgressors he disapproves, and they shall soon utterly perish.

In this sense the Psalm is true of Christ, but believers have their share in the blessings of which it treats; for in his success they partake. They have fellowship with him in every step which he took to work out their salvation. When they have redemption through faith in his blood, and free acceptance through faith in his righteousness, then they walk humbly with him, and he puts his fear within them. He teaches them to depart from evil, they do not walk in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stand in the way of sinners, nor sit in the seat of the scornful.

But he puts his law in their inward parts, and writes it in their hearts: in their renewed mind they are brought to delight in it; they make it their continual study, and through grace to walk in it as their continual practice. Yea, they live by the faith of the Son of God, as branches in the tree of life: because he lives they shall live also; drawing from their life-giving root every thing needful to mortify sin in them, and to enable them to bring forth fruit unto God.

Thus he separates them from transgressors, who live and die in their sins: these are like chaff, which the wind driveth away.

Because they shall not stand in the judgment of God, nor come into the church of Christ.

For the Lord with his loving-kindness regarded the way of the righteous, but the way of transgressors shall perish.

Thus believers look upon the Psalms. They consider them as treating of the glorious person and work of the God-man, and considering themselves in him. as members under him their Head, quickened by his Spirit, and receiving all the blessings of spiritual life out of his fulness, they can understand and sing the praises of Immanuel, with melody in their hearts; for they can apply to themselves the benefits of his atonement and righteousness, of his intercession and glory, and this renders the Psalms precious, and singing them an high ordinance. Their God does meet them and bless them in singing Psalms. While they express their love to him he communicates his love to them, and they have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ by the Spirit.

But this will be more evident from considering some particulars relating to the subject; such as

CHAPTER II.

The Scripture Names of the Psalms.

THERE are three Hebrew names often used in the titles of the Psalms, which the Septuagint have translated Psalms, Hymns, and Songs. The word rendered by them hymns is Thehilim, which is the running title to this book, expressive of the general design, and is an abridgement of the whole matter. It comes from a Hebrew word, that signifies the brisk motion of light, shining and putting its splendour upon any object, and this makes it bright and illustrious. Hence comes the propriety of the word, as it is used to praise, which is to set an object in the light; that the rays shining upon it may render it splendid and beautiful, and thereby glorious and praiseworthy. Such are the Psalms. They are rays of light—enlighteners, (if I might use such a word, and it is the literal sense of the Hebrew hymns) intended to manifest the glory of the person, and to show forth the praises of the work of God-Jesus: for light, in its various uses in nature, is the appointed emblem of the Lord Christ. He is distinguished by this name throughout the Old Testament; and he applied all the passages to himself in the New, when he declared—"I am the light of the world"—"I am not only the Creator of light in the material world, but also in the spiritual world—darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people, until I, the light of life, arise upon their souls: and when I come with healing in my rays, in that day shall the deaf hear my words, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of obscurity and out of darkness."

Jesus gives eyes to see with, and light to see by: he opens the eyes of the understanding, and makes spiritual objects visible: so that, whoever is enlightened with saving knowledge, has it all from him, and it should all lead to him. He is the bright day-star which shines throughout the volume of revelation; but in no part with clearer rays than in the book of Psalms. Here he is exalted in his meridian glory: for the whole scripture does not give greater light into what he was to be, and to do, and to suffer, his life, his temper, his employment from his tender age until his crucifixion, than is to be found in those divine hymns: nor are there any more full descriptions of his passion, death, resurrection, ascension, and his kingdom which ruleth over all. In the Psalms, he himself read and meditated day and night, while he was growing in wisdom and stature. And in them will every true believer meditate, that he may have more of the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, as it shines in the person of Jesus Christ.

As the eyes of his understanding are more enlightened with this saving truth, he will more happily enjoy in his heart the benefits of the humiliation and exaltation of the incarnate Jehovah. May this, reader, be thy happy case: may every Psalm be as the shining light, leading thee to a growing knowledge of Jesus, and shining on clearer still until the perfect day.

Zemer is another Hebrew word which the Septuagint translates Psalms: as a verb, it signifies to cut and prune trees; as a noun, it is a branch cut off, and pruned, and by way of eminence, the Branch, the man whose name is the Branch, who was known and distinguished by this title in the scripture. He was the eternal God, and he was in the fulness of time to be made flesh, and to cut off, but not for himself. This was the great transaction in the everlasting covenant—"Thus saith the Lord of hosts, (Zech. iii. 7, 8.) Behold I will bring forth my servant, the Branch," the promised branch which was to spring from the root of Jesse; and again, Zech. vi. 12, 13. "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord, (in which the Godhead shall reside) even he shall build the temple of the Lord, and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and shall rule upon his throne, and he shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both," between Jehovah and the Branch; for the Branch having grown up in his place was in the temple of his body to ratify the counsel of peace; he was to establish it in his life, and to fulfil it in his death, and having by dying conquered death, and him that had the power of death, he was to rebuild the temple of the Lord, as he said unto the Jews—"Destroy this temple, and in three days I will build it up;" which he fulfilled by building up the temple of his body natural, and thereby he demonstrated that he will in due time perfectly complete the temple of his body mystical, which is his church: for he is a head to all his members. He quickens them by his grace, and actuates them by his influence. By union with him they live, by communion with him they grow. His Spirit breathes through the church, which is his body, and enables the members to grow up into him in all things, who is the head, even Christ; whereby he teaches them, and it is a great part of their growth, how to acknowledge their obligations with increasing humility to their glorified Head. He renders the salvation of Jesus finished upon the cross, the sweet subject of their spiritual song. His dying love they would keep ever in mind; they would have it always warm upon their hearts, and always upon their tongues. His passion on the tree is their never ceasing theme: God forbid, say they, that we should glory, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. In this they glory, and in this alone, with their voices, and with every musical instrument; but chiefly with the melody of their hearts, they endeavour to praise him, who was slain, and hath redeemed them unto God by his blood. It becometh them well in the house of their pilgrimage, thus to sing the triumphs of the worthy Lamb: for it is to be in their Father's house the most blessed subject of their endless song. The ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands of angels, and the great multitude which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds and people and tongues, harping with their golden harps, in full concert join in praising the crucified Immanuel—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches, and wisdom and strength, and honour and glory, and blessing. Amen. Hallelujah."

There is another Hebrew word, Sher, which the Septuagint constantly render a Song, frequently applied to the Psalms. It signifies rule and government, and is used for any principality among men. Hence it is very properly spoken of him whose kingdom ruleth over all. The Prince of Peace is one of his high titles. He is called the Prince of the kings of the earth; a Prince for ever—of whose government and peace there shall be no end. To this empire he had an unalienable and indefeasible right, being in the one Jehovah possessed of the same perfections with the Father and the Holy Spirit. But the most common view in which the Psalms consider him, is that of the God-man, King-mediator, whose principality is the most glorious reign of grace. He sits upon his throne freely to bestow all divine blessings upon his redeemed, and he is Messiah the prince who was raised to his kingdom by the covenant of the eternal Three: in which he engaged to be a surety for his people; and in their nature, and in their stead, to satisfy all the offended attributes of the Father, by his holy life and death, and the Father engaged to give him a kingdom with all power in heaven and earth. Accordingly in the fulness of time he was manifested in the flesh, and for the joy that was set before him, he endured the cross, and despised the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. He is greatly exalted, far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. The once crucified is now the enthroned Jesus, King of kings, and Lord of lords, almighty to save his people from all their sins, and from all their enemies. The glories of Immanuel in this respect are celebrated under the name of Sher, in several of the Psalms. In the xlviith Psalm, for instance, all the people are called upon to clap their hands for joy, and to shout unto God with the voice of triumph, because Jehovah Jesus is the great king over all the earth. His happy government, under which believers receive all their blessings, was to be the constant subject of their grateful song. Singing was using words and sounds to express the praises of the King of saints, and their joy in him. It was so much the ruling and leading subject, that every hymn reminded them of Messiah the prince. Whenever they were happy in their hearts, they expressed it by singing the praises of that most glorious person, who was made flesh, humbling himself to be obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, and who thereby became the head of all principality and power. He ruleth the almighty Immanuel over every creature, and every thing, God-man upon his throne, till all his enemies, death itself, be destroyed, and then he will reign with the Father and the Spirit for ever and ever: for his reign is everlasting, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

This was the delightful theme in the book of Psalms. The Old Testament saints were never weary of celebrating Messiah their prince, the Lord and Saviour of his people, made an offering for their sins, dead, risen, and ascended to his throne. This is still the sweetest subject in the church of God. Happy are they, who have the Lord Christ ruling over their outward estate. Thrice happy they, who have him ruling in their souls. Oh what happiness is it to have set up within them the kingdom of God! which is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. None have greater reason to rejoice with joy and singing, than they who have Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith. It was one principal design of those sacred hymns to keep up this holy joy, that if any were merry they might sing Psalms and be glad in the Lord. Sensible of his tender care and royal protection, with what joyful lips will they extol their king! They would have all within them to bless his holy name, and would be praising him with Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, rejoicing all the way to Sion, and making heavenly melody in their hearts unto the Lord.

These three names take in the subject of the whole book—the Hymns contain the praises of Immanuel, our sun of righteousness—the Psalms treat of his taking our nature, and in it being cut off for his people, that through his death they might live—the Songs celebrate the glories of his kingdom, both in earth and heaven, in time and eternity. Besides these names of the book of Psalms, there are several other things written in scripture concerning them, which confirm the account here given of their reference to the ever-blessed Messiah, king of saints, and which will be farther illustrated under the consideration of

CHAPTER III.

Some Passages of the Old Testament, concerning the Book of Psalms.

These passages are either such as command the singing of Psalms, or such as lay down rules for singing them properly: of the first sort we find frequent mention. "Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people: sing unto him, sing Psalms unto him: oh sing unto the Lord a new song, sing unto the Lord, all the earth · sing unto the Lord, bless his name, show forth his salvation from day to day. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth, make a loud noise, and rejoice, and give praise: sing unto the Lord with the harp, and the voice of a Psalm. Oh clap your hands, all ye people, shout unto God with the voice of triumph: for the Lord most high is to be feared: He is the great king over all the earth: sing forth the honour of his name, make his praise glorious: sing Psalms unto God, sing Psalms; sing Psalms to our King, sing Psalms, for it is good to sing Psalms to our God; for it is pleasant, and praise is comely: sing ye praises with the understanding. sing ye praises with the whole heart: let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord. Amen. Hallelujah."

In obedience to those commands, believers exhort one another to this delightful exercise: "Oh come let us sing unto the Lord, let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation (Heb. our Jesus). Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with Psalms." And what was thus expressed in the congregation, every believer in private applies to himself and practises. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name; while I live will I praise the Lord, I will sing praises unto my God while I have my being: I will extol thee my God, O King, and I will bless thy name for ever and ever."

We have abundant authorities in the lives of believers to prove, that singing of Psalms was very early in the church. Moses composed a Psalm, which he and the whole congregation sang to the glory of their almighty Deliverer from Egyptian bondage. On the victory obtained over Sisera the captain of Jabin's host, Deborah and Barak sung a hymn of thanksgiving, recorded in the book of the Wars of the Lord. David was the sweet singer of Israel, raised up of God to indite the praises of the glorious Immanuel: the book of Psalms, which he spake by the Holy Ghost, has been in use in the church ever since his time. They made part of every day's service in the temple. They were sung by Christ, and by his apostles. Paul and Silas in prison, with their feet in the stocks, and at midnight, had liberty in their hearts to sing a Psalm unto the Lord. We know for certain, from sacred history, confirmed by profane authors, that when the whole church was come together into one place it was part of the public service to sing Psalms: for which there were rules laid down both in the Old Testament and in the New.

The principal rule was about the end proposed in singing. Why did God enjoin it in his service? And with what view did he require it to be performed by his people? he has herein clearly revealed his will. He intended to teach them to acknowledge his infinite love in Jesus, through whom all their blessings flow, and to praise him, and to thank him with joyful hearts and lips. Singing was the outward expression of their inward joy, and therefore it was accompanied with instruments of all kinds, to proclaim in the grandest manner their joy in the Lord. While the daily sacrifices were burning on the altar, they celebrated with believing hearts the atonement of the Lamb of God, and expressed their triumphing in it with all the powers of vocal and instrumental music. Thus they were commanded, Num. x. 10. "In the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginning of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt offerings, and over the sacrifices of your peace-offerings, that they may be to you for a memorial before the Lord your God: I am the Lord your God." This commandment Hezekiah observed. After he had cleansed the temple from the pollutions of his profane predecessor, "he set the Levites in the house of the Lord with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps, according to the commandment of David, and of Gad the king's seer, and Nathan the prophet: for so was the commandment of the Lord by his prophets: and the Levites stood with the instruments of David, and the priests with the trumpets: and Hezekiah commanded to offer the burnt-offering upon the altar, and when the burnt-offering began, the song of the Lord began also with the trumpets, and with the instruments ordained by David king of Israel: and all the congregation worshipped, and the singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded, and all this continued until the burnt-offering was finished." 2 Chron. xxix. 25, &c. Their music was not merely to please; it was expressive. For it was a memorial. It was to call to mind the sacrifice of Immanuel, and the joy flowing from it, the greatest joy that possibly can be: for all the sacrifices pointed to him, and were instituted to keep up faith and hope in him. He was the Lamb who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, who was slain in type from the foundation of the world, and who in the fulness of time appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. The apostle has proved at large in the epistle to the Hebrews, that all the sacrifices under the law were types and figures of the sacrifice of Christ, and that the benefits ascribed to them were to signify the graces which flow to his redeemed from his sacrifice: for through this alone justice was satisfied, wrath appeased, atonement made, the conscience purged from guilt, the sinner freely pardoned, fully justified, yea sanctified and perfected for ever: so that by his one offering, he saves believers from all sins and all miseries, and gives them enjoyment now of all blessings, and will secure to them eternal enjoyment. Here is the fountain of all joy. From hence flows peace with God, and love to God, with every blessing of his love. All comes through the bleeding Lamb, and is the fruit of his cross and passion. This is the glorious subject treated of in the Psalms, and the singing and the music of the Old Testament, were entirely in praise of this. While the burnt-offering was consuming on the fire of the altar, all that sound could possibly do with voices and instruments was exerted to rouse the attention, and to inflame the affections. The full concert was to excite the highest sentiments of thankfulness in the view of that one offering, which was to bear the fire of the Father's wrath, and thereby was to become an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well pleasing to God. No blessing is beyond this. No joy is to be compared with the joy of this. If any one had been present who did not know the occasion of this wonderful rejoicing, and had asked good Hezekiah what they meant by this music, which made the very earth ring again, he would have graciously informed the inquirer—

We are now triumphing in steadfast faith of the fulfilling of the promise, that God will be incarnate, and will come to take away sin by his sacrifice; therefore we enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise. We rejoice in our hearts in the future offering of the Lamb of God. Although we have divine words, in which to express our joy, yet our present sense of it is only according to our faith. When this is lively, our joy is unspeakable and full of glory: for it brings a foretaste of that fulness of joy, which we shall have, when we shall receive the end of our faith, even the eternal salvation of our souls. Then all the blessings, all the glories of heaven will come to us through the redemption that is in the blood of the Lamb. Hence, while the burnt-offering is consuming on the altar, we make the most joyful noise we possibly can, singing and triumphing in the offering of Immanuel: for we believe it will be a sweet-smelling savour unto God, and through it we shall enter within the veil, even into heaven itself. There we shall take up the same most blessed subject, and celebrate the Lamb that was slain with never-ceasing praise.

The answer, which I suppose Hezekiah would have given, is perfectly agreeable to David's own account of this matter. He relates very clearly for what end the Psalms were revealed, and were sung in the temple service. We find it thus described, 1 Chron. xvi. "David appointed the Levites to minister before the ark, and to record, and to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel," ver. 4, and again, ver. 7, "Then on that day David delivered first this Psalm to thank the Lord into the hand of Asaph and his brethren: Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people: sing unto him, sing psalms unto him, talk you of all his wondrous works: glory ye in his holy name, let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord."

We have in this passage a very clear description of the design of the book of Psalms. It was first to record; the word signifies to cause to be remembered. The Psalms were a standing memorial, to bring into mind the wonderful love of the ever-blessed Trinity in saving sinners through Jesus Christ, and to keep it fresh and lively upon the hearts of believers. We are apt to forget this our greatest good, and therefore God has graciously recorded it in his word. Therein he has promised to sanctify the memory to retain it, and in the use of the Psalms he bestows this blessing. When they are read and mixed with faith, then they are meditated on with delight, sung with melody, and help to keep the heart warm in its attachment to the beloved Jesus. When they are thus treasured up in the mind, and brought into constant use, believers learn, in singing them, to rejoice in the infinitely perfect sacrifice of Immanuel, and to triumph in his divine righteousness. The Psalms are the means appointed of God to answer those ends; and they do by his grace. They stir up the pure minds of his people by way of remembrance. They afford them proper matter, and choice words, and when sung with significant sounds, they excite affections to Jesus, as holy and as happy as they can be on this side of heaven.

The use of the Psalms was also to thank: "O give thanks unto the Lord: for his mercy endureth for ever," seems to have been the chorus of all the ancient hymns. The word which we translate to thank, signifies to give the hand to God, as an acknowledgment that all power was his. The hand is power. Our power extends as far as our hand reaches. The hand of God is every where, and his power is infinite. The custom of paying homage in ancient times explains this usage of the word: 1 Chron. xxix. 23, "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king, instead of David his father, and prospered, and all Israel obeyed him. 24. And all the princes, and the mighty men, and all the sons likewise of king David submitted themselves unto Solomon the king—Heb. gave the hand under Solomon the king." This was an expressive ceremony: they kneeled down and put their hands under his; thereby confessing that their power was subject to his; and in this manner they paid him homage. There is a curious letter extant of king Hezekiah, which further explains both the expression and the custom. He says in it to the people, 2 Chron. xxx. 8, "Be ye not stiff-necked, as your fathers were, but yield yourselves, Heb. give the hand unto the Lord," fall down before him, and ascribe all your power to the Lord; acknowledge him to have all power in heaven and earth. Thus give the honour due unto his name. Confess that all your good comes from him, and that he keeps you from all evil. Every blessing which you receive in earth, or hope for in heaven, acknowledge to be from the good pleasure of his own will, and to the praise of the glory of his free grace. Most of the Psalms were written, and should be sung, with this spirit. What David felt in his own heart at the free-will offerings of the people towards the building of the temple, the same he would excite in others, when they read or sing the Psalms. 1 Chron. xxix. 10, &c. "Wherefore David blessed the Lord before all the congregation, and David said, Blessed be thou Lord God of Israel, our Father, for ever and ever: thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine: thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all: both riches and honour come of thee, and thou reignest over all, and in thy hand is power and might, and in thy hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all: now, therefore, our God we thank thee, and praise thy glorious name." How delightfully does he here describe one great end of singing Psalms. It was to ascribe to the Lord all the glory of his word, and works, and ways—with voices and instruments, but chiefly with the music of the heart, to praise him for his goodness, and to bless him, because his mercy endureth for ever.

There is another word used, 1 Chron. xvi. 4. The Psalms were to record, and to thank, and to praise (Heb. Hellel) the Lord God of Israel. But this has been treated of in the beginning of the second chapter. It is the running title of the Psalms, and signifies the action of light in the material world, and from thence is applied to the action of the Sun of righteousness in the spiritual world. Singing psalms was not only to remind us of him, but also to lead us to ascribe to him all the blessings of nature and grace, of earth and heaven. All are from him—the gifts of his free unmerited love, and call for the tribute of constant thankfulness. He created the sun, and ordained it to dispense every earthly blessing, that it might be a lively picture of the true Light, who communicates spiritual life, with all its comforts. While the believer looks upon the most glorious Immanuel in this view, and has a warm sense of his obligations to him, how sweet is the exercise of faith! He finds the courts of the Lord to have some of the blessedness of the palace itself. Such they were to him who said, "Blessed are they that dwell in thy courts, they will be still praising thee. Selah." They will be still acknowledging their debt in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs: which is the very employment of the saints round the throne, and which is the divine ordinance to express our communion with them, and to bring us a foretaste of their happiness.

From this passage in Chronicles we see the use of the Psalms in the Old Testament, and for what end they were then sung in the church. It was to remind believers of the wonderful person and of the divine works of the incarnate Jehovah, that they might admire his matchless beauty, and adore him for his most precious love. With happy and thankful hearts they used daily to sing of him in the temple service. The concert will never be excelled upon this earth, and the effect which accompanied it, will only be equalled in heaven. The subject—the number of voices and instruments—the excellence of the music and of the performance—and the divine approbation which crowned the whole, by a miracle confirming the faith and strengthening the hopes of the congregation; these are most nobly described in 2 Chron. v. 11, 12, &c. Solomon had finished the temple, and had brought the ark of the covenant into the holy of holies: "And it came to pass, when the priests were come out of the holy place: for all the priests that were present were sanctified, and did not then wait by course: also the Levites, who were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals, and psalteries, and harps, stood at the east end of the altar, and with them an hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets: it came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord. And when they lift up their voice with the trumpets, and cymbals, and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying, For he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever; that then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord: so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God." All Israel met upon this occasion, a very great congregation, from the entering in of Hamath, unto the river of Egypt. They came to the dedication of the temple, knowing that it was a type of the body of Christ, and prefigured his coming from heaven to dwell with men on the earth. The filling the temple with glory was to teach them that a person in Jehovah was to tabernacle in the manhood of Christ. In him the fulness of the Godhead was to dwell bodily, and out of his fulness they should receive grace for grace. While they were looking forward with joyful hope, and singing the praises of this most blessed event, the Lord gave them the sensible proof, that he would come and inhabit the temple of his body, and would also come and dwell in their hearts by faith. Once in the end of the world God was manifest in the flesh, but in every age he has visited his people with his presence, and blessed them with his love, while they have been with thankful hearts ascribing to him all the glory of their salvation. When he has thus disposed them to give him the honour due unto his name, then he has brought them into a proper temper to receive the greatest communications of his grace. For the most high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity vouchsafes to dwell in the humble and contrite heart. The King of kings admits the meek and lowly to the nearest approach, yea, to the most intimate familiarity with him. The highest resides with the lowest. With them the almighty Sovereign keeps his court, according to his promise—"I will dwell with you, and will walk among you, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people." When he smiles upon them with his reconciled countenance, and excites in them holy love and humble adoration: oh what an happiness is it to behold the King in his beauty, even here by faith. The soul thus enamoured with him will find it a most delightful employment to sing his praises, and cannot help breaking out into psalms and hymns of thankfulness. These are the appointed means of testifying its sacred joy. In them the saints above have their heavenly exercise, and the saints below have often in the use of the same means a foretaste of the glory to be revealed.

When Zerubbabel and his brethren began to rebuild the temple after the captivity, the work was entered upon with singing of psalms. "And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites, the sons of Asaph, with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David king of Israel; and they sang together by course, in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord: because he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel." Ezra iii. 10, 11. The words to praise, and to give thanks, are the same as in the fore-cited place in Chronicles, and applied to the same person, even to the Desire of all nations, who was to come and fill the second temple with his glory—"The glory of this latter house shall be greater than that of the former, saith the Lord of hosts:" Hag. ii. 7, which was really accomplished, when the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us. Then the Lord came to his temple, and his disciples saw his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

Of him also sang Nehemiah, as mentioned in chap. xii. He repaired the wall of Jerusalem, and ended it with praising and giving thanks to the Lord God of Israel, singing psalms unto him with voices and instruments of music, according to the commandment of David the man of God. From these instances it is plain that the general subject of the Psalms was to ascribe to the incarnate Jehovah all the honour of saving sinners. The sweet psalmist of Israel frequently calls upon the church to sing psalms to the Saviour's praise, particularly in Psalm xcii., which was constantly sung on the sabbath, the day of praise; in Psalms xcv., xcvi., xcviii., &c. And he does this very remarkably in the hundredth Psalm, wherein he calls upon believers to join in this delightful work, and assigns several reasons for their encouragement to do it with the warmest gratitude of their hearts. The title is,

A Psalm of Confession, viz. to God for his goodness, and for the wonders which he hath done for the children of men.

1. O all the earth make the air ring with the praises of Jehovah.

2. Serve ye Jehovah with heartfelt joy: come ye into his presence with the highest praises you can give.

3. Be ye certain, that Jehovah is the very Alehim, he hath made us, and not we ourselves, we are his people, and the flock under his pastoral care:

4. Enter ye into his gates with confession, into his courts with ascribing to him the praise of giving you every thing useful, pay ye homage to him, bless ye his name:

5. For Jehovah is good, his mercy is for ever, and his faithfulness is from generation to generation.

When believers in their church service used to sing this psalm, they acknowledged in it the goodness of God to them, and had in their hearts sentiments of his loving kindness, such as these:—

1. O, all ye inhabitants of the world, who have found redemption through faith in the blood of the Lamb, join together to make his praise to be heard: sing unto Jehovah a new song, sing praises unto him lustily with a good courage:

2. Serve ye Jehovah with a free spirit, singing and making melody in your hearts unto him: come ye into his presence having now access with confidence, and let the high praises of God be in your mouth, ascribing to him all the glory of your salvation:

3. Be ye certain that Jehovah is the very Alehim, the Three in covenant to save sinners: for he has made us, and not we ourselves, we neither made ourselves creatures, nor new creatures in Christ Jesus—he gave us our being, and our well being—we have nothing of our own but sin; and he has made us his free subjects by redeeming us from the bondage of sin, yea, we are his beloved flock, and he is our good shepherd, who will give grace and glory to his people, and to the sheep of his pasture:

4. O come ye then into his gates with thankful acknowledgment of his infinite goodness to your souls; meet him in the great congregation, and join all the redeemed, who in earth and heaven are with one heart giving blessing and honour and glory and power, to God and the Lamb.

5. For Jehovah is good, and doeth good, his mercy is to be celebrated in his church militant from age to age, and his never failing faithfulness is to be your subject of never ending praise in the church triumphant.

Oh for such holy affections as this Psalm requires. Reader, art thou acquainted with the subject, and art thou indeed a partaker of that thankfulness of which it treats? Oh beg of him then to give thee a growing sense of thine utter unworthiness of the least mercy. This is gospel poverty of spirit, and this will lead thee to pray for a more thankful acknowledgment of the goodness of God, flowing from the happy experience of its blessings, and influencing the whole man to praise him for them. To this grateful temper the very reading of the Psalm will be as an ordinance, and the singing of it with the melody of the heart will be a feast.

From these authorities of the Old Testament it is plain that the subject of the Book of Psalms, and the singing them, were intended to excite in believers the warmest sentiments of gratitude. The love of God manifested in saving sinners through Jesus Christ, is herein described with the true sublime both of style and sentiment; and when any Psalm was sung, if the heart felt the subject, and made harmony there, then it became a delightful, as well as an acceptable service. But we shall see clearer evidence of this matter if we attend to

CHAPTER IV.

Some Passages in the New Testament concerning the Book of Psalms

THE quotations are very numerous. Christ and his apostles often refer to the Psalms, and make a direct application of them; for they all treat of him, as indeed the whole volume of revelation does. He is the spirit and life of all the Bible; but there is no part so particularly, and so frequently applied to him, as the Book of Psalms. We know the subject of the cxth from infallible authority —it is the heavenly government of King-mediator, who is David's son, and yet David calleth him his Lord: for he was God and man in one Christ. His own use of the Psalms is very remarkable: he sung them and quoted them. At his last passover he joined with his apostles in the Psalms commonly used upon that occasion. St. Matthew says, "when they had sung an hymn," which is supposed to be part of the grand hallelujah, begining at the cxiiith, and ending with the cxviiith Psalm. Hereby our Lord not only made use of, but also applied those divine hymns to himself, he being indeed the very paschal Lamb slain in type from the foundation of the world, and now about to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And after he had by his sufferings and death made a full atonement, and was risen from the dead, he reproved his two disciples as they were going to Emmaus, and he said unto them, (Luke xxiv. 25.) "O ye without understanding, how slow of heart are ye to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to have entered into his glory? And beginning at Moses, he expounded unto them from all the prophets, the things written of himself in all the scriptures." And among the rest he expounded unto them out of the Psalms, as his custom was: for when he appeared to his apostles to confirm them in the belief of his resurrection, he said unto them, "These are the words, which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me. Then opened he their understandings that they might understand the scriptures." Here he declares that the Psalms were written concerning himself. Not only here and there a passage, or an allusion, not only the quotations in the New Testament, but the whole volume throughout is concerning him. Upon whatever occasion the Psalmist composed any of them, yet it was only a case to speak upon, in order to intoduce what was to be said concerning the divine person, and the divine work of the Messiah. This is the spiritual use and design of the Psalms. And every man, whose understanding the Lord has opened, as he did his disciples, can see them in this light. The veil being taken away, he beholds Christ with open face, and every Psalm shows to him some lovely feature of his most lovely Saviour. Therein he reads of the divine and human nature of Immanuel, his life and death, his resurrection and ascension, his kingdom and glory. He understands the scriptures, and with the joy of his heart receives what is therein written concerning the God of his salvation.

Agreeably to our Lord's own use of the Psalms, we find the whole church of believers with one accord using them in the same manner. The instance recorded in Acts iv. is remarkable, because the reference which they made to the Psalms, indisputably proves, that they are written concerning Christ. Peter and John had been imprisoned for preaching Jesus, but being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them: and when they heard that, they lift up their voice to God with one accord, and said, "Lord, thou art God, who hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is: who, by the mouth of thy servant David, hast said, Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ: for of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." Here the whole church under the special influence of the Holy Spirit applies the second Psalm to Christ, and declares its accomplishment in him—he being of a truth the very person of whom it treats: which is decisive evidence, and must determine the point even to a demonstration with all that believe the scriptures.

It is not to be wondered, then, that the apostles should follow the same rule in explaining the Psalms. Peter quotes them and refers them to Christ. In his first sermon recorded Acts ii. he applies the xvith Psalm to the resurrection of Christ, and he brings the cxth to prove, that Christ had all power in heaven and earth, and should sit at the right hand of Jehovah, until all his enemies should be made his footstool. In the fourth chapter of the Acts, he shows that Christ was the stone set at nought by the Jewish builders, who nevertheless should be made the head of the corner, as it is in the cxviiith Psalm. Peter had no doubt concerning the application of the Psalms to Christ, and his beloved brother Paul shows he was of the same opinion.

We have an account of his manner of preaching among the Jews: "He used to reason with them out of the scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead, and that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is the Christ." And among the other scriptures he did not forget the Psalms: for we, in Acts xiii. have a whole sermon of his, an inestimable treasury of his scripture learning, in which he quotes several Psalms, and directly applies them to Christ, as he also does in his other writings. His epistle to the Hebrews abounds with references, twenty-nine at least. The third and fourth chapters are a comment on the xcvth Psalm: as the seventh chapter is on the cxth; and the tenth is on the xlth. Whoever will attend to the manner in which the apostle reasons upon these passages, will readily perceive, that he does not enter upon any formal proof of the design of the book of Psalms, or of Christ's being the subject of them. He does not aim at any such thing; but takes it for granted, and argues upon it as an established truth. Indeed it was at that time the belief of the whole church. There was, then, no doubt but all scripture treated of him—"to him give ALL the prophets witness"—he was their one subject. But more especially in the Psalms he was set forth, and was to be highly exalted, with all the powers of poetry, and with the sweetest sounds of instruments and voices. These hymns were inspired to celebrate his matchless fame and renown; that whenever believers felt themselves happy in the knowledge and love of Jesus, here they might find proper matter and suitable words to raise their gratitude, as high as it can be on this side of heaven We have also the apostle's practice and experience to recommend his use of the Psalms. He sung them with delight, as well as quoted them with propriety. His love to Jesus ran as high as love ever will upon earth. He speaks of him continually as the perfect delight of his soul, on whom he had placed all his affections, and whom he found every day worthy of more love than his narrow heart could contain. Oh how precious was his Saviour, when he could say—"What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ: yea doubtless, and I do count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and I do count them but dung, that I may win Christ." Happy Paul! what must he have seen in Jesus, who could count it an honour to suffer shame for his name, and an infinite gain to win Christ, though with the loss of all things? Oh happy, thrice happy man, who could carry the cross of Christ, and esteem it as his crown. God forbid, says he, that I should glory in any thing, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ: for I count not my life dear to myself, so as I may but live and die fulfilling his will. And this was not a flight of fancy, or a mere rant of enthusiasm, but it was cool sober love, and arose from real experience of the preciousness of Jesus to his heart. This heavenly lover was the subject of his songs in the worst house of his painful pilgrimage. He was so truly in body, and soul, and spirit, devoted to his Jesus, that how much soever he suffered, yet he could rejoice in the Lord. Oh what a proof did he give of it!—sufficient to shame our highest professions of attachment to the dear Redeemer. When he had been beaten with many and cruel stripes, put into a dismal dungeon, and even there, with his feet in the stocks, his heart was then full of gratitude, and in tune to make delightful melody unto the Lord, yea, brake out into Psalms of praise—"At midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God" with a loud voice; for the prisoners heard them. Oh for more faith in Jesus to fill us more with this thankful and praising spirit. Lord, pour it out abundantly for thy mercies' sake upon all those, who believe in thy holy name: let us make our boast of thee all the day long, and praise thy name for ever.

From these instances it is evident, that the New Testament church understood the Psalms in the same light as the Old. Believers always sung them with the same view, with hearts and voices making melody unto the Lord Christ. He himself confirmed this use of them: for he joined in this part of religious worship. The apostles quoted the Psalms, and directly applied them to their blessed Lord. Yea, when the church met together in one place, the Psalms were not only read and sung, but some abuses in singing them are corrected, which will lead me to consider,

CHAPTER V.

Rules laid down in Scripture for singing them aright.

SINGING of Psalms is a divine ordinance, and has an inward and an outward service. The inward consists in the proper frame and affection of the renewed and spiritual mind; for no man can use the Psalms as an ordinance of God, who has not received the Spirit of God: without him we can do nothing, being dead in trespasses and sins. And after he is received, he is the continual breath of spiritual life, yea, as much as the air we breathe is of natural life. Every spiritual sensation of peace, comfort, and joy in God the Father, is from the divine agency of the Lord the Spirit. Every act of religious worship is performed acceptably by his strengthening us mightily in the inner man, and giving us the will and the power. If we pray aright, it is in the Holy Ghost. If we hear aright, it is by his blessing on the word preached. If we sing aright, it is by the same Spirit: and therefore we are not only commanded to seek his assistance in all we do, but also a growing and increasing measure of his graces and gifts. Thus the apostle directs the Ephesians in their singing of Psalms, "Be ye filled with the Spirit, speaking to yourselves in Psalms," &c. This is not meant of receiving him at first; for it is spoken to believers, who had the Spirit, but it relates to their thirsting after more, how much soever they had attained, still more of the Spirit's fulness, it being in him infinite, and always in us finite. We never have so much, but we may have more; and when we have the most, our thirst is then the greatest. This is an holy thirst, to which there is a divine invitation—"Ho, every one that thirsteth, come to the waters of life." And a divine promise—"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, if any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; but this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive." And when this promise is fulfilled, and the Holy Spirit is received, we are still in faith to use means for the increasing of his graces and gifts; among which means the apostle recommends—"Speaking to yourselves in Psalms," &c. He supposes their singing would tend to their mutual edification: for the words are in the plural number, and denote their joining together in this holy exercise. He also commands the Colossians to instruct and to admonish one another in Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, herein using the grace given both for its exercise, and also for its improvement. And this true manner of singing comes from the Spirit, and increases the fruits of the Spirit.

It comes from the Spirit; because none can perform it, but the new creature in Christ Jesus. It is a spiritual service, in which only the spiritual man can join. No one can make any melody acceptable to God, who has not been first a partaker of the Holy Ghost. He is the Lord and Giver of life; without whom all men are dead in trespasses and sins. He only can quicken and make the soul alive to God. It requires his almighty power, and it belongs to his covenant office. And when he, the Spirit of life, makes any one free from the law of sin and death, then he is a child of God. He is made to know it, and to believe it: for he has received the spirit of adoption, whereby he cries Abba, Father. In the sense of this love shed abroad in his heart by the Holy Ghost, he begins to rejoice in God, as his God. Trusting to what Jesus is to him, that he has satisfied for his sins, has wrought out his righteousness, and is now standing in the presence of God for him, he sees himself accepted in the Beloved, an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ. Hereby his heart becomes reconciled to God, and he finds the truth of what is written—"We love him, because he first loved us." Now he has David's affection, and he can join heartily in singing with him—"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases: who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies."

Thus the right singing the praises of God comes from the Spirit, and it also increases the fruits of the Spirit. It is one of the appointed means of improving them. True grace is always operative, and grows by the fruit which it bears. If the believer be rejoicing, singing will add to his joy, as it is written, "Is any in a happy frame? Let him sing Psalms;" and that will make him happier. It is the divine promise, and cannot fail: he shall increase his joy in the Lord. Is any afflicted? Psalms will refresh and comfort him: Paul and Silas sore whipped, and put into the stocks, sung a psalm at midnight. The fulness of the Spirit in the sweet singer of Israel, went out much this way. He sang most, and praised best, of all the saints of God. He sang in all frames, and upon all occasions: let us follow his example, and be speaking much and often to one another, in Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, seeking thereby to be filled with a growing measure of the Holy Spirit.

If thou enquirest, How shall I obtain this inestimable blessing? The command is—"ask, and it shall be given you, seek, and ye shall find"—whoever is made sensible he stands in need of the assistance of the Holy Spirit is only required to ask, and the promise is—"Every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth: if a son shall ask bread of any of you that is a father, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he for a fish give him a serpent? or if he ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" How gracious are these words! How encouraging are they to every one who has any concern about his salvation, to desire the Holy Spirit may be given to him, to enable him to trust in Jesus, and to find the Father's love in him: and they leave every man without excuse, who lives and dies without those blessings, which God has promised to give to every one that asketh.

Whoever is a partaker of the Spirit, has a new nature in Christ Jesus, and has a new understanding given him, whereby he is enabled to discern and to judge of spiritual things: for thus runs the promise—"He shall lead you into all truth." And the apostle prays for the fulfilling of it to the Ephesians—"May the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him, that the eyes of your understanding may be enlightened." The Holy Spirit acts upon men as rational creatures. He does not treat them as if they were stones or brutes; but he makes the truths of the gospel clear to the mind, and desirable to the will. He opens the eyes of the understanding to see the object, and then presents it in its glorious beauty and attracting loveliness. The renewed mind beholds, admires, and loves it; and then, animated with this love, can sing its praises. Holy men of God in the Old Testament sung with knowledge. Ignorance was not the mother of their Psalmody. They were well acquainted with what they sung. The royal prophet says, he employed his understanding in this devout exercise, as well as his harp and his voice. Hear him, how earnestly he calls upon others to extol his beloved Jesus—"Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises unto our King, sing praises: for God is the King of all the earth, sing ye praises with understanding." He would have them to mind what they were about, and to understand what they sung; lest they should utter lies unto the Lord, or offer to him a sacrifice without a heart. Consider whom you have to deal with—how great and good a God—observe how you praise him: engage all your mental powers in this delightful work, that it may be holy, acceptable to God, and a reasonable service.

The apostle agrees in sentiment with the Psalmist: for thus he speaks to the Corinthians: "If I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful: what is it, then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." Singing is unfruitful, unless the understanding go with it. Unless the mind be profited and God be honoured, it is only empty sound. But when we sing by the Spirit, then he will teach us to sing with the understanding also. He will open the subject to us, will give a fixed attention to it, will bring the mind into tune, and will keep us looking at the sense more than at the sound.

Is it so with thee, O my soul? Enquire carefully. Art thou led by the Spirit in thy singing? Does he enlighten thy mind, and guide thee into the knowledge of the subject in which thou art engaged? Take heed, and be often examining thyself—how thy mind is affected—lest thou shouldest present unto the Lord the song of fools.

But chiefly keep thy heart diligently: because out of it are the issues of life. The man is what his heart is. If this be dead to God, nothing in him is alive: if this be right with God, all will be right. If he has a clean heart, and a right spirit renewed within him, the Holy Ghost has made him a new creature in Christ Jesus, and has won the will and the affections over to God. This is his principal office in the conversion of sinners. He therefore discovers truth to the understanding, in order that it may become desirable, and that the heart may be properly influenced by it. The heart is the commanding faculty. When this has once tasted the sweetness of the Father's love in Jesus, it will engage the whole man to seek for more. Love is very active, and will do or suffer much to obtain and to preserve the beloved object. Set this spring agoing, it will move all the wheels. The hands will work for God. The feet will run the way of his commandments. Love will make heavy burdens not grievous to be borne: love will carry them a long time, and faint not. Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love which he had unto her. The labour of love is always delightful. When we know God to be our Father in Jesus, and have his love shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, then his service becomes perfect freedom: then duty is ennobled into privilege; then obedience becomes willing and filial: the beloved child finds free access to the Father's throne, and receives blessed communications of his grace: for which his thankful heart offers the sacrifice of praise, and it comes up with a sweet savour acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. This is the melody of the heart. While it feels its infinite debt to free grace, is deeply convinced of its utter unworthiness, and is kept humble by the abiding sense of its imperfections, and of its indwelling corruptions, it is in a right frame to exalt the exceeding riches of divine mercy. Then it is disposed to give God all his glory. This he requires as his due, and it becometh well the righteous to pay it. When the heart is made willing to ascribe every good to his holy name, then it is right with God. All within is now in tune to join every golden harp, and every joyful tongue in heaven, which are ascribing blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, to him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever.

This is the chief requisite in singing Psalms. The heart makes the best music. The finest compositions, ever so well executed with instruments and voices, are not a divine concert, unless the heart accompany them. David knew this well, and therefore he set his affections to the highest pitch of praise, and he brought all of them to join. His whole heart entered into the performance, and rendered the concert full—"I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart, and I will glorify thy name for evermore: for great is thy mercy towards me." Thy special covenant mercy is such towards me, that my very thoughts cannot rise up to its greatness: how then can I utter forth all its praise? I cannot; no, not even half of it. But though the debt be so great, that I cannot count it up, yet I will the more extol thee for it from day to day: I would engage my affections, and give them all up to this heavenly employment. I would have my whole soul in it. And yet the debt remains, rather increases. Oh for a more enlarged heart! My praises continued are only acknowledgments, and I want them continued with growing humility—more in earth and more in heaven. There I shall praise better, when my heart will have nothing in it, but humble gratitude. Yet here I will not give over; but will carry on my joyful song, till I can sing in a higher strain. "Praise the Lord, O my soul, and all within me bless his holy name: O give thanks unto him for he is good, and his mercy endureth for ever. Hallelujah."

The apostle Paul had his portion in the same mercy, and had the same grateful sense of it: he sang the Psalms of David with the spirit of David. What he practised himself he has recommended to others. He has given us some rules about singing in the congregation, and he chiefly confines them to the heart accompanying the voice. Thus he directs the Ephesians—"Be not drunk with wine wherein is excess, but be ye filled with the Spirit, speaking to yourselves in Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, singing and making melody in your hearts unto the Lord, giving thanks alway for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." He would not have them meet together, as they formerly had done, to feast without fear, and to drink unto drunkenness, inciting one another to greater riot and excess by wanton and profane songs: which was the custom at most of the heathen banquets. They used to try to fill one another with wickedness. But ye have not so learned Christ. Seek ye to be filled with his Spirit, and use the means appointed for that purpose: among which, singing of Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, is one of the chief. These several names are expressive of the different subjects treated of in the sacred poetry; hymns are in praise of Immanuel, spiritual songs are in praise of his spiritual kingdom, according to the sense of the words in the Hebrew, and according to the translation of them in the Septuagint, as was before shown. The manner of singing them, it is here said, was by joining together with their voices, but especially with their hearts. From thence comes the best melody. Harmony in sound is pleasant in our ears, but harmony in affection is the music which enters into the ears of the Lord of hosts. "My son, give me thy heart;" he will have no service without it. Prayer, obedience, praise, every offering must come from the heart. He looks at this, and this in all, and above all. This he accepts, and testifies his delight in: for it is the same sacrifice of praise, which will for ever delight him. The church triumphant has begun the song, which will be perfectly and for ever pleasing to the Lord; and when we meet below with one faith to glorify our one Lord, then we enjoy the communion of saints. We have one heart with them—join in the same subject of praise to their Lord and our Lord—our harmony is theirs—our happiness is theirs—it is one and the same communion with the Father and the Son by the Spirit. And though we cannot raise our song to so high a pitch, or continue it without ceasing, as the saints above do; yet we entirely agree with them, and are trying to make better music in our hearts every day, until we see their Jesus and our Jesus face to face. He loves us, as well as them: for he is our Immanuel: and our souls rejoice in him together with them. We love him, we serve him, we bless him, as humbly, and as thankfully, as we can; yea in all things we would be giving of thanks to his holy name. Oh for more love, more thankfulness, more devotedness to our precious Lord Jesus Christ. This is our daily prayer, and our constant pursuit. Blessed and eternal Spirit, purify our hearts by faith, and increase in them a sense of his wondrous love to us, that we may be growing in love to him, until he vouchsafe to admit us into his presence, and give us to thank him with never-ceasing songs of praise.

In another place the apostle treats of the same subject, only varies the expression a little. He recommends singing of Psalms to the Colossians, as an ordinance of God for increasing the graces of his people—"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in Psalms, and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord: and whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him." The Colossians had put on the new man, and the apostle exhorts them to put on the ornaments and endowments peculiar to their new nature, and he mentions several of them: in which he would have them to be growing daily: and he proposes to them the word of God, as the best means for this purpose. He would have it treasured up in their hearts, and inwardly digested—"dwelling richly in them in all wisdom" for knowledge and practice. He includes both: because this wisdom was for edification—they were to teach and to admonish one another. What each had learnt out of the scriptures was to be of public benefit to the church. And the way of doing this is particularly mentioned—they were to sing together with grace in their hearts. All is discord within, until we are taught by grace, free effectual grace. But when we believe the doctrines of grace, then harmony comes in, and we learn to ascribe every good to the mere mercy of God. We receive his blessings, and he receives all the praise of them. Then grace is in the heart: it is there not only to reconcile the sinner to the way of salvation by faith alone, but also to make him in love with it, and to keep him willing to praise God for it with his lips and life. Oh how good a thing is it, that the heart be thus established with grace! for then the affections will be fixed upon the right object, and the whole soul will be in harmony with the truth as it is in Jesus. Free grace doctrines felt in their power in the heart make heavenly melody. Every faculty is in tune, and inclined to bear its part in blessing the name of the Lord. The understanding sees it right, the will chooses, the heart loves to give him all the praise, and the mouth joins to glorify him with joyful lips, singing unto the Lord—the God-man—Immanuel is the subject of this happy song. He is the God of all grace. It is a joyful and pleasant thing to be thanking him for it: yea, it is a foretaste of the saints' fulness of joy. The truly humble believer, seeing the exceeding riches of grace, gladly joins his elder brethren round the throne in praising the Lord Jesus Christ. And when the temple of God shall be complete, and the last believer joined to the spiritual building, then the top-stone shall be brought forth with shouting—grace—grace unto it—glory be to free grace for ever and ever.

To the same purpose the apostle James, ch. v. 13, teaching believers how to behave in every state, directs them, "Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray. Is any merry? Let him sing Psalms." Affliction should send him to prayer, for grace to bear it and to improve it: joy to singing of Psalms, to express thankfulness to God. Is any merry? that is a proper season, though not the only season. Prayer is necessary at all times, though it be most needful in affliction: and so singing; it is not only needful when we are rejoicing, in order that our joy may centre in the Lord, but sometimes singing will beget spiritual joy, and will awaken it in the afflicted heart. Paul and Silas were in great outward distress, yet they sang a psalm in prison. The apostles sang an Hymn after the sacrament, although they knew their Lord was going to suffer, and they were greatly troubled. In that sorrowful hour they sang. Singing is always seasonable, but especially when the heart is happy. "Is any among you merry? Let him sing Psalms." Is he in a good frame of mind, rejoicing in the bounty of God, either for temporal or spiritual mercies? Let him sing Psalms to the praise and glory of his benefactor: this is a proper expression of gratitude for favours received, and will be the means of securing them: for since his happiness comes from a good God, and arises from communion with God in Christ, it is fit and meet that he should ascribe it to the right object, and in a way of God's own appointing. A divine Hymn upon the subject of praise (of which there are many) sung with heart-felt thankfulness, is a grateful service. The Lord requires such an acknowledgment, and it becometh well the just to be thankful—yea he has vouchsafed to reveal the very words, in which he requires it to be paid him; and when all within us blesses his holy name, rejoicing in the Lord, he would have the outward man to join, and to declare with the melody of his lips, how happy he is in his heart. Thus in singing the praises of our God we shall find fresh reason to praise him. He will certainly meet us in his own means, and bless us in his own ways. We shall not wait upon him in vain. The means of his appointing cannot fail of answering the end. He has promised to put honour upon his own appointments, and his word cannot be broken. The joyful Christian is commanded to sing the praises of his God, and his heart shall be thereby kept in holy joy, yea, it shall be increased. His joy shall abound: and when believers sing, as they are commanded, with one another, it shall tend to their mutual edification. It shall stir them up to greater thankfulness, and excite warmer affection to the God of their salvation. Singing psalms is a church ordinance, and as such it is blessed. The Lord will not forsake the assembly of his saints. When they are met together to praise him, he will be in the midst of them, and will manifest his acceptance, both of their persons and services. This will make their attendance upon him delightful. When he lifts up the light of his countenance upon them, how can they help singing what they feel? Now they experience he has bought them with his blood, and saved them from hell, has wrought out their righteousness, and will give them his heaven, it becometh them well to praise him, and to rejoice in his holy name. He has made them blessed at present, and they shall be blessed for evermore. Their blessedness comes from a never-failing spring. They are the one true church, of which it is said—"Joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody." Singing is their heaven in the church triumphant. They have the fulness of joy from God and the Lamb, and they acknowledge it with humble adoration, and a grateful song of never-ending praise. The innumerable company of the redeemed will find their heaven of heavens in enjoying communion with the holy Trinity, and in singing the glories of that mercy which is from everlasting to everlasting.

In this passage the apostle James supposes that joy and singing agree well together. So they do. They depend on one another as the cause and the effect. The melody of the heart breaks out, and expresses itself with the melody of the mouth. A heart made sensible of God's love in Christ has the greatest reason to rejoice, and will be ready to show it in every way of God's appointment, particularly in singing the praises of his wondrous love. Does the prophet, happy in his soul, declare, "My mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips"—true Christians can gladly join him. They have returned to God in faith, and have found redemption through the blood of the Lamb. They know in whom they have believed, and are satisfied of the Father's love to them in his dear Son. Now they can delight in God. It is their privilege to rejoice in him as their God: yea it is their bounden duty; he calls upon them to express their sense of his goodness in songs of praise. This joy in God is one of the chief ingredients in psalm singing. The heart cannot make pleasant melody, unless joy be there: for the Lord God has an unalienable right to the service of the whole man, but we never acknowledge it, until we become his children through faith in Christ Jesus; in whom we have free access unto the Father. Then, persuaded of his precious love to us, we love him again, and in thankfulness give up ourselves, with all we have and are, to his service and glory. From hence arises our joy in God, and every expression of it; which were required of all men by the holy law, but are only fulfilled by those who have the faith of the gospel. An unpardoned sinner cannot possibly rejoice in God: because this holy joy is the fruit of the Spirit, and is the consequence of believing. Thus David—"The Lord is my strength and my shield, my heart trusted in him, and I am helped, therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and with my song will I praise him." What the prophet had experienced himself, the same he wishes for others—"Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice, let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee." And when a company of these happy people meet together it is the delight of their hearts to join in praises to their God and Saviour. "O come let us sing unto the Lord: let us make a cheerful noise to the Rock of our salvation: let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with Psalms." With these words we always begin the reading of the scriptures in our church service. And what could be more suitable? How proper is it in a congregation of believers to call upon one another to join in the praises of the common Saviour, that we may strengthen our mutual joy in him. All true joy comes from him, and every acknowledgement of it, inward and outward, is therefore required, in order to preserve and to increase our rejoicing in the Lord Jesus Christ. He deserves all our joy—the loveliness of Immanuel—his love to us—the blessings of his love—how many—how great—how lasting! these should encourage us to be glad in him now with great joy. But the well-grounded prospect, which hope has, of finding in him infinite and everlasting blessings, should lead us to rejoice in him with joy unspeakable and full of glory. This prospect has brightened the darkest day; it has enabled sufferers greatly to rejoice, when in heaviness through manifold temptations: it has supported them under every fiery trial. Nothing could extinguish the joy. It has lived, and triumphed in the martyr's breast, even in the agonies of the most painful death. Faith reads, and with hope looks out for (and it is a hope that will never be ashamed) the accomplishment of this faithful promise—"The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Dost thou find, O my soul, any of this holy joy? Canst thou sing Psalms with the understanding, with the heart, and with gladness in thy heart, rejoicing in the Lord? Canst thou give thanks always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ? This is the privilege of every true believer. Being saved from sin and hell, made an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ, he has an interest in all things: for they are all working together, under God, for his present and eternal good. While he lives by faith, he knows it, and has the comfort of it. His heart is kept in tune, and whatever befals him, he has reason to rejoice in the Lord his God.

Thus the Lord would have his people to rejoice in him always. It is not only true in theory, that they may, but it is also true in practice, if the outward walk be in concord with the doctrine of the Psalms. This is another essential part of psalm singing. The believer should live as he sings. His life should be it, harmony with his principles. If he sees the truth as it is in Jesus, and loves in and rejoices in it, the effect of all this will certainly be outward and visible. The inward melody will be expressed in his tempers and behaviour. There will be a consistency throughout. As he lives, so he will walk, by the faith of the Son of God. Practice and principle will sweetly accord. The same sound that comes from his lips, comes also from his heart, and his whole life will be in unison. His actions sing, his tempers are in harmony, his behaviour makes up the chorus abroad and at home, the music of his heart and life gives one certain note—Jesus is mine all—I live in him—on him—to him—I would have all within me to praise him, and all without me to show forth his praises—blessings on him for ever and ever. Amen.

If a man's life be not thus consistent with his singing, he mocks God, he deceives his neighbour, and he gives the lie to his own words. Actions are surer evidences than sounds: for they discover the settled and the last purpose of the mind. They show not only what a man talks of, but what he is determined to live by. The true character cannot be known, but from them. God only sees the heart. We know what is in it, by what comes out of it. We judge of the fountain from the stream. If the words and works be evil, so is the heart: for out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, &c. these are clear facts to judge by. If such a man was to sing with a voice like an angel, it is a voice and nothing more. His actions prove it to be mere air and empty sound: yea, they demonstrate, that his heart is in perfect discord with God. He says one thing, and does the contrary. He seems to praise God, as if he was happy in his love; but he cleaves to the world, and seeks his happiness in it. He sings—"Whom have I in heaven but thee?" yet shows his supreme joy is in the earth. How can any thing that such a man sings be an acceptable service, while his heart and life are in direct opposition to the holy will of God. A Jew can sing, a Turk can join in concert with him, an infidel may play well upon an instrument; a company of Jews, Turks, and infidels, may perform the finest piece of music, and with the most harmonious sounds. They may go through the oratorio of the Messiah without one discord. But here is no melody to the Lord. They have no design to show forth the praises of Immanuel: and what is not done in faith, and to his glory, is sin. Their music is as hateful to him as any of their other vices: for self is the burden of their song. They sing to please themselves, and to please God is not in all their thoughts Oh consider this ye that come to church, and join in singing the Psalms! Is it with you an ordinance of God? Do you look upon it as such, and find it such? Does your understanding go with the Psalm, and your heart enter into it? Is it the joy of your heart? Do you sing rejoicing in God? And do you find him your one supreme blessedness all the day long? So that your life is a continued song of praise, and every action of it being subject to his holy will, preserves the harmony, and keeps up the heavenly joy. Is it thus, indeed; who is like unto you, O people saved by the Lord? May nothing cause discord between you any more: but may increasing faith witness with growing comfort that you are one with God, and he is one with you. Look to Jesus. Let your eyes be fixed upon him, expecting all out of his fulness. Keep close to him. Thus you shall go on your way rejoicing; and soon you shall see him face to face, and your joy shall be full.

If all these things be put together, then we learn that singing Psalms is an ordinance of God, and one of the means of grace, instituted for the exercise and for the improvement of grace. It is commanded with a promise, and the promise is made good to this very day, as thousands of living witnesses can testify. When they have met together, understanding the subject of the Psalm, and singing it with melody in their hearts, then the Lord has accepted their praises, and increased their joy in him. They have found their affections drawn nearer to him, and he has warmed them with a sweet sense of his love. And this has not been a transient visit. It did not cease when they had done singing; but the harmony was preserved in a well-ordered walk, directed by the faith of the Son of God. They lived their songs. Peace and love dwelt in their hearts, and their joy abounded in the Lord.

But where is this sort of singing, in what place, or among what people? Who are they that find those heavenly affections exercised in it, and those happy effects from it? It is much to be lamented, that all singing of Psalms at present is not upon the right plan, and does not answer the end of its institution. I speak not of the contempt with which it is treated by the age, or of the neglect of it by many professors, but of the prevailing abuses of it among them who would be thought altogether Christians.

CHAPTER VI.

These Abuses I would particularly mention, and humbly propose a Remedy for each of them.

Some of these may seem not worthy of notice, they are such small matters: but I think there is nothing little in divine worship. The majesty of God ennobles and exalts every part of it. He has commanded us to sing Psalms, and whatever he has been pleased to command, has his authority to enforce it: and whatever he has engaged to bless, has his promise to make it the means of blessing. In keeping of it there is at present great reward. His presence will be in it, when it is rightly performed, and he will render it effectual. He will hear, he will accept, he will witness his acceptance of the praises of his people: therefore everything relating to them should be done decently and in order. We should always sing with a reverence becoming the greatness and goodness of our God, in such a manner as may best express our happiness in his love, and as may tend most to mutual edification.

If these things be considered, it will not be thought an indifferent matter, whether the Psalms be sung at all, or how they be sung—whether with, or without any heart devotion,—whether with, or without any melody of the voice—whether every believer in the congregation should sing or no—whether singing should be a trial of skill, who can bawl loudest—whether the posture should not be expressive as well as the voice—whether suitable portions of the Psalms should be chosen, or the person who gives them out should be left to choose them, often without any judgment—whether grace should be exercised in singing, or not—whether we should sing in order to increase grace, or not—whether we should sing for amusement, or for the glory of God. It is not a trifling matter how you determine those points: they enter deep into an important part of religious worship, yea, into a very high act of it, one in which we pay the noblest service we can upon earth, and indeed the nearest we can come to the service of saints and angels. How then can it be an indifferent thing, whether a believer sings Psalms or not, or whether or no he sings them with melody in his heart unto the Lord? Certainly, if he would please God in singing, he should attend to the scripture rules before laid down for directing his conduct, which compared with the analogy of faith, will regulate everything relating to the divine ordinance of Psalm singing.

One great abuse is the general ignorance of the subject of the book of Psalms. No portion of God's word is less known: many in our congregation very seldom understand what they are singing. They have not Christ in their eye, nor his glory in their view; although the design of all those hymns is to describe the love of God to sinners in Christ Jesus. They all treat of him in some view or other: for there are many extensive, and all very glorious views, in which his person, offices, works, and ways, may be considered. Some treat of his high praises as God-man, describing his person, as the infinite treasury of grace and glory. Some celebrate the matchless deeds of his life, as the Lord our Righteousness, and the complete atonement made for sin by the sacrifice of himself. Others, in language and sentiments truly sublime, sing the endless victories of his resurrection, and the prevailing efficacy of his intercession. Several of them treat of his most blessed government, when he sets up his throne in the hearts of his willing people, and saves them from sin, and death, and every enemy: while others foretel the great day of the Lord, when he will come to judge all flesh, will take his redeemed home, and the whole heaven shall be filled with his glory. Besides, the Psalms treat of this wonderful person, not only from the beginning of time, but also from the ages of eternity: they discover the undertakings of his love before all worlds in the covenant of the Trinity—his fulfilling the covenant engagements in time—and his bestowing covenant blessings from henceforth and for ever. What an extensive view do they give us of the loving kindness of Immanuel, reaching from everlasting to everlasting! And in all these respects the Psalms are of inestimable value with believers: for their use the Holy Spirit has recorded them; and herein they learn what sentiments they are to form of God the Saviour, with what gratitude they should speak of him, and with what holy joy they should sing the triumphs of redeeming love. The Psalms were fitted for this purpose by infinite wisdom: for holy men of God spake them as they were moved by the Holy Ghost: and they are blessed for this purpose, when, with the apostle, any one can say, "I will sing with the Spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also."

In order to remedy this great evil, I have prefixed the subject of every Psalm in this collection, that the congregation might have a key to the true sense, and each might know, what particular grace was to be exercised in singing it. This will help somewhat to keep up harmony in the understanding. But it will not be without some discord, until the subject treated of in the book of Psalms be made very plain, and their application to Jesus Christ be well settled. For this end I have finished some years ago a translation of the Psalms, with a treatise upon the use and design: it was computed to make two large volumes in octavo, entitled, "An Essay towards a new Translation of the Bible." In which I have been engaged, as opportunity has offered, above thirty years; but I should have published nothing more of it in my lifetime than this essay, in which the translation of the book of Psalms would have been given as a specimen of the work. It has laid me by so long, that I am not very sanguine about the publication. Yet if this little tract should be favourably received, and God should be pleased to make it useful; if some providence should afford me leisure to revise my papers, of which I have no prospect at present, and if they should then appear to me likely to promote the honour of God, and the good of his church, I should think it my duty to let my light shine before men. Yet in this, and in every thing else, I do earnestly pray, Not my will, Lord, but thine be done.

Another very great abuse arises from not treating Psalm singing as becometh a divine ordinance. There should be great respect paid to what God has appointed, and in the use of which he has promised to meet and to bless his people. We commonly call those the means of grace, to which grace is promised, and by which grace is received, and through which it is increased in the heart. Singing of Psalms is undoubtedly one of those means, but it is amongst us very much neglected, and when used, it is done in so irreverent a manner, that the end of its institution is not attained. God, as has been already proved, has enjoined and enforced it by repeated commands. He has also assigned the reason of them, namely, that whenever we find ourselves happy in him, he would have our joy to flow out this way. And what more proper and significant? singing is only expressing outwardly the melody of the heart: and God has required it of us as a just service of praise. He has furnished us both with matter and words. He has given us a divine collection of most perfect Hymns. And when we use them in humble faith, God will render them the means of exciting, of preserving, and of increasing our holy joy: for the promise is—"The meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord, and the poor among men shall rejoice in the holy one of Israel."

This promise has been made good in all ages. The blessing has come in the use of means. The church of Christ in praising him has found fresh reason to praise him. While its happy members have been singing together, he has vouchsafed to them his gracious presence, and has given them sweet communications of his heavenly love. They have sung till their hearts burnt within them, inflamed with a sense of his goodness. Then they had delightful experience of the Psalmist's words—"Praise ye the Lord; for it is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High: for it is pleasant, and praise is comely."

Reader, dost thou find it so? Is it a pleasure to thee to sing Psalms? Dost thou sing them as an ordinance? Dost thou in faith expect a blessing upon thy singing? And is it indeed to thee the means of grace? If it be, use them more, and thou wilt find an increasing blessing; if it be not, consider well what has been said—repent of thine abuse of this precious ordinance—and pray for grace to observe it to the honour of God, to the edification of others, and to the profit of thine own soul: the Lord give thee a right understanding in this matter.

The neglect of it as an ordinance has led many people entirely to neglect it. I have scarce ever seen a congregation, in which every one joined in singing. This is a very great abuse, because it is defeating the end of God's institution. He commanded Psalms to be sung for mutual edification. It was to be the service of the whole church. All were to join; whereas among us it is performed by some few, and they are sometimes set by themselves in a singing gallery, or in a corner of the church, where they sing to be admired for their fine voices, and others hear them for their entertainment. This is a vile prostitution of church music, and contrary to the letter and spirit both of the Old Testament and also of the New.

The first sacred hymn upon record was sung by Moses and the children of Israel, in which Miriam and all the women joined, and sang the chorus. The second hymn mentioned is said to be sung by the people of Israel without any distinction. When the ark was brought up to the city of David, he and all Israel played before God with all their might, and with singing: most likely they sang the lxviiith Psalm, accompanied with harps, and psalteries, and with timbrels, and with cymbals, and with trumpets. David frequently speaks of singing Psalms, as an ordinance in which every one should bear his part, that God might be glorified, and all might be edified. "Make a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands; sing forth the honour of his name, make his praise glorious. All the earth shall worship thee, and shall sing unto thee; they shall sing unto thy name. Oh let the nations be glad, and sing for joy; sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth: O sing praises unto the Lord." The sweet singer of Israel chooses this for his subject—"All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee;" and he pursues it through the cxlviiith Psalm. He begins with hallelujah, and intending to have a full chorus to join him in ascribing all glory to God in the highest, he calls upon the holy angels and the heavenly hosts to assist; then he addresses himself to the active powers in nature, which praise God by doing his will and obeying his decree; afterwards he calls upon the earth with every thing in it and on it, animate and inanimate; for these fulfil his commandments, and keep his laws, and so praise him: at last he comes to mankind, and requires high and low, kings and all people, princes and all judges of the earth, both young men and maidens, old men and children, to join with him in praising the name of the Lord; for his name alone is excellent, his glory is above the earth and heaven; he also exalteth the power of the people, the praise of all his saints, even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him, Hallelujah.

This was the state of the case in the Old Testament. We know from profane history, that the first Christians, in all their meetings, used to sing the praises of Jesus their God. They would not sit down to meat, or rise up, without a Psalm. Jerome says, you might have heard the ploughman and reapers in the fields singing Psalms: yea, several of them could repeat the whole book in Hebrew. Church history relates many particulars upon this subject. But the divine record is decisive. It contains directions how to sing in the congregation: they were to speak, not inwardly, but to themselves, one to another, that they might be heard, and the Psalms which they sung might tend to each other's benefit. In another place the apostle commands believers to teach and admonish one another in Psalms and Hymns, recommending such singing as would edify the congregation.

Consider those authorities, ye that have slighted this ordinance. Has it been the uniform practice of the church of God in all ages to join in singing his praises? Was it by his express command? Has he given us a collection of hymns, the very words which we are to sing? Has he promised to accept our thanks and praises, and while believers have been offering them with graceful hearts, has he constantly made them the means of increasing their joy in the Lord? Was it for the benefit of others, that the church might receive edifying, and that each might bear his part by stirring up and exciting thankfulness in one another? Oh do not then neglect such a blessed ordinance: but rather pray the Lord to enable you to rejoice with them that rejoice, to sing with them that sing. Have you not mercies to ask—why then will you not join the church in asking? Have you not mercies out of number to thank God for—why then will you not take your part in praising him for his goodness? Why will you rob yourself of the pleasure of doing it? Why will you not profit your neighbour? And why will you not give God the glory due unto his holy name? Be assured it becometh you well to be thankful at all times and in all places, especially in the great congregation. May you have your share in the service, and your share in the blessing promised to it!

If you are convinced it is part of the public worship of God, in which you are required to join, as much as in the prayers, or in hearing the word, then take heed you join properly. You may sing, and yet greatly abuse this holy ordinance. There are many singers in the church, who take no pains either to keep the time or to follow the tune, and who thereby show they think it of no consequence how the praises of the most high God are sung. Solomon differed much from them. He thought it a great perfection in praising God, that among the many thousands of voices and instruments, which were sounding forth his praise at one time, there was not a single discord to be heard. The scripture has taken notice of it. "They all gave one sound." Why should not we do the same? Nay, is it not the practice of the people of the world? Will they suffer discords in any of their concerts? A public performer would only rise in repute with them, as he plays or sings well. Christian, consider this. Shall they, for their mere amusement, study to have their music free from every thing offensive to the ear; and shall not we be equally careful? More especially as we sing to the honour of God and to the edifying of the brethren. We have a most noble subject—divine matter—divine words: we sing of one Lord with one faith. Oh for harmony in some measure suitable! it is much to be wished. I hope it will be attained. Let me earnestly recommend it to every one to sing, and to all who do sing, to learn to sing well; and, till you do, endeavour to avoid another matter of offence.

There are many in our congregations, who seem to think they sing best, when they sing loudest. You may see them often strain themselves with shouting till their faces are as red as scarlet. The worst singers commonly offend this way. A bad coarse voice quite out of tune is to be heard above all, and will take the lead in the congregation; and whenever a number of such meet together in their shouting humour, they put all into confusion. They disorder those, who would sing with feeling and affection. They drown the musical voices of good singers. They offend the outward people. And they do no good to themselves; so they entirely defeat the end of singing. If these lines should fall into the hands of any, who are sensible they have offended in this way, I would beg of them to reform this abuse. Examine your motive. Why would you be uppermost in the congregation? Is your voice the best? Do you think so? Ask one who is a judge; perhaps he may persuade you. I wish I could prevail with you to sing lower. Indeed, if you once come to feel what you sing, you will reform yourself. A great part of your singing will then be between God and your own soul; you will try to keep up melody in your heart, and that will mend both your voice and judgment. However, it will certainly put you upon trying to please both God and man in singing.

There is another very great and common abuse, which consists in the choice of improper portions. The person to whose judgment this is left is not always one of the wisest in the congregation. He may not understand the Psalms. He may misapply and profane them. It is not a rare thing for him to make them personal, and to apply the glorious things spoken of Christ to trifling parish business. I have heard the quarrels among neighbours sung over on Sundays. The clerk has chosen some passage, applicable entirely to the enemies of the Lord and his Christ, and has most grossly perverted it. The congregation had nothing to do with the dispute, and yet it was brought before them, and they were called upon in an ordinance to interest themselves in it. No doubt, this, and such like abuses, are a very great insult upon God's word and ordinance, and ought to be reformed. The people should understand the Psalm which they are going to sing, and should be well acquainted with its relation to Jesus Christ. They are all required to join; and therefore suitable portions should be chosen, in which all or the greatest part of them are interested; they should sing with one mind, and one heart, as well as in one tune: for which end the knowledge of the Psalm, and of whom, and of what it treats, are absolutely necessary. How can any one sing aright unto the Lord with grace in his heart, unless he understands whether the Psalm relates to praise or thanksgiving, to asking mercies of God, or praising him for them—what grace was to be exercising in seeing, faith, or hope, or love—and what blessing was to be expected from it? These things should be well known, that singing may be a reasonable service, and the means of grace. And to render it such, I have collected portions suitable to most cases of a Christian's experience, and have also prefixed the subject of each. I have also directed the believer with what frame of mind to sing, and what benefit to look for from the word of promise in singing. I wish the attempt may help to make the ordinance better observed, and then I am sure it will be more blessed.

There is another thing relating to the Psalms—I cannot call it an abuse, for it is a total neglect of them. They are quite rejected in many congregations, as if there were no such hymns given by inspiration of God, and as if they were not left for the use of the church and to be sung in the congregation. Human compositions are preferred to divine. Man's poetry is exalted above the poetry of the Holy Ghost. Is this right? The hymns which he revealed for the use of the church, that we might have words suitable to the praises of Immanuel, are quite set aside: by which means the word of man has got a preference in the church above the word of God; yea, so far as to exclude it entirely from public worship. It is not difficult to account for this strange practice. Our people had lost sight of the meaning of the Psalms. They did not see their relation to Jesus Christ. This happened when vital religion began to decay among us, more than a century ago. It was a gradual decay, and went on, till at last there was a general complaint against Sternhold and Hopkins. Their translation was treated as poor flat stuff. The wits ridiculed it. The profane blasphemed it. Good men did not defend it. Then it fell into such contempt, that people were ready to receive any thing in its room, which looked rational and was poetical. In this situation, the hymn-makers find the church, and they are suffered to thrust out the Psalms to make way for their own compositions: of which they have supplied us with a vast variety—collection upon collection, and in use, too—new hymns starting up daily—appendix added to appendix—sung in many congregations, yea, admired by very high professors, to such a degree, that the Psalms are become quite obsolete, and the singing of them is now almost as despicable among the modern religious as it was some time ago among the profane.

I know this is a sore place, and I would touch it gently, as gently as I can with any hope of doing good. The value of poems above Psalms is become so great, and the singing of men's words, so as quite to cast out the word of God is become so universal (except in the church of England), that one scarce dares speak upon the subject: neither would I, having already met with contempt enough for preferring God's hymns to man's hymns, if a high regard for God's most blessed word did not require me to bear my testimony; and if I did not verily believe, that many real Christians have taken up this practice without thinking of the evil of it; and when they come to consider the matter carefully will rather thank me, than censure me, for freedom of speech.

Let me observe, then, that I blame nobody for singing human compositions. I do not think it sinful or unlawful, so the matter be scriptural. My complaint is against preferring men's poems to the good word of God, and preferring them to it in the church. I have no quarrel with Dr. Watts, or any living or dead versifier. I would not wish all their poems burnt. My concern is to see Christian congregations shut out divinely inspired Psalms, and take in Dr. Watts' flights of fancy; as if the words of a poet were better than the words of a prophet, or as if the wit of a man was to be preferred to the wisdom of God When the church is met together in one place, the Lord God has made a provision for their songs of praise—a large collection, and great variety—and why should not these be used in the church according to God's express appointment? I speak not of private people or of private singing, but of the church in its public service. Why should the provision which God has made be so far despised, as to become quite out of use? Why should Dr. Watts, or any hymn-maker, not only take the precedence of the Holy Ghost, but also thrust him entirely out of the church? Insomuch that the rhymes of a man are now magnified above the word of God, even to the annihilating of it in many congregations. If this be right, men and brethren, judge ye. Examine with candour the evidence which has determined my judgment; so far as it is conclusive may it determine yours.

First, the Psalms are the word of God, with which no work of man's genius can be compared. His attributes are manifest in every page, and prove the author to be divine. His infinite wisdom shines throughout—his goodness appears to be matchless—his truth in every tittle infallible—his power almighty to bless the hearing, reading, and singing of his word. None that trusted in it was ever ashamed: for his faithfulness to it can never fail. The word of the Lord has been tried, and in very great difficulties, yea, in seeming impossibilities, but it was always made good. In every trial he "magnified his word above all his name;" he made it the means of bringing glory to his name and nature, and every perfection in Deity has been exalted by the faithfulness of God to his word. In this view of the Psalms, what is there to be put in competition with them? What man is like their author? What poetry is to be compared with the Psalms of God? Who can make the singing of any human verses an ordinance, or give a blessing to them, such as is promised, and is given to the singing of Psalms? For what reason then are they set aside in the church? Why are the words of man's genius preferred to the words of inspiration? Singing of Psalms is commanded by divine authority, and commanded as a part of divine worship; not left to man's wisdom how to provide for it, but is expressly provided for in the good word of God. And is not great contempt put upon this infinitely wise provision, when it is quite disused in the church, and man's word is preferred to it? What would you think of them who should throw aside all the scripture, and never read it at all in the congregation? And is it not an offence of the like nature, totally to neglect a part, a chief part of it, which was recorded for the use of the church, and in which its members were to sing the high praises of their God? It is hereby treated as useless and good for nothing. A very gross affront is put upon the love and wisdom which revealed this divine collection of hymns, and the church is deprived of the blessings promised to the singing of them, whereby it is robbed of one of its choicest treasures. If anything be sacrilege, this is. The Psalms are stolen out of the church, and thereby the members are deprived of the blessings promised to the singing of them: for God will not give you the end, if you neglect the means. Frequent are his commands in the Old Testament to sing Psalms, and we have several in the New: for instance, let the word (not something besides it, but the word) of Christ itself dwell in you richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in Psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs—these are not different things, but different names for the same collection of Psalms, as they treat of different subjects. Psalms in praise of Immanuel, such especially as have hallelujah at the beginning or end, are called Hymns, and the Psalms which relate to the spiritual things of Christ and his kingdom, have the title of Song set before them by the Holy Spirit, such as 7, 18, 30, 45, 46, 48, 65, 66, 67, 68, 75, 76, 83, 87, 88, 92, 108, from 110 to 135. These Hymns and spiritual Songs were part of the scripture and part of the Psalms, scripture Hymns and scripture Songs, for the word of Christ in singing them was to dwell in them richly; not man's word, but Christ's; and when the apostle is speaking of them altogether, he calls both the Hymn and spiritual Song a Psalm. We render the word ψαλλοντες making melody, but it means singing the Psalm, and is as if he had said—when you use a Hymn to the praise of God, or a spiritual Song to any spiritual purpose, sing the Psalm so that one may teach and admonish the other. It was a service in which each is commanded to join, and each was to endeavour in it to profit the other. They were to try so to sing with the melody of the heart to the Lord as at the same time to consult each other's profit, that while the Lord was glorified the church might receive edifying. Here is a full authority for the use of Psalms in the church, and a very clear direction how to sing them; and as following this direction was the divine means of making the word of Christ to dwell richly in believers, how poorly must it dwell in them who slight and despise the command, yea, so far as never to sing any Psalms at all.

If any real Christian would attend to this reasoning, how can he oppose it? Here is a collection of hymns appointed to be sung in the church by divine authority; but the authority is despised, and the collection is thrown aside. It comes from the inspiration of the Almighty, but the church entirely refuses to use it; is not this doing despite unto the Spirit of grace? The collection is large, and very particular in setting forth the praises of the adorable Immanuel; is it not a gross affront to him to sing none of his praises in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth? as if any praises were good enough for him, or as if he could be praised better in the words which man's wisdom teacheth. Men and brethren, consider whether this be not a very gross affront to the word of God, to the Spirit of God, and to the Son of God. Consider it well, and the Lord give you a right understanding in this matter.

Secondly, The singing of men's poems in the church, and setting aside the Psalms given by inspiration of God, is contrary to the prophecies of the Old Testament, and is an attempt to defeat them. They describe the state of the gospel church, and declare there should be great joy and gladness found in it; particularly they mention singing of Psalms, as the outward expression of their inward joy in the Lord. Thus we read, 1 Chron. xvi. 23, 24. "Sing unto the Lord all the earth, show forth from day to day his salvation: declare his glory among the heathen, his marvellous works among all the nations!" Of the same thing speaketh the prophet Isaiah, lvi. 6, 7. "Also the sons of the stranger that join themselves to the Lord to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants, even every one that keepeth the sabbath from polluting it, and taketh hold of my covenant, even them will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in mine house of prayer: their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted upon mine altar: for mine house shall be called an house of prayer for all people." How this joy was to be expressed, is mentioned in Psalm xcv. The prophet shows how believers should stir up one another to rejoice in singing Psalms: and St. Paul says this was written of the New Testament church. According to his explanation of the Psalm given in the 3d and 4th chapters of the Hebrews, the Holy Ghost here calls for the solemn worship of our Saviour, and requires him to be praised with Psalms: he presses this duty, together with public prayer, ver. 6, 7, and then demands obedient attention to the word of God, against which no man should harden his heart through unbelief: from whence it appears, that praising God solemnly, with singing Psalms, with public prayer, and with hearing the word, are still the ordinances of Christ, and are to continue to-day, even while it is called to-day, unto the end of the world. These prophecies have been fulfilled. The blessed gospel has brought joy and gladness into heathen lands, and this very day Psalms have been sung, and a pure offering of praise has been presented unto the Lord, and it will be presented unto him so long as there is a true church upon earth. What then shall we think of those pretended reformers, who have turned the Psalms out of the church, and who are acting as if they would try to defeat these prophecies? I wish they may not be found fighting against God: for they cannot stop their accomplishment. His word cannot be broken. As long as the earth shall continue, Psalms shall be sung in the church of Christ. In it there will always be found thanksgiving and the voice of melody, and these will be expressed in God's own way, in the matter, and words, and form of God's own appointment.

Consider this, ye who believe the scriptures to be the word of God: if you obey from the heart the form of doctrine therein delivered, you will begin to reason thus; yea, methinks I hear one of you say—Since God, by his sovereign grace, has put a new song in my mouth, it adds to my joy, that he has revealed the very words in which he would have me to praise him. He has foretold that the gospel should be received among the heathen, and that it should produce such effects as I now experience. Glory be to him, he has made me happy in Jesus, and my happiness is not only kept up, but I find it increases by singing the inspired Psalms of the Holy Ghost. Whoever leaves off the singing of Psalms, God forbid I should be of that number, I hope never to act so contrary to the honour of God, and to the profit of mine own soul.

Thirdly, Of the same sentiments has been the church of Christ in all ages: which is a strong argument in favour of Psalm singing. We know, from very clear testimony, that the Psalms were sung in the temple until its final destruction. We are certain that Christ made use of the Psalms. His apostles followed his example. The churches of Corinth, and Ephesus, and Colosse, made the singing of Psalms part of their public worship. Such of the twelve tribes as were scattered abroad, being persecuted for Christ's sake, did sing Psalms when they were in an happy frame: for they were commanded to do it by the apostle James. The church history affords abundant evidence of the use of the Psalms in every country converted to the faith, and of their being sung in the church, as a part of public worship. This has been the case in every age without interruption. The primitive Christians sung in all their church meetings. Eusebius says, in the second century, they sung Psalms in praise of Christ and his deity. In the time of Justin Martyr instrumental music was abolished, and he highly commends singing with the voice, because, says he, Psalms, with organs and cymbals, are fitter to please children, than to instruct the church. In the third century we read much of Psalm singing. Arius was complained of as a perverter of this ordinance. St. Augustine makes it a high crime in certain heretics, that they sung hymns composed by human wit. The sense in which the church of Christ understood this subject has been, till of late years, always one and uniform. Now we leave the ancient beaten path. But why? Have we found a better? How came we to be wiser than the prophets, than Christ, than his apostles, and the primitive Christians, yea, than the whole church of God? They with one consent have sung Psalms in every age. Here I leave the reader to his own reflections. There is one plain inference to be made from hence, none can easily mistake it. May he see it in his judgment, and follow it in his practice.

Fourthly, Singing of Psalms in the church is an ordinance commanded of God, prophesied of in the Old Testament, and hitherto fulfilled in the New. That Psalm singing is one of the means of grace has been shown before. It is part of public worship, enjoined of God, and to which he has promised his blessing. Now when you lay aside Psalms in the church, you at the same time cast out the ordinance: for they are inseparably one. The Psalm is the ordinance. Your practice speaks, as if you said—"We will neglect the means of increasing our joy in God; for we want no growing love to him, nor fresh communications of his love to us." Surely this is the language of those persons who live in the constant neglect of one of the divine ordinances. God appointed it in vain as to them. They make no more use of the Psalms, than if there were no such Hymns in being. And is not this opposing his authority? Is it not ungrateful to throw away his appointed means, and to think you can please him better with singing your own poetry than his? Is it not hurtful to yourselves? for in seeking the promised blessing in the way of will-worship, you certainly cannot find it. Because Fifthly, The blessing is promised to the ordinance. You cannot have the end without the means. The Psalms were revealed, that we might in singing them express our joy in God, and thereby improve it. They were for the exercise of grace, and for the increase of grace; that we might sing with grace in our hearts, and make one another's hearts warmer by singing. The word is one of the means of grace; by hearing it, faith cometh; by constant hearing, faith is established. If the word was never heard, how could faith come? If the word be entirely neglected, how can faith grow? Prayer is one of the means of grace: it is appointed in order to keep up communion with God, and to bring down daily supplies of mercies from him: Could those be had without asking? Certainly they could not. Singing of Psalms is also one of the means of grace: How can the blessing promised to the means be received, if no Psalms be sung? What sort of a church would it be, in which the word was never read, nor prayers nor singing of Psalms, nor any means of grace used? It could not be a church of Christ: because his presence with, and his blessings to his people, are promised to them in the use of the means. The blessing accompanies the ordinance, and is promised unto it; God has joined them together, and they must not be put asunder. He will give honour, he does give honour to his own means. He makes them answer the end of their institution. When the Psalms are sung in faith, they do rejoice the heart. The Holy Spirit blesses the singing, and causes mutual joy to abound, which is Sixthly, Another reason for preferring divine psalms to man's poems. The Psalms were for the church service. When the members met, we read of their singing together, both in the Old Testament and in the New. It was their joint offering of praise. The Psalms were appointed to be sung in the congregation, that one might admonish another, which we do, by joining with them, by making the word of Christ dwell more richly in them, and by exercising their graces with ours. Thus we show our fellowship in the gospel. When we all sing the same psalm, it is as if the church had but one mouth to glorify God. And we never enjoy more of the presence of God, than while we are thus praising him together with thankful hearts. The Lord, who instituted the ordinance, promised this blessing to it: but when his Psalms are thrust out, and human compositions sung in their room, what reason have the singers to expect that he will give his good Spirit to quicken their hearts, and to inflame their devotion? He did not promise mutual edification, but to the use of his own means. He would have believers to teach and to exhort one another, but it was in singing his own Psalms: and when they do, he has met them and blessed them, and always will: but he has given no promise to be present, whenever the church meet together in public to sing their own compositions, or to make them full of joy with the light of his countenance, when they have been doing despite to his Spirit, and putting dishonour upon his word.

Perhaps these sentiments may arise from my great attachment to the word of God, with which others may not be affected as I am: for I am persuaded it is not possible for me to set too high a value upon the holy scriptures—as the revelation of the will of God, I want words to express my respect for them—as the revelation of his good will in Jesus, I reverence them next to himself. What more precious? What more delightful? They are, indeed, more precious than gold, yea, than much fine gold: and the Psalms are sweeter than honey, yea, than the honey dropping from the comb. I find them so. They are my daily study, and daily delight. I do not boast, but praise. The more I read, the more I admire them. The description of Jesus in them is sweet: the meditation of him is sweeter than all other sweets. It often tastes so much of heaven, that it seems to me I cannot possibly bestow so much admiration upon the Psalms, as they deserve. This is my settled judgment confirmed by experience. I cannot help taking particular notice of this, because it fully confirms the arguments which have been before used.

Experience demonstrates, that God does bless the singing of psalms in the church, and does not bless the singing of men's hymns. It is a melancholy matter of fact, that in many congregations there is no reading of God's word, no singing of God's word. It is almost laid aside, even the great ordinance of God for all saving purposes. And what has followed? Truly, what might be expected; yea, what could not but follow. The Holy Spirit has been grieved, and has withdrawn his powerful presence. For want of which a deadness that may be felt is in such places. Of this good men have complained to one another, and are humbled for it before God. They find public worship without power. Prayer is lifeless. Preaching is voice and nothing more. It may be the truth, but the hearers are apt to fall asleep over it, and the preacher is no more animated, than if he was telling an old story. The channel of divine communication is quite stopped up: hence Ichabod may be seen and felt too upon such congregations. Reader, if thou art alive to God in thine own heart, thou knowest this to be true. And how does it affect thee? Certainly thou wilt join with me in begging of God to revive his work among us, and to put glory upon his ordinances. Oh that the Lord would return with his gracious presence to his worshipping people. May the Holy Spirit lead them to see their error in neglecting his established means of grace, especially his word read and sung. And whenever he does this, and wherever they put honour upon his word, there will he certainly put life and power into the ordinances, and the congregations shall again experience that God is among them of a truth.

And as God does not bless the singing of human compositions in his church, so it is a certain matter of fact, that he does bless the singing of his own Psalms. If the eyes of your understanding be opened, look around; where is the power of God most to be found? Among whom is he chiefly carrying on his work? And where are the liveliest congregations? If you know the present state of religion in this land, you can easily find them. God has made them very conspicuous. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. The builder of it did not intend it should. His gifts and graces are therefore conferred, that the giver may have all the glory. And who are most enriched with his gifts and graces? Are they not such as he has brought to use the means most? Who honour his word, never failing to make the reading of it part of public worship, and who never meet, but they sing out of the word the praises of their God. Among these the Lord the Spirit does work with power, and they do find in singing his Psalms, what they never find in singing men's poems. He makes all their church ordinances lively and edifying. He enables them to draw near to God in prayer, and they have happy communion with him: he hears, and answers. The word preached is mighty through God. Sinners are awakened. Mourners are comforted. Believers are strengthened. The word sung is also accompanied with the same power: the Psalms are made an ordinance indeed. The Holy Spirit works in and by them to keep up holy joy in believing hearts. He promised this, and the promise is fulfilled at this very hour. "The Lord shall comfort Sion, he will comfort all her waste places, and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord, joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving and the voice of melody." Blessed be God for these favours now bestowed upon the church of England. This prophecy is ours. Adored for ever be his love. He is now with us of a truth, and he has turned our wilderness into the garden of the Lord. We do not triumph for this in ourselves. We do not look down with contempt upon others. No, no. We acknowledge it to be the Lord's doing, to the praise of the glory of his own grace; and to him we look for the continuance of this inestimable blessing. O that he would bestow it abundantly upon those congregations, who have the form without the power. This is the fervent prayer of my heart. I am sure our joy will increase by their sharing with us. May the good Lord revive his work in all his churches, and may the life and power vouchsafed to some be found in all.

What can any unprejudiced person infer from hence? Is not the case plain? Where is the presence of God most to be found? Among the singers of poems, or the singers of Psalms? What says matter of fact? It speaks to the point, and determines in favour of God's word. The Holy Spirit does not put honour upon man's poems, when set up in the church in opposition to his divine Hymns. Yea, he disgraces them. He pours contempt upon them, as it might be expected he would: for he leaves the singers to themselves, and then their performance is without life and power. It keeps up no communion with God. It administers no holy joy. It is not the means of grace, but degenerates into a mere entertainment, and is the same thing in the church, that music is in the playhouse.

How can that be, says one, I am a witness to the contrary: I have found profit in singing hymns, and I am sure I have received pleasure. You may fancy so, but perhaps it is only fancy: for your practice confutes your profession. God has revealed the Psalms for the use of the church, he has commanded them to be sung in it, and has promised to meet his rejoicing people, and in singing to make their joy abound: but you despise the command, and therefore you can have no title to the promise. You cannot have the end without the means: while you slight the ordinance, how can you possibly receive the blessing promised to it? For the Holy Ghost will not vouchsafe his joy to them who seek it in opposition to his sovereign will: so that you might be pleased, but profited you could not. The profit is God's blessing upon the use of his own means, but you did not use the means; nay, you despised his, and followed your own self-will. What profit could such singing bring you? What fellowship could you have with God in it, or what joy in God increased by it? You may bring your poems into the church, and may be vastly delighted with performing them. So is the vainest creature alive at the opera. The pleasure in both cases arises from the same cause. The ear is pleased with the harmony, some animal joy is excited, a fine tune, well played, well sung, a very agreeable entertainment; but there could be no more spiritual edification in one than in the other: because neither of them was the ordinance of God.

What! say some, is it unlawful to sing human compositions in the church? How can that be? Why, they sing them at such a place, and such a place: great men, and good men, ay, and lively ministers too, sing them: will you set up your judgment against theirs?

It is an odious thing to speak of one's self, except it be to magnify the grace of God. What is my private judgment? I set it up against nobody in indifferent things: I would wish to yield to every man's infirmity: for I want the same indulgence myself. But in the present case the scripture, which is our only rule of judgment, has not left the matter indifferent. God has given us a large collection of hymns, has commanded them to be sung in the church, and has promised his blessing to the singing of them. No respect here must be paid to names or authorities, although they be the greatest on earth: because no one can dispense with the command of God, and no one can by his wit compose hymns to be compared with the Psalms of God. I want a name for that man, who should pretend that he could make better hymns than the Holy Ghost. His collection is large enough: it wants no addition. It is perfect as its author, and not capable of any improvement. Why in such a case would any man in the world take it into his head to sit down to write hymns for the use of the church? It is just the same as if he was to write a new Bible, not only better than the old, but so much better, that the old may be thrown aside. What a blasphemous attempt! And yet our hymn-mongers, inadvertently I hope, have come very near to this blasphemy: for they shut out the Psalms, introduce their own verses into the church, sing them with great delight, and as they fancy with great profit; although the whole practice be in direct opposition to the command of God, and therefore cannot possibly be accompanied with the blessing of God.

If any one be offended at my freedom of speech, I am sorry for it. I thought I had liberty to give mine opinion, especially in a matter wherein the honour of God, and of his word, required me to speak openly. Let this be mine apology. If you are not convinced, if you will still sing human compositions in preference to divine; pray do not quarrel with me. I am a man of peace. Go on your way, and let me go on mine. Let me sing God's psalms, and you may sing any body's hymns. I have borne my testimony. Forgive me this once, and after I have closed up the evidence with a very good witness, against whom the admirers of hymns can have no objection, I promise herein to offend you no more He is no less a person than the great Dr. Watts himself. He speaks full to the point, and gives his testimony very distinctly. He never intended, he says, to thrust the Psalms of God out of the church. His words in the preface to his hymns are these: "Far be it from my thoughts to lay aside the book of Psalms in public worship: few can pretend so great a value for them as myself: it is the most artful, most devotional, and divine collection of poesy; and nothing can be supposed more proper to raise a pious soul to heaven, than some parts of that book; never was a piece of experimental divinity so nobly written, and so justly reverenced and admired." Happy would it have been for the Christian world, if his followers had stopped just where he did. He declares it was far from his thoughts to do what they have done. It never came into his head to lay aside the book of Psalms in public worship. Think of this, and weigh it carefully, ye that idolize Dr. Watts, and prefer his poems to the infallible word of God. It would be well for you, if you valued psalms as much as he did: for he says none valued them more. Then you would have looked upon them in his light: for having already in your hands the most devotional and the most divine collection, you would not have thought of any other, knowing it was impossible to have a better, but you would have used this, and would have found it too, as Dr. Watts did, the most proper to raise the soul to heaven. Blessed sentiments! I honour the memory of Dr. Watts for this glorious testimony. I can say nothing that can bear harder upon those persons, who, contrary to his opinion, have entirely left off singing the Psalms of God in the church. He never intended to countenance such a practice. He declares it was far from his thoughts, yea, he abhorred the very thought, and in so saying he has upon record condemned it. Here I rest the matter. If the admirers of Dr. Watts will not be determined by his authority, I am sure they will not be mine: and therefore I take my leave of them Farewell. May the Lord guide you into all truth.

There are several abuses among us relative to the music, which I wish to see reformed, and some of which I would point out. We have many good psalm tunes, excellently composed and fitted for public worship. These should be studied, in order that they may be well sung, and properly applied. Sung well to avoid the tedious drawling manner in use in most of our churches, which gives offence to worldly people, and makes the ordinance dull and heavy to believers. Properly applied, and suited to the subject, that the sound may, as near as possible, express the sense: for want of understanding or attending to this, we very often hear a light tune to a mournful prayer, and heavy music set to a joyful psalm, which are grievous discords. In the service of God every thing should be solemn. Our own minds require it, as well as his greatness; but especially in praising him, we should try to shut out whatever would distract us, or dishonour him. When the heart is affected, or desires to be duly affected, with a sense of the exceeding riches of his mercy in Jesus, the psalm and the tune should help to excite, and to keep up the heavenly flame. If the psalm be proper for this purpose, the tune should not defeat it. This was much studied in the primitive church. They had great simplicity in their psalm singing, which we are told was corrupted by the heretics. Complaint is made particularly of Arius, that he perverted singing into an entertainment. He had a taste for music and he composed several light, frothy tunes, by which he sought to please trifling people, who, with him, neither loved the God, nor the praises of the God of the Christians. Herein he succeeded. His music was admired, and did a great deal of hurt. Let us take warning from hence. As far as we can, let our praises of God be sung with such music as will solemnize our hearts, and keep them in tune to make melody unto the Lord.

I will only mention one thing more, which is a great impropriety, and to me very offensive, and that is the posture generally used among us in singing. Suppose there had been nothing at all said about it in the scripture, judge ye with yourselves, men and brethren, whether it be respectful and becoming to sit down to sing. When subjects go upon any joyful occasion to address their sovereign, is it a custom in any nation of the world to do it sitting? Does the person who pays homage sit, or he who receives it? But it is not left to ourselves, or to what we may think right or wrong. The case is determined in scripture, and there are precedents to go upon. The singers and musicians stood, when they performed in the temple service: so did all the people, 1 Chron. ii. 28, &c. "The office of the Levites was to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of the Lord in the courts and in the chambers, and in the purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God: and to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at evening." This was their appointment; and we read of their fulfilling it, 2 Chron. v. 12, where it is said, "they stood at the east end of the altar:" and we are certain that all the congregation of Israel stood at the same time: for it is expressly mentioned. When the royal prophet is encouraging the priests and people in the heavenly work of praise, he thus addresses the priests, Psalm cxxxiv. "Behold, bless ye the Lord all ye servants of the Lord, who by night stand in the house of the Lord: lift up your hands in the sanctuary and bless the Lord. The Lord that made heaven and earth bless thee out of Sion." So again speaking to priests and people, Psalm cxxxv. "Praise ye the Lord, praise ye the name of the Lord: praise him O ye servants of the Lord: ye that stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God, praise ye the Lord, for the Lord is good: sing praises unto his name for it is pleasant." Standing to sing is recommended in those scriptures, and was accordingly practised both by clergy and laity: when they thanked the Lord morning and evening in the words of David the man of God, they sung his praises standing. It is a decent posture. People of fashion think it so: for they stand up even in the playhouse, at the Hallelujahs in the oratorio of the Messiah. Our very good church people think so: for if they sit down at the Psalm, they are sure to stand up at the Gloria patri. It is indeed highly becoming the majesty of the great King of heaven and earth, and it is also expressive of our readiness to join our brethren in praising his holy name. As such I would recommend it. The venerable practice of antiquity has something more to enforce it than mere propriety: at least it calls upon me to try to keep up an uniformity with the church of Christ in this particular. But if you think otherwise, and prefer sitting, lolling, or any lazy indolent posture, I will not unchristian you. We may differ, and not quarrel; nay, I will not quarrel with you, if you will but let me observe, when I see any person irreverently sitting down, after he has been called upon to sing to the praise and glory of God, and after a suitable psalm has been given out, it seems to me, as if he said—indeed his behaviour speaks louder than any words can—"You may sing, but I will not—I will exercise no grace—I want no more grace—I have no melody in my heart, and therefore I will make none with my mouth—I will take myself away while you are singing, and I will sit down to show that I have no part with you in this ordinance."

The abuses here complained of are not to be easily remedied. I know they are not; but I have done my duty. Some of them are of long standing, not soon to be rooted out. Some are the consequences of mere profession, which renders all ordinances ineffectual: for they are only blessed to any one, as he observes them in true faith. Others are not looked upon to be profanations of the ordinance, but refinements of it; against such I only deliver my sentiments, not from the chair, as a Pope; but I beg leave to give my opinion, and if I could, I would do it without offence. If any one be offended, I am sorry for it. I would not hurt a worm. However, we are all agreed I hope in one thing, and let us improve that. It is our joint desire to please God in singing his praises. If this be pursued, it will tend to reform every abuse relating to this ordinance. His glory should be aimed at with a single eye. When this is the ruling principle, the heart would enter into the service, and then it would soon influence the outward man. There would be no neglect, no contempt, no misbehaviour, if gratitude to God in Christ inspired our songs. We should love to present such praises and in such a manner, as would best express our thankfulness, and we should study to avoid every thing which would render them unprofitable to ourselves or others, or dishonourable to him.

Let me intreat you, men and brethren, never to forget this point. Set God always before you, whenever you are going to sing Psalms. Do it as in his presence and to his glory. If you think it your bounden duty to sing with your voices to be heard of one another, take heed that you sing with your hearts unto the Lord. Let it be the service of every faculty, and each exerted to the utmost. Praise your blessed Immanuel with your warmest gratitude. Give him the best you have. He richly deserves it. And remember you thereby pay him nothing again: you only give him his own. Your gratitude is the gift of his grace, and by it you only make acknowledgment of your vast obligations to him. O beg of him then to enable you to praise him with a growing sense of your debt, and of his increasing favours. And may you so praise him, as to find fresh reason to continue your praises from day to day, and for evermore.

Whoever is in this humble happy frame, will be kept from a temptation, into which most of our hymn singers have fallen. I have heard several of them, who would by no means be thought common rate understandings, object to Sternhold and Hopkins. They wonder I would make use of this version, which they think is poor flat stuff, the poetry is miserable, and the language low and base. To which I answer: they had a scrupulous regard for the very words of scripture, and to those they adhered closely and strictly; so much as to render the versification not equal to Mr. Pope. I grant, it is not always smooth: it is only here and there brilliant. But what is a thousand times more valuable, it is generally the sentiment of the Holy Spirit. That is very rarely lost. And this should silence every objection—it is the word of God. Moreover the version comes nearer to the original than any I have ever seen, except the Scotch, which I have made use of, when it appeared to me better expressed than the English. You may find fault with the manner of eking out a verse for the sake of rhyme; but what of that? here is every thing great, and noble, and divine, although not in Dr. Watts's way or style. It is not, like his, fine sound and florid verse: as good old Mr. Hall used to call it, Watts's Jingle. I do not match those Psalms with what is now admired in poetry; although time was, when no less a man than the Rev. T. Bradbury, in his sober judgment, thought so meanly of Watts's Hymns as commonly to term them Watts's Whymns. And indeed, compared to the scripture, they are like a little taper to the sun: as for his Psalms, they are so far from the mind of the Spirit, that I am sure if David was to read them, he would not know any one of them to be his.

Besides, you are offended at the scripture style, and Dr. Watts must mend it. This is owing to a very false taste. For the scripture wants no mending; nay, it is always worse for mending. It is plain in majesty. God has not written it to please the imagination, but to convert the heart, and to comfort and to edify the soul; therefore the inspired writers have used great plainness of speech. They disclaim all painted language and oratorical colouring. One of them, speaking for the rest, says—"We have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God; which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." To his words the understanding should bow, and with reverence receive them: because they are his. Curiosity should be dumb. It should make no inquiry: "Are they fine words, poetical, dressed up with flowers and metaphors, brilliant as Cowley, smooth as Pope." No, they are not; but they are revealed to make the man of God wise unto salvation, and they do. As such, the finest poetry of man is no more to be compared with them, than man is to be compared with God. His word is the great instrument of salvation. It is the ordinance of God for every saving purpose. He works in it and by it, and therefore it is plain and simple, that the glory may not be given to the means themselves, but to his almighty grace, which makes them effectual. How unlikely is the word preached so to change a sinner's heart, that he shall be as much a new creature, as if a devil was made an angel; and yet this effect is daily produced, and by plain preaching too. Thus the most successful preacher that ever was, declares—"My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power; that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of man, but in the power of God." And his power is promised, and is also experienced to this very day in the use of the means of grace. God does give his blessing to them. What more simple than the sacraments? Yet through Christ working mightily in them, they do answer the end of their institution? What so unlikely as prayer to obtain all needful blessings? and yet it is certain matter of fact, that the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. So the Psalms, not trimmed up with human embellishments, but in the simple dress of scripture, do communicate holy joy in the Lord. He blesses the means, because they are his own means, and when used in faith, he never fails to render them effectual. Here then let us look, not at fine words, but at God's word. Let us not be offended at its simplicity: for it is purposely so. It is written for profit, and not for amusement. As an instrument, it has not the virtue in itself, that the excellency of the power exerted by it may be of God. He would have all the glory. Our own joy in singing, and our neighbour's edification, shall not arise from fine poetry, but from his effectual grace. How much is it to be wished, that this was more regarded in singing Psalms. Then should we hear no more of this objection; but believers in the use of this, and of all the means of grace, would be seeking not entertainment, but communion with God, which is our highest privilege, and they would be expecting the improvement of it, which is their highest happiness.

Another objection may be made to this collection. If all the Psalms be alike the word of God, why should these be selected, and the rest excluded? I do not exclude any, not a letter or tittle. They are all of equal authority, all given by the inspiration of the Almighty. There is the same divine stamp and impression upon every word. For which reason I reverence what is left, as much as these: but these are sufficient for our use, and these, if rightly used, will lead us to understand and to value the rest. If any thing here said should be the means of explaining the subject of the book of Psalms, and of enabling believers to see more of the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, then they will not only value this collection, but will also, as occasion offers, sing the rest with increasing melody in their hearts unto the Lord.

The collection of Psalms, which I have here made, cannot be sung aright by any one, unless he thus aims at the glory of God. He must be a true believer in Jesus, and made sensible of the Father's love to him in his Son; because they are chiefly songs of praise, and require the music of the heart: he who is in tune to make the best melody, has the deepest sense of his obligations to free grace. He has found redemption through the blood of Jesus, and is convinced of his acceptance through the righteousness of Jesus. He sees all blessings, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, provided for him by the Father's love in the Son's fulness, and by the faith of the operation of the Holy Spirit he receives them, as he wants them, day by day. He feels himself a poor needy creature, unworthy of the least of those blessings, and while he is in this humble frame he is thankful for the least. Then he is most disposed to give the glory of all his mercies to the eternal Three, and to acknowledge his debt in every appointed way. This makes him desirous of profiting others by singing the praises of that good God, who has so exceedingly loved him, and herein he has an especial regard to his brethren in Christ. As a church-member he frequents ordinances, enters into the spirit of them, prays in the Holy Ghost, hears and mixes faith with the word, sings with the congregation, and with his heart and voice tries to increase their melody. He lives the Christian. In his walk and conversation he shows forth the praises of God. He glorifies his Father which is in heaven, before men, and lets them see, that they who are happy believers in Jesus, have found their heaven upon earth. Thus he goes on his way, singing and rejoicing in the Lord—ready to join the great concert of saints and angels—yea, he does join, ascribing with them all the good he has, and hopes for, to the free grace of the holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity.

Reader, art thou one of this happy number? Is thy heart in tune to sing Psalms of praise to thy God? Is he thy Father which art in heaven, and dost thou love him for the unspeakable gift of his Son? Until he be known to thee in this dear relation, thou canst not be happy in him either in earth or heaven. If thou art thinking he has mercy in store for thee, how wast thou brought to believe it? Was it in God's appointed way, and in his means? Didst thou hear his word declaring what thy state was, and didst thou yield to its testimony, persuaded thou wast under guilt and in great danger? Wast thou convinced of the exceeding sinfulness of sin, how abominably filthy it made thee in the sight of an holy God—how guilty in the sight of a just God, and how utterly helpless it has left thee in thyself? Did this conviction follow thee? Wast thou made deeply and thoroughly sensible, that thou canst do nothing for thyself, but hasten on thy ruin? Such is thy captivity to sin, all the powers and faculties of thy soul and body are in such bondage to it, that thou canst do nothing but serve it, yea, thou art such a willing slave, that if God leave thee to thyself, thou wilt go on sinning through time, and sinning through eternity.

Didst thou never see thyself in this state? The scripture declares, that thou art by nature a child of wrath—and dost not thou believe the word of God? Are its threatenings an idle tale? What! art thou still asleep in the arms of sin, in the midst of the thunder of the vengeance of God—still dreaming of happiness in the ways of sin, which God assures thee in his word will lead thee to destruction? Oh desperate delusion! May God deliver thee from it. May the eternal Spirit accompany his own message, and send it to thy heart. "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

If thou hast been made sensible of thy danger, what thinkest thou of Christ? If thou hast seen thyself a lost sinner, who is to save thee? To whom, or to what dost thou look for help? To man, or to God? To thyself, or to Christ?

To thy works, or his? Is Christ become thine only object? Examine with care: for there is but one right way to the city of habitation. "I am the way," says Jesus. Be assured there is salvation for thee in no other. Nothing can wash thee clean, but the atoning blood of Jesus. Nothing can justify thee, but his righteousness. His all-sufficient grace alone can keep thee in the way to heaven. He alone can present thee spotless there before the throne. Every other hope will disappoint thee but hope in Jesus. One day all the rest will prove refuges of lies. If thou buildest on them now with confidence, they will fail thee at the bar of God. Thou wilt then find, that other foundation can no man lay, than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

If thou art enabled to build upon this rock, happy art thou. Hail, thou that art highly favoured: the Lord is with thee. He has encouraged thee to place the whole weight of thy salvation upon the work of Jesus, who is Immanuel, the Creator, and the Supporter of all worlds, visible and invisible. Trust in him, and be not afraid: for he is almighty to save. And he has given thee his infallible promises to satisfy thee, that in him thou art safe from all thy sins, and from all thine enemies. Oh how establishing are his own words! Thus he speaketh to thee—"Whosoever cometh unto me, and heareth my sayings, and doeth them, I will show you to whom he is like: he is like a man, who built a house, and digged deep, and laid the foundation on a rock, and when the flood arose, the stream beat vehemently upon that house, and could not shake it: for it was founded upon a rock." How happy is thy state! Thou art come to him at his bidding, thou hast heard his sayings, and art doing them in faith: survey thy safety and bless the Lord. Thou art the wise man, who builds on a foundation contrived by infinite wisdom, and supported by almighty power, "Behold," says the Father, "I lay in Sion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone," &c. The Father chose his co-equal Son, on whom he would build his whole church; he is therefore called an elect foundation; and sure, as sure as God can make it; his will and word, his arm and love secure the foundation and every thing built upon it. Try it again and again, and thou wilt find how sure it is. This is another of its divine excellences—it is a tried foundation, none ever built on it and were confounded. Believers have made trial of it in every age, and it always answered their hopes: indeed how could it fail them? For the divine Architect has so strengthened every part of his structure, that the gates of hell cannot prevail against it. How precious then is this foundation! "To them that believe he is precious." All the beauties and pleasures in heaven and earth are to be found in his fulness, and in the creature only as a drop out of the ocean. Unsearchable riches are his: so are eternal glories. Blessed is the man who is living upon his fulness. While he is receiving out of it grace for grace, oh how precious is Jesus! especially while he is hoping to receive out of the same fulness the glory that is to be revealed: for he shall not be disappointed of his hope; because "the righteous hath an everlasting foundation." He is built upon the rock of ages, and is kept there by the power of God. Oh happy, thrice happy believer. Again survey thy mercies—see how many, how great they are—to thy body—to thy soul—family, church, national mercies—sure and covenant mercies. Who is like unto thee saved by the Lord? The Father is thine with all his love. The Son is thine with all his salvation. The Holy Spirit is thine in all his offices, to comfort, to strengthen, and to sanctify thee, to lead thee safe by his counsel, till he bring thee unto glory. And this is also thine with its richest blessings—eternal life is the free gift of God to thee through Jesus Christ thy Lord. Oh, what has God done for thee! saved from deserved destruction, and saved with such a salvation, so wrought out for thee, so secured to thee, and for ever, what could God do more? Now thou hast learned the subject of praise, and canst make sweet melody with these words—"I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry; he brought me up also out of the horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings: and he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." None can learn this new song, except he be redeemed from the earth—a saved sinner, delivered from the pit of corruption, and finding his feet set fast upon the rock of salvation, sings it from experience. He feels what he sings. His heart and mouth go together in blessing the Lord his God. Now he wants no comment upon the Psalms of praise. He is taught them by the Holy Spirit, and can sing them with delight. A grateful sense of the divine favours freely conferred upon him keeps him in tune, humble and thankful. And this is the right frame of mind to offer up the sacrifice of praise, with which God is well pleased. He accepts it from saints and angels round the throne, and he accepts it also from us, when we present it in their spirit. The humblest upon earth pay him the highest service, as he declares—"Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me."

Reader, is this thine experience? Dost thou sing Psalms, and didst thou learn to sing them in this way? Wast thou enabled by faith to love God in Christ, and art thou now blessing him with a rejoicing heart? Is his glory the end and aim of all thy services? If it be (but beware of mistakes) then thou art accepted in Jesus, and so are thy songs. May thy delight in singing them increase. I wish to be a helper of thy joy, and to that end let us take a short review of the subject. Thou wilt see the graces needful for singing of Psalms, and if thou findest God has bestowed them upon thee, then make use of them: offer up through Jesus Christ thy sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of thy lips, giving thanks to his name.

1. Dost thou understand the subject of the book of Psalms, and enter into it in singing? Dost thou see the praises of Immanuel celebrated throughout, and canst thou take up the words and sing them with melody in thy heart? Being one with Jesus by faith, and a partaker of his fulness, thou wilt see a new glory in the Psalms; for thou wilt read thine own interest in all that Christ is and has, and wilt make use of it too, receiving from him grace for grace. This will inspire thy soul with warm devotion to the Lord Christ, and will lead thee greatly to prize this blessed book. Thou will delight to

2. Study the scripture names of it. Dost thou attend to them? Have they their proper weight with thee, so as to convince thee thoroughly, that the Saviour in his several offices and works is the person treated of in the book of Psalms? The different names are only to describe him in different views as the Giver of every blessing in earth and heaven, Hymns to celebrate his praises, Spiritual Songs to set forth the glory of his kingdom, and the happiness of his subjects. Psalms and Hymns, and spiritual Songs, altogether intended to raise the affections of the soul to as high a pitch of love to Immanuel, as we are capable of, while in the body.

3. When thou art reading the Old Testament or the New, and observing the passages in which the Psalms are mentioned, do they farther confirm thee in the belief of their being written concerning Christ? And mixing faith with them, do they warm thy heart with gratitude to Jesus, and stir thee up to sing his praises with increasing delight? But, above all, consider

4. How thou singest the Psalms. Examine. Art thou made a new creature in Christ Jesus, and a partaker of his Spirit? Dost thou then sing with thine understanding, and with thy heart, singing Psalms as an ordinance of God to exercise grace, and to increase the grace which he has given? And dost thou indeed find it profitable to thyself, and edifying to others?

5. Dost thou keep up the harmony in thy life? Is thy walk in concord with thy Psalms? Art thou showing forth the praises of Jesus in thy conversation? What! is all consistent and of a piece? Are thy heart, and voice, and life, in tune to thank the Lord for his goodness, and to declare the wonders which he hath done for thy soul? Oh this is heavenly music. Happy man, to whom it is given thus to live the Christian. May there be no discord in thy tempers and walk, but may all within and without thee conspire in sweet concert to bless thy Lord and thy God.

6. If the Lord has thus enabled thee to sing, and to love his praises, then, art thou humble enough to study to please others as well as thyself in singing, that they may be edified? If there has been any abuse in this ordinance, dost thou stand corrected, and art willing to reform? Is it thy desire in public singing to give no offence to outward people, but above all to give none to the church of God? This is the Christian temper. Show it. Let it appear that the mind is in thee, which was also in Christ Jesus. Aim, in singing, at the profit of others. Look not to thyself alone, that thou bearest thy part, with thine understanding, heart, and voice, but endeavour also to edify the church. See thy neighbour be benefited according to the command—"Teach and admonish one another in Psalms," &c Let this and all other things in the congregation be done to edifying.

If, upon careful inquiry, thou dost understand those truths, dost thou experience the power and comfort of them? Art thou indeed a living Christian, capable of singing them with melody in thy heart unto the Lord? If this be thy happy case, then accept this collection of Psalms, which I here present to thee, not in preference to any of those here omitted, or to exclude any of them, but only as a sufficient number for our regular service. Go, and make use of them, and the Lord be with thee. May he render them profitable to thine own soul, and edifying to his body the church. Pray for grace to glorify him more in this ordinance. It will soon be thy whole employment. Yet a very little while, and thou wilt have nothing to do, but to enjoy and to praise Immanuel for evermore. May thy heart now feel something of this heaven: and if it please him, may thy happiness daily increase, in the enjoyment of, and thankfulness for, all covenant mercies, till thou art admitted to the general assembly and church of the first-born, to join with them in ascribing all the glory of thy salvation to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, three persons in one Godhead, to whom be equal and everlasting praises. Amen.
